PREFACE

I. The Origin of the Dictionary.

THIS Dictionary owes its origin to two facts, not altogether unrelated: In the first place, the existence of a general need, frequently expressed in many quarters, as not being supplied by the two comparatively recent Biblical dictionaries of Hastings and Cheyne. These dictionaries have been found to be too discursive to answer the purpose of handy and ready-reference books. In addition to this fundamental objection, their high price has made it impossible for many to purchase them who are desirous of having in their possession an accurate, modern Bible Dictionary.

The second fact was the appearance in Germany of the one-volume Bibelwörterbuch, edited by Professor Hermann Guthe. This work attracted the attention of the Funk & Wagnalls Company, who planned at first to have it translated and thus put before the English reading public. It was found, however, on investigation that Guthe's work would involve so much editorial revision in order to adapt it to an American or a British public that the idea of translating it was abandoned, and it was determined to construct an absolutely new Dictionary, altogether independent of any existing one, which it was hoped would meet the demands of the situation. Of this effort the present work is the result.

II. The Problem of the Dictionary.

The construction of a modern single-volume English Bible Dictionary, accurate and abreast of modern scholarship, presents a complicated problem. For the production of such a book there must be an understanding of the material with which it has to deal; there must be an appreciation of the constituency to which it is to minister; and there must be an intelligent consciousness of the critical position to which its purpose commits it.

(1) The material with which an English Bible Dictionary has to deal is the contents of the English Bible. The English Bible, however, is simply a version, and behind its English terminology are the Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek originals. As a consequence, the Dictionary, while it reproduces the words and phrases of the English Bible in its titles, must treat them primarily with reference to the Hebrew, Aramaic, or Greek terms which underlie them. In other words, its task must be the explication of a terminology drawn in the first place from the English Bible, but not from the point of view of English philology or etymology, but from the point of view of the underlying terminology of the originals.

(2) The constituency had in view in such a Dictionary is determined largely by the facts which have called the book into existence. It is a constituency which is much wider than the class of distinctive scholars, continually engaged in Bible study, familiar with Hebrew and Greek, and having a first-hand acquaintance with the field of modern Biblical research. It is made up of the educated ministry, who, while possessed of technical scholarship, have not always the leisure to enter into a discursive presentation of critical research; besides this, it includes the Sunday-school teachers and workers, who in most cases have not had the benefit of a technical education in Bible study and yet desire and appreciate all that Biblical scholarship can give them of its results; and, finally it includes the intelligent laymen interested in Bible study, but not acquainted with Hebrew, or in many cases with Greek. For this widely extended circle of interested Bible students the Dictionary, to be of service, must avoid being too scholastic in its general character. It should be accurate in its presentation of facts, but not so technical as not to be easily understood; it should be up to the day in its information, but not so discursive as to burden its pages with the pedantry of undigested facts. What it gives should be given in such a way as not to repel the busy man and woman of to-day, but to help them in their understanding of the Bible, which they wish to read intelligently and to study with a view to the best results for themselves and others.

(3) The critical position to which such a Dictionary is necessarily committed must be one of acceptance of the proved facts of modern scholarship, of open-mindedness toward its still-debated problems, and of conservation of the fundamental truths of the Christianity proclaimed and established in the message and mission of Jesus Christ. The constituency to which the Dictionary appeals is not to be helped by an apologetic method that ignores what a reverent critical scholarship has brought to light regarding the Book of the Christian religion; nor is it to be served by a radical spirit so enamored of novelty and opposed to tradition that it would seek to establish a new religion on the ruins of the historical facts of Christianity. It can be ministered to only by a clear, charitable, uncontroversial presentation of the results which a century and a half of earnest, conscientious, painstaking, self-denying study of the Bible has secured, to the end that all students and readers of the Book may be led into its more intelligent understanding and its more spiritual use.

III. The Principles Guiding the Editors.

Such being the character of the problem, the principles guiding the editors in the constructing of the Dictionary have been the following:

(1) The text of the American Standard Edition of the Revised Bible (copyright, 1901, by Messrs. Thomas Nelson & Sons, New York) has been made the standard English text of the Biblical citations and references. At the same time, it is evident that, the Dictionary being intended for English readers in general, this text could not be adhered to exclusive of any reference to that of the English Revision of 1881 (copyright by the Oxford University Press, Oxford, England) which occupies in British countries relatively the same position as that held by the American Revision in this country; much less could there be an ignoring of the Authorized Version of 1611, which in all English-speaking countries still maintains, and is certain to continue to maintain for some time to come, a position of great respect and considerable use. In fact, in so far as the Dictionary concerns the English Bible as a version of its original languages, it must, while adopting a standard English text, have constant reference to such varieties of interpretation as the English versions actually in use present.

(2) The Concordance to the English Bible has been made the basis of the list of titles. At this point the editors were confronted with a peculiar difficulty; for there is as yet no complete concordance of the American Revised text. The nearest approach to any such work that was at their disposal is the elaborate Concordance of James Strong, S.T.D., LL.D., which indicates the passages in the Authorized Version where changes were made in the Revision of 1881, and which shows these changes in a comparative table, but contains no concordance of them. While every effort has been made to supply this fundamental lack, it is more than likely that some terms in the American Revision have been inadvertently omitted. Apart from this, however, it is obvious that this basal relation of the concordance to the list of titles does not mean that all the words in the concordance have been given a place in the list of titles. The purpose of the Dictionary is not to record the contents of the Bible, but to give information and instruction regarding such parts of the Bible contents as may be of service to Bible readers and students. Furthermore, it is clear that not all the contents of the Bible which call for such treatment belong legitimately to a Bible Dictionary; for, again, the purpose of such a Dictionary is not to do the work of an English lexicon or grammar. There are not a few obsolete English words and phrases —especially in the Authorized Version—which are subjects of interesting study in our own language, but are without significance in the underlying original languages of the Bible. These can safely be omitted, and both the space and the dignity of the Dictionary be conserved. Still further, there are words and phrases which so obviously belong to the field of ordinary Bible comment, having little or no significance in the study of the Bible, that there would be no real service rendered the student or the reader in considering them. The Dictionary is not intended to do the work of the general English commentary any more than of the general English lexicon. With these exceptions, however, the effort has been made to include in the list of titles every term in the American Revision.

(a) This being the working list, it will be found as a matter of fact that its larger part consists of names of persons and places. These resolve themselves into two classes, the more important and the less important. As to the latter class, it has been impossible in many cases to do more than record the Bible statements, there being nothing known beyond them. But even in doing this the endeavor has been to place these statements in the critical connections to which they belong, the purpose of the Dictionary being not simply to gather Bible references, but to present results of scholarship wherever they have been secured. As to the former class, the endeavor has been to treat them not only in regard to the facts of the Bible record, but also and more especially in regard to the relation which they sustain to the progress of the history and the development of the religion contained within and connected with the Bible. This, the editors believe, will be conspicuously evident in the most important articles in this class—such as those on Assyria, Babylonia, Egypt, Asia Minor, and Palestine on the one hand, and those on Moses, David, Elijah, Jeremiah, John the Baptist, James, Peter, John, and Paul on the other. It will be found at its best in what has been written of the One Supreme Personality in all religion.

(b) Closely connected with these person and place articles and necessitated by the historical method employed in their treatment will be found a class of articles presenting in larger compass the general subjects of the History of Israel, Semitic Religion, Greek and Roman Religions, Ethnography and Ethnology, with a specific discussion of the politico-religious parties of the New Testament times, and the Religious Thought and Life and Institutions of the Jewish People.

(c) Conversely, in the direction of the details of the people's civic and domestic life, the reader of the Dictionary will find articles on such subjects as Crimes and Punishments, Law and Legal Practise, Family and Family Law, Marriage and Divorce, Money, Trade and Commerce, Agriculture, Artisan Life, Disease and Medicine, Dress and Ornaments, Burial and Mourning Customs.

(d) It is impossible, however, in any study of the Bible to dissociate the history and life of the people from the literature in which the history has been recorded and the life has found expression. Necessarily, therefore, the plan of the Dictionary has included a discussion of the origin, composition, and characteristics of the Bible writings, together with those of the Apocrypha and of the more important writings in the apocalyptic literature. In the treatment of these writings the editors have been influenced by a consideration of the readers for whom the Dictionary is intended, and have sought, consequently, not so much to enter into the details of the critical problems involved as rather, along with a plain statement of the critical facts which scholarly investigation has brought to light, to unfold the significance of the writings in their connection with the history which they record and the teachings which they present. This will account for the space devoted to the analysis of the contents of the respective books and for the treatment in many of them of their theological position. With a treatment of the Biblical books naturally is connected a treatment of the languages in which they were written, of the text in which they have been preserved, and of their collection into the canons of the Old and New Testaments.

(e) From such a treatment of the Biblical literature it follows that there must be some specific presentation of the theological teachings of the Bible, as a whole. The plan of the Dictionary confessedly did not permit it to enter the field of systematic theology; but equally, it did not admit of its ignoring the Biblical basis on which this science is founded—the point in fact at which the Bible is perhaps most profoundly searched and studied. The editors consequently determined upon including among the articles the fundamental doctrines on which the Scriptures themselves give utterance, such as Faith, Repentance, Atonement, Sin, Forgiveness, Grace, together with such presupposed doctrinal facts as God, such doctrinal inferences as Predestination, and such general fields of doctrinal thought as Eschatology.

In all these varied directions it has been the endeavor of the editors to maintain the purpose of the Dictionary to present to the readers and students of the Bible the results of a reverent scholarship, committed to the accepted facts of criticism, open-minded to its unsettled problems, and thoroughly loyal to the basal truths of an evangelical Christianity.

It is difficult to measure the help to the editorial work which has come from the sympathetic interest of the contributors to the undertaking. The editors desire that their appreciation of the assistance which has thus been rendered them shall not be underestimated. In addition, they would acknowledge the courtesy of the authorities of the BRITISH MUSEUM in permitting the use of illustrations taken from their magnificent collection of antiquities as well as the generous use which the PALESTINE EXPLORATION FUND and the EGYPTIAN EXPLORATION FUND have permitted of the cuts which their records contain of the valuable finds made at Gezer and elsewhere.

Thanks are due also to Professor JOHN R. S. STERRETT, of Cornell University, for the map of the Pauline world; to Professor SAMUEL DICKEY, of McCormick Seminary, for the excellent photographs of Oriental scenes and places gathered by him while in Palestine and the East; to Dr. LEWIS GASTON LEARY, of Pelham Manor, N. Y., for photographs taken by himself of the tombs of the Cave of Machpelah; to Professor LEWIS BAYLES PATON, of Hartford Seminary for his map of Jerusalem, and to him in conjunction with Professor ELIHU GRANT, of Smith College, for the admirable photographs of objects included in the complete collection of articles of dress and utensils of domestic and agricultural life gathered by him and his devoted wife during their year in Jerusalem and Palestine.

The editors would not forget the constant kindness of Professor CHARLES SNOW THAYER, the librarian of the Case Memorial Library of Hartford Seminary, and of his assistants, Mr. ANANIKIAN and Doctor CHAPMAN, in the bibliographical details of the Dictionary; and also the painstaking care of Mr. EDWARD F DONOVAN, of the publishers' editorial staff, in correcting the proofs for the press, particularly in the care of the Hebrew text and its transliteration. To Miss ETHEL L. DICKINSON special thanks are due for her efficient service in preparing the manuscript for the printers.

HELPFUL HINTS FOR THE GUIDANCE OF THE READER

Box-heads: The larger articles will be found to be divided into sections hy box-heads numbered consecutively, no matter how large the article may be or how it may be divided otherwise. This is done to facilitate easy cross-reference. Wherever any reference is made to these longer articles, the number of the box-head section is given, so that it may be turned to and found instantly, e.g.:

> When the box-head section to which reference is made is a long one and the term referred to it is treated only there, this term is printed in heavy-faced type. In this way it is believed the value of the Dictionary as a ready-reference book will be greatly enhanced.

Quotation-Marks: In the use of single and double quotation-marks, the plan has been to use double marks for all literal quotations from the English Bible (including single terms, in so far as they are used as terms employed in the English Bible) or from other literature. Single quotation-marks are used for terms or expressions that are definitive in character or have a somewhat technical significance, and for literal translations of the Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek when such translation does not agree verbally with the rendering of the English Bible, and for other literal translations, including the meanings given to the Hebrew, Aramaic, or Greek originals.

Proper Names: In the case of proper names, the meanings have been given wherever they are known or can be ascertained with a fair degree of probability. In a great many cases this is not possible, and consequently no meanings have been assigned.

Transliteration: In the transliteration of the Hebrew the aim has been to enable the English reader to understand, as easily as possible, how the Hebrew words should be pronounced, and also to avoid the unnecessary printing of large numbers of Hebrew words. The system used is slightly different from that in general use, a few modifications having been made for the sake of greater simplicity.

In regard to the vowels, no distinction has been made between the natural-long and tone-long, both alike being marked as long by a ¯ over the vowel letter. The hatephs are indicated by an inverted caret, thus, ă, ĕ, ŏ. Vowels with no mark are short. The indistinct sh^{e}was are indicated by small superior letters, nearly always ^{e} or ^{o}.

The following table indicates how the vowels are to be pronounced:

ā long, as in father,		a short, as in fat,		ă very short
ē	" " " prey,	e	" " " met,	ĕ	" "
ī	" " " ravine,	i	" " " pin,
ō	" " " tone,	o	" " " not,	ŏ	" "
ū	" " " lute,	u	" " " put,
^{a}, ^{e}, ^{o}, merely a breathing—not a full vowel sound.

In pronouncing a transliterated Hebrew word the following general rules will be of service:

There are as many syllables as there are vowels, and every syllable must begin with a consonant (א = ' and ע = ‘ are consonants).

As a rule, a consonant with the vowel following forms a syllable.

When two consonants, or a double one, occur between two vowels, the first consonant unites with the preceding vowel to form or complete a syllable, while the second consonant takes the vowel following it. A final consonant belongs with the syllable of the vowel preceding it.

Hebrew words are, as a rule, accented on the last syllable, but if both vowels of the last two syllables are short the accent will generally be placed on the syllable next before the last.

The transliteration of the Hebrew consonants is exhibited in the following table. The letters בּ, גּ, דּ, כּ, פּ, תּ have each two sounds, a hard and a soft. When pointed with a daghesh, e.g., בּ, these letters have a hard sound; when without a daghesh, a soft sound. With the exception of גּ, these two sounds are easily represented in English by b and bh (= v), d and dh, k and kh, p and ph, t and th. But as gh does not well represent the sound of undagheshed ג, it seemed best not to attempt to make any distinction in regard to this letter, but to allow the one letter g answer for both the hard and soft ג.

Hebrew and Arabic words are transliterated according to the following tables:

HEBREW

א = ʾ	מ, ם = m
ב = b, ב = bh (i.e., v)	נ, ן = n
ג = g, gh	ס = s (emphatic s)
ד = d, ד = dh (i.e., th as in the)	ע = ʿ (a guttural, gasping sound)
ה = h	פ = p, פ, ף = ph
ו = w	צ, ץ = ts
ז = z	ק = q
ח = ḥ (i.e., a guttural h)	ר = r
ט = ṭ (palatal t)	שׁ = s
י = y	שׁ = sh
כ = k, כ, ך = kh (like a Scotch ch)	ת = t, ת = th
ל = l

ARABIC

KEY TO PRONUNCIATION

Throughout this book the Scientific Alphabet, prepared and promulgated by The American Philological Association, and adopted by the Standard Dictionary of the English Language, has been used to indicate pronunciations. Where two or more pronunciations are given, the first is the one preferred by this work. Respellings of simple words have been omitted as unnecessary.

Two pronunciations are intended by the diacritics ⌢ and ⌣ below a vowel: (1) a formal pronunciation; (2) an approved colloquial weakening. The mark ⌢ indicates that the colloquial weakening is toward u in b*u*t. The ⌣ mark indicates that the colloquial weakening is toward i in p*i*ty.

ɑ	as in sof*a*.	o	as in *o*bey.	iu	as in d*u*ration.

The pronunciation given immediately after the titles, when these are Hebrew proper names, is that preferred by the Standard Dictionary. A comparison of this pronunciation with the transliteration of these names will show the difference between the modern English pronunciation of such names and the Hebrew pronunciation.

A STANDARD BIBLE DICTIONARY

A

AARON, ār'ʊn (אַהֲרֹן, 'ahărōn): Son of Amram and Jochebed, descendant of Levi through Kohath, and three years older than his brother Moses (Ex 6 16 ff.; Nu 33 39).

The Biblical representation of his character, negative and shadowy as compared with Moses', may be considered under two aspects, the historical and the official. A clue to the seemingly contradictory delineations of A. is found in the documentary analysis (see HEXATEUCH). (a) The account of E. This writer, consistently with the point of view of a historian in N. Israel, where the tribe of Levi had no vested rights (cf. I K 12 31), does not represent A. as a sacrosanct priest. He comes to meet Moses (Ex 4 14), supports him in war (Ex 17 12) and jurisprudence (Ex 24 14). He yields to the people and makes the Calf (Ex 32), and with Miriam mutinies against Moses (Nu 12). He is present at the sacrificial covenant meal between Israel and the Kenites (Ex 18 12). The account of his death in Dt 10 6 (from E) is different from that in Nu 20 22 ff. (P). According to Dt it occurred at Moserah, seven stations from Mt. Hor (cf. Nu 33 30 ff.), in the early months of the wandering because of the sin of the Golden Calf. In E Joshua, instead of A., serves in the Tent (Ex 33 11).

1. The Historical Aspect.

(b) The account of J. J records only the covenant meal on Sinai (Ex 24 1, 2, 9-11) and the vague charge that Aaron "let the people loose" (Ex 32 25). Aaron seems to be an afterthought in J's plague narrative (cf. Ex 8 25). In both J and P Moses is the vicegerent of deity and Aaron is Moses' prophet (Ex 4 16, J; 7 1, P).

(c) The view of the Law of Holiness and of Ezekiel. In Lv chs. 17–26 A. appears only in redactional passages connecting the Law of Holiness with its present context. In Ezk 40–48 Zadok, not A., is the eponym of the priestly line (44 15, etc.).

(d) View of P. In P Aaron is regularly subordinated to Moses. The first three simpler plagues Aaron brings on at Moses' command; thereafter Moses himself is the actor. In the narratives (Nu 16, 17) it is Moses in each case who vindicates him. A. dies at Mt. Hor in the 40th year of the Exodus (Nu. 20 22 ff., 33 38), because of rebellion at Meribah (cf. Dt as above).

In Ex 25–30 and 35–40, and in Lv and Nu Aaron's name occurs frequently, but evidently as a convenient priestly symbol demonstrating the priestly function to the people (cf. the usage in Ezk). What was done to and for Aaron was what should be done with any high priest. The ceremonial enduement prescribed in Ex chs. 28, 29 and Lv ch. 8 is a manual for the sanctuary ritual. The historicity of Aaron himself and of the Aaronic descent of the priestly line need not be doubted, but we must recognize that the prominence of his name in Ex and Nu reveals and emphasizes the necessity felt for prescriptive rights for the priesthood.

2. The Official Aspect.

A. S. C.

AARONITES. Only in I Ch 12 27, 27 17; cf. PRIESTHOOD, §§ 7 and 8a.

AB, ab: The fifth month of the Jewish year. See TIME, § 3.

ABADDON, ə-bad'ən (אֲבַדּוֹן, 'ăbhaddōn), only in Rev 9 11 as the Hebrew original of Apollyon, 'Destroyer': A name of Hades personified. In the O T (Heb. text) the term Abaddon appears in its stricter etymological sense of 'destruction' (Job 26 6, 28 22, 31 12; Pr 15 11; Ps 88 11; also Wis 18 22, 25). In some of these passages destruction is spoken of as performing functions belonging to a person. This is the beginning of the personification which culminates in the apocalyptic figure of an angel, exercising kingly authority over the abyss (Hades). See also ESCHATOLOGY, § 18.

A. C. Z.

ABAGTHA, ə-bag'thə (אֲבַגְתָא, 'ăbhagtha'): A chamberlain who served in the presence of Ahasuerus. See CHAMBERLAINS, THE SEVEN.

E. E. N.

ABANAH, ab'ə-nə (אֲבָנָה, 'ăbhānāh, Abana AV; see II K 5 12): A cold swift stream rising in Mt. Anti-Lebanon. Breaking out into the plain a few miles W. of Damascus, its waters irrigate the plain and supply the city. It loses itself in the swampy Meadow Lakes 20 m. E. of Damascus on the edge of the desert. Its right name was probably Amana (RV mg.). The modern name is Barada. See also DAMASCUS.

E. E. N.

ABARIM, ab'ə-rim (עֲבָרִים, 'abhārīm), 'those-on-the-other-side': The name of the mountain range in NW. part of Moab. (The term, however, according to G. A. Smith (HGHL. p. 548; EB. 1 4) is applicable to the whole E. Jordan range.) Mt. Nebo is the best-known summit, and Abarim is used by metonymy for Nebo (Nu 27 12; Dt 32 49). In Jer 22 20 (" passages " AV) Abarim is a more exact synonym of Bashan. The Heb. text of Ezk 39 11 also contains the word Abarim, but it is more literally translated "they that pass by." A. C. Z.

ABBA, ab'a (Ἀββά = אַבָּא): Aramaic for 'Father,' transliterated into Greek and thence into English. It occurs three times in the N T (Mk 14 36; Ro 8 15; Gal 4 6). From the fact that it is invariably followed by the explanatory addition "father" it has been argued that it had come to be regarded as one of the proper names of God. For this there is no direct evidence. More probably it was used as a familiar liturgical expression, which Jesus and Paul adopted with particular emphasis on its essential content, developing into rich suggestiveness.
A. C. Z.

ABDA, ab'da (עַבְדָּא, 'abhdā'), 'servant of J"': 1. The father of Adoniram, Solomon's tribute-master (I K 4 6). 2. The son of Shammua (Neh 11 17, called Obadiah in I Ch 9 16).
E. E. N.

ABDEEL, ab'dē-el (עַבְדְּאֵל, 'abhde'ēl), 'servant of God': The father of Shelemiah (Jer 36 26).
E. E. N.

ABDI, ab'dai (עַבְדִּי, 'abhdī), 'servant (of J")': 1. The father of Kishi or Kish (I Ch 6 44; II Ch 29 12, or Kushaiah in I Ch 15 17). 2. One of the " sons of Elam " (Ezr 10 26).
E. E. N.

ABDIEL, ab'di-el (עַבְדִּיאֵל, 'abhdī'ēl), 'servant of God': A Gadite (I Ch 5 15).
E. E. N.

ABDON, ab'don (עַבְדּוֹן, 'abhdōn), 'servant': I. 1. One of the minor judges of Israel, son of Hillel (Jg 12 13, 15). See also BEDAN. 2. A son of Shashak (I Ch 8 23). 3. A son of Jeiel, father of Gibeon (I Ch 8 30, 9 36). 4. A son of Micah (II Ch 34 20, called Achbor in II K 22 12).

II. A Levitical city in Asher (Jos 21 30) called Ebron (Hebron AV) in 19 28. Map IV, E 6.
A. C. Z.

ABEDNEGO, a-bed'nē-gō (עֲבֵד נְגוֹ, 'ābhēdh n'gō), from Abed-Nebo, 'servant of Nebo': The Babylonian name of Azariah, one of Daniel's three companions (Dan 1 7, 2 49, etc.).
E. E. N.

ABEL, ê'bel (הֶבֶל, hebhel, etymology doubtful, formerly translated 'breath,' but with more probability derived from the Assyrian ablu, 'son'): Adam's second son, murdered by Cain (Gn 4 2 ff.). In the N T (Mt 23 35; Lk 11 51; He 11 4; I Jn 3 12) A. is pictured as a martyr for a high, religious conception. In He 12 24 the blood of Jesus, which declared forgiveness, is contrasted with Abel's, which called for vengeance.
A. S. C.

ABEL, ê'bel (אָבֵל, 'ābhēl), 'meadow' (II S 20 14-18): 1. See A.-BETH-MAACAH. 2. According to the Heb. text of I S 6 18, followed by AV, the name of a locality near Beth-shemesh. The LXX. reads instead "stone," which is followed by RV.
E. E. N.

ABEL-BETH-MAACAH, ê"bel-beth-mê'a-cā (אָבֵל בֵּית הַמַּעֲכָה, 'ābhēl bēth hamma'ăkhāh): A northern frontier fortress, the stronghold of Sheba's insurrection (II S 20 14 ff.); connected in the LXX. with Dan (I K 15 20; II K 15 29). The site is probably Abil el-Ḳamḥ, about 3 hours' ride W. of Tell el-Ḳadi (Dan). It was besieged by Ben-hadad (I K 15 20) and Tiglath-pileser III (II K 15 29). Map IV, E 4.
A. S. C.

ABELCHERAMIM, ê"bel-ker'a-mim (אָבֵל כְּרָמִים, 'ābhēl k'rāmīm, A.-Keramim AV), 'vineyard-meadow': A locality in Ammon (Jg 11 33). Site unknown.
A. S. C.

ABEL-MAIM, ê"bel-mê'im (אָבֵל מַיִם, ābhēl mayīm), 'meadow of waters': A variant, or text-corruption, for Abel-beth-maacah (II Ch 16 4).
A. S. C.

ABEL-MEHOLAH, ê"bel-mę-hō'lā (אָבֵל מְחוֹלָה, 'ābhēl m'ḥōlāh), 'dance meadow': Elisha's birthplace, near Beth-shean (Jg 7 22; I K 4 12, 19 16).
A. S. C.

ABEL-MIZRAIM, ê"bel-miz'ra-im (אָבֵל מִצְרַיִם, 'ābhēl mitsrayīm), 'meadow of Egypt': The stopping-place of Jacob's funeral cortège (Gn 50 11). On location, see ATAD.
A. S. C.

ABEL-SHITTIM, ê"bel-shit'im (אָבֵל הַשִּׁטִּים, 'ābhēl ha-shiṭṭīm), 'acacia-meadow': A locality in the lowlands of Moab (Nu 33 49; cf. Mic 6 5). Map III, H 5.
A. S. C.

ABEZ, ê'bez. See EBEZ.

ABI, ā'bî (אָבִי, 'ābhī), 'father': Compound personal names in which "Abi" forms the first element are of two general classes: (a) In which the second part is a noun, generally the name of a deity; (b) in which it is an adjective or a verb. In cases under (a) Abi is generally the predicate, as Abi-jah, i.e., "Jah (= Jehovah) is father." In cases under (b) it is the subject, as Abinadab, i.e., "the father (= God) gives." The "i" of Abi is probably not the pronominal suffix "my," but an old ending serving merely as a connective. See G. B. Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, pp. 75–86).
E. E. N.

ABI, ê'bai (in II K 18 2). See ABIJAH, 7.

ABIA, a-bai'a, ABIAH, a-bai'ā. See ABIJAH.

ABIALBON, ê"bi-al'bon (אֲבִיעַלְבוֹן, 'ăbhī 'albōn): One of David's heroes (II S 23 31, Abiel in I Ch 11 32).
E. E. N.

ABIASAPH, a-bai'a-saf. See EBIASAPH.

ABIATHAR, a-bai'a-thar (אֶבְיָתָר, 'ebhyāthār), 'father of abundance': A son of Ahimelech, priest at Nob. When Saul massacred Ahimelech and his household for harboring the fugitive David (I S 22 11-19), A. escaped and joined David at Keilah, reporting to him what Saul had done. As he also brought the ephod with him, David appointed him to be the priest of his company, and consulted J" through him (I S 30 7). Thenceforward Abiathar remained with David, and, when the latter became king, was associated in the priesthood with Zadok (II S 15 24, 29 35). He survived David, and was deposed and banished to Anathoth by Solomon for abetting and assisting in Adonijah's plot to wrest the kingdom from him (I K 1 7, 19, 25, 2 22, 26, 27).

A. C. Z.

ABIB, ê'bib: The 'earing' month of the old Hebrew year. See TIME, § 3.

ABIDA, a-bai'da (אֲבִידָע, 'ăbhīdhā', Abidah AV), 'the father knows': The ancestral head of a clan of Midian (Gn 25 4; I Ch 1 33). E. E. N.

ABIDAN, ab'i-dan (אֲבִידָן, 'ăbhīdhān), 'the father is judge': A prince of Benjamin in the Mosaic age (Nu 1 11, 2 22, 7 60, 65, 10 24). E. E. N.

ABIEL, ê'bi-el (אֲבִיאֵל, 'ăbhī'ēl), 'father is God': 1. Grandfather of Saul and Abner (I S 9 1, 14 51). 2. One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 32, Abialbon in II S 23 31). E. E. N.

ABIEZER, ê"bi-î'zẹr (אֲבִיעֶזֶר, 'ăbhī'ezer), 'the father is help': 1. The clan of Abiezrites of Manasseh, to which Gideon belonged (Jg 6 11 ff., 8 2, 32). Reckoned genealogically to Machir through Gilead (Jos 17 2; I Ch 7 18; Nu 26 30, where the form is Iezer, Iezerite [Jeezer, Jeezerite AV]). 2. An Anathothite, one of David's heroes (II S 23 27; I Ch 11 28, 27 12). E. E. N.

ABIEZRITE, ê"bi-ez'rait. See ABIEZER, § 1.

ABIGAIL, ab'i-gêl (אֲבִיגַיִל, 'ăbhīgayīl): 1. The wife of Nabal, later of David (I S 25 3, 42), mother of Chileab (or Daniel, I Ch 3 1), David's second son (II S 3 3). 2. The mother of Amasa, daughter of Nahash (II S 17 25; Abigal RV), or of Jesse (I Ch 2 16), which is preferable. A. S. C.

ABIHAIL, ab"i-hê'il (אֲבִיחַיִל, 'ăbhīḥayīl), 'the father is strength': 1. The father of Zuriel (Nu 3 35). 2. The wife of Abishur (I Ch 2 29). 3. A Gadite (I Ch 5 14). 4. Niece of David, and mother-in-law of Rehoboam (II Ch 11 18). 5. The father of Esther (Est 2 15, 9 29). E. E. N.

ABIHU, a-bai'hū (אֲבִיהוּא, 'ăbhīhū'), 'my father is He': Second son of Aaron (Ex 6 23; Nu 3 2, etc.). He and his brother Nadab were with Moses on the Mount (Ex 24 1-2, 9 ff.). Together they became priests (Ex 28 1) and were slain for offering strange fire (Lev 10 1 ff.; Nu 3 4, 26 61; I Ch 24 2). E. E. N.

ABIHUD, a-bai'hud (אֲבִיהוּד, 'ăbhīhūdh), 'my father is glory': A son of Bela (I Ch 8 3). E. E. N.

ABIJAH, a-bai'jā (אֲבִיָּה, אֲבִיָּהוּ, 'ăbhīyāh, 'ăbhīyāhū), 'J" is my father': 1. King of Judah, the son of Rehoboam, and Maacah, the daughter of Absalom. In I K 14 31, 15 1 ff., the name is spelled Abijam (an error). During his reign of three years he waged continual war with Jeroboam. The story in I K produces the impression of a prolonged campaign, while the Chronicler (II Ch 13) records only a single decisive battle. With 400,000 troops he met Jeroboam with 800,000 at Mt. Zemaraim. He upbraided Jeroboam and Israel for rebellion against the Davidic dynasty, for apostasy, and the expulsion of the priests and Levites. Caught at a disadvantage, the men of Judah prayed to Jehovah, who granted them a signal victory. His character was not exemplary, for he walked in the sins of his father, and his heart was not perfect with Jehovah. 2. A son of Jeroboam I. He died in fulfilment of Ahijah's prediction (I K 14 1 ff.). 3. A son of Samuel (I S 8 2, Abiah AV). 4. The ancestral head of the eighth course of priests, to which Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, belonged (Lk 1 5 [Abia AV]; I Ch 24 10; Neh 10 7, 12 4). 5. A son of Becher (I Ch 7 8, Abiah AV). 6. The wife of Hezron (I Ch 2 24, Abiah AV). 7. The wife of Ahaz and mother of Hezekiah (II Ch 29 1).

J. A. K.

ABIJAM, a-bai'jam. See ABIJAH, 1.

ABILENE, ab"i-lî'nî (Ἀβιληνή, Ἀβειληνή, WH.): The tetrarchy of Lysanias (Lk 3 1) in the Anti-Lebanon. Abila, 18 Roman m. NE. of Damascus on the Abanah River, was its chief city, and has been identified with the ruins at Sūk Wādy Baradā. Josephus (Ant. XX, 7 1) speaks of a tetrarchy of Lysanias, and in XIX, 5 1 of "Abila of Lysanias." See LYSANIAS. C. S. T.

ABIMAEL, a-bim'a-el (אֲבִימָאֵל, 'ăbhīmā'ēl): One of the descendants of Joktan (Gn 10 28). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11. E. E. N.

ABIMELECH, a-bim'ẹ-lec (אֲבִימֶלֶךְ, 'ăbhīmelekh), 'my father is Melech (Moloch)': 1. A Philistine king of Gerar, a locality near Gaza. Struck by the beauty of Sarah, and being deceived by Abraham as to her true relationship, he took her to wife. Obedient to a warning from God in a dream, he returned Sarah to her husband with costly gifts, at the same time pleading his integrity and upbraiding Abraham for his deception (Gn 20 1-18, E). Later, their quarrel over the possession of a well was finally settled by the making of a covenant at Beer-Sheba (Gn 21 22-34, E). A similar story combining both incidents is related of Abimelech and Isaac (Gn 26 7-11, 26-33, J). Critical scholarship looks upon the two accounts as doublets.

2. A son of Gideon by a woman of Shechem. He made the first attempt to found a monarchy in Israel. The Shechemites made him king after he had murdered all of Gideon's sons but Jotham. His reign of three years ended in a revolt. Abimelech took Shechem, and burned it with its citadel and temple. Later, at the siege of the citadel at Thebez, his skull was fractured by a millstone thrown from the wall by a woman. His armor-bearer thrust him through at his own request (Jg 8 31, ch. 9).

3. A son of Abiathar, David's priest (I Ch 18 16, but see AHIMELECH). 4. A Philistine king (Ps 34: title—probably an error for Achish, cf. I S 21 10).

J. A. K.

ABINADAB, ə-bin'ə-dab (אֲבִינָדָב, 'ăbīnādhābh), 'my father is generous': 1. A man of Kiriath-Jearim, to whose house the Ark was brought from Beth-Shemesh (I S 7 1), where it remained until David carried it to Jerusalem (II S 6 3 f.; I Ch 13 7). 2. The second son of Jesse (I S 16 8), who followed Saul against the Philistines (I S 17 13; I Ch 2 13). 3. A son of Saul, perhaps also called Ishvi (I S 14 49), slain by the Philistines in the great battle of Mt. Gilboa (I S 31 2; I Ch 8 33, 9 39, 10 2). 4. See BEN-ABINADAB.
C. S. T.

ABINOAM, ə-bin'o-əm (אֲבִינֹעַם, 'ăbhīnō'am), 'the father is pleasantness': Father of Barak (Jg 4 6, 12, 5 1, 12).
E. E. N.

ABIRAM, ə-bai'rəm (אֲבִירָם, 'ăbhīrām), 'the father is the High One': 1. A Reubenite (Nu 16 1 ff.). See KORAH. 2. Eldest son of Hiel of Bethel (I K 16 34).
E. E. N.

ABISHAG, ab'i-shag (אֲבִישַׁג, 'ăbhīshag): A young Shunammite woman, nurse of David in his old age (I K 1 3, 15). Adonijah's request for her after David's death led to his execution (I K 2 17 ff.).
E. E. N.

ABISHAI, ə-bi'shai (אֲבִישַׁי, 'ăbhīshay): One of the ruthless sons of Zeruiah. He was Joab's elder brother, chief of staff during David's outlaw period and the leader of the Thirty (I S 26 6 ff.; II S 23 18 ff.). His great exploits were the slaughter of 300 Philistines, the rescue of David from Ishbi-benob (II S 21 17), and the subjugation of Edom (I Ch 18 12, but cf. II S 8 13). Without the calculating ferocity of Joab, he is consistently portrayed as the inciter of David to acts of fierce reprisal (I S 26 8; II S 16 9). He disappears from history shortly after Absalom's rebellion.
A. S. C.

ABISHALOM, ə-bish'ə-ləm. See ABSALOM.

ABISHUA, ə-bish'u-ə (אֲבִישׁוּעַ, 'ăbhīshūa'), 'the father is wealth': 1. A priest, son of Phinehas (I Ch 6 4 f., 50; Ezr 7 5). 2. The ancestor of a Benjamite clan (I Ch 8 4).
E. E. N.

ABISHUR, ə-bish'ūr (אֲבִישׁוּר, 'ăbhīshūr), 'the father is a wall': A son of Shammai (I Ch 2 28 f.).
E. E. N.

ABITAL, ab'i-tal (אֲבִיטַל, 'ăbhīṭal), 'the father is dew': A wife of David (II S 3 4; I Ch 3 3).
E. E. N.

ABITUB, ab'i-tub (אֲבִיטוּב, 'ăbhīṭūbh), 'the father is good': A son of Shaharaim by Hushim (I Ch 8 11).
E. E. N.

ABIUD, ə-bai'ud (Ἀβιούδ): A son of Zerubbabel (only in Mt 1 13).
E. E. N.

ABJECTS (נְכִים, Ps 35 15): The RV margin "smiters" gives better sense, but is incorrect. Perhaps 'strangers' (impious Israelites) are meant. The Hebrew term occurs only here and is of uncertain meaning.
E. E. N.

ABNER, ab'nər (אַבְנֵר, 'abhnēr), 'my father is a light': The cousin, or uncle, of Saul (I S 14 50; I Ch 8 39 ff.) and his chief of staff. After the defeat and death of Saul at Mt. Gilboa (I S 31) Abner came forward as the champion of Ishbosheth, Saul's son (II S 2 8). He was defeated at the tournament and subsequent battle of Gibeon (II S 2 12 ff.), an old ancestral possession (I Ch 8 29). It was there that he slew Asahel (II S 2 18 ff.), and thus started the blood-feud with the sons of Zeruiah. He was loyal to the house of Saul until Ishbosheth took him to task for his alleged conduct concerning Rizpah (II S 3 7 ff.); then he plotted to turn over all Israel to David, but Joab treacherously murdered him before this could be accomplished, whereupon David, not to lose his hold upon Israel, assumed the duty of blood-revenge which was carried out by Solomon (I K 2 5 f.).
A. S. C.

ABOMINATION renders Heb. terms as follows: (1) tōēbhāh, broadly that which gives offense either to God or to men, possibly because of inherent repulsiveness (e.g., Gn 46 34; Lv 18 22), or a violation of established customs (e.g., Pr 6 16, 11 1). (2) shiqqūts, that which is hated as a religious offense. The term is frequently applied in contempt of the idols of the heathen (I K 11 5; Jer 13 27, etc.). (3) sheqets, i.e., 'taboo,' used only in Lv 11 10-42. (4) piggūl, sacrificial flesh which has become stale and hence loathsome and unfit for food (Lv 7 18, etc.). (The Greek term [used in LXX.] βδέλυγμα is generic, and means approximately the same as the English "abomination.")
A. C. Z.

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION (Τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως) only in Dn (9 27, 11 31, 12 11; "that maketh desolate," AV; "astonisheth," AVmg.) and in the 'Apocalypse of Jesus' (Mt 25 15; Mk 13 14). The latter, however, is a direct reference to the former. The original in Dn is susceptible of more than one rendering. It may be 'the abomination that desolates' or 'the abomination that appals' (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v. שָׁמֵם). The term, moreover, which is translated "abomination" (shiqqūts) strictly means 'image of a false god' (cf. I K 11 5; II K 23 13). What the author of Dn had in mind was the setting up in the Temple of a heathen idol, the presence of which there should strike the devout Israelite dumb with amazement and at the same time profane the sacred precincts, and be the signal of a terrible distress. This distress is conceived of as laying waste the country (ἐρημωσις, 'desolation,' Dn 9 26; Lk 21 20). The conception of Dn seems to have created an apocalyptic figure about which is centered all enmity against the true God and His will. The figure is used under different names in subsequent apocalyptic compositions. It is probable that the "Man of Sin" in the 'Little Apocalypse' (II Th 2 1-12) is one of these. The fact that Jesus points to the appearance of this figure as a sign by which His followers should recognize the definite beginning of the final stage of the Messianic era has led many persons to identify the abomination of desolation with some historic person, event, or thing, e.g., the Roman army (B. Weiss), desecration by zealots (Bleek and Alford), a statue of Caligula, the Roman standard with the figure of the eagle, etc. But such identifications are futile, inasmuch as apocalyptic figures are embodiments of ideas whose concrete appearance in the form of historical facts or personages is not necessarily bound to individuals, but occurs with every realization of the idea. The abomination of desolation is actualized whenever its conception as above defined becomes an objective fact. A. C. Z.

ABRAHAM, ê'bra-ham (אַבְרָהָם, 'abhrāhām): The meaning and derivation of the word are uncertain. For Abram (אַבְרָם, i.e., Abiram [?]), cf. analogies in Abimelech, etc. Abê-ramu occurs on contract-tablets prior to Hammurabi (2250 B.C.). 'The Exalted One is (my) father' (or 'exalted father') is a probable translation. Abraham is perhaps an amplified form, and רָהַם an otherwise unused variant of רוּם (Oxf. Heb. Lex.). "Father of a multitude" (Gn 17 5) is a word-play between הָם and הָמוֹן.

A. holds a prominent place in the thought of both the O T and the N T. His name occurs repeatedly in the formulas of inheritance (Dt 18; II K 13 23), and in the assertion of the continuity of the religion (Ex 3 15; I K 18 36). By the prophets he is seldom mentioned, perhaps never in a pre-exilic passage, but this is hardly significant, considering the clear national consciousness. The prophets assume his personality; he is God's "friend" (Is 41 8; cf. II Ch 20 7); he was "one" (Is 51 2; Ezk 33 24; perhaps Mal 2 15); Abraham and Sarah are progenitors (Is 51 2; cf. also Is 29 22, 63 16; Jer 33 26; Mic 7 20). The N T recognizes A. as a race-father (Mt 3 9; Jn 8 33, 37, 39), but it is more deeply conscious of his profound significance as a hero of faith (He 11 8-11), his intimacy with God (Jn 8 56), and his spiritual fatherhood (Lk 16 22; Ro 4 11 ff.).

The present form of the narrative is due to the writer's desire to picture an ideal figure, embodying supreme religious conceptions. The following is the analysis: (1) Gn 12–14, A.'s character and greatness. (2) Gn 15–22 19, the trials through which character was achieved. (3) Gn 23–25 8, the final acts of a well-rounded life. The thought of the covenant is ever dominant, but first is shown how exalted the hero was. He marches across the ancient world from the Euphrates to the Nile, his possessions increase in Canaan, he is able to overthrow the army of a world-conqueror. How did A. become so powerful? The answer is—not through heaping together wealth, not through flocks and herds, not through conquest, but by silent communion with God beneath the stars of heaven, by trials that tested his patience and wrung his heart, and by a life which found its goal not in earthly grandeur but in God. And he leaves the scene, not as one who has passed his prime, but as a king, who before he lays down the scepter prepares for his own departure, and, with dignity and far-sightedness, for his heir, and for the children who have a claim upon his love but no share in the great promise of his line.

The offering of Isaac, the crowning test of his faith, taught positively the need of a consummate sacrifice for the final ratification of the covenant, and negatively, that J" did not desire human sacrifice. The site could hardly have been the Temple-mount, because (1) Jerusalem seems to have been already occupied (Gn 14 18) and (2) is much less than three days' journey (Gn 22 4) from Beer-sheba.

While some maintain the absolute historicity of the entire Abrahamic narrative, others treat it as a myth, personalized tribal history, or the outgrowth of religious reflection. For A.'s actual existence, the persistent national tradition is a witness. The name is stamped too deeply upon the records to be but a fanciful creation. On the other hand, the narrative is so artistic as to indicate idealization. The minute particularizations (e.g., Gn 18) seem hardly consistent with literal history, and we should distinguish between the present form and the original substratum. Probably under the name of A. are preserved traditions of great tribal movements which began in Arabia, followed the Euphrates, crossed to Haran, and ended for the time in Canaan. The leader may well have been named Abraham, but the clan was originally the concrete reality. While his name nowhere occurs as a clan title, on an inscription of Shishak the "field of Abram" is mentioned (PEFQ, Jan., 1905, p. 7); cf. "field of Moab" (Nu 21 20). For a theory of the two names Abram and Abraham, see Paton, Early History of Syria and Palestine, pp. 25–46.

It is now the general consensus that the names of the four kings (Gn 14) are historical, though not all have, with certainty, been identified. Gunkel argues for the historicity of Melchizedek also. The forms, however, of the Elamite and Babylonian names have suffered much in transmission. The synchronism with Hammurabi (Amraphel) postulates a date earlier than was formerly assigned to A. The chapter forms the fitting conclusion to the picture of Abraham's greatness.

ABRAM. See ABRAHAM.

ABRECH, ê'bree (אַבְרֵךְ, 'abhrēkh): The Hebrew original of "bow the knee" in Gn 41 43. The translation thus given is probably not correct. Abrech does not correspond to any Hebrew word-form. The most probable view is that the true reading is abarak, a Babylonian term for a royal minister. On account of the political predominance of Babylonia, official terms in use in that country were in vogue also in Palestine and Egypt in the days of Joseph. J. F. McC.

ABRONAH, a-brō'nā (עַבְרֹנָה, 'abhrōnāh, Ebronah AV): A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 34 f.). Site unknown. E. E. N.

ABSALOM, ab'sa-lǫm (אַבְשָׁלוֹם, 'ăbhīshālōm, Abishalom in I K 15 2, 10), 'father of peace,' perhaps so named as a good omen of David's growing power: David's third son, born at Hebron of Maacah, daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur (II S

3 3). His character is delineated consistently throughout as fierce, revengeful, and treacherous. Evidently he inherited his traits from his mother's wild mountain ancestry. His first outbreak follows Amnon's outrage of Tamar (II S 13), and self-exiled, he appears to wait in Geshur a vindication of his act. Joab's ruse to bring him back (II S 14) seems to embody an attempt to secure the abrogation of the right of private blood-revenge. Absalom's recall was, therefore, equivalent to a legal enactment on the subject (II S 14 11). But his confinement thereafter to his own quarters was an affront which his untamed spirit could not brook, and which precipitated the insurrection wherein he perished (II S 18 14). The narrative (II S 13–19) is intended to show how the folly of each of the presumptive heirs to the throne wrought their ruin and thus cleared the path for the youthful Solomon. Abijam (I K 15 2) and Asa (I K 15 10) were Absalom's descendants through Maacah. A. S. C.

ABYSS (ἄβυσσος), 'a place of great depth': As far as known the word is found only in the Greek of the Bible. It occurs frequently in the LXX. as the translation of the Hebrew tᵉhōm, deep. In the N T it is the name of Hades, the place of the dead (Ro 10 7; Lk 8 31; Rev 9 1, 2, 11, 17 8, 20 1, 3. In AV of Rev, it is always rendered "the bottomless pit"). See also ESCHATOLOGY, § 48. A. C. Z.

ACACIA. See PALESTINE, § 21.

ACCAD, ac'ad (אַכַּד, 'akkadh): One of the four cities which, according to Gn 10 10, were the starting-point of the dominion of Nimrod in Babylonia. In the inscriptions the same word-form usually designates not a city but the division of the country lying N. of the district about Babylon. The form Agade, however, is written as the name of a very ancient city, also in N. Babylonia, and supreme over the whole country about 3800 B.C. This is doubtless the same name as Accad, the g of the so-called Accadian language being regularly represented in proper names by k (c) in Semitic Babylonian.

'Accadian' is the name given by Sir Henry Rawlinson to a supposed non-Semitic language, spoken and written in many inscriptions in Babylonia, and to the people employing it. These are, however, now generally named "Sumerian," since the inscriptions in question are found not in N. but in S. Babylonia, and Shumer is supposed to be a designation of the latter region. This is doubtful (see BABYLONIA, § 9). In any case 'Accadian' is a misnomer and should be discarded. J. F. McC.

ACCO, ac'o (עַכּוֹ, 'akkō, Accho AV; in Acts 21 7 called Ptolemais; Arabic, 'akka): A Canaanite city in the territory of the tribe of Asher, whose inhabitants were not driven out by Israel. Fortified and situated on the seacoast at the N. end of the Bay of Acre, and on the main road along the coast, it was important for controlling the roads inland to the fertile plain of Esdraelon and to lower Galilee. From the earliest times down to the Crusades its possession was considered of great strategic value, although politically it was inferior to Tyre and Sidon. (See PALESTINE, § 4.) At the close of the 3d cent. B.C. its name was changed to Ptolemais. Map IV, B 6. C. S. T.

ACCURSED: The RV translation of חֵרֶם (Dt 21 23) and יְקֻלָּל (Is 65 20), from the root qālal, meaning 'to esteem lightly.' The AV has "accursed" in most O T passages, where the RV has "devoted" or "devoted thing." In the place of the AV "accursed" the RV in N T reads "anathema," the transliteration of the Greek word. See ANATHEMA, DEVOTED, also CURSE. C. S. T.

ACCUSATION. See SUPERSCRIPTION.

ACELDAMA. See AKELDAMA.

ACHAIA, a-kê'ya (Ἀχαΐα): The northernmost country of the Peloponnesus, but in Homer the country inhabited by the Achæans, that is, all Greece. The Romans (after 27 B.C.) adopted the Homeric usage, and their Provincia Achaia (capital, Corinth) included all Greece along with Thessaly, Acarnania, Ætolia, Eubœa, and the Cyclades. This is N T usage, "Gallio, Proconsul of Achaia" (Ac 18 12; cf. also 18 27; Ro 15 26, etc.). J. R. S. S.

ACHAICUS, a-kê'i-cus (Ἀχαϊκός): Mentioned in I Co 16 17 with Stephanas (q.v.) and Fortunatus. From the exhortation (ver. 16; cf. I Th 5 12) we infer that A. and the others occupied some important position in the Corinthian Church. Their attitude of friendliness relieved Paul's anxiety (ver. 18), particularly in view of what was lacking in the Church's moral condition at the time (τὸ ὑμέτερον ὑστέρημα, ver. 17b; cf. 5 1 f.). J. M. T.

ACHAN, ê'can (עָכָן, 'ākhān, called Achar, I Ch 2 7): A member of the tribe of Judah, who appropriated treasure from the spoils of Jericho, thus violating the law of the ban (ḥerem) (see CURSE, § 2), according to which spoils of war were sacred to Jehovah. This sin brought defeat on Israel at Ai. By lot Joshua discovered Achan to be the offender. In the valley of Achor he and his family were stoned to death, while all his property was burned (Jos 7 1-26). J. A. K.

ACHAZ. See AHAZ.

ACHBOR, ac'bōr (עַכְבּוֹר, 'akhbōr), 'mouse': 1. The father of Baal-hanan, a king of Edom (Gn 36 38 f.; I Ch 1 49). 2. A courtier under Josiah and Jehoiakim (II K 22 12-14 [but cf. II Ch 34 20]; Jer 26 22, 36 12). E. E. N.

ACHIM, ê'kim (Ἀχείμ): An ancestor of Joseph (Mt 1 14). E. E. N.

ACHISH, ê'kish (אָכִישׁ, 'ākhīsh): The Philistine king of Gath who befriended David (I S 21 10 ff.) and later gave him Ziklag. He demanded David's aid against Saul, but yielded to the objections of the Philistine princes (I S 27–29). He was still king at Solomon's accession, according to I K 2 39, but this seems improbable in view of David's conquest of Gath and of the chronological difficulty. E. E. N.

ACHMETHA, ac'mę-thą (אַחְמְתָא, 'aḥmᵉthā'): A royal city in Media where the roll was found containing a copy of Cyrus' decree permitting the return of the Jews (Ezr 6 2). The word is the Aramaic equivalent of the Pers. Hagmatana or Ecbatana, as the Greeks spelled it. The site of the city mentioned in Ezra is somewhat uncertain. The old Median Ecbatana can not easily be identified with the beautifully situated Ecbatana, used by the Persian kings as a summer residence, now called Hamadan; but it is probable that the latter is the city referred to both in Ezra and in To 6 5. E. E. N.

ACHOR, ê'kōr, VALLEY OF (עֵמֶק עָכוֹר, 'ēmeq 'ăkhōr), 'valley of trouble': The valley near Jericho where Achan was stoned (Jos 7 24-26). Its identification with the Wady-el-Kelt is unsatisfactory. Jos 15 7 implies a more southern, Is 65 10 a more spacious valley. Hos 2 15 plays on the meaning of the term. E. E. N.

ACHSAH, ac'sā (עַכְסָה, 'akhṣāh, Achsa AV), 'anklet': A daughter of Caleb (perhaps in reality a clan) given to Othniel for conquering Kiriath-sepher. The springs mentioned lay a few miles north of Debir (Jos 15 16 ff.; Jg 1 12 ff.; I Ch 2 49). E. E. N.

ACHSHAPH, ac'saf (אַכְשָׁף, 'akhshāph), 'sorcery': A town on the border of Asher (Jos 19 25) whose king was confederate with Jabin of Hazor against Joshua (Jos 11 1, 12 20). Site unknown. E. E. N.

ACHZIB, ac'zib (אַכְזִיב, 'akhzībh), 'winter torrent' (?): 1. One of the 22 towns of the tribe of Asher (Jos 19 29) on the seacoast S. of Tyre; the inhabitants were not driven out by Israel (Jg 1 31). Map IV, B 5. 2. A town in the Shephelah of Judah, mentioned with Keilah and Mareshah (Jos 15 44), with Mareshah and Adullam (Mic 1 14); the same as Cozeba (I Ch 4 22) and Chezib (Gn 38 5). Map II, D 1. C. S. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, THE: The book of Acts is unique. Without it any consecutive knowledge of the Apostolic Age could not be attained, even with the aid of the Pauline letters. With it as background, all other data fall into order and unity in a way which speaks loudly for its historic worth. As, then, our hopes of constructing a sure picture of primitive Christianity depend largely on Acts, it is essential to form a correct idea as to its historicity. How far does it satisfy modern requirements? One thing must be borne in mind: Its author, alone of N T writers, claims to write history (καθεξῆς γράψαι), and to have satisfied the conditions of accurate inquiry (πᾶσιν ἀκριβῶς) necessary to give the reader a sense of security (ἵνα ἐπιγνῷς τὴν ἀσφάλειαν) touching the matters of Christian faith (τῶν πεπληροφορημένων ἐν ἡμῖν πραγμάτων). Such is the claim of the preface to his work in two parts, of which Acts is the second. It was meant as serious history, occasioned too by the consciousness that existing narratives dealing with the same class of facts were not satisfactory in this very respect, as a basis of rational historic assurance.

1. Introductory.

But, it will be said, there is history and history. We need to know how far Acts is an objective record of objective facts. As to the objectivity of its author's attitude, Ramsay is probably right in claiming for Acts a place among histories of the first rank, in which nothing is allowed consciously to deflect the historian from stating things as they really occurred. Only this does not mean the dead, superficial fidelity of a photograph, giving no guidance to the beholder by light and relief. Our author gives an interpretation of the story, particularly of its religious meaning, in order to aid one seeking for religious truth, so far as this can find expression in history. But this need not make him inaccurate, or ready to suppress facts material to the line of exposition selected in keeping with the total effect of all known to the writer, though much can not be brought in for reasons of space and perspective. Whether all that reached him as 'facts,' or even all that he had verified for himself as such, were really objective facts—at least as we should interpret them to-day—is another question. This can not here be discussed, save as regards the probability that our author was himself an eye-witness of a large number of them—and these often, as Harnack points out, of the same 'supernatural' order as those which he records on the evidence of others—and in so far as we can infer that those others were themselves eye-witnesses or drew their impressions directly from such. Approach, however, to all such problems lies through a consideration of the general drift of Acts, and of its verisimilitude or otherwise. The question of its Scope will lead on to those of its Aims, Occasion and Provenance, Authorship, and Date. The final test of all these will be their mutual coherence as the simplest theory for unifying an immense complex of phenomena, literary and historical.

2. Scope and Plan.

Acts sets forth in orderly sequence (καθεξῆς) how the Divine Society constituted by the Gospel spread, in ever-widening circles, from its native home in Jerusalem even unto Rome, the distant capital of the world. This appears from the commission (1 8) given at the final interview between Jesus and those who as "witnesses" were to continue His ministry, and who, as so commissioned, were "apostles" in the wider sense, as distinct from the Twelve (see 1 6, 14 f., 21; Lk 24 33 ff., and I Co 15 7, τοῖς ἀποστόλοις πᾶσιν). We gather that their horizon was still confined to a Messianic Kingdom for Israel (1 6); and, in fact, down to ch. xv we find, traced with a care implying a very primitive standpoint (for A.D. 70 effaced such shades of distinction), the gradual steps by which they accepted the logic of Divine facts, even when running counter to preconceived theory, in the annulling of Jewish restrictions upon membership in God's Kingdom. The one secret of this triumph of the Divine over human limitations—as of all those triumphs which constitute the moral of the book and its high argument—lay in the power of the Holy Spirit upon and through the Lord's witnesses. This is surely true to life. Here, too, lay the continuity between our author's two books: the same Spirit qualified the Master and His disciples (Lk 4 14, 24 49; Ac 1 1 f., 8, 2 33, cf. 16 7, "the spirit of Jesus") both to do and endure; for the pathway of 'glory through suffering' was God's counsel for both (Lk 24 26, 46; Ac 14 22, cf. 5 41). The traditional Jewish forms of thought touching the mode of the Kingdom's consummation within the generation then living (Lk 21 32, cf. 9 32; Ac 1 11, 3 20 f.), and the natural assumption that Jewish forms of worship and ritual still held good, did not suddenly fall away. The Gospel did not destroy save through being seen to fulfil. These things simply faded away in the growing light which spread from the new luminary of the spiritual world; and the subjective power to appropriate all in Him turned on the Messianic gift, the "Spirit of the Lord" in new form and fulness, which constituted the New Israel out of the Old in spite of its wonted stiff-necked resistance to the Holy Spirit (7 51). Israel was even then a "crooked generation," from which "salvation" was needful (2 40, 4 12, cf. 14 26).

Accordingly the Messianic outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost holds the same determinative place in Acts as in the Gospel the coming of the Messianic consciousness to Jesus Himself unfolded in the discourse in the synagogue at Nazareth (3 21b, 4 14-30). The parallel is all the closer in that, in both cases, rejection by Judaism follows, because the conditions of the Kingdom are presented as purely spiritual, so that birth confers nothing but prior opportunity. Thus Acts depicts, first, the Divine power and spirituality of life manifest in the nucleus of the coming Kingdom, the new Ecclesia; while Judaism passes self-judgment upon itself, step by step, by hardness of heart to the Spirit's appeal (chs. 3–5). Anon we are shown a certain differentiation within the new Ecclesia itself, between the less and the more progressive types—those strictly "Hebrews," and those in fuller sympathy with Israel's wider heritage owing to experience of the Greek world, the "Hellenists." The spokesman of the latter is Stephen, whose speech before the official representatives of strict Judaism indicates the principles at issue, and foreshadows the line of development for the Ecclesia. Then the shaking of persecution (chs. 6, 7) providentially spreads this true seed beyond Jerusalem, in various soils more and more remote from those heretofore held fit for the reception of God's word. Thus the Samaritans respond to Philip the Evangelist and are solemnly adjudged of God by the Messianic gift, through the agency of Peter and John—most authoritative of "apostles"—worthy of life: an imperfect proselyte (a eunuch) is by special Divine action admitted, less publicly, through Philip: there follow proofs of God's hand with His new Ecclesia, in the conversion and early ministry of Saul, the leader of the recent persecution, and next in typical incidents taken from Peter's missionary work in Judæa; and then the latter is led to sanction the admission of a group of proselytes to the spirit merely of Judaism, and not to the letter of its requirements (through circumcision)—in sheer deference to God's manifest will in the gift of the Spirit. This case is made the more significant by being challenged at Jerusalem and successfully vindicated by Peter, on the ground that God had acted and could not be gainsaid. Thus "to the Gentiles had God given repentance unto life" (11 18).

This occurred at Cæsarea, just beyond the borders of the Holy Land of Judæa proper (from which Peter had passed in coming from Joppa, 9 43, 11 5, 11; cf. Knowling, on 8 40), and might hardly have been tolerated nearer to Jerusalem. Further it affected but few in the first instance, and was probably not expected to extend very far either numerically or locally. But in both respects God was already on the way to transcend Jewish-Christian thought even more signally. Yet here too progress was gradual, and no sharp breach was actually caused with the Palestinian Ecclesia. This, so far, had conceived of itself as "the Ecclesia" (ἐκκλησία, 'called sect,' usually rendered "church"), made up of "the saints" proper (9 32, 41; cf. 9 13, 26 10; also I Co 16 1; Ro 15 25), while non-Jewish adherents were Messianic proselytes on the skirts of Israel (as with orthodox Judaism). Such a conception would be helped by the sense that all was still provisional. "The Lord was at hand," and He would perfect all in His Ecclesia. But the conception was menaced as soon as membership in the Ecclesia extended far beyond Palestine, and included by special Divine bounty large masses of persons hitherto assumed to be exceptions by special Divine bounty. This is what happened at Antioch, which therefore is treated as the second home of the Gospel, and then as the starting-point of the Gentile Mission proper. But the actual extent of the fresh departure, in its beginnings, is doubtful. According to the best MSS reading in 11 20 the "great number" who there hastened to believe were "Hellenists," and therefore Jews of a kind, yet not of the kind which had hitherto constituted the great mass of "the Ecclesia" in the Holy Land. So great a change in relative proportions would in itself warrant the sending of some one to examine matters and report; and we notice that Barnabas, himself a Hellenist, was chosen, and not Peter and John (as for Samaria), which would surely have been the case if anything so revolutionary as a preponderance of uncircumcised "Greeks" (the other reading) had appeared at this stage even outside Palestine.

Hort (Judaistic Christianity [1894], p. 59 f.) seems right in insisting on the more difficult reading of BD² EHLP, supported by ℵ* ευαγγελιστας; see also 13 46, cf. 14 27. The author's meaning seems to have been missed by the other MS authorities, through taking the δέ in ἦσαν δέ τινες ἐξ αὐτῶν κτλ, as adversative to the foregoing οἱ μὲν οὖν διασπαρέντες —to the undue prejudice of μηδενί . . εἰ μὴ μόνον Ἰουδαίοις; whereas it really appends a special instance as in 8 4 f., and elsewhere in Acts. So it is to be rendered: "Now there were certain of them, men of Cyprus and Cyrene, such as (οἵτινες, cf. 9 36) on reaching Antioch began to address the Hellenists." It seems best, therefore, to follow ℵ^c DEHLP al. pler. sah. cop. syr.^utr. arm. æth. col. gig. vg codd Chry. in omitting καί, since its presence in ℵ* AB may well be due to the feeling that it is needful to the antithetic relation of ver. 20 to ver. 19 which they agree with the authorities for Ἕλληνας in reading into the passage.

In any case the extension to Antioch, standing midway between the Jewish and Greek spheres, was a momentous step; and there, we read significantly, the disciples of Jesus first obtained the name distinguishing them from Jews proper, "Christians." There too begins the association of Saul with Barnabas, which marks the next stage of advance—still without loss of touch with the old center, Judæa (11 27-30). But before leaving the fortunes of the Gospel in its first home, we are shown how attempts to harm it ever turned, by God's grace, to the confusion of its foes (ch. 12): then, with a verse reestablishing sequence with ch. 11, we pass on to the beginnings of the real Gentile mission, with its base at Antioch.

And now Saul—who at the psychological moment (13 9) is given his Gentile name, Paul—comes out in his true rôle as the main agent of the Divine counsel in the wider destiny of the Gospel, as surely as Peter had been the pioneer of its more restricted scope. The 'turning to the Gentiles' is narrated very emphatically in 13 46-48, while the moral of the whole mission is pointed in 14 27, "all things that God had done with them," so showing "that he had opened a door of faith unto the Gentiles." It was seemingly the news of this great extension of Gentile Christianity on principle that drove the more reactionary wing of the Jerusalem church (now including Pharisees, 15 5) to action in Antioch (as also in Galatia), where it was felt that the issue had to be fought out (see GALATIANS, § 3). With the Jerusalem Concordat, which settled it for the time, i.e. as it arose in Syria and Cilicia (and Galatia), where the Jewish element, side by side with the Gentile, was large, the story, as so far told, reaches its natural conclusion (15 35). Hitherto it has been treated from the Hellenistic standpoint, from which the conditions of intercourse in the Ecclesia between Jew and Gentile, set forth in 15 20, 29, seemed to be minimum concessions (ταῦτα τὰ ἐπάναγκες) to unity on the part of godly Gentiles. Hereafter, however, the horizon widens enormously; new interests and conditions arise: the old platform becomes too narrow in practise, where Gentiles more and more outnumber Jewish converts in typically Gentile regions. Antioch and its associations are largely left behind; and the history gathers round the career of the Apostle of the Gentiles, whose personal commission determines his conduct in regions to which, in his judgment, the Jerusalem compact was inapplicable.

3. Sources of Acts.

Here space forbids any full discussion. As regards chs. 1–12 the present writer feels that neither the hypothesis of merely oral traditions nor the usual theories of written sources—Aramaic (so now Harnack) or Greek—can fully meet the case. The use of a Hellenistic or Antiochene source would account for the bulk of these chapters, but there is need also of the view broached in the commentary on Acts in the Century Bible (1901), viz., that Luke wrote some of Acts 1–12 (or even 15 33) on the basis of notes taken down by himself from the lips of excellent informants, and largely in their own words (which explains the distinctive language and thoughts shining through the present Lucan narrative). Probably Philip, Hellenist and Evangelist, was his main oral source for such notes as to the Jerusalem and Judæan church, taken during Paul's detention in Cæsarea (cf. 21 8 f.). Mark or his mother may be the channel through whom most of ch. 12 (with its intimate reference to Mark's home and the maid servant and the abrupt naming of James, the Lord's brother) reached Luke. Stephen's speech may or may not have come through Philip; at all events it came through a Hellenist of the same circle or type as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (the affinities with which are well pointed out by Dr. B. W. Bacon, Stephen's Speech, in Yale Biblical Studies, 1901). For Saul's history during that period, Paul himself and Luke's own notes of Paul's defenses at Jerusalem and Cæsarea (not always quite at first hand) would contribute something. Other and more purely traditional elements, e.g. the idea of Pentecost as involving foreign tongues—in contrast to Peter's speech on that occasion—may be due to Hellenists in Antioch. The First Missionary Journey (13–14) probably reflects the account given by an eye-witness (Titus?) on returning to Antioch. For the latter part of Acts all is due to Luke's memory or notes, as the case may be; nor is the absence of "we" any sure disproof of his presence, as it may have merely a psychological or emotional significance.

4. Aims.

Henceforth the motifs underlying the narrative, and causing selection from a larger mass of materials, become more varied. The central one so far, the universal spirit of the old religion, as of Divine origin—in spite of Jewish blindness and hardness of heart, now as in former days (cf. Stephen's Speech)—persists to the end, with its climax at Rome (28 17-28). But with it blends more and more another idea, its counterpart, viz., the witness borne by the attitude of typical representatives of the Gentile world, the Roman Empire in the widest sense, that the hostility of actual Judaism was vexatious and groundless. Further, as far as Judaism might try to crush its rival by suggesting that it was an element of disorder and even of disloyalty in the Empire itself, the early history of the Christian Church and its relations to the Roman State, its law and order, refuted the charges. Such troubles as had arisen were in fact due to Jewish jealousy and misrepresentation. All these lines of thought meet in Paul himself, both in his outer lot and in his attitude, whether to his national religion or to Roman citizenship. To both he was essentially loyal. This explains the long and at first sight unduly prolix story of Paul's last visit to Jerusalem and its issues, particularly the repeated speeches of defense. Paul, in fact, was the embodied apologia of the Church in the Roman Empire, over against all its traducers (cf. Von Soden, Early Christian Literature [1906], pp. 230 ff.).

The occasion of Acts, then, like that of all NT writings, is practical. It is determined by pressing religious needs, not by abstract or scientific interests. It is an apology for the religion of Jesus, addressed primarily to men of faith, yet a faith distressed both by bitter opposition and by some perplexities of thought, not as yet quite at home with the deeper ideas of the new religion—as one of power shown through suffering, not through prosperity (the notion of ancient religion generally). But while primarily meant for actual faith, Luke's writings, perhaps alone in the NT, look also to potential faith outside, in 'men of good-will' who need only to know the facts in all the impressiveness of their true order—so that their real meaning jumps to the eye—in order to believe in the "Kingdom of God" among men.

5. Provenance.

Where, then, was such a work likely to arise? Internal evidence suggests that the region in which its first readers were most interested was the Roman province of Asia (note references to Paul's abortive wish to visit it and Bithynia in 16 6 f.), where the concrete narrative becomes most detailed and the topography most minute (18 24–21 1; contrast the verses given to the last visit to Greece, 20 2-5). Differences, even, and abuses among believers emerge at Ephesus (18 24–19 7, John's baptism, and 20 26-36, forecast of that church's future dangers), as nowhere else. Observe too the calm allusiveness of the reference to "the school of Tyrannus" (τινος was soon added to soften it) in 19 9, as though self-explanatory to "Theophilus" and his circle (cf. the abrupt reference to Alexander in 19 33); also the triviality of the itinerary in 20 13-15, save for those familiar with the coast between Troas and Ephesus.

Here reference may be made to some of the most striking of the readings in Codex Bezæ, etc. A whole series of them betray special acquaintance with Asia Minor (Ramsay); and these are among the oldest of the so-called 'Western' or β text. But they are never more than intelligent glosses, showing that Acts was read with more than special interest in the region. The change in 15 20, 29, where the abstinences lose their ceremonial or Jewish reference, may also have arisen in Asia, especially as it is already found in Irenæus.

Finally consider the correspondence between this environment and the motifs of Acts, as already described: the numbers and influence of the Jews in Asia (referred to in 21 27, 24 19 as prime causes of Paul's arrest); the bitterness of their hostility to the Christians both in the later Apostolic age (Rev 2 9 f.) and in Polycarp's day; the interest for this region of the modus vivendi of Acts 15 20, 29, in the light especially of Rev 2 6, 14 f., 20; and the problem of the internal relations of Judaism and Christianity there as late as Ignatius' day. Surely these things constitute strong cumulative evidence for Asia, and Ephesus in particular, as the original home of Acts.

6. Date.

If this be granted, it will add also to our evidence for date, in so far as the tone of Acts is optimistic touching Rome's attitude to Christians, apart from Jewish envy and slander. It assumes that Rome may continue its old policy of treating Christianity as a form, the most legitimate form, of Israel's religion, and as sharing its status as a religio licita, exclusive of the forms of the Imperial cult, as of every other 'idolatrous' worship, yet not therefore disloyal to Rome and Cæsar. When exactly the course of events in Asia, the center of fanatical Cæsar-worship, rendered such hopes untenable, it is hard to say. But relatively early, we may be sure, apart even from the evidence of Rev, the date of which is itself an open question. Harnack thinks a date about 80 A.D. most probable: the present writer inclines to a date earlier in the Vespasian era, as better suiting the words of the Gospel (21 32, cf. 9 26 f.) touching the fulfilment of "all things" before the passing of the original generation of Christ's hearers. The experiences of the era of the siege and fall of Jerusalem seem clearly implied in the wording of Luke 21; but the "times of the Gentiles" seem only just beginning to be fulfilled (21 24, 28). Still "redemption draweth nigh," and some of Christ's generation will see it.

The argument for a date about 100 A.D. derived from parallels with Josephus' Antiquities is quite "in the air" (Harnack, op. cit., p. 18). It does not account for the divergences in the case either of Theudas (5 36, e.g., the number 400)—whatever be made of the account in Acts—or of Herod (12 20 ff.). On the other hand, it is unsafe to argue from the point at which Acts ends (61–62 A.D.); for the narrative has reached its natural climax when the Gospel is preached by Paul in Rome. Paulus Romæ apex evangelii. Nothing of equal significance could be added. The heroic age, in which the Divine power working in Christ's witnesses was most manifest, was already well-nigh over.

7. Authorship.

Finally a date between 70 and 80 A.D. best suits the most probable theory as to authorship, viz., that the whole work, as distinct from a supposed Travel-diary—cropping out here and there between chs. 16 and 28—comes from Luke, "the beloved physician," companion and helper in the Gospel to Paul, who is the hero of the book's most moving sections from ch. 9 onward. Harnack has recently accepted and restated in Lukas der Arzt the arguments used by scientific defenders of the traditional authorship,[1] such as Hobart in The Medical Language of St. Luke (1882), and Sir J. C. Hawkins in Horæ Synopticæ (1899), as regards the stylistic unity of Acts generally. At present, then, as far as linguistic evidence goes, this view may be said to hold the field. The weakness of the counterview, which assigns Acts to about 100 A.D., is seen in the paradox to which it is driven, in order to account for certain Hellenistic features in the warp and woof of the book, that its final author was a 'Hellenistic Jew' (so Wendt and B. W. Bacon). The form of the preface to both works, and their whole feeling when dealing with Græco-Roman matters (cf. Ramsay), make this most unlikely. Luke, however, though born a Gentile (whether Syrian or Greek in race), would naturally have much of the Hellenist in his training—he may have been a Jewish proselyte to begin with—and suits the complex conditions of the problem, both of style and thought, completely. Early tradition touching him is well summed up in the Monarchian Prologue to Luke's Gospel: "Luke, a Syrian by race, an Antiochene,[2] by profession a physician, departed this life at the age of seventy-four in Bithynia." The latter statements, in no way suspicious in themselves, agree well with the foregoing theory in all respects.

8. Relation to the Pauline Letters.

One confirmation of Luke's authorship lies in the apparent non-use of the Pauline letters, which any one save a companion of Paul's would eagerly study for data. Particularly striking is the case as regards the Epistle to the Galatians, which runs parallel to much in Acts, and the absence of exact harmony with which is by some made a prime reason for denying Lucan authorship. As this case is crucial for the historicity of Acts, we must deal with it somewhat fully, instead of trying to discuss minor problems of like order.

Some still regard Acts 15 and Gal 2 1-10 as both historically trustworthy versions of the same incident, in spite of their marked differences. Such differences are, e.g., (1) their ostensible occasion; (2) the privacy implied in Gal 3

[1] This is supported by very early and wide-spread evidence, going back as far as Marcion (c. 140 A.D.), for Luke's Gospel. This is natural, if Harnack be right in saying that a work with a Prologue must from the first have had its author's name in the title. Evidence of the use of Acts is probable (so HOLTZMANN) in Ignatius of Antioch and Polycarp of Smyrna, c. 115 A.D., and perhaps even in Clement of Rome (xviii. 1, cf. Acts 13 22), c. 96 A.D.

[2] Knowledge of this fact (and nothing else) is perhaps implied in the early reading of D also Aug. after 11 27. "and when we were gathered together," etc.—unless we have here secondary use of an Antiochene source underlying Acts. Note also the intimate knowledge of the Antiochene Church shown in Acts 11 26, 13 1, cf. 6 5 fin.

[3] At best, Paul's account could apply only to a private conference at the time of Acts 15, but not there recorded, while yet Paul lays all the stress on it (but see GALATIANS, § 3).

(where it was important for the purpose of Paul's argument to emphasize the public vindication of his own Gospel, if it had then occurred); (3) the practical conditions laid down for keeping the two separate missions in sufficient touch with each other—as to which Paul's language in Gal 2 10, "only," etc., formally excludes any other terms than those he specifies; (4) the clear implication both of Paul's logic (which does not leave him free to pass over any visit between Gal 1 18 and 2 1 without explanation) and of the statement that he remained still unknown by face to the churches of Judæa (1 22f.), to the effect that no visit to Jerusalem fell between those in Gal 1 18 and 2 1, whereas Acts 11 27 ff. records a relief visit to Judæa after Gal 1 18; (5) the contrast between the attitude of Peter and yet more of Barnabas (after his Gentile experiences in Acts 13–14) in Gal 2 11 ff., with what we should gather of them in Acts 15 (esp. 30-36). Those who see their way around these differences must be allowed to take their own course; but they can not fairly cite Lightfoot's authority, since the 'South-Galatian' theory, which makes Paul in Galatians address a totally different body of readers from that contemplated by him, has become so widely accepted, even by defenders of Acts 15 = Gal 2 1-10. This changes the whole perspective. In particular it makes the natural assumption that Paul is defending the independent authority of his Gospel as proved prior to his "begetting" his readers by its agency—an assumption involved by Lightfoot's 'North-Galatian' theory—tell heavily against Acts 15 = Gal 2 1-10 on the current theory.

Turning, then, to those who agree in regarding the foregoing historical equation impossible, we have two types of theory. The one frankly denies any real historicity to Acts 15, and in most cases performs a critical operation on its organic unity, separating the conditions contemplated in 15 20, 29, cf. 21 25, from the narrative as a whole, and relegating them to some later occasion, real or supposed. This leaves Acts thoroughly discredited and its Lucan authorship out of the question. Here Harnack's present position is untenable, as Schürer presses home in the TLZ (1906, cols. 406 f.). He must unify his literature and historical results somehow. The other simply challenges the traditional dogma that Acts 15 must be meant to refer to the same visit as Gal 2 1-10, and sets about finding an earlier stage in the story of the Gospel's extension in Acts with which it may be correlated. Thus there is no reason why a private conference should not have taken place between the Antiochene and Jerusalem leaders touching their respective 'missions'—with a view to anticipate public difficulties such as a Paul would readily foresee (cf. Gal 2 2)—prior to the emergence of public occasion[1] for deputation of Acts 15 2 ("and certain others"). Distinguite tempora. As yet the problem was not one present to the rank and file at all, only to Paul himself in the first instance—leading him up "by revelation" to make sure of the "pillar" apostles. On this occasion these devout followers of the finger of God (cf. Acts 11 17, and later 15 8, 12-17) felt the unity of the Divine working visible in both types of mission, and simply requested that Paul should see to it that he and his converts "should remember the poor" in keeping with the best traditions of Jewish piety (cf. Acts 2 34 ff.)—a principle for which Paul was himself already zealous. It is just here that the second theory divides into alternative forms. Ramsay, followed by V. Weber and others, sees in the wording of Gal 2 10 a reference to Paul's being in Jerusalem for the very purpose of showing the Antiochene mindfulness of the poor saints in Judæa (Acts 11 30). But the present writer considers this identification exegetically forced and views that relief visit rather as an early proof [2] of Paul's zeal for the principle expressed in Gal 2 10. That is, it is simplest and best to assume, as we are free to do—since the account in Acts is so far from professing to be a complete narrative—that the visit of Gal 2 1-10 is an otherwise unrecorded visit, preparing the way privately for that other and public concordat which was occasioned by overt controversy in Antioch some years later (but see GALATIANS, § 3). Thus there is no necessary clash between Acts 15 and Gal. 2 1-10; and with similar allowance for different perspective, we may say the same for Acts 9 and Gal 1 16-21, touching Paul's movements in the first years after his conversion.

LITERATURE: A full discussion of the literature on Acts will be found in the last edition of Meyer's Kommenter (1899), by Wendt, and in Knowling's Comm. in the Expositor's Greek Test. (1906), supplemented by his Testimony of St. Paul to Christ (1905); see also Moffatt's Historical New Testament (1901), and C. ADADAH, ad'a-dā (עֲדָעָדָה, 'adh'ādhāh): A town on the S. border of Judah (Jos 15 22). Probably the Aroer (q.v.) of I S 30 28. E. E. N.

ADAH, ê'dā (עָדָה, 'ādhāh), 'beauty': 1. A wife of Lamech (Gn 4 19 ff.). 2. The Hittite wife of Esau (Gn 36 2 ff.). E. E. N.

ADAIAH, a-dê'yā (עֲדָיָה, 'ădhāyāh), 'J" has adorned': 1. The maternal grandfather of King Josiah, of Bozketh in the Shephelah of Judah (II K 22 1). 2. A Levite of the sons of the Kohathites (I Ch 6 41). 3. A Benjamite of the family of Shimei (Shema ver. 13), (I Ch 8 21) of Jerusalem. 4. A priest dwelling in Jerusalem (I Ch 9 12). 5. The father of Maaseiah (II Ch 23 1, here spelled אֲדָיָהוּ). 6. A man of the family of Bani of the post-exilic Jewish community who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 29). 7. Another of same family and guilty of same offense (Ezr 10 39). 8. A descendant of Perez, son of Judah (Neh 11 5). 9. A priest, son of Jeroham, in the post-exilic list of the inhabitants of Jerusalem; probably the same as 4 (Neh 11 12). C. S. T.

ADALIA, ad"a-lai'a (אֲדַלְיָא, 'ădhalyā'): One of Haman's ten sons (Est 9 8). E. E. N.

ADAM, ad'am (אָדָם, 'ādhām, from root אדם, 'to build,' 'produce'?): I. According to the creation story of Genesis the name of the first man of the race. The Hebrew word used without the article is the name of the first man (Gn 4 25, 5 1, 3-5; I Ch 1 1; also Gn 2 20, 3 17, 21?); with the article, it should be translated 'the man,' as it is in most instances in RV, where AV has "Adam." It is used as the name of the first man where it is necessary to distinguish him from his descendants. In the NT the Greek transliteration Ἀδάμ is used as the name of the first man (Jude ver. 14), who is looked upon as the father of the whole human race, so closely connected with all men that he involved all in his acts (Ro 5 14a; I Co 15 45a; I Ti 2 13 f.). In Ro 5 14b (5 12 f.), I Co 15 22 Paul brings out the historical connection of Adam with humanity, in representing him as being the author of sin and death for all by his one act of disobedience; in this he is a type—though by contrast in result—of Christ, who by His one act of obedience is the conqueror of sin and death. In I Co 15 45 Paul seems to go from the influence exerted historically to nature, i.e., to the relation in which they stand to humanity; Adam the first sensuous,

[1] I see no such occasion in Gal 2 4 f. There is no suggestion such as Paul's readers could be expected to follow, that the "false brethren" were "brought in" at Antioch, rather than at the private conference in Jerusalem mentioned just before.

[2] See Expositor (Oct., 1899), p. 268: cf. O. Holtzmann in ZNTW (1905), pp. 102 ff.: "But then the journey to the Apostolic conference and the first Collection-journey fall in the period immediately after Acts 11 26; one must assume that both journeys followed one another quickly, as Gal 2 10 lets one suppose."

earthly man, Christ the second and last, the spiritual and heavenly man.

II. The name of a city in the Jordan valley, near the mouth of the Jabbok, where the waters were dammed up when Joshua led Israel into Canaan (Jos 3 16). Map III, H 4. C. S. T.

ADAM, THE BOOKS OF: This general title is given to a number of apocryphal and apocalyptic productions (by Christian hands working on Jewish originals), embodying semireligious romances in which Adam and Eve figured as the chief characters and the story of Gn 3 is supplemented and embellished by legendary or mythical accretions. The books are: 1. The Narrative and Citizenship of Adam and Eve (ed. Tischendorf, 1867; also in a Latin form, Vita Adæ et Evæ); 2. The Mandaite Sacred Book of Adam; 3. The Ethiopic Book of Adam; 4. The Syriac Treasure Cave of Adam (based upon the preceding); 5. The Syrian Testamentum Adami (cf. Hort, in DCB). A. C. Z.

ADAMAH, ad'a-mā (אֲדָמָה, 'ădhāmāh): A city of Naphtali (Jos 19 36). The identification, Map IV, G 7, is uncertain. E. E. N.

ADAMANT. See Stones, Precious, § 3.

ADAMI-NEKEB, ad"a-mai-nek'eb (אֲדָמִי הַנֶּקֶב, 'ădhāmī ha-negebh): A town on the NW. border of Naphtali (Jos 19 33). Its site is uncertain. E. E. N.

ADAR. See Time, § 3, and Addar II.

ADBEEL, ad'bę-el (אַדְבְּאֵל, 'adhbe'ēl): A 'son' of Ishmael (Gn 25 13; I Ch 1 29). An Arabian tribe Idiba'il near Egypt is mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions. E. E. N.

ADDAN, ad'dan (אַדָּן, 'addān): The Babylonian home of certain exiles who were unable to prove their genealogy (Ezr 2 59). Called Addon in Neh 7 61 ff. Site unknown. E. E. N.

ADDAR, ad'dār (אַדָּר, 'addār): I. Ancestor of a Benjamite clan (I Ch 8 3). Cf. Ard in Gn 46 21; Nu 26 40. II. A town on the S. border of Judah, site unknown (Jos 15 3). In Nu 34 4 it is combined with Hezron into Hazar-Addar. E. E. N.

ADDER. See Palestine, § 26.

ADDI, ad'dai ('Αδδεί): An ancestor of Christ (Lk 3 28). E. E. N.

ADDON. See Addan.

ADER. See Eder.

ADIEL, ê'di-el (עֲדִיאֵל, 'ădhī'ēl): 1. A Simeonite chieftain (I Ch 4 36-40). 2. A priest (I Ch 9 12). 3. Father of Azmaveth (I Ch 27 25). E. E. N.

ADIN, ê'din (עָדִין, 'ādhīn): The ancestral head of a large post-exilic family (Ezr 2 15, 8 6; Neh 7 20, 10 16). E. E. N.

ADINA, a-dai'na (עֲדִינָא, 'ădhīnā'), 'delightful': A Reubenite chieftain in David's army (I Ch 11 42). E. E. N.

ADINO, a-dai'no (עֲדִינוֹ, 'ădhīnō): II S 23 8 reads "Adino the Eznite" as a second name of David's mightiest hero. I Ch 11 11 more correctly omits the name altogether. E. E. N.

ADITHAIM, ad"i-thê'im (עֲדִיתַיִם, 'ădhīthayim): A city of Judah in the Shephelah (Jos 15 36). Site unknown. E. E. N.

ADJURE. See Oath.

ADLAI, ad'lê-ai (עַדְלַי, 'adhlay): Father of Shaphat (I Ch 27 29). E. E. N.

ADMAH, ad'mā (אַדְמָה, 'adhmāh): One of the cities near the Dead Sea that rebelled against Chedorlaomer (Gn 10 19, 14 2, 8). It was destroyed with Zeboim, Sodom and Gomorrah (Dt 29 22; Hos 11 8). E. E. N.

ADMATHA. See Princes, The Seven.

ADNA, ad'na (עַדְנָא. 'ădhnā'), 'pleasure': 1. One of the "sons of Pahath-moab" (Ezr 10 30). 2. A priest (Neh 12 15). E. E. N.

ADNAH, ad'nā (עַדְנָה, 'ădhnāh): 1. A Manassite who deserted Saul for David (I Ch 12 20). 2. A captain under Jehoshaphat (II Ch 17 14). E. E. N.

ADONIBEZEK, a-dō"nai-bî'zek (אֲדֹנִיבֶזֶק, 'ădhōnībezeq), 'lord of Bezek': A Canaanite king defeated by Judah and Simeon at Bezek. He escaped, but was pursued, captured, and mutilated. He died afterward in Jerusalem (Jg 1 5-7). A. C. Z.

ADONIJAH, ad"o-nai'jā (אֲדֹנִיָּה, 'ădhōnīyāh), 'my Lord is J"': 1. The fourth son of David. His mother was Haggith. Near the close of David's reign he assumed royal state, hoping to become his father's successor. Joab and Abiathar were his active supporters. He made a feast at the Stone of Zoheleth, near Jerusalem, and invited all the king's sons and nobility, except Solomon and his partizans, Benaiah, Zadok, and Nathan. Here he disclosed his plot for seizing the throne. At this critical juncture Nathan advised Bath-sheba to remind David of his promise to appoint Solomon as his successor. David acted with characteristic energy, commanding Solomon to ride on his own mule to Gihon, there to be anointed by Zadok and proclaimed king under the protection of the body-guard. A. and his guests heard the acclamations of the populace, and Jonathan, the son of Abiathar, informed them of the coronation. A. took refuge at the altar, but Solomon graciously pardoned him. Later, he preferred a request to Solomon through Bath-sheba for Abishag, David's concubine. As the harem of a king belonged to his successor, Solomon rightly considered this an act of treason, and had him put to death (I K 1 and 2). 2. A Levite (II Ch 17 8). 3. Ancestral head of a family of Levites (Neh 10 16) called Adonikam (q.v.) in Ezr 2 13, etc.

J. A. K.

ADONIKAM, ad''o-nai'kam (אֲדֹנִיקָם, 'ădhōnīqām), 'the Lord is risen up': Ancestor of a large post-exilic family (Ezr 2 13, 8 13; Neh 7 18). Called Adonijah in Neh 10 16. E. E. N.

ADONIRAM, ad''o-nai'ram (אֲדֹנִירָם, 'ădhōnīrām), 'the Lord is high' (called also Adoram and Hadoram): Overseer of the men forced to work on public works under David and Solomon (II S 20 24; I K 4 6, 5 14). He was stoned to death in N. Israel (I K 12 18; II Ch 10 18). E. E. N.

ADONIZEDEK, a-dō''nai-zī'dek (אֲדֹנִי־צֶדֶק, 'ădhōnī tsedheq), 'lord of righteousness': King of Jerusalem when Joshua conquered Ai; he entered into a league with four other Canaanite kings to fight against the inhabitants of Gibeon, which had made peace with Israel. He was defeated and put to death by hanging (Jos 10 1, 3). Perhaps the same as Adoni-bezek (Jg 1 5).

C. S. T.

ADOPTION (υἱοθεσία): A legal term appropriated by theology. Its Biblical usage is limited to the Pauline epistles (Ro 8 15, 23, 9 4; Gal 4 5; Eph 1 5). Here it signifies the act by which the privileges of a child of God are conferred upon the believer in Jesus Christ. In the Roman judicial system a place was made for a formal act of adoption. In Israelite history cases of adoption also occur. Esther was adopted by Mordecai (Est 2 7, cf. also the cases of Moses, Ex 2 9, and of Genubath, I K 11 20). But no formal act is mentioned. According to the Roman law, on the other hand, the person to be adopted was publicly sold to the prospective parent before witnesses, and thenceforth became a member of the latter's family, exactly as if he had been born into it.

The Apostle's use of the Roman legal term raises the question whether he meant to ascribe real significance to the act of adoption and assert that in the dispensation of redemption there is something corresponding to it. If not, he had in mind the great change for the better in one who has entered the Christian life, with a special regard to the privileges thus secured him. If the act is the important thing in the Apostle's mind, adoption is a separate and distinct stage of redemption. If the privileges it brings are the emphatic element, then adoption is merely another name for regeneration, and the Roman legal formula is chosen to express it because it does vividly bring before the mind these privileges. Of these alternatives, the latter is much more probable. A. C. Z.

ADORAIM, ad''o-rê'im (אֲדוֹרַיִם, 'ădhōrayim): A city of Judah fortified by Rehoboam, about 6 m. W. of Hebron (II Ch 11 9). Map II, E 2.

E. E. N.

ADORAM. See ADONIRAM.

ADRAMMELECH, a-dram'el-ec (אַדְרַמֶּלֶךְ, 'ădhrammelekh): 1. One of the gods of Sepharvaim (II K 17 31), or Sippar in Assyria, possibly Adar (Adrammelech-Adar-King); but a god Adar is unknown in the Assyrian pantheon. 2. One of the two sons of Sennacherib, who murdered their father on his return from the unsuccessful campaign against Jerusalem (Is 37 38; II K 19 37; in the latter passage, however, the word "son" does not occur). A. C. Z.

ADRAMYTTIUM, ad''ra-mit'ti-um (Ἀδραμύττιον): A city of Mysia formerly situated on the sea, but now six miles inland from the Adramyttian gulf, surrounded by olive groves and vineyards, which, with timber from Mt. Ida, make it prosperous. It was founded by Adramys, son of Alyattes and brother of Crœsus. Later, it was colonized by Athens and under the Romans was a metropolis and the seat of a conventus iuridicus (see ASIA MINOR, § 10). It was in "a ship of Adramyttium" that Paul sailed from Cæsarea to Myra on his voyage to Rome (Ac 27 2–5). J. R. S. S.

ADRIA, ā'dri-ā (Ac 27 27), Gr. Ἀδρίας, Lat. Hadria, Hadriaticum mare: The name may have been derived from the town of Adria, or Atria, near the mouth of the Po, and was ordinarily applied to the gulf between Italy and Illyria. But geographers contemporary with the NT extended it to include not only the Ionian Gulf but the sea bounded by Epirus, Achaia, and Crete on the E., and Sicily with the southern coast of Italy on the W. and NW Strabo, e.g. (§ 123), says that the older name was used for "part of what is now called Adrias," under which he includes the Ionian Gulf and the Sicilian Sea. Ptolemy distinguishes the Adriatic Sea from the Adriatic Gulf, and Pausanias applies the name to the sea between Sicily, Malta, and Crete. Luke conforms to this later usage—possibly, as Ramsay suggests, following the sailor's nomenclature—in using the term "the Adria" for the sea in which Paul's company drifted about for fourteen days, generally in a southerly and southeasterly direction, from Crete until they reached Melita. An opinion that Paul was wrecked on a little island Meleda in the Adriatic on the Dalmatian coast is baseless.

ADRIEL, ê'dri-el (עַדְרִיאֵל, 'adhrī'ēl): A Meholathite who married Saul's daughter Merab, already promised to David (I S 18 19). His five sons were given up to the Gibeonites (II S 21 8 [Michal here by mistake for Merab]). E. E. N.

ADULLAM, a-dul'am (עֲדֻלָּם, 'ădhullām): The earliest notice concerning Adullam (Gn 38) is to the effect that in early times clans or families of Judah consolidated with Canaanitish clans (Adullamites) near Adullam. The statement in Jos 12 15 that the city and its king were conquered by Joshua is late and conflicts with the earlier accounts of the conquest. From the notices in Jos 15 35; Mic 1 15; Neh 11 30, its general location is made certain (Map II, E 2). David frequently used its stronghold or citadel as his headquarters (I S 22 1; II S 23 13, where the true reading is 'stronghold,' not "cave"; cf. ver. 14 and 5 17). Rehoboam strengthened its fortifications (II Ch 11 7) It was reoccupied by Jews early in postexilic times (Neh 11 30). (See G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 229.) E. E. N.

ADULTERY. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, § 10.

ADUMMIM, ą-dŭm'im, THE ASCENT OF (מַעֲלֵה אֲדֻמִּים, ma'aleh 'ădhummīm, thus named, perhaps, on account of the red-colored stone in the pass): It lay on the road most traveled between Jerusalem and Jericho, and on the boundary-line between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15 7, 18 17). On a height NE. of the pass was the Chastel Rouge of the Crusaders. Map II, G 1. C. S. T.

ADVERSARY: In the OT the term most often used to designate opponent in general (tsar); but in I S 1 6 this signifies the rival wife. In Nu 22 22; I S 29 4; II S 19 22; I K 5 4, 11 14, 23, 25, it is the translation of the noun, and in Ps 71 13, 109 20, 29, of the verb from the root שָׂטָן ('satan'), meaning to 'accuse' or 'oppose.' In Job 3 35 it means an opponent in a case at law. In the NT it often designates the general idea of opponent, but in Mt 5 25; Lk 12 58, 18 3; I P 5 8, that of legal opponent. C. S. T.

ÆNEAS, ĭ-nē'ąs (Αἰνέας, Eneas AV): A paralytic healed by Peter (Ac 9 33-34). E. E. N.

ÆNON, ĭ'nŏn (Αἰνών, 'springs'): A place near Salim (Jn 3 23). Neither site is certainly identified. According to Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. 245, 91; 134, 25) Ænon was eight Roman miles S. of Bēthshean (Scythopolis). But Conder's identification (*Tent Work*², p. 57 f.) of the "much water" (Jn 3 23) with the springs between Salim (Map III, F 3) and 'Ainūn (Map III, G 3) is more probable. J. M. T.

AGABUS, ag'ą-bŭs (Ἄγαβος): A Christian prophet (Ac 11 27 f.) who came down to Antioch and predicted "a great famine over all the world" (probably the famine in the reign of Claudius c. 46–48 A.D.). In the diary source Ac 21 10 f. A. appears in Cæsarea and predicts Paul's arrest and deliverance to the Gentiles (see CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 5). J. M. T.

AGAG, ē'gag (אֲגָג, 'ăgāg): King of an Amalekite tribe. Samuel commissioned Saul utterly to exterminate the tribe with their king, because of past hostility to Israel, thus putting Agag under the ban (ḥerem). See CURSE, § 2. But Saul saved the king and also much booty. Samuel, highly displeased at this disobedience, carried out the Divine commission by hewing Agag to pieces (I S 15). In Nu 24 7 read Og or Gog for Agag. AGRICULTURE: There can be no doubt that the Israelites first learned agriculture in Palestine.

1. Israelites Originally not Agriculturists. According to the patriarchal legends their ancestors were essentially nomadic, and became agriculturists only incidentally, as in the course of their wanderings they came upon land adapted to farming purposes (Gn 26 12, 37 7; cf. 30 14). Gn 4 20, with its peculiar appreciation of the nomadic life, is not the only thing which reminds us of the fact that the Israelites were once nomads; the Rechabites also, who tried to retain artificially the old conditions which had long since disappeared, bear witness to the fact that the nomadic life was for them the genuine Israelitic life (Jer 35 7).

2. Transition to Agriculture After the Conquest. The nomadic situation, however, changed after Israel had settled in the W. Jordan country. Here the conditions demanded that they take up a settled life the chief employment of which was farming—an art they learned from the Canaanites; for Canaan had been a well-cultivated country long before Israel settled there. The lowlands especially had from very ancient times been tilled, though the cultivation of the hillsides was also old, in spite of the fact that the house of Joseph are bidden to clear the hilltops of their forests (Jos 17 15-18). The importance which agriculture had for Israel from the very beginning of its settlement in Canaan is seen not only in the close connection in which agriculture and religion stood in the earliest times, but also in the fact that it is the background for all the legislation of Israel—even the oldest. After the tribe had by conquest secured a place of habitation for itself, every family probably received a certain piece of land, which was marked off definitely, generally by stones, the removal of which was subjected to curse (Hos 5 10; Dt 19 14, 27 17; Pr 22 28). The land was measured according to "acres," literally 'yokes,' tsemer: i.e., the unit of measurement was as much ground as one yoke of oxen could plow in a day (I S 14 14; Is 5 10), as it is to-day with the fellāḥīn, whose measure is the feddān (i.e., literally, 'yoke of oxen'). According to Lev 27 16, land was also appraised at times by the quantity of seed used in sowing (cf. I K 18 32).

3. The Soil. In Dt 11 10 f., as an especial advantage over against Egypt, the point is emphasized that Israel is not compelled to irrigate the land, but that Jehovah pours out upon it rain and dew; as in other ways the brooks, springs, and lakes were esteemed for their importance with reference to fertility (Dt 8 7). There must have been, therefore, in early times, as to-day, very little irrigated land.

Thorough manuring of the soil was unknown. In II K 9 37; Jer 9 22, 16 4, reference is made merely to the excrement of animals, especially of the oxen and asses used in plowing, which lay upon the fields; and such passages as Dt 23 13 f.; I K 14 10; cf. Ex 29 14, show the practise of thorough fertilization to have been most unlikely. Moreover, manure was dried and often used as fuel (Ezk 4 15). This custom is still prevalent among the fellāḥīn of Palestine (cf. ZDPV, IX, 29). Instead of manure the people employed for fertilization straw and stubble, which like thorns and thistles were burned (cf. Ex 15 7; Is 5 24, 47 14). Of significance for the fertility of the land is the regulation in Ex 23 10 f. that farms, vineyards, and olive orchards were to lie fallow in the seventh year. This hardly indicates that there was a fixed fallowing year for the whole country—a requirement which could not have been carried out in the earlier days except with the greatest hardship to the people—but each field had its own definite fallowing year, as was formerly the custom in Germany.

In the tilling of the soil it was necessary to wait till autumn, when the early rains, mōreh—termed early because the old civil year began in autumn—softened the ground which had grown dry and hard as stone in the summer sun. As the soil to-day in certain localities is worked with the mattock (q.v.), so it was perhaps, here and

4. Tillage. there, in early times (I S 13 20; Is 7 25); but the ordinary way was to use the plow (q.v.); and very likely the practise then, as now in Judæa, was not to plow till after the sowing. The sower scatters the seed rather thinly over the fields, and it is then through the plowing turned under and covered to a depth of about three to four inches. Furrows (Job 39 10; Ps 65 10; I S 14 14) can not be understood of a deep trench as in Western agriculture. The plow does not do much more than break up the surface of the ground; so that it is not sufficiently freed of weeds. For example, in the fertile plain of Philistia there are weed-roots as thick as one's finger, spreading out a yard or more in all directions, and at a depth that can not be reached by the plow. The ox was generally used to draw the plow, the ass also being probably used on lighter (Is 28 25) a box with open front is used to-day in Palestine (ZDPV, IX, 38).

It is likely that the difference between winter and summer seeds was recognized, as it is to-day. The former consist of wheat and barley, the soil. The prohibition in Dt 22 10 leads to the conclusion that at one time both were yoked together. A single plowing did not suffice for fallow land. Upon the first plowing in winter there followed a second in the spring, and a third in summer; indeed, the careful farmer plowed in the late summer a fourth time; cf. Wetzstein in Delitzsch's *Isaiah*², 389 f. Whether harrowing was known in early times is a question. Perhaps the word which is generally so translated (שׂדד) means rather a sort of plowing (cf. Hos 10 11; Is 28 24). For leveling off the fields toward the end of October, at first intermittently and generally at night. Barley was sown first, followed by the wheat. Seed was usually sown with the hand (Mt 13 3-8); the more valuable varieties, such as barley, wheat, and spelt, were at times laid in the furrow by a sower who followed behind the plowman, as is still done to-day, and then plowed in, to protect them from the large ants of which there are great numbers in Syria and Palestine, and which are fond of carrying off the grain into their holes (ZDPV, IX, 30, note). It was perhaps also done to keep the seed from drying up, since a period of from four to five weeks of dryness sometimes elapses after the sowing (ZDPV, IX, 29 f.).

The summer grain was sown at the end of January and in February. The later rain, malqōsh, which falls in March and at the beginning of April, was of great importance for the ripening of the grain. If it failed, or if it came too late, or if it was too scanty, the grain did not mature properly. Another enemy of agriculture was the hot east or southeast wind (qādhīm, Arab. chamsin), which scorched, shiddāphōn, the ears (Gn 41 6; Dt 28 22), so that they turned yellow, yērāqōn (Am 4 9; I K 8 37). The crops were frequently destroyed by grasshoppers also (Am 7 2; Jl 1 4), and at times by hail (Ps 78 47; Hag 2 17). If the harvest-time were near, those crops which were especially valuable were protected by watchmen (Jer 4 17); but it was permitted one who was hungry to pick ears in passing by (cf. Dt 23 25; Mt 12 1). [On the subject of this general paragraph see PALESTINE, §§ 16–23.]

THRESHING WITH A SLEDGE, OR Mōrag.

The harvest, qātsīr, began in April with the cutting of the barley, at which time lentils and fitches were also ripe. Two or three weeks later followed the harvest of wheat and spelt; but of course the harvest-time varied according to the climatic conditions of each region. In the hot lowlands about Jericho the barley harvest began near the first of April; on the coast it was eight and in the mountains fourteen days later. The grain harvest generally lasted about seven weeks, from Passover to Pentecost. The grain was reaped with the sickle, ḥermēsh, maggāl, as is still done (Dt 16 9). The reaper, qōtsēr, grasped a number of stalks with one hand (Is 17 5; Ps 129 7) and with the other cut them off some distance from the ground. The grain that had been cut remained lying in swaths, 'āmīr, behind the reaper, and was bound by the sheave-binder, me'aṣṣēph (Jer 9 22) into sheaves, 'ălummāh (Gn 37 7), 'ōmer (Lv 23 10, etc.; Gn 37 7), which were gathered into shocks, gādhīsh (Ex 22 6). In Lv 19 9, 23 22, every one is forbidden, in the interests of the poor, to harvest his field to its limits. The laborers refresh themselves, while harvesting, with roasted kernels of grain, qālī, and bread dipped in a sour drink, ḥōmēts (Ru 2 14).

6. Harvesting.

The grain was generally threshed, dūsh (I Ch 21 20), or ḥābhat (Jg 6 11), in the open air, however, which was possible inasmuch as the harvest-time is free from rain (I S 12 16 ff.). During threshing-time the harvest men spent the night, as is still the custom, upon the threshing-floor, in order to guard it (Ru 3 6; Robinson, Pal. II, p. 720). The threshing-floors, gōren, were either permanent locations on mountains or hills or else placed, if possible, upon a somewhat elevated spot. There were different modes of threshing: cattle were driven over the sheaves, which were piled knee-deep in layers upon the floor, until they had trodden out the kernels of grain with their hoofs and reduced the straw to chaff, in which operation the ox was not to be muzzled (Dt 25 4; cf. I Co 9 9; I Ti 5 18); or the threshing-sledge, mōrag, mōrag ḥārūts, or ḥārūts (τρίβολον, tribulum of the ancients), was used (Am 1 3; Is 28 27; II S 24 22). This sledge was made very likely, as today, of wooden planks joined together, in the under side of which were set stones or knives (now called naurağ, cf. ZDPV, IX, 41). In addition there was the threshing-wagon, 'ăgālāh, "cart wheel" (Is 28 27 ff.), which consisted of several rollers running parallel, each of which was provided with three or four iron disks, so arranged that the disks of one roller extended into the spaces left by the others (cf. ZDPV, IX, 44). After threshing, the chaff, mōts, was separated from the kernels of grain, bar, by winnowing, zārāh, i.e., by throwing the chaff and grain into the air, with a fork, mizreh (Is 30 24), sometimes furnished with two but generally with several curved prongs. This was done toward evening and at night (Ru 3 2); for the sea wind blows from four o'clock in the afternoon till half an hour before sunset, and carries away the light chaff. The kernels were then sifted (Am 9 9), and thrown together into larger heaps by means of the winnowing-shovel, raḥath (Is 30 24). In the earlier period there were no barns, strictly speaking; the stores of grain were stowed away in pits resembling cisterns, which were carefully covered up, as is still done at the present time in Palestine (Jer 41 8). In later times storehouses seem to have been in use (II Ch 32 28; Pr 3 10; Jer 50 26; Jl 1 17).

8. Variety of Yield.

The yield varies greatly. On soil which has been fertilized, and which is advantageously located, under favorable conditions wheat may yield thirtyfold and barley a hundredfold (cf. Mt 13 8). On unfertilized land, in the plain of Esdraelon, wheat does not yield at the most more than tenfold and, on the average, seven to eightfold; barley at most not more than tenfold and, on the average, sixfold. In the mountains of Judah wheat yields twofold, barley threefold. See further Food and Vines and Vintage.

Job favors the conjecture that ham-mas-sā' ("the oracle," ver. 1) is the name of a region S. of Judah. Its unique literary character makes it reasonable to attribute the entire chapter to Agur. A. S. C.

AH, ā, AHI, ê'hai (אָח, אָחִי, 'āḥ, 'āḥī), 'brother' or 'my brother': In compound personal names Ah or Ahi may refer (1) to the deity as 'brother,' or (2) to the common human relationship. Names of class (1) are very common, e.g., Ahijah, 'Jah (Jehovah) is brother.' Examples of (2) are much more rare and of more obscure meaning, e.g., Ahab (= 'father's brother'?). See ABI. E. E. N.

AHAB, ê'hab (אַחְאָב, 'aḥ'āBH), 'father's brother': 1. The second king of the Omri dynasty and early Israel's most conspicuous and potent ruler. Two alliances give special interest to his reign: his own marriage to the Phœnician princess Jezebel, and that of their daughter Athaliah to Jehoram of Judah. Through the former he gained the support of the richest trading people of antiquity, and by the latter the old schism of the Hebrew people seemed in the way of being healed. Though this hope was doomed to disappointment, Israel and Judah were joined by close bonds for over a century.

But the Phœnician alliance brought with it the cult of the Tyrian Baal, an importation distasteful to people and prophets. The local Baalim had been regarded as legitimate, and doubtless even identified with Jehovah, hence the people resented the intrusion of the strange god, whose centralized worship threatened the existence of the local shrines. The names of Ahab's children—Ahaziah, Jehoram, Athaliah—indicate indeed the strength of the J" religion, but the growing syncretism aroused the prophets to outline a purer and loftier idea of J", which dominated prophetic thought from that time forth.

1. The Assyrian Record.

The gross disregard of personal rights shown in the seizure of Naboth's vineyard (I K 21) was undoubtedly a potent element in the downfall of the dynasty, while it enabled the prophets to grasp and present the great principles of ethical monotheism.

Two important synchronisms meet us in this period: (1) The Moabite Stone, lines 6 and 7, refers to Ahab, and suggests that even in his reign Moab began struggles for independence, which culminated under Jehoram (see MESHA). (2) Ahab ascended the throne as the vassal of Damascus (I K 20 4), but at the battle of Aphek he threw off the yoke and a three years' peace followed (I K 22 1). In this period we should probably place the invasion of Shalmaneser II., who records that A-ḥa-ab-ba of Sir-'a-la-ai (Israel) appeared with 2,000 chariots and 10,000 soldiers at Karkar, 854 B.C., and together with the allied Syrian kings suffered a crushing defeat. The battle must have been indecisive, however, for it was not followed up, and Ahab's military establishment gave him confidence to seek to wrest Ramoth-gilead from Damascus, in which enterprise he perished (I K 22). Assuming that the battle of Karkar took place during the Peace of Aphek, Ahab's death occurred probably in 853 B.C.

AHAZ, ê'haz (אָחָז, 'āḥāz), 'He (i.e., J") has seized': 1. Son of Jotham and king of Judah, c. 735–721 B.C. (or later). See CHRONOLOGY OF O T.

1. The Assyrian Record.

Tiglath-pileser III. (745–727) received tribute from Ahaz (called Ja-u-ḥa-zi, i.e., Joahaz) in 734 B.C. (cf. II K 16 7). In the same year he deposed and slew Pekah and thus broke up the Syro-Ephraimitic alliance (cf. II K 15 37, 16 5). In 732 B.C. Damascus fell, Rezin was slain, and Tiglath-pileser held a great levee as "King of kings" in the captured city, at which Ahaz was present (according to II K 16 10).

2. The Record in II Kings 16.

At Damascus Ahaz saw a great altar and ordered Urijah to construct one like it. W. R. Smith (*Rel. Sem.*² p. 487) considers this a great permanent altar-hearth, whose ritual, described at length in II K 16 13 ff., was thereafter dominant. Possibly Is 29 echoes the struggle about the new altar ritual, for Ariel ('altar-hearth,' or 'hearth of God') was probably the technical name for the old brazen pillar-altar such as was displaced by Ahaz. The dark period of invasion led to human sacrifice and much oppression and cruelty (cf. II Ch 28 3).

3. The Prophetic Record.

Some of the most striking sections of Isaiah belong to this period. Children and babes are their rulers, he declares, in a fierce invective against the turbulence of the state (Is 3 4). The Syro-Ephraimitic invasion called forth the Immanuel prophecy (Is 7 1–9 7), a declaration that God's purpose to be with His people was invincible, though princes might falter and people be recalcitrant (see IMMANUEL). In ch. 28, dating near the fall of Samaria, the drunken, scoffing, faithless politicians are probably those who favored the Assyrian alliance when Pekah and Rezin were threatening Jerusalem with dynastic overthrow (cf. also Is 7 6). Ahaz's weak, short-sighted policy can be largely accounted for by his youth and inability to cope with the deep-seated corruptions of his predecessors' régimes.

2. A descendant of Saul (I Ch 8 35 f., 9 42). A. S. C.

AHAZIAH, ê″ha-zaiʹā (אֲחַזְיָה, ʼăḥazyāh), 'J″ hath grasped': 1. King of Israel (855–854), son of Ahab and Jezebel. His character was on a level with that of his parents. He was a devotee of Baal and also followed in the sin of Jeroboam. During his reign Moab rebelled, and probably became independent. Mesha says: "But I saw my pleasure upon him, and on his house, and Israel perished with an everlasting destruction" (Mesha inscription, l. 7. See MESHA). Seriously injured by falling through a latticework, he sent to Ekron to inquire of Baal-zebub. Elijah met his messengers and bade them return with the prediction of the king's death (cf. ELIJAH). He made a commercial alliance with Jehoshaphat for the purpose of sending ships to Tarshish. The vessels were destroyed, and the enterprise came to naught (I K 22 51-53; II K 1 1-18; II Ch 20 35-37).

2. King of Judah (843–842), son of Jehoram of Judah, and grandson of Ahab through his mother, Athaliah. The Chronicler speaks of him as the youngest son, as the Arabians had slain all the others (II Ch 22 1, called Azariah in ver. 6). As an ally, he went to war with Jehoram against the Syrians at Ramoth-gilead. At Jehoram's assassination by Jehu, he was severely wounded, but made his escape to Megiddo, where he died (II K 8 25-29). J. A. K.

AHIJAH, a-haiʹjā (אֲחִיָה, ʼăḥīyāh), 'J″ is brother': 1. A prophet of Shiloh, who incited Jeroboam to head the revolt of N. Israel against the house of David (I K 11 26 ff.), but afterward condemned him for his disloyalty to J″ and foretold the ruin of his house (I K 14). The story of Ahijah's dealings with Jeroboam in the LXX. varies considerably from that of the Massoretic Hebrew text reproduced in our Eng. version. 2. See AHIMELECH, 1. 3. Father of King Baasha (I K 15 27). 4. A son of Shisha (I K 4 3, Ahiah AV). 5. A son of Jerahmeel (I Ch 2 25). 6. One who helped Gera to carry away captives (I Ch 8 7, Ahiah AV). 7. A Pelonite; one of David's valiant men (I Ch 11 36). 8. According to the Heb. text a Levite, caretaker of the sanctuary treasures under David (I Ch 26 20), but, according to LXX., instead of "Ahijah," we should read "their brethren." 9. One of the signers of the covenant (Neh 10 26). E. E. N.

AHIKAM, a-haiʹkam (אֲחִיקָם, ʼăḥīqām), 'the brother riseth up': One of the trusted courtiers of Josiah delegated to consult Huldah (II K 22 14 ff.). He was a friend and protector of Jeremiah (Jer 26 24 ff.). His son Gedaliah was governor after the fall of Jerusalem (Jer 39 14). E. E. N.

AHILUD, a-haiʹlud (אֲחִילוּד, ʼăḥīlūdh), 'a brother is born': 1. The father of David's recorder, Jehoshaphat (II S 8 16, 20 24; I K 4 3; I Ch 18 15). 2. The father of Baana, one of the victualers of Solomon's household (I K 4 12). E. E. N.

AHIMAAZ, a-himʹa-az (אֲחִימַעַץ, ʼăḥīmaʿats), 'my brother is wrath': 1. A son of Zadok, David's priest. In David's flight from Jerusalem, A. and Jonathan were sent back to act as spies and couriers. A., with his companion, was despatched by Hushai to warn David. Eluding their pursuers, they reached David and delivered the message which enabled the king to escape. After the battle with Absalom, A. desired to bear the tidings to David. At first Joab refused, and sent a Cushite. A. finally secured permission, outran the Cushite, and delivered his message first (II S 15, 17, 18). 2. The father of Saul's wife, Ahinoam (I S 14 50). 3. A prefect and son-in-law of Solomon (I K 4 15). J. A. K.

AHIMAN, a-haiʹman (אֲחִימָן, ʼăḥīman), 'my brother is a gift': 1. One of the three sons of Anak at Hebron, offspring of the Nephilim, and of such gigantic stature that they terrified the spies (Nu 13 22 f.). They were conquered by Caleb (Jg 1 10, 20; Jos 15 13 ff.). Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai were most probably clan names. There may be a mythological touch in the reference to the Nephilim. 2. A Levite porter "at the king's gate eastward," who returned from Babylon (I Ch 9 17). J. A. K.

AHIMELECH, a-himʹẹ-lec (אֲחִימֶלֶךְ, ʼăḥīmelekh), 'the king is brother': 1. The head of the priesthood at Nob slain by Saul for assisting David (I S 21, 22). Descended from Eli through Ahitub (I S 22 9, cf. 14 3; I Ch 24 3). His son Abiathar was priest under David (I S 22 20, etc.). In II S 8 17, I Ch 24 6 read "Abiathar son of Ahimelech." In I Ch 18 16 read "Ahimelech" for "Abimelech," in 24 3, 31, "Abiathar" for "Ahimelech." Ahijah in I S 14 3 is probably to be identified with Ahimelech. 2. A Hittite in David's service (I S 26 6). E. E. N.

AHIMOTH, a-haiʹmoth (אֲחִימוֹת, ʼăḥīmōth): A son of Elkanah, a Levite (I Ch 6 25). (In ver. 35 and II Ch 29 12 called Mahath.) E. E. N.

AHINADAB, a-hin'a-dab (אֲחִינָדָב, 'ăḥīnādhābh), 'brother is generous': A prefect under Solomon (I K 4 14). E. E. N.

AHINOAM, ā''hin'o-am (אֲחִינֹעַם, 'ăḥīnō'ām), 'brother is pleasantness': 1. The wife of Saul (I S 14 50). 2. A woman of Jezreel (in Judah, cf. Jos 15 56), wife of David and mother of Amnon, his eldest son (I S 25 43, 27 3, 30 5; II S 2 2, 3 2). E. E. N.

AHIO, a-hai'o (אַחְיוֹ, 'aḥyō): 1. A son of Abinadab (II S 6 3 f.). 2. The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 8 14). 3. A Benjamite of Gibeon (I Ch 8 31, 9 37). E. E. N.

AHIRA, a-hai'ra (אֲחִירַע, 'ăḥīra'): A prince of Naphtali (Nu 1 15, 2 29, etc.). E. E. N.

AHIRAM, a-hai'ram (אֲחִירָם, 'ăḥīrām), 'the brother is high': Ancestral head of the Ahiramites, a clan of Benjamin (Nu 26 38; Ehi in Gn 46 21; Aharah in I Ch 8 1; also cf. Aher, I Ch 7 12). E. E. N.

AHISAMACH, a-his'a-mac (אֲחִיסָמָךְ, 'ăḥīṣāmākh), 'brother sustains': A Danite, father of Oholiab (Ex 31 6, 35 34, 38 23). E. E. N.

AHISHAHAR, a-hish'a-hār (אֲחִישַׁחַר, 'ăḥīshaḥar), 'brother is dawn': The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 7 10). E. E. N.

AHISHAR, a-hai'shār (אֲחִישָׁר, 'ăḥīshār): The overseer of Solomon's household (I K 4 6). E. E. N.

AHITHOPHEL, a-hith'o-fel (אֲחִיתֹפֶל, 'ăḥīthōphel), 'brother of foolishness': Accounted the wisest man in Israel (II S 16 23), a counselor of David, possibly the grandfather of Bath-sheba (II S 23 34, cf. 11 3). He was a co-conspirator with Absalom (II S 15 12, etc.), but his advice being rejected he committed suicide, for which his name has perhaps been stamped with the opprobrious epithet הָכֶל, thōphel. A. S. C.

AHITUB, a-hai'tub (אֲחִיטוּב, 'ăḥīṭūbh), 'brother is goodness': 1. A priest, descended from Eli, and the father of Ahimeleeh (I S 14 3, 22 9). 2. The father of David's priest Zadok (II S 8 17; I Ch 6 8, 18 16; Ezr 7 2). 3. A priest descended from Zadok (I Ch 6 11 f.). 4. A priest, ruler of the Temple in post-exilic days (I Ch 9 11; Neh 11 11). E. E. N.

AHLAB, ā'lab (אַחְלָב, 'aḥlābh): A Canaanite town in Asher. Site unknown (Jg 1 31). E. E. N.

AHLAI, ā'lai (אַחְלַי, 'aḥlay): 1. A child of Sheshan; perhaps a son (I Ch 2 31), or, possibly, a daughter (ver. 34). 2. The father of Zabad (I Ch 11 41). E. E. N.

AHOAH, a-hō'ā (אֲחֹחִ, 'ăḥoaḥ): The head of the Ahohites, a Benjamite family (I Ch 8 4) to which Zalmon (II S 23 28, Ilai in I Ch 11 29) and Dodo (I Ch 11 12, 27 4) belonged. E. E. N.

AHOLAH, AHOLIAB, AHOLIBAH, AHOLIBAMAH. See OHOLAH, etc.

AHUMAI, a-hū'mai (אֲחוּמַי, 'ăḥūmay): The head of a family of Judah (I Ch 4 2). E. E. N.

AHUZZAM, a-hū'zam (אֲחֻזָּם, 'ăḥuzzām, Ahuzam AV), 'possession' (?): A son of Ashur (I Ch 4 6). E. E. N.

AHUZZATH, a-huz'ath (אֲחֻזַּת, 'ăḥuzzath), 'possession': The "friend" (i.e., 'adviser') of Abimeleeh, king of Gerar (Gn 26 26). E. E. N.

AHZAI, ā'zai (אַחְזַי, 'aḥzay, Ahasai AV): A priest (Neh 11 13); possibly = JAHZERAH (I Ch 9 12). E. E. N.

AI, ai (עַי, 'ay, in Hebrew always with the article; Jos 7 2 f.; Ezr 2 28; [LXX., Γαι]): An ancient royal city of the Canaanites, situated "beside Bethaven on the E. side of Bethel" (Jos 7 2; Gn 12 8), destroyed by Joshua (Jos 8 28); best identified with certain obscure ruins just S. of the modern Dēr Dīwān (Map III, F 5). Hai (Gn 12 8, 13 3, AV), Aija (Neh 11 31), and Aiath (Is 10 28) are but variant forms of the same name. The Ai of Jer 49 3 was probably an unknown city E. of the Jordan. G. L. R.

AIAH, ê'yā (אַיָּה, 'ayyāh), 'faleon': 1. An Edomite tribe (Gn 36 24, Ajah AV). 2. The father of Rizpah (II S 3 7, 21 8, 11). E. E. N.

AIATH, ê'yath, AIJA, ê-ai'ja. See AI.

AIJALON, ai'ja-lon (אַיָּלוֹן, 'ayyālōn, Ajalon AV), 'hart': 1. A broad valley NW. of Jerusalem leading down to the seacoast plain (Jos 10 12). Map III, E 5. 2. A town in this valley (Jos 19 42, 21 24; Jg 1 35; I S 14 31; I Ch 6 69, 8 13; II Ch 11 10, 28 18), mentioned in the Amarna letters as Ailuna. Now called Yalo. Map III, E 5. 3. A town in Zebulun, site unknown (Jg 12 12). E. E. N.

AIJELETH HASH-SHAHAR, ai-jê'leth hāsh-shê'hār. See MUSIC, § 6.

AIN, ê'in (עַיִן, 'ayin), 'spring': 1. A place on NE. border of Canaan, near Riblah (Nu 34 11). Robinson identifies it with the sources of the Orontes River. 2. A place in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15 32), assigned to Simeon (Jos 19 7) and apparently the same as the Levitical city (Jos 21 16). Should perhaps be read with Rimmon (Jos 15 32) as one word. See EN-RIMMON. C. S. T.

AKAN, ê'kan. See JAAKAN.

AKELDAMA, a-kel'da-mā ('Ακελδαμάχ, Aceldama AV): The Greek transliterates an Aramaic word meaning 'field of sleep' (cf. κοιμητήριον, cemetery), and is given as the name of a piece of land which Judas purchased with the blood-money paid him for the betrayal of Jesus and upon which he committed suicide (Ac 1 19). In Mt 27 7 f., it is said that the high priests and elders purchased the field with the money returned by the remorse-stricken Judas, and that the field was used for the burial of strangers, and called "the field of blood." The place is identified with the modern Hakk-ed-Dumm, S. of the Pool of Siloam, on a level spot, half-way up the hill. The RV reading is based upon the assumption that the Akeldamach of the Greek text is a mistake for Ἀκελδαμα, the transliteration of חֲקַל דְּמָא, 'field of blood.' A. C. Z.

AKKUB, ak'kŭb (עַקּוּב, 'aqqubh): 1. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 24). 2. The head of a post-exilic family (I Ch 9 17 = Ezr 2 42; perhaps = Neh 7 45, 11 19, 12 25). 3. The head of a post-exilic family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 45). 4. One of the Levites who helped to expound the law read by Ezra to the people (Neh 8 7). C. S. T.

AKRABBIM, ak-rab'im (עַקְרַבִּים, 'aqrabbīm), 'scorpions': The 'Ascent of the Scorpions' which led up from the region about the S. end of the Dead Sea to the highland of S. Judah (Nu 34 4; Jos 15 3, Maaleh-acrabbim AV). Map II, F 5. E. E. N.

ALABASTER (origin of word unknown): Mineral carbonate of lime. A white stone much used in antiquity to ornament buildings and for vases and small bottles for holding precious ointment (Lk 7 37; Mk 14 3 = Mt 26 7). E. E. N.

ALCIMUS, al'si-mŭs (Ἄλκιμος, probably the Greek form of Eliakim): A leader of the Hellenistic party, and opponent of Judas Maccabeus, c. 162 B.C. (I Mac 7 5). He was appointed high priest by Demetrius I., and a Syrian army under Bacchides was sent to Judæa to put him in power and take vengeance on Judas. Because Alcimus was of the "seed of Aaron" (I Mac 7 14) he was accepted largely by the ASSIDEANS (q.v.), but a treacherous murder of sixty of them in one day caused a deep revulsion of feeling, and after Bacchides returned to Syria, Alcimus was unable to maintain himself as high priest (I Mac 7 21) and appealed to Demetrius for aid. Judas defeated the first army sent under Nicanor, and Alcimus fled. But a second large Syrian force (I Mac 9 1) vanquished Judas at Eleasa (161 B.C.). Alcimus now came to full power and a determined policy of Hellenizing the land was carried out. While taking down the dividing wall in the Temple, in order to blot out the distinction between Jew and Gentile, he was stricken with paralysis and died, B.C. 160. J. S. R.

ALEMETH, al'ĕ-meth (עַלְמֶת, 'ālemeth): I. 1. A descendant of Jonathan (I Ch 8 36, 9 42). 2. A descendant of Becher, the Benjamite (I Ch 7 8). II. A town in Benjamin. See ALLEMETH. E. E. N.

ALEXANDER, al''egz-an'dĕr (Gr., 'defender of men'): 1. Alexander the Great. Alexander III., called 'the Great,' was born at Pella (Macedonia) in 356 B.C., and died in Babylon in 323 B.C. Brief as was his career, it was one of the most brilliant of ancient history, not simply because of the irresistible power of his military genius, but also because of the policy which he followed in reference to his conquests, of bringing to them the riches and stimulus of Greek culture. With him Hellenism virtually began. Our interest in him in this brief article is concerned entirely with his contact with the Jews.

The battle of Issus (333 B.C.), in which he defeated Darius, made him master of Asia. Soon thereafter he went to Syria. Damascus, Sidon, Tyre, and Gaza fell, one after another, before his victorious forces. According to Josephus (Ant. XI 8 3), it was while besieging Tyre that he sent to the high priest at Jerusalem demanding auxiliaries, supplies of provisions, and allegiance. The high priest refused, and Alexander determined, after capturing Gaza, to go to Jerusalem. The city was, of course, in terror, and the high priest urged the people to prayer and sacrifice for their protection. A dream from God assured him that the city would be protected and directed him how to meet the conqueror. In solemn procession the priests and the people met Alexander at Scopus, and the story goes that Alexander adored the name of God on the breastplate of the high priest. When asked why he did this, he answered that in a dream at Dion in Macedonia he had seen a figure corresponding to the high priest, who promised him success, hence none other than the God of the Jews had been with him. Entering Jerusalem, he offered sacrifice, and gave the Jews the favors which they asked. The prophecy in Daniel shown to him by the Jews (8 21, 11 3) he interpreted as applying to himself. The probable fact underlying this highly embellished story is that Alexander visited Jerusalem. Alexander made Palestine a province of Cœle-syria. The Samaritans, encouraged by the privileges granted by Alexander to the Jews (viz., "that they enjoy the laws of their forefathers, and pay no tribute on the seventh year" Ant. XI 8 5), asked also for favors, professing that they too were Jews. Alexander promised to let them know his decision on his return from Egypt. While he was away they revolted against the governor whom he had placed over them in Samaria, and were severely punished on his return (Curtius IV. 5, 8). Shechem later became the religious capital of the Samaritans. Alexander was favorably disposed toward the Jews, giving them large privileges in Alexandria (q.v.) and many enrolled themselves in his army. He is expressly mentioned in I Mac 1 7, 6 2.

2. Alexander Balas (bā'lăs) figures in Jewish history in the time of Jonathan Maccabeus. He was a man of obscure origin who palmed himself off as the son of Antiochus Epiphanes and laid claim to the Syrian throne occupied by Demetrius Soter. His remarkable likeness to Antiochus V., son of Antiochus Epiphanes, led many to believe in him, and he was supported in his pretensions by Ptolemy Philopator of Egypt, Attalus II. of Pergamum, and Ariarathes V. of Cappadocia; also by the Romans (Polyb. XXXIII. 14, 16). He secured the support of Jonathan (153 B.C.), and gave him in return high honor, conferring upon him the title of "the high priest of thy nation, and friend of the king" (I Mac 10 20). Balas proved, however, totally unfit for the high position which he had gained and after varying fortunes during five years (150–145 B.C.) fled to Arabia, where he was slain (I Mac 11 17). The general attitude of the Jews toward him is given in I Mac 10 47.

3. Alexander, the son of Simon of Cyrene and brother of Rufus (Mk 15 21).

4. Alexander, one of the kindred of the high priest (Ac 4 6). Nothing further regarding him is known.

5. Alexander of Ephesus, who was "brought out of the multitude" by the Jews, to make a defense for them (Ac 19 33). The purpose of this was most likely to save the Jews from being mixed up with the Christians in the vengeance of the people. He may or may not have been the same as Alexander the coppersmith.

6. Alexander the coppersmith (χαλκεύς), of whom it is said in II Ti 4 14 that he did Paul "much evil."

7. Alexander, an early Christian, "who made shipwreck concerning the faith," and whom Paul "delivered unto Satan" (I Ti 1 19f.). Attempts have been made to identify 5, 6, and 7, but identification is simply a matter of conjecture. J. S. R.

ALEXANDRIA, al"egz-an'dri-a: An ancient city, situated 14 m. W of the Canopic mouth of the Nile, founded by Alexander the Great 332 B.C. It lay on a strip of land 2 m. wide, with Lake Mareotis on its southern side, and the sea on the northern. Running out from the mainland to an island 1 m. distant (Pharos Island) was what was called the Heptastadium, an artificial mole. On either side of this were two spacious harbors. A canal joined Lake Mareotis with the Canopic branch of the Nile. The city, which was regularly and beautifully built, was divided into five districts. The Jews occupied the northeastern quarter, and were granted large privileges. Indeed, in this Hellenistic center Judaism and Greek culture came into very close contact. Owing to lack of information it is impossible to trace the development of the city, but under the early Ptolemies it became a noted center of commerce, learning, and civic splendor. Its famous museum and library were promotive of research, and made Alexandria foremost in science. It was here that the first endeavors were made to adjust the OT to Greek conceptions; it was here that the Septuagint translation of the OT was made; it was here that the allegorical interpretation of the Scriptures was developed—all of these being due to the close touch of Judaism and Hellenism. In the Roman period Alexandria was second only to Rome in importance. Alexandria is not mentioned in the NT. Tradition tells us that Mark went to Egypt and established churches in the famous capital.

ALEXANDRIA TROAS, or simply TROAS, trō'as (Τρωάς), originally Sigia, on the W coast of the Troad. Antigonus enlarged Sigia, colonized it with people from Scepsis and elsewhere, and renamed it Antigonia Troas. It was further embellished by Lysimachus (300 B.C.), who renamed it Alexandria Troas. A. sided with Rome against Antiochus, and was made a Roman colony (Colonia Augusta Alexandria Troas). It became one of the most important towns in Asia. Cæsar planned to make it the seat of government, as did Constantine at first. It was further embellished by Augustus, Hadrian, and Herodes Atticus, who built an aqueduct and baths, the ruins of which are still extant, as are those of a temple, gymnasium, and theater, while the outlines of the port with quay and colonnade of granite columns are still distinct. Many marble columns from A. now adorn the Yeni Validé mosque in Constantinople (built 1649–87). A. was a Christian bishopric in Byzantine times. For Paul's connection with this city see Acts 18 8-11, 20 5-12; II Co 2 12; II Ti 4 13. J. R. S. S.

ALLAMMELECH, al-lam'ę-lec or āl''lam-mê'-lec (אַלַּמֶּלֶךְ, 'allamelekh, Alammelech AV): A place in Asher (Jos 19 26). See Map IV, B 7. E. E. N.

ALLEGORY: The description of one thing under the forms of another. Essentially, an allegory is an extended metaphor. In the original text of the Bible the word does not occur as a substantive. The verb derived from it is used in Gal 4 24 and may mean that the affair allegorized was intended as such, or that the interpreter is at liberty to see in it a meaning different from that on the surface. As the object of the Apostle in the passage in question is practical and homiletical rather than doctrinal and pedagogical, it is probable that he used the word to designate the process of appropriating to a specific use by allegorizing what was originally intended in a different sense. The allegorical method of interpretation was common in Alexandria among the followers of Philo, and without committing himself to its underlying principles the Apostle could use it in illustrating and enforcing Gospel truth by O T utterances. Other instances of similar allegorizing by Paul are the use of Dt 25 4 in I Co 1 9 referring to the muzzling of the ox employed in threshing; of Nu 14 16, 23, 30 in I Co 10 4 referring to the rock, and of Ex 34 33, 35 in II Co 3 13. More akin to the typological use are the references in the Epistle to the Hebrews to O T passages regarding Melchizedek and other matters. As a class these may be called allegories read into the O T.

Allegories designed to be such at the start are kindred to parables (q.v.) and metaphors. It is impossible to draw the line sharply between these similar and allied figures of speech (cf. Trench on Parables). Nathan's story to David (II S 12 1-14) may be construed either as a parable or as an allegory. The figures of the Vine (Jn 15 1-8), of the Bread of Life (Jn 6 32-42), and other kindred narratives are more clearly allegories. A. C. Z.

ALMON-DIBLATHAIM, al''mon-dib''la-thê'im (עַלְמוֹן־דִּבְלָתָיְמָה, 'almōn dibhlāthāyēmāh): One of Israel's encampments in Moab, between Dibon and the mountains of Abarim (Nu 33 46). Beth-diblathaim (Jer 48 22, and Mesha-stone, line 30) may be the same place. E. E. N.

ALMOND, ām'und (שָׁקֵד, shāqēdh [from שָׁקַד, 'to keep watch,' or 'to be alert'], so called from its early blossoming, as though watching for the spring; cf. the play on the name in Jer 1 11): The almond, a native of W. Asia, was well known in Palestine and was a delicacy much esteemed in other countries, such as Egypt, to which it was exported from S. Palestine (Gn 43 11). The almond blossom was imitated in the making of the golden candlestick (Ex 25 33 ff., 37 19 ff.), each of the bowls being shaped like its calyx (so Dillmann). In Ec 12 5 the words "the almond-tree shall blossom" seem to be, on the whole, the correct rendering. The white (really pink-white) blossoms are made the symbol of the white hair of the aged man. See also PALESTINE, § 21; FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 5. E. E. N.

ALMS, ALMSGIVING. In the EVV this is an exclusively N T word, being found only in Mt, Lk, and Ac. As an English word, the term is derived from the Greek through the Latin (ἐλεημοσύνη, eleēmosynē, Old Eng. aelmese, almes), and is a singular noun with a plural appearance. The essential element of its meaning is that of gratuity bestowed as an expression of compassion as in the presence of God. The feeling at the root of the conception is one which finds much encouragement in the laws and institutions of the O T (cf. the law on gleaning, Dt 24 19-22). There is, however, a twofold development of the thought in the O T. While on the one side the Mosaic legislation looks upon compassion toward the needy as a feeling to be cherished by the Israelite in his ideal conduct, the prophets on the other side present the case in the light of a rendering to the needy of rights which they might justly claim. Out of the interaction of these two sides of the development, there arose in the intertestamental age the idea of righteousness secured through almsgiving. Especially were charitable deeds thought to be efficacious in annulling the guilt of sin (Sir 3 14-30, 16 14) and securing divine favor in time of danger or distress (To 14 10, 11; Sir 29 12, 40 24). The treatment of the subject by Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 6 1-4) is characteristic. He does not denounce almsgiving as futile in the search for right standing with God, but attempts to plant it upon the right motive of love to the heavenly Father. A. C. Z.

ALMUG-TREE. See PALESTINE, § 21.

ALOES, al'ōz, LIGN ALOES: The rendering of two Heb. words אֲהָלוֹת, 'ăhālōth (Ps 45 8; Song 4 14) and אֲהָלִים, 'ăhālīm (Nu 24 6; Pr 7 17) and of the Gr. ἀλόη (Jos 19 39). In all but one (Nu 24 6) of these reff. a perfume (or fragrant wood) is meant, and in none is the common bitter aloes intended. The two Heb. words probably refer to the same thing, viz., the 'eaglewood' of commerce, an aromatic wood native to SE. Asia and well known to ancient traders. When burned it yields a fragrant odor. Most scholars consider that the text of Nu 24 6 is corrupt, for it does not seem likely that a tree native to far-off India could be spoken of by Balaam so familiarly (though Post, in HDB, contends that it may once have flourished in the tropical Jordan valley and thinks that Song 4 14 supports this view). Dillmann would emend to 'palms,' Cheyne and others to 'poplars.' E. E. N.

ALPHA AND OMEGA, al'fa, o-mî'ga (τὸ Ἄλφα καὶ τὸ Ὦ): The self-designation of Jehovah (Rev 1 8, 21 6) and of Christ (22 13, cf. 1 17), and evidently based on such passages as Is 41 4, 44 6, 48 12; Ps 90 2. The term, or its equivalent, was not uncommon in Rabbinical and contemporary Greek writers. It means 'the Eternal One,' being in O T an attribute of Jehovah, the source and end of existence, with whom the writer of Revelation associates Christ in divine life-giving power. In early Christian literature (Tert. Clem. Alex.) it denotes Christ as the fountain and consummation of all things, and is common in Christian art as a monogram for the eternal Divine Son. R. A. F.

ALPHABET: The hieroglyphic signs of Egypt and the cuneiform characters of Babylonia had been used in writing for centuries before the alphabet was invented. It is first found in use among North Semitic peoples, and although it may not have originated with them, it was developed by a Semitic people, and became the source from which almost all systems of alphabets can be derived. From the Tel-el-Amarna letters, discovered in 1887–88 and dating from about 1400 B.C., it is evident that the Babylonian characters and language were then in use in Canaan. By 1000 B.C., however, they had been displaced by Semitic alphabets and languages, which had developed with the growth of the more or less independent national life of the various Semitic peoples. In each people both alphabet and language, although having an origin in common with that of all the others, became changed and thus adapted to its individual needs.

The material for the study of the development of the Semitic alphabet is found in a few inscriptions, principally on stones, seals, and coins.

1. Date of Alphabet. Perhaps the earliest inscription is that on a bronze bowl of Phœnician origin. It is dedicated to Baal-Lebanon by a servant of Hiram, King of the Sidonians, and may date from about 1000 B.C. From the middle of the 9th cent. comes the inscription of Mesha, King of Moab, called the Mesha Stone (see illustration). The earliest Hebrew inscription was found in the Siloam tunnel, probably built by Hezekiah, and therefore dating from the end of the 8th cent. (see

The important Aramaic inscriptions are from Zinjirli in N. Syria (8th cent.), Nerab, SE. of Aleppo (7th cent.), and others (8th to 3d cent. B.C.) (see cols. 6, 7, 8 of Plate). Comparison reveals a common origin, and also a period of development in the individual alphabets covering several centuries, which were, however, slight. The earliest forms of the Greek alphabet, especially where the writing is from right to left as is the case with the Semitic alphabet, show that these also were derived from the same source. It is therefore evident that the original alphabet must have come into use some centuries earlier than the dates of the inscriptions cited, certainly by 1200 B.C.

2. Origin of Alphabet.

Attempts have repeatedly been made to find the source of the Semitic letters in the Egyptian or Babylonian characters. J. Halévy (Revue sémitique, 1896, pp. 47–65; 1901, pp. 356–370) derives the forms directly from the monumental hieroglyphs; whereas E. de Rougé (Mémoire sur l'origine égyptienne de l'alphabet phénicien, 1874) obtains them from the early hieratic characters, a cursive development of the hieroglyphs. Isaac Taylor (The Alphabet, Vol. I) accepts this view. On the other hand, W. Deecke (ZDMG, xxxi. 102 ff.)

and Hommel (Gesch. Babyloniens u. Assyriens, p. 50 ff.) contend that the forms of the Semitic alphabet were derived from certain cuneiform characters. Fr. Delitzsch (Die Entstehung des ältesten Schrift-Systems, p. 221 ff.), however, contents himself with the attempt to prove only a free dependence of the Semitic letters on the Babylonian writing. Neither system can as yet be proved to be the direct source of all the letters of the Semitic alphabet. The acrophonetic element of the later Egyptian characters, however, may have suggested the alphabet to its inventor, for a letter is represented in its earliest form by the picture of the object, the name of which begins with the letter represented.

3. Names and Origin of Individual Letters.

At present it is impossible to give the etymological explanation of all signs used in the Semitic alphabet, but several are certain: among them are the following (consult Plate): א (a) 'ox-head,' Heb. 'eleph; ב (b) 'house,' Heb. bayith; ל (l) 'ox-goad,' malmadh (Lidzbarski, Ephemeris, Vol. I, p. 263, gives, as the name of ל, a Hebrew word beginning with מ, prefixed to a stem which begins with ל; in use this initial מ was dropped); מ (m) 'water,' mayim; ע (i) 'eye,' 'ayin; פ (p) 'mouth,' peh; ר (r) 'head,' r'osh; ש (s, sh) 'row of teeth,' shēn;

ת (t) 'sign,' tāw. Nöldeke (Beiträge zur sem. Sprachwissenschaft, 1904, pp. 124–136) and Lidzbarski (Ephemeris, Vol. II, Heft 2, 1906) have recently published interesting contributions on this point. A study of the Greek names, which evidently were derived from the original Semitic forms, may assist in this investigation. The Aramaic form of the names of the Hebrew alphabet may point to an Aramaic origin of the alphabet. It is almost certain that a few names were given after the original significance of the character had been forgotten and without the use of the principle of acrophony, further than that the name should begin with the letter designated. Perhaps certain letters were developed out of other letters, as e.g., ח from ה, ס from ז, ט from ת, the last-named by enclosing the original form, a cross, in a circle. There is, however, no evidence to prove that the North Semitic alphabet ever had less than the 22 characters used in the inscriptions. All the letters were originally consonants, but י, ה, ו, and א came to represent vowels in Hebrew. The Greek alphabet used some of its forms for vowels and added three new signs. The phonetic demands of the South Semitic peoples led to the production of many additional forms, some at least derived from older characters.

4. Order of Letters.

The names of the letters show that the characters were derived from parts of the human body, from animals, and things with which they had most to do. The arrangement of these letters in the alphabet may have been due in part to the tendency to place together things related, e.g., י = hand, כ = bent hand, ע = eye, פ = mouth, and to other mnemonic motives. We know the order of the Hebrew alphabet from that of the Greek, from the numerical value of each letter, and also from the initial letters of the verses in the alphabetic Psalms (111, 112, 119; Pr 31 10 ff., and La 1).

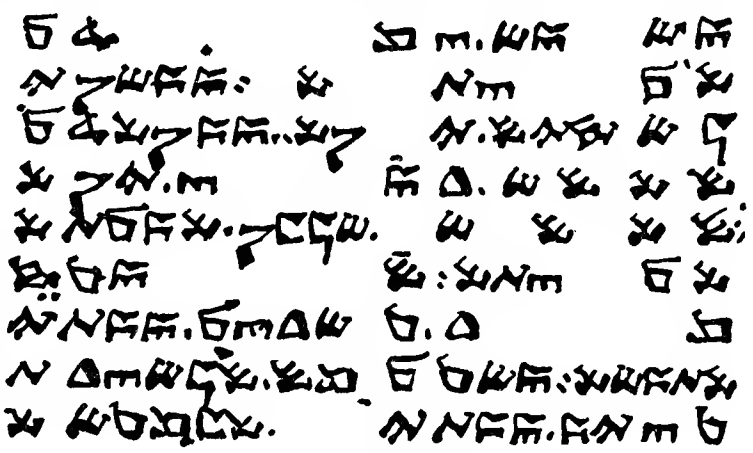
5. Alphabet Used by the Hebrews.

Apart from the origin of the Semitic alphabet, the changes in the alphabet used by the Hebrews are of especial interest. The letters of the Siloam alphabet (Plate, col. 4) show a tendency to a more cursive character than is found in the Mesha Stone (col. 2); but the letters on the seals (col. 3) and coins (col. 5) retain essentially the forms of the Siloam inscription. The older Hebrew forms were used on the Maccabean coins, perhaps to emphasize the feeling of national independence.

The Samaritans continued to use a form of the old Hebrew alphabet which shows its close relation to the original, and proves that until the separation of the Jews and Samaritans (about 400 B.C.) the older form had maintained itself. The accompanying illustration reproduces a few lines of a Samaritan MS. (Dt 1 44-46) of the Pentateuch, written in 1219 A.D., but retaining essentially the forms used by the earlier Samaritans. In certain respects the Samaritan writing is more cursive, while at the same time the characters are more ornamental, as in a codex.



The Samaritan Script.

6. Samaritan Writing.

The Aramaic alphabet was undergoing a development to the north and east of Palestine (see Plate, cols. 6, 7, 8), and out of it developed the square letters characteristic of the Hebrew alphabet, best known to us from its use in the MSS. of the O T. It was not a development within the Hebrew alphabet; but was used by that people, as they had adopted the earlier Aramaic forms, familiar to them from their residence in Babylon. The Aramaic writing did not at once displace the old Hebrew alphabet, but both were in use, the Aramaic characters finally securing the preference in copies of the books of the O T. Strack (*PRE*3, Vol. 17) gives as explanation for this that the Aramaic characters were considered holy, the Hebrew profane. At the time of Christ we have evidence (Mt 5 18) that this square alphabet was in use, for ' is the smallest letter. The changes in the forms of the letters were largely due to the attempt to obtain cursive forms, which were as simple as possible and could be made without removing the pen, and also to the similar effort to join the letters of words. This form of writing gave two forms for five letters: final forms, ך, ף, ן, ם, ץ; and forms for use before other letters of a word, מ; and by bending the perpendicular lines to the left, ע, פ, נ, כ. In other letters, and in a similar way, horizontal bars have arisen out of the vertical lines of the primitive forms, cf. ב, ס, as well as כ, נ, פ, צ, of column 1. By the opening of the upper portion of closed loops, and the straightening of zigzags of earlier forms, the upper bars of ב, ד, כ, ם, נ, ר,ס are obtained. In order to avoid the confusion of characters in other letters the vertical lines were left, cf. כ and ר. The form ע results from the opening of the upper part of the original circle, and extending the right-hand line toward a following letter. The square Hebrew characters were obtained by isolating each letter from all others in a word, and retaining the form thus resulting. This alphabet, with slight modifications, has been used in all OT manuscripts, the oldest of which dates from the end of the 9th cent. A.D.

ALPHÆUS, al'fe-us or al-fi'us (Ἀλφαῖος, WH Ἁλφαῖος): 1. The father of the second James in the apostolic lists (Mk 3 18; Mt 10 3; Lk 6 15; Ac 1 13), probably the same as Clopas, husband of Mary (Jn 19 25). For (a) both names are possible transliterations of the Aram. chalephai, but cf. Zahn, Forsch. VI, p. 343; and (b) in Mk 15 40; Mt 27 56, the woman who corresponds to Mary, the wife of Clopas in Jn 19 25, is called the mother of James (Mk adds "the Less") and Joses. There is no reason for the further assumption (Eusebius, HE, III, 11, 2; IV, 22, 4) that A. was a brother of Joseph, thus making James son of A. the cousin of Jesus (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD).

ALTAR: The origin of the term altar is very obscure. The current theory, that the altar is but a development from the sacred stone, of which the 'pillar,' the matstsēbhāh, was the later and more direct representative (so e.g. Benzinger, p. 379, Nowack, II, p. 18), is not beyond all doubt. The ancient legislation (Ex 20 24) requiring that altars should be of earth, or, if not, of unhewn stone only, seems to indicate that the primitive altar often consisted simply of a heap of earth. In any case, there can be no doubt that the earliest altars were of the most simple type. The sacred stone, also, was essentially an altar, in the sense of being a place where some recognition of the presence of deity could be made (by smearing with oil, cf. Gn 28 18, or blood, cf. I S 14 31-35). The ancient narrative in I S 14 31 ff. is instructive as to the intimate relation between the sacred stone and the altar. Saul, horrified by the news that the people were slaying the captured animals and eating them "with the blood"—i.e., without a proper sacrificial disposal of the blood—abode of deity or indicated the near-by presence of deity (cf. Gn 28 16-18). The main idea regarding an altar was that it was the place of sacrifice (i.e., slaughter, since originally every slaughter was a sacrifice) as its Heb. name mizbēaḥ indicates. These two ideas are brought together in the most ancient O T legislation regarding altars (Ex 20 24 f.). Wherever J" "recorded" His name was a legitimate place for an altar; that is, wherever J" manifested His presence, as by a theophany, by a dream, by giving victory to His people, etc. Such conceptions betray themselves in all that is said of altars in the

had a large stone placed before him to which the people were ordered to bring their animals for slaughter. This stone was both a sacred stone, set up in commemoration of Jehovah's deliverance of His people, and an altar—a mizbēaḥ, 'sacrifice-(i.e., slaughter-) place.' The main idea regarding the sacred stone was that it either was actually the patriarchal stories in Gn and in the stories in Jg and I S. In all these a comparatively simple state of society (seminomadic or undeveloped agricultural) is presupposed, and all usages are correspondingly simple.

Every Canaanite high place had its altar, and as the main function of the altar was to furnish a place for the proper disposition of the blood (afterward, of necessity, of the whole or parts of the body, by burning of the sacrificial victim), remains of such high-place altars generally show a number of cup-like depressions on the top with one or more drains to collect and carry off the blood (see the reports of excavations at Gezer in PEFQ, 1902–06). For illustrations of ancient Hebrew rock-altars see H. B. Greene in Bib. World, May, 1897, and see also G. L. Robinson's account of the Edomite high place of Petra, ibid., Jan., 1901.

The Kingdom period with its development of city life and the establishment of royal sanctuaries (e.g., at Jerusalem, Beth-el, and Samaria), with their temples and more elaborate cultus, brought about a corresponding development of the altar probably with more or less extensive adoption of foreign types (Phœnician, Assyrian, etc.). In some Canaanite cities altars of elaborate form were in use before the Conquest. One such was found at Taanach by Professor Sellin (July, 1902), with ornamented corners and faces, with horns, a cup for sacrifices, etc. (see PEFQ, Oct., 1902).

2. The Altars of the Temple and Tabernacle.

The detailed information regarding altars in the O T concerns mainly those of the Tabernacle and the temples of Solomon and of Ezekiel's vision. For his Temple Solomon discarded David's altar and had a new brazen altar constructed. It is probable that this altar was erected on the site of David's sacrifice on the occasion mentioned in II S 24 16-25 (cf. I Ch 22 1; II Ch 3 1), the place now supposed to be covered by the famous Dome of the Rock (see JERUSALEM, §§ 4, 25). The description of this altar has been omitted in I K 7 (though reminiscences occur in 8 64 and 9 25), but it can be supplied from II Ch 4 1. It was 20 cubits in length and breadth with a height of 10 cubits. Its general shape was probably like that of the altar of Ezekiel's vision (Ezk 43 13-17). It "rose in terraces, contracting by means of two inlets [ledges] toward the top." It was 20 cubits square at the base, but the altar hearth was probably not more than 12 cubits square. By some Ezekiel's altar is taken as an exact reproduction of Solomon's, but the figures given in Ezk seem to make a structure 18 cubits square by 12 cubits high, instead of 20 cubits and 10 cubits (see Davidson's Com. on Ezk in Camb. Bible). The altar was ascended by a flight of steps on its east side. Its faces were probably ornamented with figures of various kinds. Little is said of its structure in detail. The material is said to have been brass (bronze). Whether this refers to the whole or only to its covering or plating is not known. It had horns, apparently because it was customary for more elaborate altars to have such. The original significance of these is not known. W. R. Smith (Rel. Sem., p. 436) thinks that they were a survival of the practise of actually placing the head (with the horns) of the sacrificial victim on the altar and leaving them there to hang votive offerings on, etc. The horns appear to have been thought the most sacred part of an altar (cf. Ex 29 12; Lev 16 18; I K 1 50). The altar was doubtless provided with drains, etc., but of these nothing is said. Its location was "before Jehovah" (II K 16 14), i.e., directly E. of the porch of the Temple.

Solomon's altar was in general use for all burnt offerings until it was displaced by the altar Ahaz had made after a model he had seen at Damascus (II K 16 10-16). Both of these altars were doubtless destroyed at the capture of Jerusalem (586 B.C.).

In Solomon's Temple there was another "altar," that of the showbread (I K 6 20) made of cedar, overlaid with gold. This is called a "table" in Ezk (41 22). Something similar to this has been found portrayed on the Assyr. monuments. (See the cut in Benzinger, p. 387.) In K, Ch, and Ezk there is no specific mention of an altar of incense.

When the exiles returned, one of their first acts was to build an altar (Ezr 3 3) probably of unhewn stones (cf. I Mac 4 47) in stricter accord with the old law of Ex 20 25 than the altars of Solomon, Ahaz, or Ezekiel had been. This altar was in use as the altar of the Second Temple until it was desecrated by the command of Antiochus Epiphanes (I Mac 1 54). When the Jews regained possession of Jerusalem they carefully pulled down the desecrated altar, laid away its stone and built a new one, also of unhewn stone (I Mac 4 44-47). It is thus seen that Ezekiel's plan of a magnificent bronze altar was not realized.

The description of the Tabernacle in Ex 25–31 and 35–40, largely of post-exilic date, states ideals rather than facts. It combines the conceptions of Ezekiel with the actual practises of the post-exilic Temple in one ideal presentation. According to this description the Tabernacle had three altars: (1) "The altar," i.e., the altar of burnt offerings, a small portable structure, hollow, of wood overlaid with bronze, 5 cubits square and 3 cubits high. It was furnished with horns and with a bronze grating or network, perhaps intended for carrying away the blood, rather than for the ashes (Ex 27 1-8). (2) The table for the showbread (Ex 25 23-30). (3) The altar of incense (Ex 30 1 ff.). The account of this last seems to belong to a secondary stratum of the narrative in Ex 25–31 and, since even Ezekiel says nothing about such an altar, was probably added at a later time in the post-exilic period after the altar of incense had been added to the furniture of the Second Temple. When that was no one can say, except that it took place before the Maccabean period (cf. I Mac 4 49). Of the altars of Herod's reconstructed temple little is definitely known. See also TEMPLE, TABERNACLE, and SACRIFICE.

The reference in Gn 14 7 to "all the country of the Amalekites" as smitten by Chedorlaomer and his allies does not necessarily carry them back in history to the days of Abraham, but rather defines their locality in the time of the author. They are not alluded to in the 'Table of Nations' (Gn 10). Geographically, they occupied the desert region S. of Canaan, extending from Beersheba beyond Kadesh-barnea far into the peninsula of Sinai and probably also into northern Arabia. They withstood the Israelites, when the latter under Moses migrated from Goshen to the Promised Land, attacking them in the rear (Dt 25 17-19). At Rephidim, which is best identified with Wady Feirân, they were defeated by Joshua (Ex 17 8-16). When the spies returned they reported that the Amalekites dwelt "in the land of the South" (Nu 13 29). Not long after this they are spoken of as occupying "the valley," presumably the valley S. of the Dead Sea (Nu 14 25). Though powerful at the time of Israel's exodus, they must have become somewhat reduced through the secession of the Kenites and Kenizzites (cf. I S 15 6). In the time of the Judges, however, they seem to have possessed a foothold in Ephraim (Jg 5 14, according to the present text) and to have continued their marauding expeditions (Jg 6 3).

Saul was commissioned to exterminate them utterly, but he spared Agag, their king (I S 15). In David's day Amalekite robbers made a raid upon Ziklag and took it, but they were overtaken by David and so completely decimated that they seem never to have recovered (I S 30). In Hezekiah's reign, "the remnant of the Amalekites that escaped" were smitten by the Simeonites, who dispossessed them of Mount Seir (I Ch 4 43). No trustworthy data concerning them are to be found outside the O T. Neither Assyrian nor Egyptian records allude to them. G. L. R.

AMAM, ê'mam (אֲמָם, 'ămām): A city of S. Judah (Jos 15 26). Site unknown. E. E. N.

AMANA, ā-mā'nā (אֲמָנָה, 'ămānāh): The southern portion, probably, of the Anti-Lebanon mountain range (Song 4 8). E. E. N.

AMARIAH, am"ą-rai'ā (אֲמַרְיָה, 'ămaryāh), 'J" hath promised': 1. A son of Meraioth and grandfather of Zadok (I Ch 6 7 f.; Ezr 7 3). 2. The ancestral head of one of the subdivisions of the Kohathite Levites (I Ch 23 19; cf. 24 23). 3. Chief priest in Jerusalem under Jehoshaphat (I Ch 6 11; II Ch 19 11). 4. A Levite assistant to Kore, the porter at the east gate who was over the free-will offerings of God, in the time of Hezekiah (II Ch 31 14 f.). 5. Ancestor of Zephaniah, possibly son of Hezekiah, King of Judah (Zeph 1 1). 6. One of the priests that sealed the covenant of Nehemiah's time (Neh 10 3). 7. A Judahite who dwelt in Jerusalem (Neh 11 4). 8. One of the priests of Zerubbabel's band which returned from Babylon (Neh 12 2, 13). J. A. K.

AMASA, am'ą-sa (עֲמָשָׂא, 'ămāsā'): 1. A son of Jether, an Ishmaelite, and David's sister Abigail (I Ch 2 17; II S 17 25). Absalom appointed him captain of his forces (II S 17 25). After David's victory he gave Amasa the place held by his cousin Joab (II S 19 13 ff.), probably in order to allay disaffection in Judah. Very soon after this Amasa was assassinated by Joab (II S 20 4-12; I K 2 5, 32). 2. An Ephraimite (II Ch 28 12). E. E. N.

AMASAI, ą-mas'ai (עֲמָשַׂי, 'ămāsay): 1. A Kohathite Levite (I Ch 6 25, 35; II Ch 29 12). 2. One of David's captains (I Ch 12 16-18, perhaps the same as Amasa, 1). 3. A priest (I Ch 15 24). E. E. N.

AMASHSAI, ą-mash'sai (עֲמַשְׁסַי, 'ămashṣay, Amashai AV): A priest (Neh 11 13), called Maasai (I Ch 9 12). E. E. N.

AMASIAH, am-ą-sai'ā (עֲמַסְיָה, 'ămaṣyāh), 'J" bears': One of Jehoshaphat's captains (II Ch 17 16). E. E. N.

AMAZIAH, am"ą-zai'ā (אֲמַצְיָהוּ, 'âmatsyāhū), 'J" strengthens': 1. Son of Joash and king of Judah, c. 798–790 B.C. Though he executed his father's murderers he refused to follow custom and spared their children. Having reduced Edom once more to subjection to Judah, he rashly engaged in war with Jehoash of Israel, but was utterly defeated. Jerusalem was captured, its walls partly demolished, while Amaziah retained his throne only through paying a heavy indemnity and giving hostages. Judah was thus reduced practically to the condition of subjection to Israel. After this, disaffection showed itself and, like his father, Amaziah was murdered by conspirators (II K 12 21, 13 12, 14 1-22; II Ch 25). Amaziah is said to have reigned twenty-nine years (II K 14 2). It is probable that a mistake has been made somehow and that he actually reigned but nine years. See CHRONOLOGY OF O T (table). 2. Priest of Beth-el under Jeroboam II., who attempted to prevent Amos from prophesying in Israel (Am 7 10 ff.). 3. One of the descendants of Merari (I Ch 4 34). 4. A Levite (I Ch 6 45). E. E. N.

AMBASSADOR: In O T the equivalent of (1) mēlīts (II Ch 32 31). Properly, 'interpreter' (cf. Gn 42 23; Is 43 27 [RVmg.]; Job 33 23). (2) mal'āk (II Ch 35 21; Is 30 4, 33 7; Ezk 17 15). 'One who has been sent,' 'a messenger.' (3) tsīr (root idea 'to go'), ambassador in a technical sense (Is 18 2, 57 9; Jer 49 14); parallel to "messenger" (Pr 13 17). In Jos 9 4, the Heb. form is verbal, not substantive.

In N T only as a rendering of the verbal form πρεσβεύειν (II Co 5 20; Eph 6 20). J. M. T.

AMBER, am'bęr: This word occurs in the AV of Ezk 1 4, 27, 8 2, as the rendering of the Heb. חַשְׁמַל, ḥashmal. The RV replaces it with the term "glowing metal," which is as satisfactory a rendering as can be suggested, since the meaning of the term is uncertain. E. E. N.

AMBUSH, AMBUSHMENT. See WARFARE, § 4.

AMEN, ē″men′ or (Mus.) ā″men′: Originally a verbal adjective meaning 'steadfast,' it became an adverb, 'truly,' or an interjection, 'so be it,' 'so it is.' (1) In the O T: (a) Initially; in affirmation of a preceding statement, which the speaker solemnly makes his own (I K 1 36; Jer 28 6; cf. Rev 7 12, 22 20). (b) Detached, as an oath (Nu 5 22; Dt 27 15; Neh 5 13). (c) Liturgical; at the close of public prayer and benediction (I Ch 16 36; Neh 8 6; Ps 106 48). (2) In N T: (a) In the Epistles, commonly a response to public or private prayer (I Co 14 16; Rev 5 14). (b) In Rev 3 14 (cf. II Co 1 20; Is 65 16; RVmg.) it is used as a proper name—Jesus as the Word affirming the truth of God's promises. (c) In the Gospels its use is confined to the utterances of Jesus. Luke usually employs instead of it the expressions "of a truth," "truly," or "I say." Jesus uses it not as an answer, but in strong asseveration. The truth of His utterance must be accepted on His own testimony (cf. "Yea" in Mt 11 9, 26). In John's Gospel only the double term "verily, verily" (i.e., "amen, amen") occurs. R. A. F.

AMETHYST. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 2.

AMI, ē′mai (אָמִי, 'āmī, Amon in Neh 7 59): Ancestral head of a family of "Solomon's servants" (Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59). E. E. N.

AMINADAB. See AMMINADAB.

AMITTAI, ə-mit′ai (אֲמִתַּי, 'ămittay), 'J" is truth' (?): The father of the prophet Jonah (II K 14 25; Jon 1 1). E. E. N.

AMMAH, am′ā (אַמָּה, 'ammāh): A hill near Giah in the wilderness of Gibeon, where Abner, supporting the claims of Ishbosheth, son of Saul, was defeated by Joab, the leader of David's forces. C. S. T.

AMMI-, am′mai (עַמִּי, 'ammī [or עָם, 'ām, when at the end of a word]): An element in the composition of proper names, which, since this word may mean 'uncle,' 'kinsman,' or 'people,' may refer to the divine Being (as 'uncle,' i.e., chief kinsman), or to one's relatives or people. For illustrations see the significance of the various names compounded with "ammi" (or with the suffix "am"). Cf. G. B. Gray, Studies in Hebrew Proper Names, pp. 41–60. E. E. N.

AMMI, am′mai (עַמִּי, 'ammī), 'my people': The designation of Israel as restored to divine favor (Hos 2 1); the opposite of Lo-ammi, "not my people" (1 9), the symbolic name of Hosea's third child which was indicative of the separation that had taken place between Israel and J" E. E. N.

AMMIEL, am′mi-el (עַמִּיאֵל, 'ammī'ēl), 'God is kinsman': 1. One of the spies (Nu 13 12). 2. The father of Machir of Lo-debar (II S 9 4 f., 17 27). 3. The father of David's wife Bathshua (I Ch 3 5), the same as Eliam, father of Bath-sheba (II S 11 3). 4. A Levite (I Ch 26 8). E. E. N.

AMMIHUD, am-mai′hud (עַמִּיהוּד, 'ammīhūdh), 'kinsman is glory': 1. The father of Elishama, prince of Ephraim (Nu 1 10, 2 18, etc.; I Ch 7 26). 2. A Simeonite (Nu 34 20). 3. A Naphtalite (Nu 34 28). 4. A Judahite, the son of Omri (I Ch 9 4). 5. For II S 13 37 see AMMIHUR. E. E. N.

AMMIHUR, am′mi-hūr (עַמִּיהוּר, 'ammīhūr, Ammihud AV): Father of Talmai, King of Geshur (II S 13 37). E. E. N.

AMMINADAB, ə-min′ə-dab (עַמִּינָדָב, 'ammīnādhābh), 'the [divine] kinsman gives': 1. The ancestral head of a family or clan of Judah (Nu 1 7, 2 3, etc.; Ru 4 19 f.; I Ch 2 10). 2. The name of one or more Levites, descendants of Kohath (I Ch 6 22 [elsewhere called Izhar, vs. 2, 18, 38; Ex 6 18, etc.], 15 10 f.). A., the father of Aaron's wife (Ex 6 23), was probably a Levite. The reference to Nahshon in both Ex 6 23 and Nu 1 7, etc., may indicate some intermarriage between Levite and Judahite families. E. E. N.

AMMINADIB, ə-min′ə-dib (עַמִּינָדִיב, 'ammīnādhībh): A name which occurs in the AV of Song 6 12, but RV reads "my princely people." The Heb. text is obscure and difficult. E. E. N.

AMMISHADDAI, am″mi-shad′dā-ai (עַמִּישַׁדַּי, 'ammīshadday), 'Shaddai is kinsman': Father of Ahiezer, prince of Dan (Nu 1 12, etc.). E. E. N.

AMMIZABAD, am-miz′ə-bad (עַמִּיזָבָד, 'ammīzābhādh), 'kinsman has made a gift': An officer, son of Benaiah, David's hero (I Ch 27 6). E. E. N.

AMMON, am′ən (עַמּוֹן, 'ammōn; always בְּנֵי עַמּוֹן, "children [sons] of Ammon," except in I S 11 11; Ps 83 7). In Assyrian inscriptions bit-ammânu: The termination 'on' ('om'), seen also in Milcom, may be an Ammonite linguistic peculiarity, and Ammon, like Milcom, a qualitative designation of the god. The Ammonites were a Hebraic people, descendants of Lot through Ben-ammi (q.v.) (Gn 19 30 ff.). Dispossessing the Zamzummim (Dt 2 20), they settled E. of the Jordan. Their boundaries were indefinite, the Jordan was claimed as the W. border (Jg 11 13), and to the E. lay the uncharted desert. When Israel entered Palestine the A. lived E. of the Jabbok (Nu 21 24; Dt 3 16). Rabbah ("Rabbah of the children of Ammon," Dt 3 11), now Ammân, on the Jabbok, was the capital.

The story in Gn 19 30 ff., generally assumed to be a slur upon the origin of Ammon, is not necessarily such. A. and Moab, both being in possession of their lands long before the Exodus, might well call themselves pure-blooded natives as compared with the Hebrew immigrants. Later the story may have become a taunt. Their language, nearly identical with Hebrew (comp. their proper names), was a witness to kinship.

The term "children of Ammon" suggests nomadic characteristics, and while towns are vaguely referred to, Rabbah is the only one named. Jg 11 gives the first detailed account of their fortunes; Jephthah repudiated their claims on Gilead and drove them E. of the Jabbok. When they again attempted to humiliate Israel, Saul defeated them (I S 11). David was at first friendly to A., but because of the insult to his ambassadors (II S 10 1 ff.), besieged and captured Rabbah, and discrowned Milcom (II S 12 30 mg.); Jotham reduced them to tribute (II Ch 27 5). Later we find them at times in a coalition against Babylon (Jer 27 3), at other times tributary. They once attacked Jerusalem (II K 24 2), and later exulted over her fall (Ps 83). The prophets bitterly denounced them (Am 1 13; Jer 49; Ezk 25 1 ff.; Zeph 2 8 f.). In post-exilic days Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh 2 10) was an opponent of Nehemiah. In 164 B.C., under a leader, Timotheus, they were defeated by Judas Maccabæus (I Mac 5 6-8). The name finally disappears in the 3d cent. A.D.

The name of the chief deity was Milcom, from the same root as מֶלֶךְ, 'king.' In II S 12 30 we should follow the RVmg. Perhaps a colossal idol-statue stood in Rabbah.

AMNON, am'nŏn (אַמְנוֹן, 'amnōn): 1. David's eldest son, slain by Absalom for violating his sister Tamar (II S 3 2, 13 1-39). 2. A descendant of Judah (I Ch 4 20). E. E. N.

AMOK, ê'mŏk (עָמוֹק, 'amōq), 'deep': A post-exilic priestly family (Neh 12 7, 20). E. E. N.

AMON, ê'mŏn (אָמוֹן, 'āmōn), 'master-workman': 1. King of Judah, son of Manasseh, and father of the godly Josiah. Of his brief reign of two years (641–639 B.C.) little is known. Like his father he was devoted to the worship of Assyrian deities. He was assassinated by some of his courtiers, but the people took vengeance upon his assassins. Scholars connect these events with a religious struggle between the prophetic and reactionary parties in Judah. The former, having put the king to death, was not strong enough to maintain its position (II K 21 18 ff.). 2. The governor of Samaria, under Ahab (I K 22 26). 3. One of Solomon's temple slaves whose descendants returned from Babylonia with Zerubbabel (Neh 7 59). J. A. K.

AMORITE, am'o-rīt (אֱמֹרִי, 'ĕmōrī), perhaps 'mountain-dwellers' (Oxf. Heb. Lex.): The early inhabitants of Palestine. Two strong Amorite kingdoms confronted Israel E. of the Jordan prior to the invasion, but they were overthrown and their kings, Sihon and Og, slain (Dt 2 33, 3 3). But there is evidence that the Amorites early occupied the W. and S. of the land as well as the E. The synonymity of Amorite and Canaanite is uncertain, and it is disputed whether the word martū in early Bab. and Assyr. inscriptions is equivalent to A.; but in inscriptions from Hammurabi's age onward, the two terms are interchangeable. "Land of Amurri" occurs on Bab. tablets as early as the 12th cent. B.C., and is also common in the Amarna tablets. The name is frequent in the enumeration of nations (Ex 3 8, and elsewhere). The constant Hebrew tradition makes the A. the immediate predecessors of the Hebraic and Aramean invaders (cf. Paton, Early History of Syr. and Pal.). About 2500 B.C. a new type of Semitic names appears in Babylonia, and racial changes are evident throughout Syria and perhaps Egypt. A. S. C.

AMOS, ê'mŏs (עָמוֹס, 'āmōs), 'bearer' or 'borne' (by God?): 1. The prophet Amos was a nōkēdh or shepherd of fine-haired sheep, a tender of sycamores, and a native of Tekoa, south of Bethlehem (Am 1 1, 7 14). In the loneliness of his native mountains, as with Elijah (I K 19 12 ff.), God's voice was more clearly heard and His words more perfectly understood. So he was impelled to go to Beth-el to preach against N. Israel his God-given message. His activity may be dated some time between B.C. 765 and 750. He repudiated the name nābhī', prophet (7 14), but only because of Amaziah's implication that he prophesied for gain and belonged to a venal gild (7 12). Yet he is the first of the writing prophets, the originator indeed of a new school of prophecy.

1. The Man.

The analysis of the book, externally, is simple. We may distinguish four sections: I. 1 2–2 16. Indictment of the kindred peoples for sins against common humanity, culminating with Israel, who has broken a holier law. II. 3 1–6 14. Oracles in which are reiterated the folly of formalism and the futility of national hopes, while luxury, extravagance, and crime are rampant. To this belongs also 8 4-14, which interrupts its present context.

2. The Book.

III. 7 1–9 8a. Five visions of judgment with a historical appendix. These visions are climacteric in arrangement, though the order is broken first by 7 10-17, and second by 8 4-14. First, we have two visions of remediable evils, 7 1-3, 4-6; then the hopeless internal perversity, 7 7-9; and finally the impending consummation, 8 1-3; with earthquake and extermination, 9 1-4.

IV. 9 8b-15. The Messianic future follows ver. 8a abruptly and differs in phraseology, conception, and outlook from the rest of the prophecy. It can hardly have been the original conclusion of Amos's visions of judgment. The five visions seem to be the original kernel of the book, and with them is associated the story of Amaziah's protest, and the prophet's probable expulsion (7 12). The other sections, artistically elaborated as they are, may well have been written later by Amos and committed to posterity. Four passages in I are of doubtful genuineness: 1 2 is probably a late addition; 1 9 f. is a doublet of 1 6 f.; 2 4 f. is vague and colorless and to be rejected; while 1 11 f., according to some, with less reason, is post-exilic.

Prophecy began a new era with the herdsman of Tekoa. Whatever his predecessors may have done, he first wrote for posterity the outlines of an ethical theory of the world. The Hebrew term טוֹב, 'good,' attained with him a distinct moral significance (5 14; cf. ver. 6). The essence of the Law was equity and not sacrifice (5 7, 11, 22-25, 8 4-7). The Day of Jehovah was not to be one of national aggrandizement but of searching judgment (5 18 ff.). Above all rises the conception of the God of Hosts transcendent in power, inflexible in justice, whose dictates are founded not upon arbitrary will, but upon the very constitution of the world (7 7 f.). It would, perhaps, be too much to say that Amos had a system. It would be inadequate to characterize him as a teacher of ethical monotheism. He was one upon whom the reality of God had powerfully impressed itself, and to the expression of this, monotheism was but a corollary. If one attribute of the divine nature appealed to him with more intensity than another, this enabled him to present with startling clearness the truths that there can be no religion where human rights are not recognized, and that the claims of justice between men find their original counterpart in the nature of God Himself. In his view of the relation of man to man in society, Amos has not been outgrown, nor have his conceptions of deity become antiquated.

2. An ancestor of Joseph (Lk 3 25).

AMOZ, ê'moz (אָמוֹץ, 'āmōts), 'strong': Father of Isaiah (Is 1 1, etc.). E. E. N.

AMPHIPOLIS, am-fip'o-lis: A city of Thrace, in a bend of the river Strymon (ἀμφι, πόλις), and a post on the Via Egnatia. Under the Romans it was a free city and the capital of the province. It is mentioned once in the N T (Ac 17 1). J. R. S. S.

AMPLIATUS, am''pli-ê'tus (Ἀμπλίατος, WH Ἀμπλιᾶτος, Amplias AV [am'pli-as], Ἀμπλιᾶς): A Christian greeted in Ro 16 8 as "My beloved in the Lord." The name, probably that of a slave, occurs in inscriptions. Cf. CIL. 5154. J. M. T.

AMRAM, am'ram (עַמְרָם, 'amrām): 1. Grandson of Levi, through Kohath, and father of Miriam, Aaron, and Moses (Ex 6 18-20; Nu 26 59). His descendants were the Kohathite Levites called Amramites (Nu 3 27). 2. One of the "sons of Bani" who had taken strange wives (Ezr 10 34; cf. ver. 19). 3. See HAMRAN. E. E. N.

AMRAPHEL, am'ra-fel (אַמְרָפֶל, 'amrāphel): The king of Shinar who, with two other kings, invaded Palestine some time in the 23d cent. B.C. under the leadership of Chedorlaomer, King of Elam (Gn 14). Lately Amraphel has been identified by many scholars with the great Hammurabi (see BABYLONIA, § 15), who is known to have been king of Babylon and therefore of Shinar, or Babylonia proper, and to have thrown off the yoke of Elam about 2250 B.C. The combination is probable but not quite certain. An alternative hypothesis, that the king in question was the father of Hammurabi, has something in its favor. J. F. McC.

AMULET. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 11.

AMZI, am'zai (אַמְצִי, 'amtsī): 1. A Merarite Levite (I Ch 6 46). 2. A priest (Neh 11 10, 12). E. E. N.

ANAB, ê'nab (עֲנָב, 'ānābh), 'grapes': A town of Judah, eight m. SW. of Hebron (Jos 11 21, 15 50). Map II, D 3. E. E. N.

ANAH, an'ā (עֲנָה, 'ānāh): The ancestor of a Horite clan of the same name (Gn 36). In ver. 2 read "Anah the son of Zibcon the Horite" as is required by vs. 20, 24 ff. E. E. N.

ANAHARATH, a-nê'ha-rath (אֲנָחֲרַת, 'ānāḥărāth): A city of Issachar (Jos 19 19). Site uncertain. E. E. N.

ANAIAH, a-nai'ā (עֲנָיָה, 'ānāyāh), 'J" has answered': 1. An assistant of Ezra (Neh 8 4). 2. One of those that sealed the covenant (Neh 10 22). E. E. N.

ANAK, ê'nak, ANAKIM, an'a-kim (עֲנָק, 'ānāq). The legendary ancestor of the gigantic Anakim of SW. Palestine (Nu 13 22 ff.; Dt 2 10 f.; Jos 15 13 f.; Jg 1 20, etc.). E. E. N.

ANAMIM. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

ANAMMELECH, a-nam'ę-lec and ā''nām-mê'lec (עֲנַמֶּלֶךְ, 'ănammelekh): A deity worshiped by the inhabitants of Sepharvaim (Sippara), at times with human sacrifice (II K 17 31). The text of this passage is somewhat uncertain and A. may be a later gloss. The name A. is explained by King (in EB) as equivalent to Anu-malik ('Anu is the decider or prince'), Anu being the name of one of the principal Babylonian deities. See also SEMITIC RELIGION, § 9. E. E. N.

ANAN, ê'nan (עָנָן): One of those that sealed the covenant (Neh 10 26). E. E. N.

ANANI, a-nê'nai or a-nā'nî (עֲנָנִי, 'ănānī), 'my cloud': One of the sons of Elioenai (I Ch 3 24). E. E. N.

ANANIAH, an''a-nai'ā (עֲנַנְיָה, 'ănanyāh): 'J" is a cloud': I. The father of Maaseiah (Neh 3 23). II. A town in Benjamin mentioned along with Nob and Ramah (Neh 11 32). Map II, F 1. A. C. Z.

ANANIAS, an''a-nai'as (Ἀνανίας, Heb. חֲנַנְיָה), 'J" hath been gracious': 1. A member of the early Church, who attempted to enhance his reputation by a show of liberality. Having sold a piece of property he offered to the Church a part of the amount received, pretending that he gave the whole sum. Peter detected the deceit and its deliberate purpose and laid bare the enormity of the sin to the guilty conscience of A., who is represented as having died from the shock (Ac 5 1-11). 2. A Christian disciple living in Damascus who baptized Paul (Ac 9 10-18, 22 12-16). 3. The high priest before whom Paul was brought by Claudius Lysias (Ac 23 1 ff.; cf. Ac 24 1 ff.; Jos., Ant. XX, 6 2). J. M. T.

ANATH, ê'nath (עֲנָת, 'ānāth): Father of Shamgar (Jg 3 31, 5 6). E. E. N.

ANATHEMA, a-nath'ę-ma. See CURSE, § 3.

ANATHOTH, an'a-thoth (עֲנָתוֹת, 'ānāthōth): A name connected with that of the Semitic goddess Anat. I. A city of Benjamin (Jos 21 18) where the priestly family to which Abiathar belonged had its estates (I K 2 26) and the home of two of David's heroes (II S 23 27, Anethothite AV; I Ch 11 28, 12 3, Anathothite, Antothite AV). It was also the home of Jeremiah where the family had property (Jer 1 1, 32 6-15). Its inhabitants once threatened the prophet's life (Jer 11 21-23). After the exile it was reoccupied by the Jews (Ezr 2 23; Neh 7 27, 11 32). Map II, F 1.

II. 1. A Benjamite, the son of Becher (I Ch 7 8). 2. A leader of the men of Anathoth who sealed the covenant (Neh 7 27, 10 19). E. E. N.

ANCHOR. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 20.

ANCIENT OF DAYS: An apocalyptic name of God, first used in its Aramaic form in Dn (7 9, 13, 22). It was chosen probably not in order to suggest the eternity of the divine Being, but to show that profound veneration was due Him. The figure implies a strongly anthropomorphic conception and was taken up by later apocalyptic usage (cf. Ethiopic Enoch 47 3, 48 2-6). A. C. Z.

ANCIENTS. See WISE MEN and ELDER.

ANDREW (Ἀνδρεας, 'manly'): Son of John, of Bethsaida Julius, brother of Simon Peter, with whom he lived in Capernaum. He was the first called of the disciples of Jesus, to whom he was sent by John the Baptist, and became one of the inner group of four among the Twelve (Mk 13 3). In the lists he is always next before his friend and fellow-townsman Philip, with whom he is also associated on two important occasions in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 6 9, 12 22). After Ac 1 13 he disappears from view, but tradition has it that he evangelized Scythia (becoming thus Russia's patron saint) and was martyred in Achaia. R. A. F.

ANDRONICUS, an″dro-nai′cus (Ἀνδρόνικος): A Jew—as is apparent from the term "kinsman"—converted before Paul, with whom he probably shared imprisonment (Ro 16 7). He is referred to as "of note among the apostles," i.e., well known in the circle of the apostles, though possibly here "apostle" is used in the wider sense of that term (see APOSTLE). R. A. F.

ANEM, ê′nem. See ENGANNIM.

ANER, ê′ner (עָנֵר, 'ānēr): I. An Amorite prince, with whom Abraham entered into covenant (Gn 14 13, 24). Since, however, Eschol and Mamre are names associated with localities, it is quite likely that the same is the case with Aner. If so, it may be identical with Neir, a range of hills near Hebron.

ANGEL (Gk. ἄγγελος, 'messenger,' the LXX rendering of מַלְאָךְ, mal'akh, 'sent one'): Belief in beings intermediate between man and God has existed among all nations. In ancient Semitic polytheism, this belief was associated with the portraiture of the pantheon as a royal heavenly court in which the Supreme Being was the head of a family and the master of a retinue of servants. The sukkalli, 'angel ministers,' of primitive Babylonian mythology are, however, ordinarily the sons of the gods whose messages they convey to other gods and men (Muss-Arnolt, Concise Dict. of Ass. Lang., s.v.). An objective ground for such a hierarchy of heavenly beings was furnished by the astral theology of later times, according to which the apparent relative size and importance of sun, moon, and stars suggested subordination. Even among the Hebrews echoes of an originally astral angelology are to be found in such passages as Is 14 12 f., 24 21 (cf. 27 1). But the Hebrews, true to their purer revealed religious thought, eliminated this mythology from their doctrine of angels and fixed mainly upon the relation of God and angels in contrast with men and the work of angels as messengers of God.

1. Angelology in Semitic Religion.

In their relation to God and in contrast with men they are called "gods" (Ps 97 7), "Sons of God" (Job 1 6, 2 1), "Sons of the Mighty" (Ps 29 1, 89 6), "Holy Ones" (Job 5 1; Ps 89 5), "Watchers" (Dn 4 13, 17). They form the "host of heaven" (I K 22 19), the "hosts" of Jehovah (Ps 103 21). It is to be understood that these terms are not expressive of physical relationship, but rather descriptive of the superior nature of these beings. They are far above men. As such, superior and mighty, they form the court of heaven. They are the armies of the Most High, "the mighty in strength that fulfil his word" (Ps 103 20), "the ten thousands of holy ones" (Dt 33 2), who are about Him. They attend upon Jehovah and constitute part of His royal and judicial glory. They continually adore Him in the heavenly sanctuary (Ps 148 2), and are the "council of the holy ones" (Ps 89 7), i.e., are witnesses of His counsels. In a word they form that great, glorious company whose presence in heaven helps us to conceive of the majesty and royal splendor of God Himself.

2. In Their Relation to God.

As messengers of God to men they execute His will whether it be of mercy or of judgment. They mediate His purpose in the moral government of the world, hence are not personified natural forces, but, from the beginning, actual personal agents who, appearing in the form of man, carry out a divine commission which may be a deliverance from evil (Gn 19 15), a summons to duty (Jg 6 11 f.), an interpretation of special situations (Job 33 23), a prophecy (Gn 18 10), a warning (Nu 22 31-35), or an actual judgment (II S 24 16). It was not until later times in O T history that these angels were distinguished in moral character. At first simply the character of their mission was noted; the bearer of it was not characterized. All were executors of God's will. Later, however, the conception of 'evil angels' grew up out of the mission of destruction or judgment upon which they came (cf. Ps 78 49) and from the desire to avoid making God the cause of moral evil. At times the providential care of God is figuratively spoken of as the 'encamping' of the angel of the Lord "round about them that fear him" (Ps 34 7), or as "giving his angels charge" over one (Ps 91 11), but this is a secondary use of the term angel. Primarily it denotes a superhuman being distinct from God serving Him in heaven or among men, and is not a mere synonym of our term Providence.

3. As Messengers of God to Men.

Prominent among the descriptions of these heavenly beings is one, The Angel of Jehovah or the Angel of God, which deserves special consideration. While any angel executing God's commands might be so named (as in I K 19 5, 7; II S 24 16), it is more than one of the rank and file, so to speak, who is referred to in such passages as Gn 31 11-13; Ex 32 34; Is 63 9. This angel in speaking identifies himself with God. The conclusion that the "angel of God is God himself" descending into visibility or manifesting Himself is the one generally accepted. In Is 63 9 we read, "In all their affliction he was afflicted and the angel of his presence saved them." Undoubtedly there was to those who seemed to look into the face of J" a distinction between God Himself and His manifestation, but the Angel of His presence was a veritable theophany. He represented God so fully that in dealing with him they were virtually dealing with God. What these temporary manifestations of God were in the O T, that the Logos, in a fuller and more abiding sense, is in the N T. It is not surprising, therefore, that they have been looked upon as foreshadowings of the Incarnation.

4. Exilic and Post-exilic Angelology.

Beginning with the time of the exile and in consequence of the new contact with the more developed angelology of the Persians, the Jewish doctrine started upon a new course and in later times became extreme and often fantastic. This is true especially of extra-Biblical Judaism. Within the Scriptures the doctrine is indeed always sober, but it shows marked differences from the simpler doctrines of the pre-exilic period. Some of these are undoubtedly due to the increasing emphasis given to the transcendence of God. Angels are assigned a diversity of different functions such as the interpretation of visions, the protection of the faithful, etc. To some of them names are given, as, e.g., Gabriel and Michael. Such names are always of Hebrew etymology and significant of the service rendered or the character of the bearer. Gabriel signifies 'man of God' and served Daniel as the interpreter of dreams and of prophecy (Dn 8 15, 9 21). He appears in the N T as the foreteller of the birth of John the Baptist (Lk 1 19), and as the bearer of the glad tidings to Mary (Lk 1 26). In the pseudepigraphic books he is glorified as one of the four great angels that stand at the four sides of God's throne and act as guardians of the four parts of the globe (Eth. En. 9 1). He is sent upon special missions to the servants of God, and against their enemies. He taught Joseph the 70 languages of the world. With him is closely associated Michael, who ranks just above him, but ranks with him near the throne of the Most High. Michael has his field of activity in heaven, while Gabriel executes God's will on earth. Each is the guardian of one of the divisions of the twelve tribes of Israel, of which there are four, the other two being assigned to Uriel and Raphael. Into many an incident of the O T tradition has read the name of Michael as the being who warned, rescued, or protected. Indeed he was looked upon as the divine advocate of the Jews, and prayers were offered to him. He was the greatest of the Archangels, of whom there were, according to the Book of Tobit (12 15), seven (the number is not in all texts). This number varies in other books (cf. Eth. En. 20, 40 2, 78 1, 89 1). All these chief angels have exalted duties. They stand by the throne of God and each has dominion over some particular sphere. Uriel is set over the world's luminaries, and over Sheol (Eth. En. 21 5, 27 2, 33 3, 4); Raphael, over the spirits of men (To 3 17); Michael, over Israel; Gabriel, over paradise and the cherubim, etc. In the Book of Enoch the title of Watcher is given to the Archangels (20, 39 12 f., 40 2, 61 12). They are the sleepless ones who stand before the Lord and say: "Holy, holy, holy is the lord of spirits; he filleth the earth with spirits" (Eth. En. 39 12). This title appears also in the Book of Jubilees (4 15). The term is first used in Dn 4 13, 17. Jewish tradition declares that the names of the angels came from Babylonia.

5. In the N T.

In the N T we have substantially all the foregoing features of the doctrine of angels, but in sober and reserved form. "A multitude of the heavenly host praising God" appears over the shepherds (Lk 2 13) on the night of the nativity. Angels are ministers to the saints (He 1 14) and they shall accompany the Son of Man at his coming (Mt 25 31; II Th 1 7). Satan and his angels are spoken of in Mt 25 41; Rev 12 7. The distinctions in the Pauline Epistles referred to under the terms thrones or dominions or principalities or powers (Col 1 16) are those of the angelic hierarchy. These distinctions appear in Jewish literature of the same general period and were probably adopted by Gnostic Judaizers (cf. Lightfoot on Col 1 16; see also GNOSTICISM). In Christ's day the Sadducees were distinguished by their denial of angels (Ac 23 8).

ANNAS, an'gs (Ἄννας; Heb. חָנָן, 'merciful,' in Josephus Ἀνανος): Appointed high priest by Quirinius in 6 A.D., deposed by Valerius, 15 A.D., who later appointed Simon, a son of A. In 18 A.D. his son-in-law Caiaphas (q.v.) was appointed to the office (Jn 18 13; cf. Jos. Ant. XVIII, 2 2). As head of the family A. still retained influence, which explains why Jesus was led first to A., probably only for an informal hearing, and then to the high priest (Jn 18 13). For the same reason A. is called the high priest in Ac 4 6, although the actual high priest at the time must have been Caiaphas, or another of A.'s sons, either Jonathan or Theophilus (Jos. Ant. XVIII, 4 3, 5 3). J. M. T.

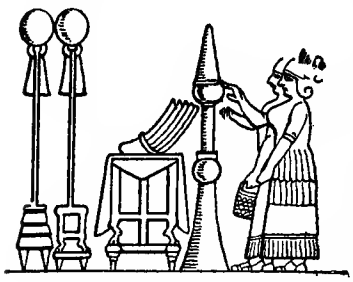
ANOINT (māshaḥ, whence 'Messiah,' is employed both literally and figuratively; κρίειν [χρίσμα, χρισός], always of God's spiritual anointing; the other terms [sūkh, ἀλείφειν, etc.] are used only in the physical sense): Anointing originally signified smearing with soothing and cleansing unguents. Pouring oil upon the head was a later, ceremonial form.

1. Practical. The application of scented oils was a common toilet operation (Ru 3 3; Ps 104 15; Pr 27 9), which was discontinued in time of mourning (II S 14 2; Dn 10 3; cf. Mt 6 17). It was also a mark of welcome to an honored guest (Ps 23 5; Lk 7 46; Jn 12 3). Ointments were frequently applied as remedies (Is 1 6; Lk 10 34; Ja 5 14); but the anointing of the dead (Mk 14 8; Lk 23 56) seems to have been a token of respect, rather than an embalming process (cf. Jn 11 39). Oil was rubbed upon shields to make them slippery and bright (Is 21 5; II S 1 21). See Arms and Armor, § 7.



Anointing of a Sacred Stone Pillar.

2. Symbolical, as a sign of dedication, sometimes with resulting inspiration (I S 10 1 f., 16 13). Jacob poured oil upon the pillar at Beth-el (Gn 28 18). The Tent and its furniture were sanctified with "holy anointing oil" (Ex 30 22 f.). See Ointments and Perfumes, § 1. Priests were consecrated by anointing (Lv 8 12, 30; cf. 4 3; Ps 133 2), and the early kings were thus designated (I S 10 1, 16 13; cf. II S 19 10) and inaugurated (II S 2 4, 5 3; I Ch 29 22). Later monarchs apparently were anointed only under exceptional circumstances (II K 9 6, 11 12, 23 30).

3. Metaphorical, signifying divine selection for some particular service or blessing. In this figurative sense Hazael (I K 19 15; cf. II K 8 13), Cyrus (Is 45 1), Elisha (I K 19 16; cf. 19), and the prophet-patriarchs (I Ch 16 22; cf. Gn 20 7) were said to be "anointed." Thus also, Israel, or Israel's king, was Jehovah's anointed (Hab 3 13; Ps 89 38; La 4 20), and Christians received the unction of the Holy Spirit (II Co 1 21; I Jn 2 20, 27). The actual name Antichrist is first found in the Johannean epistles (I Jn 2 18, 22, 4 3; II Jn 7), but the main idea underlies St. Paul's description of the 'Man of Lawlessness' ("Man of Sin" EVV) in II Th 2 1-12; while, from the manner in which both writers refer to this mysterious figure, it is evident that they had in view an oral tradition current at the time (I Jn 4 3 "ye have heard," II Th 2 6 "ye know"). Any attempt, therefore, to understand the doctrine of Antichrist as it meets us in the N T must naturally begin with this tradition, so far as it is now possible to trace it.

1. The Name Antichrist.

Here, according to the latest view, we are carried far back. Bousset, in his elaborate monograph, Der Antichrist (1895, Eng. transl. The Antichrist Legend, 1896), adopting and developing the suggestion of Gunkel in his Schöpfung und Chaos (1895), would have us see in the Antichrist legend an anthropomorphic transformation of the Babylonian Dragon Myth, according to which the monster (Tiâmat), who had opposed the Creator at the beginning, would again in the last days rear its head in rebellion, only, however, to be finally crushed. It is impossible to examine here in detail the evidence adduced in support of this position, but it seems practically certain that this myth had reached Palestine, and may, therefore, have had a share in familiarizing the Jews with the idea of an arch-enemy of God, and of His cause. Beyond this, with the data at our disposal, we can hardly go at present, and we are on surer ground when, for the early history of this belief, we turn to the evidence supplied by the Scriptures themselves.

2. Possible Connection with Babylonian Myth.

In the O T we have ample proof of a general Jewish belief in a fierce attack to be directed against Israel in the end of the days by some hostile person or power, while this attack is frequently so described as to supply later writers with their language and imagery in depicting the last attack of all against God's people. See, e.g., Psalm 88 (89). many of whose words and phrases are reechoed in II Th 1 and 2 (cf. Bornemann, Thess. p. 356 f.), or the account of the fierce onslaught by Gog from the land of Magog (Ezk 38. 39; cf. Rev 20 7 f.).

3. Antichrist in Old Testament.

It is, however, in the Book of Daniel (168–165 B.C.) that we find the real starting-point of many of the later descriptions of Antichrist, and especially in the picture that is there presented of Antiochus Epiphanes. No other foreign ruler was ever regarded by the Jews with such hatred on account both of his personal impieties and of his bitter persecution of their religion, and, accordingly, he is here portrayed as the very impersonation of all evil. Some of the traits indeed ascribed to him are of such a character (7 8, 11, 20, 21, 25, 11 36-45) that it has been thought the writer had not so much Antiochus as the future Antichrist directly in view. And, though this is not exegetically possible, it is easy to understand how this description influenced the Apostolic writers in their account of the arch-enemy of God and man (cf., e.g., II Th 2 4 with Dn 11 36 f. and Rev 13 1-8 with Dn 7 8, 20 f., 25, 8 24, 11 28, 30 and see Driver, Daniel, p. xcvi f.). With the fall of Antiochus and the rise of the Maccabean kingdom, the promise of deliverance, with which Daniel had comforted God's people during their dark days, received its proximate fulfilment; but, when the nation again fell under a foreign yoke, the old fears were once more revived and received a fresh coloring from the new powers by which the Jewish nation now found itself opposed.

4. In Later Writings of the Jews.

In determining the Jewish views regarding Antichrist during this period much difficulty is caused by the uncertainty regarding the exact date of some of the relative writings, and the possibility of their having received later Christian interpolations. The following references, however, deserve notice: In the Pharisaic Psalms of Solomon (48–40 B.C.) Pompey, as the representative of the foreign power that had overthrown Zion, is described as the personification of sin (ὁ ἁμαρτωλός, 2 1), and even as the dragon (ὁ δράκων, ver. 29); while in IV Ezr 5 1-6, which, though belonging to the last decade of the 1st cent. A.D., is a characteristically Jewish work, after an enumeration of the signs of the last times and the shaking of the kingdom that is after the third power (i.e., the power of Rome), we read of one who "shall rule, whom they that dwell upon the earth look not for"—a mysterious being generally identified with the future Antichrist. Compare also the description of the destruction of the "last leader" of the enemies of Israel in Apoc. Bar. 40 1 f., where again Pompey may be thought of.

In none of these passages, it will be noticed, have we more than a God-opposing being of human origin, but it has recently been pointed out with great cogency by Dr. Charles (The Ascension of Isaiah, pp. lv ff.) that, in the interval between the O T and the N T, a further development was given to Jewish belief in Antichrist through the influence of the Beliar myth.

In the O T "belial" is never, strictly speaking, a proper name, but denotes 'worthlessness,' 'wickedness,' though, from its frequent occurrences along with another noun in such phrases as "sons of Belial" (Dt 13 13; Jg 19 22, etc., AV), the idea readily lent itself to personification, until in the later pseudepigraphical literature, the title regularly appears as a synonym for Satan, or one of his lieutenants.

Thus in the Book of Jubilees (2d cent. B.C.) we read, "Let Thy mercy, O Lord, be lifted up upon Thy people, and let not the spirit of Beliar rule over them" (1 20, ed. Charles), and similar references to Beliar as a Satanic spirit are frequent in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (2d cent. B.C. in part at least), in which see, e.g., Test. Reub. 4, 6.

The most interesting passage, however, for our purpose is contained in the third book of the Sibylline Oracles, in a section which in the main goes back to the same early date, where Beliar is depicted as a truly Satanic being, accompanied by all the signs that are elsewhere ascribed to Antichrist (see Orac. Sib. iii, 63 ff., ed. Rzach). And with this there should also be compared Orac. Sib. ii, 167 f., where it is stated that "Beliar will come and do many signs to men," though here the originally Jewish origin of the passage is by no means so certain.

In the same way it is impossible to lay too much stress in the present connection on the speculations of Rabbinical theology regarding the person of Antichrist, in view of the late date of our authorities. But we may accept, as in the main reflecting the views of the Jews about the beginning of the Christian era, the conception of a powerful ruler to be born of the tribe of Dan (cf. Gn 49 17; Dt 33 22; Jer 8 16, and see further Friedländer, Der Antichrist in den vorchristlichen jüdischen Quellen [1901] c, ix) and uniting in himself all enmity against God and hatred against God's people, but whom the Messiah will finally slay by the breath of His lips (cf. Weber, Jüd. Theologie [1897] p. 365).

5. In Christ's Teaching.

We can at once see how readily this idea would lend itself to the political and materialistic longings of the Jews, and it is only, therefore, what we would expect when we find our Lord, true to His spiritual ideals, saying nothing by which these expectations might be encouraged, but contenting Himself with warning His hearers against false teachers, the "false Christs," and the "false prophets" who would be ready "to lead astray, if possible, even the elect" (Mt 24 24; Mk 13 22). Even, too, when in the same discourse He seems to refer to a single Antichrist, the reference is veiled under the mysterious figure derived from Daniel of the "abomination of desolation standing (ἑστηκότα) where he ought not" (Mk 13 14; cf Mt 24 15); while a similar reticence marks His words as recorded in Jn 5 43, if here again, as is most probable, He has Antichrist in view.

Slight, however, though these references in our Lord's recorded teaching are, we can understand how they would direct the attention of the Apostolic writers to the traditional material lying to their hands in their treatment of this mysterious subject, and, as a matter of fact, we have clear evidence of the use of such material in the case of at least two of them.

6. In Pauline Epistles.

Thus, apart from his direct reference to the Jewish belief in Beliar in II Co 6 15, Paul has given us in II Th 2 1-12 a very full description of the working of Antichrist, under the name of the 'Man of Lawlessness,' in which he draws freely on the language and imagery of the O T and on the speculations of later Judaism. The following are the leading features in his picture: (1) "The mystery of lawlessness" is already at work, though for the moment held in check by a restraining person, or power, apparently to be identified with the power of law or government, especially as these were embodied at the time in the Roman State. (2) No sooner, however, has this restraining power been removed (cf. II Es 5 4; Apoc. Bar. 39 7) than a general "apostasy" results, finding its consummation in the 'revelation' of 'the man of lawlessness.' (3) As 'the opposer' he "exalteth himself against all that is called God" (cf. Dn 11 36 f.) and actually "sitteth in the temple of God, setting himself forth as God"—the description being again modeled on the Danielic account (cf. Dn 8 13, 9 27, 11 31, 12 11); while (4) the "lying wonders" by which his working is distinguished are illustrated by Orac. Sib. iii, 64 f.; Asc. Isaiah 4 5. (5) And yet, powerful as this incarnation of wickedness seems, the Lord Jesus at His parousia will "slay him with the breath of his mouth," the words being a quotation from Is 11 4, a passage which the Targum of Jonathan afterward applied to the destruction of Armilus, the Jewish Antichrist, and whose use here Paul may well have drawn from the Jewish tradition of his time (cf. the use of the same passage in Pss. Sol. 17 27, 39; II Es 13 10).

The whole description is thus of a very composite character, but, at the same time, is so definite and detailed that it is hardly to be wondered at that there has been a constant endeavor to find its suggestion in some historical personage of the writer's own time. But, though the sacrilegious conduct of Caligula (cf. Tacit., Hist. v, 9) may have influenced the writer's language in ver. 4, the real roots of the conception lie elsewhere, and it is rather, as we have seen, in the O T and in current Jewish tradition that its explanation is to be sought.

7. In the Apocalypse.

The same may be said, in part at least, of the various evil powers which meet us in the Johannean Apocalypse. The wild Beast of the Seer (Rev 13–20) vividly recalls the horned wild Beast of Dn 7 and 8, and the parallels that can be drawn between the language of John and of Paul (cf. Rev 12 9, 13 1 f. with II Th 2 9 f.; Rev 13 5 ff., 14 11 with II Th 2 4, 10 ff.; Rev 13 3 with II Th 2 9 ff.) point to similar sources as lying at the roots of both. On the other hand, the Johannean descriptions have a direct connection with contemporary secular history which was largely wanting in the earlier picture. This is seen noticeably in the changed attitude toward the power of Rome. So far from this being regarded any longer as a restraining influence, it is rather the source from which evil is to spring. And we can understand, therefore, how the city of Rome and its imperial house supply John with many of the characteristics under which he describes the working of Antichrist, until, at last, he sees all the powers of evil culminate in the Beast of ch. 17, who, according to the interpretation of Bousset (adopted by James in HDB), is partly representative of an individual "who was and is not," etc., that is, Nero redivivus; partly of a polity, namely that of Rome.

There remain only the references in the Johannean Epistles, in which, in keeping with the writer's main object, the spiritual side of the conception is again predominant. Thus, after indicating some of the main elements in Christian truth, John passes in I 2 18 to the conflict into which, at "a last hour," truth will be brought with falsehood, and in token of this points to the decisive sign by which this crisis will be known, namely, the coming of "Antichrist"—the absence of the article in the original showing that the word has already come to be used as a technical proper name. Nor does "Antichrist" stand alone. Rather he is to be regarded as "the personification of the principle shown in different Antichrists" (Westcott, ad loc.), who, by their denial that "Jesus is the Christ," deny in like manner the revelation of God as Father (2 22) and, consequently, the true union between God and man (4 3).

It is, therefore, into a very different atmosphere that we are introduced after the strange symbolism of the Apocalypse, and the scenic representation of the Pauline description. And one likes to think that the last word of Revelation on this mysterious topic is one which leaves it open to every one to apply to the spiritual workings of evil in his own heart, and in the world around him, a truth which has played so large a part in the history of God's people in the past, and which may still pass through many varying and progressive applications before it reaches its final fulfilment in the "dispensation of the fulness of the times" (Eph 1 10).

LITERATURE: In addition to the special literature referred to above, mention may be made of the articles on Antichrist by Bousset in EB, by James (under the title Man of Sin) in HDB, by Ginsburg in JE, and by Sieffert in *PRE*³, and of the Excursuses by Bornemann and Findlay in their Commentaries on the Thessalonian Epistles; see also E. ANTIOCH (Ἀντιόχεια): 1. Pisidian Antioch was so called to distinguish it from Antioch in Syria. It was a Phrygian city situated near the frontier of Phrygia and Pisidia (consequently called Antiochia ad Pisidiam, i.e., A. toward Pisidia). It is said to have been founded by a colony from Magnesia on the Mæander and to have been renamed Antiochia by Seleucus I. It was declared free by the Romans (190 B.C.). In 39 B.C. it was given by Antony to Amyntas, and in 25 B.C. incorporated into the Province of Galatia. About 6 B.C. Augustus made it a Roman colony and called it Cæsarea. In the time of Paul A. was a governmental and military center, and the many Latin inscriptions (cf. Sterrett, Epigraphical Journey, pp. 127 ff.) probably belong to this period. Later A. became the metropolis of Pisidia. It was situated on the still traceable Royal Road built by Augustus. It is now called Yalowadj. At A. Paul opened his missionary labors in Asia Minor. The church here was one of those addressed in the Ep. to the Galatians (q.v.) (cf. Ac 13 14-51, 14 19, 21-24, 15 36, 16 4-6, 18 23).

2. Antioch on the Orontes ("the [Antioch] by Daphne"), chief of the sixteen cities founded (301

B.C.) by Seleucus I in honor of his father. It was the capital of Syria, the residence of the Seleucid kings, and famous for its beauty, luxury, palaces, temples, and was a center of industry and commerce. Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch (pop. 400,000) were the three greatest cities of the Roman world. There the Roman governors of Syria resided. It was beautified by Cæsar, Augustus, Agrippa, Herod, Tiberius, Antoninus Pius, Constantine, and was a favorite residence of Roman emperors. It had a great library and a school of philosophy. It was destroyed by earthquakes ten times in the first six centuries. Christians were first so called here, and A. became the mother-city of Gentile Christianity (Ac 11 19-30, 13 1-3, 14 26–15 2, 15 30 ff., etc.). According to tradition Peter was for two years Bishop of A., whose patriarchs therefore claimed precedence over those of Rome, Constantinople, Jerusalem, and Alexandria. It is now called Antakia (6,000 inhabitants). J. R. S. S.

ANTIOCHUS, an-tī'o-cŭs (Ἀντίοχος, 'the opposer'):

Antiochus III (the Great) was on the Syrian throne from 223–187 B.C. By his victory over the Egyptians at Paneas in 198 B.C. Palestine came under the control of Syria, and though at first the Jews were favorable to the Syrian domination, a growing party in the nation opposed the Greek influences furthered by the Syrian monarchs. A. was succeeded by his son Seleucus Philopater (187–175), who reigned eleven years with the same general conditions prevailing as under his father. A crisis came under Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), who succeeded his brother Seleucus in 175. He was a brilliant but moody man—a strange combination of intellectual power and moral weakness. With unflagging zeal he sought to Hellenize Palestine, and this brought on the Maccabean revolt (see MACCABEES). At the very first he decided against the high priest Onias III in favor of Jason, the leader of the Hellenizing party (II Mac 4 7, 8). All attempts of the Jews to resist his policy met with swift censure, and twice he vented his rage upon Jerusalem (I Mac 1 20 ff.; II Mac 5 11 ff.). At last he determined to extirpate the Jewish religion, and issued the sweeping decree enforcing uniformity of (pagan) worship throughout the land (I Mac 1 41). The efforts to carry out this decree involved him in the Maccabean war in which one Syrian army after another was defeated by the brilliant Judas Maccabæus (I Mac 3 10, 4 35). A., who had intrusted the subjugation of the land to his generals, was meanwhile away in the East, where he became mad and died (164).

Antiochus V (Eupator) was only nine years old when his father died, and Lysias, the governor of the provinces, undertook the guardianship of the young boy. Together they made an expedition into Judæa and at the famous battle of Bethzacharias they defeated Judas Maccabæus. The outlook for the Jews at this time was very dark, when suddenly the war was terminated by the attempt of Philip, foster-brother of Antiochus IV, to secure the Syrian throne. Hastily concluding a peace, Lysias and A. hurried back to Antioch and suppressed Philip. In the following year (162) A. was betrayed into the hands of Demetrius Soter, his cousin, and put to death.

The next Antiochus (VI), brought as a child from Arabia by Tryphon, a Syrian general, as a claimant to the throne, was a son of Alexander Balas, a pretender to the throne who reigned 150–145. Tryphon was successful and A. was crowned, but the real power of the government was Tryphon, who used the young king as a tool and finally had him murdered in order to be himself made king. During all the rivalries and intrigues of the Syrian court up to this time, Jonathan Maccabæus (q.v.) had been able by clever diplomacy to further the interests of the Jews, but he fell at last a victim to the treachery of Tryphon in 143 B.C.

In 138 Antiochus VII, a great-grandson of Antiochus III (called Sidetes from the place of his education, Side in Pamphylia), drove Tryphon out and took the throne. To win the favor of the Jews, former privileges were confirmed, and further concessions granted, but as soon as A. felt himself secure upon his throne he changed his attitude and demanded of Simon (Jonathan's successor) the surrender of all the principal fortresses. On Simon's refusal A. sent an army to enforce obedience. This army was so disastrously defeated that A. troubled Simon no further.

In the time of Hyrcanus (135) A. himself marched upon Jerusalem. After a long siege a satisfactory peace was arranged (Jos., Ant. XIII, 8 2-3). Sidetes fell (128) in a battle with Arsaces, King of the Parthians (Jos., Ant. XIII, 8 4).

Altogether distinct from these Syrian kings is an Antiochus mentioned in I Mac 12 16, 14 22 as father of a certain Noumanius, one of the ambassadors sent by Jonathan Maccabæus to Rome. J. S. R.

ANTIPAS, an'ti-pas (Ἀντ[ε]ίπας): 1. Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great. See HEROD, § 5. 2. An early Christian martyr of Pergamum (Rev 2 13). E. E. N.

ANTIPATRIS, an-tip'a-tris (Ἀντιπατρίς): A city built by Herod the Great, named after his father Antipater, on the main road from Cæsarea to Lydda (Ac 23 31). It was held to mark the NW. limit of Judæa. Map I, C 7. E. E. N.

ANTONIA, an-tō'ni-a: A strong fortress situated at the NW. corner of the Temple area, the "castle" of Acts 21 34, etc. See JERUSALEM, § 38, and TEMPLE, § 30. E. E. N.

ANTOTHIJAH. See ANTHOTHIJAH.

ANUB, ē'nŭb (עֲנוּב, 'ānūbh): A Judahite person or clan (I Ch 4 8). E. E. N.

ANVIL: The rendering of Heb. pa'am, lit. 'stroke,' in Is 41 7. The Targum renders "mallet." The exact meaning is somewhat uncertain. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 12. E. E. N.

APE: This animal does not belong to the fauna of Palestine and is mentioned only in the account of Solomon's riches, where it is said that his navy brought apes, peacocks, etc., once every three years (I K 10 22; II Ch 9 21). The Heb. קוֹף, qōph, rendered "apes," apparently a loan-word from the Sanskrit kapi (see Oxf. Heb. Lex.), was general in meaning, so that it is impossible to determine what species of monkey was meant. The animals were probably purchased by Solomon's agents in S. Arabia, though they may have been of African or Asiatic origin. Ancient literature (Egyptian and Assyrian inscriptions, the Amarna letters) contains references to apes or monkeys, showing that they were well known and prized as curiosities.

E. E. N.

APELLES, ə-pel'lîz ('Απελλῆς): A Christian in Rome to whom Paul sent a greeting as "the approved in Christ" (Ro 16 10). Nothing more is known of him. E. E. N.

APHARSACHITES, APHARSATHCHITES, ə-fär'sak-aits, af''ar-sath'kaits (אֲפַרְסַתְכָיֵא, 'ăpharṣathkhāyē'): In Ezr 4 9 the term signifies, apparently, a class of Persian officials, a meaning that suits the other two passages also (5 6, 6 6). The different spelling is probably due to scribal errors. E. E. N.

APHARSITES, ə-fär'saits (אֲפָרְסָיֵא, 'ăphārsāyē'): A term of uncertain meaning, indicating probably either a class of subordinate officials or the Persian colonists in Syria (Ezr 4 9). E. E. N.

APHEK, ê'fek (אֲפֵק, 'ăphēq), variant APHIK. Three, probably four, cities whose identity is doubtful: 1. Near Jezreel, whose king was slain by Joshua (Jos 12 18; I S 29 1; I K 20 26, 30; II K 13 17). 2. In the territory of Asher, never wrested from the Canaanites (Jos 19 30; Jg 1 31, Aphik). 3. Identified with Afqa, NE. of Beirût (Jos 13 4). 4. Near Mizpah (I S 4 1). The first and the last are considered identical by Robertson Smith. G. L. R.

APHEKAH, ə-fî'kā (אֲפֵקָה, 'ăphēqāh): A town of Judah apparently not far from Hebron (Jos 15 53). E. E. N.

APHIAH, ə-fai'ā (אֲפִיחַ, 'ăphīaḥ): One of the ancestors of King Saul (I S 9 1). E. E. N.

APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE. A class of prophetic productions in which the form given to the prophet's message is that of a vision.

1. Nature of Apocalyptic Literature. Such a form assumes the lifting of the veil which hides the spiritual world, bringing into view the realities in earthly symbols. Revelation through dreams and visions is not uncommon in the OT. In Jer, Ezk, and Zec there are apocalyptic passages. In Dn the form so far predominates as to control the whole book, thus distinguishing it as an apocalyptic production. With the vision form, however, apocalyptic literature developed associated characteristics as follows: (1) Complicated symbolism. (2) A dualistic view of the world, involving on the one side a righteous people and on the other a brutal opposition to God. (3) A system of angelic mediators between God and man. (4) A tendency to use the name of some renowned man of piety of the earlier days as the seer of the visions portrayed (pseudonomy). (5) An elaborate but optimistic eschatology. (6) Associated with eschatology the division of the whole duration of the world's life into ages (eons), chiefly the present age and the coming age.

2. Conditions Favoring Its Development. The period during which the Apocalyptic Literature had the most currency was that between 200 B.C. and 150 to 200 A.D. During the early part of this interval the conditions were specially adapted to its being used as the prophetic vehicle of address. The people had objected to the domination of a foreign power (the Seleucid dynasty of Syria). They struggled manfully to regain their independence, and did so at last, but meantime they endured the stress of severe persecutions. The apocalyptic form of writing was adapted to convey to them encouragement in the form of great world pictures, showing that their oppressors were destined to collapse and Israel to rise into dominion under the Messiah. These pictures were to be understood by them, but to prove unintelligible to their oppressors.

3. The Apocalypses. The apocalypses according to dates of composition are: (1) The Ethiopic Book of Enoch (first published in modern times in 1821). (2) The Slavonic Book of Enoch (1896). (3) The Sybilline Oracles (1545). (4) The Assumption of Moses (1861). (5) Fourth Ezra or 2d Esdras (q.v.). (6) The Syriac Book of Baruch (1866). (7) The Greek Baruch (1886). (8) The Psalter of Solomon (1868). (9) The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (1714). (10) The Book of Jubilees (1859). (11) The Ascension of Isaiah (1819). (12) The Histories of Adam and Eve. (13) The Apocalypse of Elias (fragm., 1886). (14) Book of Eldad and Modad (1713). (15) Prayer of Joseph (1713). (16) Apocalypse of Zephaniah (fragm., 1886).

While each of these books does not present all the aspects of a typical apocalypse, the combination of their characteristics groups them together as literary productions of this type APOCRYPHA OF OT AND NT: The word 'apocrypha' (ἀπόκρυφος, 'hidden') passed through several stages of meaning before it received the sense that we now give to it.

1. The Term. At first it meant literally rolls which were put away, because worn out or containing faults in writing. They were thus 'withdrawn from publicity,' 'hidden' (see OT CANON, §§ 10, 12). Books might also become 'hidden' because they were unfit for public reading. Such, e.g., was the story of Susannah. In this early use of the word no other discrediting of the book as to authorship, or teaching, was implied. A much wider application was given to the word by early ecclesiastical writers in denoting by it that which was mysterious, secret, esoteric. It was thus used to classify all such books as aimed to disclose to the favored few 'the hidden things' of nature, of the future, of wisdom, and of God. The Book of Enoch and the Assumption of Moses are illustrations of this kind of literature. Their contents were reputed to be handed down through secret tradition by the few from those whose names are given as their authors. In II Es 14 44-46 will be found an account of the miraculous production of seventy esoteric books of this kind. This meaning of the word 'apocrypha' was restricted at first to the pseudepigraphical books. The claims of Gnostic leaders to the possession of just such hidden disclosures gradually added another modification to the word 'apocrypha,' and that was the meaning 'heretical,' and this opened the way to the use of the word with which we are familiar, viz.: to mark the non-canonical books found in our English bibles between the O T and the N T. Cyril of Jerusalem was, as far as we know, the first who applied the name 'apocrypha' to the books which we place under this description.

2. List of O T Apocrypha.

The following list comprises the books usually classed as O T Apocrypha (e.g., in the edition published by the Revisers in 1896):

I Esdras.
II Esdras.
Tobit.
Judith.
The Rest of Esther.
The Wisdom of Solomon.
Ecclesiasticus.
Baruch. Chap. VI = Epistle of Jeremiah.
The Song of the Three Holy Children.
The History of Susannah.
The History of Bel and the Dragon.
The Prayer of Manasses.
I Maccabees.
II Maccabees.

These works may be classified as follows: I. Works of a Historical Character: I Mac, II Mac, I Esdras. II. Works of a Reflective Type: Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus. III. Legendary Works: Tobit, Judith, Rest of Esther, Song of the Three Children, History of Susannah, History of Bel and the Dragon. IV. Works of a Prophetic Type: Baruch. V. Apocalyptic Works: II Esdras. Of all these the following were without doubt originally in Hebrew: I Mac, Tobit, Judith, and Ecclesiasticus.

A full description of these various works will be found under the separate titles. The purpose here is to give only a general idea of each.

3. General Character of the Several Books.

I Esdras (sometimes called the Third Ezra) is a revision of the canonical Ezra with the following changes: Ezr 4 7-24 is removed to an earlier place; ch. 3 1–5 6 interpolated; Neh 7 73–8 13 is added at the close. II Esdras (also called Fourth Ezra). This work is composite. Chs. 3–14 formed the original work and they contain seven visions given to Ezra; the work is thus apocalyptical in character. The other chapters were added by a later hand. The whole has come down to us in Latin, Syriac, Ethiopic, Arabic, and Armenian versions. The original language was Greek. Tobit, a legendary (Haggadic) narrative whose scenes are from the captivity, was written to lead the Jews to adhere strictly to the Law. The work exists in several versions, Aramaic, Greek, and Latin. Judith, a narrative of the same kind as Tobit. It recounts the bravery of Judith, a Hebrew widow, in delivering the city of Bethulia from the Assyrians under Holofernes. The Greek text is a translation of a Hebrew (Aramaic) original. The Rest of Esther. These additions to the Book of Esther mention three times the divine name in the particulars with which they fill out the Bible story. This seems to be the primary purpose of these additions—to give distinct recognition to God. The original language was Greek. The Wisdom of Solomon is a fine example of Hellenistic literature written by an Alexandrian Jew, and containing, besides a setting forth of the glory and value of Wisdom, an earnest warning against the folly of idolatry. Ecclesiasticus. This work is of the same general character as the Wisdom of Solomon. Its fundamental thought is Wisdom, and it seeks to give instruction therein by a multitude of rules for the regulation of life in all varieties of experience. It was originally written in Hebrew; a considerable portion of this Hebrew original has been lately brought to light. Baruch. The book in its preface (1 1-14) describes its origin, and then in three distinct parts gives us (a) the confession of sin and prayer of the Jews in exile (1 15–3 8), (b) an admonition to the people to return to the fountain of Wisdom (3 9–4 4) and (c) the promise of deliverance (4 5–5 9). The first half of the book (1 1–3 8) was originally Hebrew; the latter half was Greek. The Epistle of Jeremiah, added to Baruch as a sixth chapter, is a warning against idolatry. It purports to be a letter from the prophet Jeremiah to the Jews in Babylon. The Song of the Three Holy Children. This is one of the additions found in the Greek text of the Book of Daniel. It gives the prayer of Abednego, uttered in the fiery furnace, and the song of the three children because the prayer was heard. The History of Susannah. This story glorifies Daniel, who saves the beautiful Susannah from death, to which she had been condemned under false charge of adultery made by two elders, to save themselves when discovered by Susannah as they were peering at her in her bath. The History of Bel and the Dragon. This third addition to Daniel (after ch. 12) is made up of two independent stories, both of which show the prowess of Daniel and at the same time set forth the worthlessness of idolatry. All these additions to Daniel are found in the Septuagint, also in the version of Theodotion. The Prayer of Manasses. This prayer, attributed to Manesseh, King of Judah, was composed as a completion of II Ch 33. It is a confession of sin and a cry for pardon. In most MSS it is in the appendix to the Psalms. I Maccabees. A reliable history of the period 175–135 B.C. It is extant in Greek. II Maccabees, originally written in Greek, is an epitome of the work of Jason of Cyrene and covers the period 175–160 B.C. The work is a mixture of history and story told for religious edification.

4. The Position Assigned to the Apocrypha.

A brief outline history of the position given to the O T Apocrypha by the Jews, the early Christian Fathers, and the Christian Church generally will reveal their conception of its authority and value. It is safe to say that the Jews never have recognized as belonging to the Canon of Scriptures any other books than those which now constitute our O T. In Alexandria some of the apocryphal books were read in public, but even here canonical authority was not attached to them. They (the Jews) have always recognized a difference between these works and the OT (see OT CANON). As for the NT the most that can be said is that there are interesting parallels found in James and Paul with Ecclesiasticus and the Book of Wisdom (see these titles). The Apostles held to the same canon as their Jewish brethren. Owing to the fact that in their Greek bibles the early Christian writers found apocryphal books joined with books of the Hebrew Canon, they used them, citing them sometimes as Scriptures. Their very connection with the canonical Scriptures gave them honoring consideration. So Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen used them. At the same time when investigation into the matter was carried on we find emphasis placed upon the number 22 (24) as the number of books in the Hebrew Canon. A series of writers thus support the Jewish Canon as distinct from the Alexandrian—Melito of Sardis, Origen (despite his own habit of citing apocryphal books), Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Gregory Nazianzen, and Jerome. Critical judgment was at variance with common usage even among scholars and for a long time the books were cited. Eastern learned opinion excluded them from the Canon. In the West, Jerome made the most determined stand for the Hebrew Canon, but the common usage of the apocryphal books, made possible by their inclusion in the old Latin versions, and the inconsistent practise of the Fathers left the matter undecided. At the time of the Reformation the question was finally settled in different ways. The Protestant Church, following Luther's lead, gave the position of inferior authority to the A., and from that time the word 'apocrypha' has had the meaning which Protestantism now gives to it. The Council of Trent (1545) made these books of equal authority for the Roman Catholic Church with those of the OT proper. Coverdale was the first to translate the A. from Greek into English. He placed them between the OT and the NT, in which position they have appeared in later versions. The English Church recognizes the A. in its lessons, but only for edification and not as authoritative in the sense that the canonical books are. The A. have no recognition in non-Episcopal churches.

In refusing to receive the apocryphal books as canonical, Protestantism has by no means declared them to be of no value. On the contrary, their worth for certain purposes has always been recognized. To the student of the centuries just preceding the Incarnation, they are of deep interest as reflecting the life and thought of Judaism in one of its most eventful periods.

5. The Apocrypha of the New Testament.

The aim and general character of the NT Apocrypha are quite different from those of the A. added to the OT. The latter seek to give the history or reflect the thought of the period from which they come. The NT Apocrypha, on the other hand, are deliberate attempts to fill in the gaps of the NT story in the life of Jesus, to further heretical ideas by false claims of authority, and to amplify the prophecies of Jesus by revelations given the Apostles. Works of this description were very numerous. They may be classified under four heads:

I. Gospels. These have as their object either to offer a narrative which shall rival the canonical Gospels or to add something to their story. It does not fall within the scope of this article to discuss the questions which they severally present; rather to give a brief, concise idea of those which were more prominent. (1) First to be noted is The Gospel according to the Hebrews. The fragments of this gospel have been brought together and discussed by Nicholson in his edition of it. It seems to have existed in two forms—the Nazarene and the Ebionite, the latter being more heretical. It contains additions to the canonical narrative and gives us some new alleged sayings of Jesus.

(2) The Gospel according to the Egyptians. This gospel shows marked Gnostic tendencies. Fragments of it are found in Clement, Hippolytus, and Epiphanius.

(3) The Gospel according to Peter. An important fragment of this gospel was discovered in 1885. In this work appears a strong Docetic tendency and it shows acquaintance with all our Four Gospels.

(4) The Protevangelium of James. The narrative of this well-known gospel extends from the birth of Mary to the slaughter of the Innocents at Bethlehem. This is a good sample of a supplementary gospel. Its date is probably quite early.

(5) The Gospel of Thomas, or the Gospel of the Infancy. This has been preserved for us in Greek, Latin, and Syriac. It exhibits the life of Jesus from the fifth to the twelfth year and makes Him at this time a miracle-worker to satisfy His own whims and ambitions. These are samples of many attempts made to gratify curiosity by intruding upon the silence of the Scriptures.

II. Among the Acts of Apostles we have The Acts of Paul and Thecla. It is the story of a young woman of Iconium who was converted by Paul and suffered much for her faith, but was miraculously protected. The work is preserved in a number of versions and dates from perhaps the middle of the second century. It is a romance inculcating continence and its rewards.

III. Epistles. Under this head we may mention the Abgarus Letters—one from the king of Edessa to our Lord and His answer, which are quite early—and the Epistles of Paul to the Laodiceans and Alexandrians mentioned in the Muratorian Canon.

IV. Prominent among early apocalypses is The Apocalypse of Peter. A large fragment of this apocalypse was discovered in the same MSS containing the Gospel of Peter (see above). It presents the Lord complying with the request of His disciples to show them their righteous brethren who had gone before them into the other world. To Peter He gives a revelation of heaven and hell, with a description of the terrible punishment of the lost. It was written probably early in the 2d cent. and exerted a wide influence. In the attempt to satisfy a demand for particulars not given us in our NT nearly all the Apostles were made authors of apocryphal Gospels, while fictitious Acts of the Apostles provided missionary enterprise for the Twelve. These are all of too late a date to require attention here. It is needful only to say a word regarding the outcome of this mass of apocryphal literature. It has required no such careful discussion as did the Apocrypha of the O T to determine its place. The love of the marvelous in these creations of the imagination and their vivid presentation of some special teaching made them very popular. They have been the fruitful source of sacred legends and ecclesiastical traditions. It is to these books that we must look for the origin of some of the dogmas of the Roman Catholic Church. Because they have been thus influential, scholarship has been deeply interested in a critical study of them, and much light has been thrown in recent years upon their origin, character, and worth.

APOLLONIA, ap"el-lō'ni-a (Ἀπολλωνία): A city of Macedonia, on the celebrated Egnatian way, 30 m. W. of Amphipolis and 38 m. E. of Thessalonica (Acts 17 1). Identified by Leake with the modern Pollina. E. E. N.

APOLLOS, a-pel'es (Ἀπολλώς — possibly contracted from Ἀπολλώνιος. [So in D.]): A cultured Jew of Alexandria, who came to Ephesus during the interim between Paul's first and second visits to that place (Ac 18 24-28). He is described as "an eloquent man" and "mighty in the Scriptures"—the latter term defining the particular field in which his gift specially realized itself (ver. 24). The seeming paradox that, though instructed in the way of the Lord and able to speak and to teach accurately the things concerning Jesus, he knew only the baptism of John (ver. 25) is possibly explained by saying that his knowledge of the new religion had been confined to an information regarding the facts of Jesus' life and teaching and did not involve a definite course of instruction in the truths held by the early Church (cf. Ac 21 21, 24 for the use of κατηχεῖν in the sense of 'imparting information.' Cf. also Zahn, Introduction, § 60, n. 4). As a matter of fact, converts were not at this early period of the Church's life given the catechetical training which later was given to candidates for baptism. The use of κατηχεῖν in Gal 6 6, I Co 14 19, in the sense of 'imparting instruction' refers to the teaching of full members within the Church and does not cover such cases as that of Apollos (or of Theophilus, Lk 1 3 f.). In other words, in spite of pilgrims from Egypt (Ac 2 10), the news of an organized Church based on the Pentecostal outpouring of the Spirit and involving general charismatic gifts had not reached him, so that he knew nothing beyond baptism as administered by John as a symbol of reformation of life in preparation for the Messiah. His condition was simply a stage or so more primitive than that of the people of Samaria before the coming to them of Peter and John (Ac 8 14-17), though not so primitive as that of the disciples of John referred to in 19 1-7.

Attracted by his speaking in the synagogue, Priscilla and Aquila gave him the instruction needed to complete his knowledge of Christian facts (Ac 18 26). Upon his departure to Achaia he carried with him the warm commendation of the Ephesian brethren (ver. 27) and coming to Corinth proved specially helpful in controverting the Jews in their denial of the Messiahship of Jesus (ver. 28). Unfortunately, however, his peculiar eloquence—so different from Paul's plainness of speech—gave opportunity to the partizan spirit which possessed the Corinthian Church to form the bulk of the disciples into rival followings around these leaders' names (I Co 3 4 ff.; cf. 1 10-12). That Apollos was in no way party to this rivalry is evident from the fact that upon Paul's return to Ephesus, he is found there with the Apostle, unwilling, even at his magnanimous urging, to return to Corinth while partizanship reigned in that Church (I Co 16 12).

The only other mention of him is in the brief note of Tit 3 13, where, with "Zenas the lawyer"—evidently as bearers of the letter—he is commended to the brethren at Crete to be diligently cared for and forwarded on the journey. M. W. J.

APOLLYON, a-pel'i-on (Ἀπολλύων): The Greek name of the Heb. Abaddon (q.v., Rev 9 11). Unlike the Hebrew, which first designates a place (of destruction, Job 26 6, 28 22, etc.), and secondarily the personification of that place, the Greek word, by its etymology, refers solely to the destroyer. It thus represents a fuller development of the conception. A. C. Z.

APOSTLE, a-pos'l (ἀπόστολος, 'a commissioned messenger' [cf. Jn 13 16], from ἀποστέλλειν, 'to send from'): A designation in the early Church of general and not exclusive application. It was given not only to the originally chosen disciples of Jesus (Mk 3 13-19 [ver. 14 Gr.]; Mt 10 1-4; Lk 6 13-16), but also to others (e.g., James, the Lord's brother, Gal 1 19; Barnabas, Ac 14 4, 14; Andronicus and Junias, Ro 16 7).

Whatever natural tendency there may have been in the first days after the Ascension to confine this designation to the Eleven, it was offset by the authority assumed by the Church in the filling, under divine guidance, of Judas' place (Ac 1 23-26), and whatever idea may have yet remained of restricting this term to the sacred number of the Twelve was removed by the divine appointment of an extra Apostle in the person of Paul (Ac 9 15; Ro 1 1). The way was thus opened for the application of the title to such persons as James, who, though apparently not commissioned to any work, was honored for his special relationship to Jesus (Gal 1 19) and his special witness to the Resurrection (I Co 15 7), and Barnabas, who though not related to the Lord nor as far as recorded a special witness to the Resurrection, was divinely set apart for significant work (Ac 13 1-3).

Through this latter application it became natural to give the designation to those who, though not marked by any outward sign as divinely chosen for special work, showed their choice by their notable performance of the work given them to do. It is this development in the application of the term which has led many scholars to understand Paul in I Th 2 6 as associating Silvanus and Timothy and in I Co 4 9, Apollos with himself as Apostles, and in I

Co 9 5, 15 5-7, as having in mind a body of Apostles extended beyond the Twelve (see Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 92f.; Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry, p. 79 f.). In II Co 8 23 and Ph 2 25, however, the word in the Greek text is used in its primitive sense of commissioned messenger. Thus "messenger," RV, though "Apostle" RVmg.

Once it is used in a highly official sense of Jesus Christ (He 3 1) where His representative relations to God ("Apostle") and to man ("High Priest") are combined. M. W. J.

APOTHECARY. See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 2.

APPAIM, ap'pa-im (אַפַּיִם, 'appayīm), 'nostrils' or 'face': A Judahite (Jerachmeelite) person or clan (I Ch 2 30 f.). E. E. N.

APPAREL. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS.

APPHIA, ap'fi-a (Ἀπφία, a Phrygian name, indicating that the bearer was of native provincial stock): Greeted (Phm ver. 2) as "our sister." Since this epistle concerns one household exclusively it is probable that A. was Philemon's wife and the mother of Archippus. J. M. T.

APPIUS, MARKET OF (Ἀππίου Φόρον, Appii Forum AV): A station on the Appian Way, 43 m. S. of Rome, at the northern terminus of the canal through the Pontine marshes (Ac 28 15). E. E. N.

APPLE. See PALESTINE, § 23.

APRON. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 1, and HANDKERCHIEF.

AQUILA (Ἀκύλας): A Jew of Pontus, who migrated to Rome. When Claudius banished the Jews from that city in 49 A.D., A. with his wife, Priscilla, went to Corinth, where they carried on their trade of tent-making (Ac 18 1-3). Probably through Paul, who wrought with them, they were converted to Christianity. They accompanied the Apostle to Ephesus (Ac 18 18 f.), where, during the latter's absence, they instructed Apollos. Their house in Ephesus was used as a Christian assembly-place (I Co 16 19). They are mentioned again, Ro 16 (ver. 3), a chapter probably addressed to the Ephesian church. But see ROMANS, § 3. J. M. T.

AR (עָר, 'ār), 'city' (?): A city of Moab, in one of the upper valleys of the Arnon. The exact site is unknown (Nu 21 15, 28; Dt 2 9, 18, 29; Is 15 1). The same place is referred to in Jos 13 9, 16; II S 24 5. E. E. N.

ARA, ê'ra (אָרַא, 'ăr'a): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 38). E. E. N.

ARAB, ar'ab or ê'rab (אָרֵב, 'ărābh): A town of Judah (Jos 15 52), to which Paarai the Arbite (II S 23 35) probably belonged. Map II, E 3. E. E. N.

ARAB (עֲרָב, 'ărābh); ARABIA: The use of these names in the O T and the Hebrew knowledge of the land and its people must be carefully distinguished. Middle and northern Arabia and the life of its populations were practically the same for the Hebrews as they had been from time immemorial and are still. Its steppes, deserts, and oases were inhabited by nomads in the steppes, seminomads around the smaller oases, and settled townsfolk in the larger oases, all keeping up relations with the nomads. Thus, the life there, at the present day, gives us a sufficiently exact idea of their life as the Hebrews knew it. The best descriptions are in Doughty's Arabia Deserta, but Hogarth's Penetration of Arabia may also be used especially for its elaborate bibliography of exploration.

1. Introductory.

Except for the remotest prehistoric times, it is safe to start with the position that Arabia was the original home of the Semites. From it all the Semitic peoples of Asia have gone out in successive waves, driven by an economic law. The population of Arabia is always on the edge of starvation, just larger than what the land can support. In consequence, there is a steady overflowing on its borders; nomads pass over gradually into agriculturists; Bedawīn into Fellāḥīn. The picture in the prologue to Job is of a tribe half-way through this process. But further, from time to time, the pressure becomes so great that Arabia pours out its thousands in a conquering army over the neighboring lands. The early conquests of Islam are one case in point; those of the Hebrews are another; there must have been many more.

2. Arabia the Original Home of the Semites.

We have, then, to consider the Hebrews as an Arab clan that abandoned its original nomadic life, seized rich lands, and turned more or less to a settled, agricultural existence. Yet this was not complete, and a yearning back to the nomadic ideal is always evident (cf. RECHABITES). Nomad and farmer are a frequent contrast in the O T, and now one, now the other is given preference, according to the writer. A knowledge, therefore, of Arabian institutions and literature and of the Arab religion and mind is of the first importance as a guide to the genius of the Hebrews. All the forms of Hebrew literature, except the psalm, can be paralleled and illustrated from Arabic literature, and all the manifestations of Hebrew religion have kindred appearances in the desert. There can be best found that common Semitic soil of ideas and emotions from which the unique religion of the Hebrews rose.

3. The Hebrews Essentially Arabians.

The oldest views of the Hebrews on the Arab tribes are given in Gn 10 (cf. ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 10). Later, they speak of them separately, as Ishmaelites, Midianites, Kedarites (q.v.). For the south Arabians, now becoming important for the earliest history and most primitive religion, see SABEAN. Only comparatively late does the name Arab appear. Yet the evidence is that the Arabs called themselves so from remote antiquity, and that they knew no derivation for the name. The Hebrews, on the other hand, connected it with the word 'ărābhāh, a dry, sterile tract, and spoke of an 'Ărābhī, the inhabitant of such a tract, a nomad (Is 13 20; Jer 3 2). Whether this is the true derivation of the name, preserved by the Hebrews, but lost by the Arabs, we can not tell.

4. References to Arab Peoples in the Bible.

'Ărābhāh does not seem to exist in old Arabic. In Is 21 13 the title is probably incorrect, and in the oracle should be read, "in the steppe" or "in the evening." In Ezk 27 21 the Arabs ('ărābh, a collective) are a separate people besides the Kedarites; the name is not general. In Jer 25 24 we have, "all the kings of the Arabs ('ărābh)," evidently now in a broad racial sense. The same usage is firmly established in II Ch (9 14, 17 11, 21 16, 22 1, 26 7), and the Chronicler throws it back unhistorically into earlier times, e.g., of Solomon (9 14) and Jehoshaphat (17 11). For him, 'Ărābhī is clearly an Arab, and he reckons them with the Philistines as neighboring enemies of Israel; once (21 16) also with the Cushites (Ethiopians). More historical is the similar use of the term in Neh 2 19, 4 1, 6 1. Apparently the slow appearance of Arab, as a name in the O T, reflects the gradual movement of Arabian tribes northward (which has often occurred), displacing the Ishmaelites, Midianites, etc., whom the Israelites had previously known. So a new general name for these strangers came into use. Cf. especially Nöldeke, Arabia, Arabians, in EB. In Ac 2 11 "Arabians" means, probably, Nabatæans, and for Paul (Gal 1 17, 4 25), Arabia was the country of the Nabatæans including the Sinaitic peninsula.

ARABAH, ar'a-bā (עֲרָבָה, 'ărābhāh): In its broadest sense, that portion of Palestine extending S. from the Sea of Galilee to the Red Sea, or more accurately to the Gulf of Akabah (Dt 1 1, 3 17; II K 25 4; Jos 3 16, 11 2, 12 3), and embracing within it the Dead Sea, which is sometimes called the "sea of the Arabah" (Dt 4 49). The Hebrew name is usually translated in the AV by "plain" or "wilderness," but in the RV it is treated, more correctly, as a proper name; the article frequently accompanies it in the original. The modern Arabs give two names to this deep depression; that portion N. of the Dead Sea they call el-Ghōr, 'the depression,' while that S. of the Dead Sea and extending to the Red Sea, they designate as Wady el-'Arabah (Dt 2 8). Both portions are intensely arid and hot. More than two-thirds of the whole stretch lies below the level of the Mediterranean Sea. The highest point is the ridge about opposite Mt. Hor known as er-Rishy, whose altitude above sea-level is 723 ft. (Hull). Almost the entire valley is bounded on both E. and W. by high mountains which on the average are not more than 10 m. apart. Hence the valley is usually very narrow. Geologically, it is especially interesting because the terraces are filled with fossil shells which afford traces of the former height of the waters of the Dead Sea. Though barren now, the whole valley, being composed of marl, sand, and gravel, might become by means of proper irrigation a veritable garden of rich productivity. See also CHAMPAIGN.

ARAD, ē'rad (עֲרָד, 'ărādh): I. A town in the Negeb or "South" region, about 17 m. S. of Hebron. Its king fought against the Israelites when they were on the southern borders of Palestine (Nu 21 1, 33 40). It was afterward occupied by the Kenites (Jg 1 16; cf. Jos 12 14). Map II, E 4. II. A name in the genealogy of Benjamin (I Ch 8 15).

ARAH, ē'rā (אָרַח, 'āraḥ), 'traveler': 1. One of the sons of Ulla, an Asherite (1 Ch 7 39). 2. A clan or family name in the list of Ezr 2 5 = Neh 7 10.

E. E. N.

ARAM, ē'ram (אֲרָם, 'ărām): I. Aram, from which our words Aramean and Aramaic are derived, is the Hebrew name of a people and of a country usually translated "Syrian" and "Syria" in the English versions. The original, however, is retained as the name of an ancestor in Gn 10 22, 22 21, who is reckoned as one of the sons of Shem. It appears also as the name of the country in a few passages. "Aramitess" is used as equivalent to an Aramean or Syrian woman (I Ch 7 14). The adjective "Syrian" ("Syriack," AV, or "Aramaic," RVmg.) is employed to express the language of the Arameans (see ARAMAIC LANGUAGE).

1. Name.

The Arameans were one of the great divisions of the Semitic family, lying, as a whole, after the dispersion of the race, between the Babylonians (and Assyrians) to the E. and the Canaanites to the W. Yet they were also found in large numbers as a pastoral people on both sides of the Tigris till the latest Babylonian times. W. of the Euphrates they do not appear in force till after the 12th cent. B.C., though it was in this region that they played their chief rôle in history. Their historical progress may be summarized as follows:

2. Geographical Distribution.

They were, until perhaps the 15th cent. B.C., wholly nomadic or seminomadic, ranging from the lower Tigris to the middle Euphrates. In or about the 15th cent. a portion of them formed a settlement near the city of Haran in Mesopotamia and became interested in trade. With the increasing development of wealth and industry generally in both east and west, their trading habits became more general till from the 9th cent. onward they became the chief traveling merchants and negotiators of Western Asia. In the 8th cent. they are found doing business in Babylonia and Assyria and their language is the lingua franca of all Semitic peoples (cf. II K 18 26). Meanwhile, with the decline of the Hittite kingdoms in Syria, Arameans had been crowding into Northern Syria and gradually taking the positions in Middle and Southern Syria from which the Hittites had retired. Thus were formed, on both sides of the river, the Aramean communities which are referred to in the O T and of which Damascus (q.v.) was by far the most important.

3. Character and Influence.

The other western districts (see below), which are distinguished as Aramean, all lay to the S. and W. of Damascus; but the great cities of Syria to the N. —Carchemish, Arpad, and Hamath—were also Aramean after the 12th cent.

(1) Aram-Naharaim is the original of the Mesopotamia of EVV and designates (somewhat inexactly) the country to the E. of the middle Euphrates as far as the river Habor (the modern Khabour). Naharaim is generally supposed to mean 'the two rivers'; but it should probably be explained as 'the river region.' The Priestly Code has Paddan-Aram in the place of Aram-Naharaim. The center of population and trade till long after the Christian era was the great city or district of Haran (q.v.). This region was of great importance in the earliest history of Israel. Abram himself lived for a time in Haran (Gn 11 31, 12 4 f.; cf. Dt 26 5). In the same region dwelt his kindred, from among whom both Isaac and Jacob obtained their wives. After the patriarchal period we read that Balaam, the seer, came from "Aram" (Nu 23 7; cf. 22 5), and not long thereafter "Cushan-rishathaim," King of Mesopotamia, invaded the newly formed Hebrew community in Palestine (Jg 3 7 ff.). According to II S 10 16 "Syrians from beyond the River" came to the help of their kindred who were involved with the Ammonites in their war against David, and with them suffered defeat at his hands. This was the last warlike movement against Palestine reported of the Arameans to the E. of the Euphrates, though Arameans, as was natural, formed a large element in the army of Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 35 11), and, we may presume, of the earlier Assyrian invaders.

4. Political Subdivisions.

Other cities and districts settled by Arameans were the following; those which lay in S. Syria were ultimately absorbed in the great kingdom of Damascus:

(2) Geshur. A district lying close to Bashan (Dt 3 14) which was not subdued by Israel (Jos 13 13), but at one time took possession of some Israelitic territory of northern Gilead (I Ch 2 23). Absalom, whose mother, Maacah, was the daughter of Talmai, King of Geshur, fled thither after the murder of Amnon (II S 13 37). The reference in II S 15 8 shows it to have been Aramean.

(3) Maacah was close to Geshur, probably to the N., and equally independent of Israel (Dt 3 14; Jos 13 13). The Aramean origin of its people is indicated by their descent from Nahor (Gn 22 24). They joined the other Arameans of the neighborhood in assisting the Ammonites against David and shared in their defeat (II S 10 6-8). See Tob.

(4) Rehob or Beth-rehob, to be distinguished from the city of the same name W. of the Jordan which lay "toward Hamath" (Nu 13 21). It was a small kingdom E. of the Jordan, closely connected with Zobah and sent a contingent to join the Ammonites in their war against David (II S 10 6-8).

(5) Tob was an Aramean district, to which Jephthah fled for refuge (Jg 11 3-5), and which also assisted the Ammonites in their war against David, where it was joined with Maacah as Rehob was with Zobah. In II S 10 6-8, omit "the men" before "Tob," אִישׁ having been written for אֶת in ver. 6 and repeated in ver. 8.

(6) Zobah, the most important of the southern Aramean settlements after Damascus. Already in the time of King Saul it was pressing upon the people of Gilead, as we may infer from I S 14 47. In the time of David it took the lead of the Arameans in endeavoring to prevent the extension of his dominion. The next year after the defeat of the Aramean and Ammonite allies (see above), and while Rabbath-Ammon was not yet captured, Hadadezer, King of Zobah, sent for reenforcements and defied the advance of David, who, however, utterly defeated the combination. The result was the submission of all the Arameans of S. Syria (II S 8 3 ff.).

(7) Hamath, to be distinguished from "Hamath the great" (q.v.), was a district lying on the SW. slope of Hermon, reaching at least as far as the Jordan westward, and forming the boundary of Palestine and Israel to the NE. (Nu 34 8; I K 8 65; II K 14 25; Ezk 47 16; Am 6 14). In the 10th cent. B.C. it was an Aramean kingdom whose ruler Tou, though not joining in the league against Israel, became tributary to David (II S 8 9 ff.; cf. I Ch 18 9). As the frontier of a rival people, its control was always aimed at by the powerful kings of Israel (II Ch 8 4; II K 14 28). See Winckler in *KAT*³, 182, 231 f., and Oriental. Forschungen, III., Heft 3 (1905).

(8) Mesopotamia is used in EVV to translate 'Ăram-Nahăraim. The word among the Greeks and Romans stood for the whole territory lying 'between the rivers' Euphrates and Tigris, S. of the Masius range of mountains and N. of the Syro-Arabian desert proper. This great region, however, is not designated by this or any other single name in the Bible (except perhaps in Ac 2 9). It is through the influence of the LXX that the term came to be used in the versions for the more limited area as above described instead of Mesopotamia in the larger sense. See the articles under that name in HDB, EB, and EBrit.

(9) Syria and Syrian. Syria in the O T translates 'Ăram except in the case of 'Ăram-Nahăraim and may be said to comprehend all the Aramean settlements and their inhabitants W. of the Euphrates above described. According to the common view the word is a contraction of Assyria and was employed by the Greeks of Asia Minor to designate the neighboring peoples of the Assyrian Empire. It became afterward restricted to the empire of the Seleucidæ, formed after the death of Alexander the Great, and in N T to the surviving portion of it which had its capital in Antioch, and Damascus as its second great city, and which in 65 B.C. was made a Roman province. J. F. McC.

II. 1. A son of Kemuel, son of Nahor (Gn 22 21). See I. § 1. 2. A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 34). 3. For Mt 1 3 f. and Lk 3 33 (AV) see RAM. E. E. N.

ARAMAIC LANGUAGE: The following parts of the O T are written in Aramaic: Gn 31 47 (the words Yᵉgar sāhădhūthā); Jer 10 11; Ezr 4 8–6 18, 7 12-26; Dn 2 4b–7 28: there are also several Aramaic words cited in the N T. Aramaic was a branch of the Semitic languages, cognate with Hebrew, which, in several closely allied dialects, was spoken formerly in the countries surrounding Palestine, and ultimately also in Palestine itself. The name Aramaic is given to this group of dialects because "Aram" —commonly rendered in both AV and RV "Syria" or "Syrians" (II S 8 5, etc.)—was the name of the people, spread over different localities (as "Aram of Damascus," "Aram of Zobah," etc., II S 8 5, 10 8), by whom it was spoken.

1. Where Spoken.

2. Relationship with Hebrew.

Looking at Aramaic in general, its relationship with Hebrew is such that a person conversant with one can at once see that the other is allied; but at the same time there are differences: though most of the roots and grammatical forms have evidently a common origin, the roots (or derivatives) in use in one are often not in use in the other, and there are differences sometimes in the consonants, and frequently in the vowels. Thus 'he wrote' is, in Hebrew, kāthab, in Aramaic, kᵉthab; 'I wrote' is, in Heb., kāthabtī; in Aram., kithbēth, or (in other dialects) kethbeth or kᵉthabith; 'he made to write' is, in Heb., hikhtīb; in Aram., hakhtēb or akhtēb; 'I' is, in Heb., 'ănī, in Aram., 'ănā; the masc. plur. ends in Heb. in -im, in Aram. in -in; Heb. ō often corresponds to Aram. ā, as Heb. lō, 'not' = Aram. lā, Heb. kōthēb, 'writing' = Aram. kāthēb, Heb. ṭōb, 'good' = Aram. ṭāb; in Heb. a noun is made definite by the article being prefixed, as 'ōth, 'sign,' hā-'ōth, 'the sign,' but in Aram. by -ā affixed, as 'āth, 'sign,' 'āthā, 'the sign' (cf. in the N T Abba, Beth-esda, Gabbetha, Golgotha, Tabitha, talitha): in certain cases, also, consonants are changed, thus 'gold' is in Heb. zāhāb, in Aram. dᵉhab; 'three' is in Heb. shālōsh, in Aram. thᵉlāth; Heb. שׂ in certain cases corresponds to the Aram. ע (as אֶרֶץ, 'earth' = Aram. אַרְעָא); and in certain other cases to Aram. ט (as יָעַץ, 'he counseled' = Aram. יְטַב); many words, again, correspond in the two languages, but there are some which are in common use in Aramaic but are rare (usually either poetical or late) in Heb.: thus 'to go down' is yārad in Heb., but nᵉḥēth in Aram. (only in a few poetical passages in Heb.), 'to go up' is 'ālāh in Heb., sᵉlēq in Aram. (only Ps 139 9 in Heb.), 'to forsake' is 'āzab in Heb., shᵉbaq in Aram. (and so in "sabach-thani," Mt 27 46 = Mk 15 34), 'lord' is 'ādōn in Heb., but mārē in Aram. (cf. I Co 16 22, "Marana-tha," 'Our Lord, come!').

3. Different Dialects of Aramaic.

The following are the principal types of Aramaic known: (1) The Aramaic found on weights, and in short inscriptions attached to contract-tablets, from Nineveh, and afterward from Babylon, from the reign of Sargon (722–705 B.C.) onward.

(2) The Aramaic of inscriptions found at Zinjirli and Nerab, in N. Syria near Aleppo—two of the former dating from the reign of Tiglath-pileser III (745–727 B.C.), and one being somewhat earlier.

(3) The Aramaic spoken by settlers in Egypt, found chiefly on papyri dating from the reign of Xerxes (485–465 B.C.) onward. Some of the longest and most important of those at present known are marriage-contracts (between Jews), containing descriptions of house-property, etc., but there are also others. An interesting inscription from Têma (in N. Arabia, about 250 m. SE. of Edom) presents the same type of dialect. Aramaic inscriptions—as far as they go, of the same type—from Cappadocia, and (on coins) from Tarsus in Cilicia (c. 350 B.C.) are also known.

(4) Biblical Aramaic (see below).

(5) Nabatæan inscriptions (chiefly sepulchral). Mainly from el-'Olâ, about 80 m. S. of Têma, and dating from the reign of חרתת (i.e., Aretas, II Co 11 32), 9 B.C. to 60 A.D., and onward, till the overthrow of the Nabatæan kingdom by Trajan, 105 A.D. These inscriptions have a considerable mixture of Arabic idioms.

(6) Inscriptions from Palmyra, 150 m. NE. of Damascus, in an oasis in the Syrian desert, dating from about the Christian era to 270 A.D. Many of these are inscriptions on statues erected in honor of different magistrates, etc.; others are votive inscriptions; a particularly valuable one is a long tariff, regulating the tolls payable on various kinds of goods brought into Palmyra.

(7) Syriac, spoken in and about Edessa, 100 m. NE. of Aleppo in W Mesopotamia, the home of Laban, the "Syrian" (Heb. the "Aramean"). In this are written the Syriac version of the Gospels commonly called the Curetonian or the Sinaitic (c. 200 A.D.), the Peshiṭto version of O T and N T, and an extensive Christian literature besides (3d cent. A.D. onward).

(8) The Targums (Aramaic "interpretations," or paraphrases, of the O T) of Onkelos on the Pentateuch, and of Jonathan on the Prophets, of Judæan origin, but in their present form redacted in Babylonia in the 5th cent. A.D., and (according to Nöldeke, though doubted by Dalman) considerably tinged by the Aramaic dialect spoken by the Jews in Babylon.

(9) Galilæan Aramaic, preserved chiefly in the Aramaic parts of the Palestinian Talmud—some dating from as early as the 3d and 4th cent. A.D. This must have been the dialect spoken by Christ and the Apostles.

(10) The Christian Palestinian Aramaic, spoken in Palestine in the 5th and 6th cent. A.D., and preserved in a lectionary of the Gospels, and also in various fragments, chiefly Biblical.

(11) Samaritan. The Samaritan version of the Pentateuch, liturgies, etc., dating probably from the 4th and following centuries after Christ. No. 10 has many resemblances with No. 9; and No. 11 has some (cf. the synopsis in Dalman *Gramm.*², pp. 44–51).

(12) Babylonian Aramaic. The Aramaic dialect spoken in Babylonia in the 4th to the 6th cent. A.D. preserved in the Babylonian Talmud.

(13) 'Mandaic,' the language of the strange Gnostic sect of Mandæans (from Manda, 'knowledge' = γνῶσις), half Jewish, half heathen, living in lower Babylonia. Closely allied to No. 12.

(14) The Targums on the Hagiographa, and the so-called 'Jerusalem' Targums on the Pentateuch. Of later date than No. 8 (c. 5th–8th cent. A.D., or later). The language is in the main that of No. 8; but it exhibits some of the distinctive features of Nos. 9 and 10 (see Dalman *Gramm.*², pp. 395 ff.).

Of these dialects, Nos. 7, 12, 13 are generally grouped as Eastern Aramaic, and are distinguished from the others, or Western Aramaic, in particular by the prefix of the 3d pers. masc. impf. being n (in Nos. 12 and 13 also sometimes l) instead of y. The dialects all resemble one another, though several of them have scripts, representing particular phases in the development of the Aramaic alphabet, peculiar to themselves; they differ also, to some extent, in vocabulary and grammatical forms. Thus, in addition to the difference just noted, in Nos. 1, 2, 3 the relative and demonstrative pronouns are zi, zenā, not, as in the others, di, denā: the pron. suffix of the 3d pers. plur. is in Nos. 2, 3, 5, and Jer 10 11 -ōm, in Nos. 4 (Daniel) and 6, -ōn (Ezr has both forms). No. 2 resembles Hebrew in certain features more than any of the other dialects do (e.g., 'to sit' is yᵉsheb, not yᵉthēb, cf. Heb. yāshab). The Biblical Aramaic belongs to the West Aramaic group, of the type spoken in and about Palestine (the relative, for instance, is di, not zi, as in Babylon down to at least 400 B.C.): it is very similar to that of No. 8, though in some respects of an earlier type; it has also (in particular forms) notable affinities with Nos. 3, 5, 6. It was formerly called "Chaldee," from the mistaken idea that the language of Dn 2 4 ff. was that actually spoken by the "Chaldeans" in Babylon. The verse Jer 10 11 has some peculiarities showing that its author must have spoken a particular Aramaic dialect (cf. the writer's LOT, p. 255; אֲרַקָא also occurs in Egyptian Aramaic, side by side with אַרְעָא).

4. Use of Aramaic in Palestine.

Aramaic was formerly used largely as the language of commerce and diplomacy, as is shown by II K 18 26 (701 B.C.), by some of the Aramaic inscriptions on coins and weights, and some of those from Egypt. How prevalent it was in the countries around Palestine will be apparent from the preceding enumeration of dialects. It is not, therefore, surprising that it gradually made its influence felt upon Hebrew. Aramaic words appear occasionally in Heb. written c. 600 B.C.; in Heb. writings dating from the captivity and later Aramaic words and constructions become increasingly frequent: there are many Aramaic words, for instance, in Job, the later Psalms, Jonah, Esther, the Heb. parts of Daniel; Aramaic words, and sometimes also Aramaic constructions, are marked in Chronicles, Ezr, and Neh, and especially in Ec. In the end, Aramaic supplanted Hebrew altogether as the popular language in Palestine; and so nearly all the Semitic words quoted in the NT are distinctively Aramaic (e.g., Akeldama, Maranatha, and the forms in -ā cited above). Of course, the old view that the Jews forgot their Hebrew in Babylonia, and spoke in 'Chaldee,' when they returned to Palestine, must be entirely given up: the 'Chaldee' (Aramaic) of Daniel was not spoken in Babylonia at all; Hag., Zec, and other post-exilic writings use Hebrew, which was still spoken normally in Jerusalem c. 430 B.C. (Neh 13 24). The Hebrews, after the captivity, gradually acquired the use of Aramaic through intercourse with their neighbors in and about Palestine.

Another error is also to be guarded against. It does not follow because a word, otherwise unknown in Heb. but common in Aramaic, occurs once or twice in Heb., that therefore the passages in which it occurs are late: some regard must be had to the character of the word, and we must consider, for instance, whether it occurs in poetry or prose, and whether it is isolated or accompanied by other marks of a late style. Such a word may, for example, not have been borrowed by Heb. from Aramaic at a late date, but have formed part of the original stock common to both languages, though in Heb. it may have been rare and used only in poetry. There are also reasons for thinking that the language of the N. kingdom differed dialectically from that of Judah; and some Aramaic forms may be due to the fact that the writings in which they are found originated in the N. kingdom. This has been supposed to be the explanation of the Aramaic expressions in the Song of Sol.; but the trend of recent opinion has been to attribute them rather to a post-exilic date, to which indeed, viewed in the aggregate, they certainly seem to point.

ARAMITESS, ê'ram-ait"es: An Aramean woman (I Ch 7 14). See ARAM, § 1. E. E. N.

ARAM-MAACAH, ê'ram-mā'a-cā, NAHARAIM, nê"ha-rê'im, REHOB, rî'hob, and ZOBAH, zō'bā: See ARAM, § 4.

ARAN, ê'ran (אָרָן, 'ărān), 'wild goat' (?): A Horite clan (Gn 36 28; I Ch 1 42). E. E. N.

ARARAT, ar'a-rat (אֲרָרָט 'ărārāṭ): A district located in E. Armenia, between Lakes Van and Urumia and the River Araxes. Thither the sons of Sennacherib fled after killing their father (II K 19 37; Is 37 38; Armenia AV). In Jer 51 27 it occurs as the name of a "kingdom" along with those of the Minni and Ashkenaz, all of whom are summoned by the prophet to fight against Babylon. The Assyrian inscriptions, from the 9th cent. B.C. forward, frequently mention the land of Urarṭu, or Ararat. The altitude of this region above the level of the Mediterranean Sea is between 6,000 and 7,000 ft. Noah's ark is said to have rested on "the mountains of Ararat" (Gn 8 4); the reference being probably to a mountain range, rather than to any particular peak. In the Babylonian account of the Deluge also the impression is given that the mountain (range) of Nisir stopped the ship. It is barely possible that the double-peaked mountain, whose altitude is 17,260 and 13,000 ft., respectively, and which is situated about half-way between the Black and Caspian seas, may have been in the writer's mind.

ARAUNAH, a-rō'nā (אַרַוְנָה, 'ărawnāh): The Jebusite from whom David purchased the threshing-floor over which the destroying angel seemed to be stationed (II S 24 16 ff.; I Ch 21 15 ff.; cf. II Ch 3 1). Called Ornan in I Ch 21 15 ff. E. E. N.

ARBA, ār'ba (אַרְבַּע, 'arba'), 'four': Only in connection with Hebron as the "city of Arba." The legendary ancestor of the Anakim near Hebron (Jos 14 15, 15 13, 21 11). See also ANAK and HEBRON.

ARCHEVITE, ār'kẹ-vait, ARCHI, ār'kai, ARCHITE, ār'cait (אַרְכֵּוָי, 'arkewāyē): Only in Ezr 4 9 and of uncertain meaning. Possibly a mistake in the text for Cuthites (cf. II K 17 24). Generally taken as meaning people from Erech (q.v.) in Babylonia. E. E. N.

ARCHIPPUS, ar-kip'us (Ἄρχιππος): A member of the household of Philemon, probably his son (Col 4 17; Phm ver. 2). Though evidently a young man, he held an important office in the church of Colossæ. Paul calls him his "fellow-soldier" (Phm ver. 2; cf. Ph 2 25; II Ti 2 3). He may have shared with him in some arduous labor for the Gospel. R. A. F.

ARCHITECTURE: The practical art of building in Palestine was mainly evolved from a single type, the rectangular, flat-roofed house of stone or brick.

The common nomadic tent of skins or stuffs exerted no discernible influence upon structural forms, and the use of wood was confined to small internal details or fittings. The house-type was developed into the dwelling or domestic house, the palace or royal house, the temple and synagogue or house of religious assembly, the tower or fortress, the granary or storehouse, and the tomb or house of the dead. Aggregations of houses in towns were regularly encircled by protecting walls, having gateways for communication and towers for defense. A city like Jerusalem might contain special structures for communication, like stairways or bridges, and in connection with pools or reservoirs and in the Temple area porticos or colonnades were built. It seems likely that in the artistic treatment of all these types of building there was almost nothing original to Palestine. In cases where considerable elaboration may be inferred, it was doubtless an imitation of Phœnician, Egyptian, or Greek styles.

The typical house-plan was introverted, i.e., the exterior was normally barren, broken only by the gateway, while all rooms opened inward upon a central court. In the palaces of Jerusalem and Samaria there was some use of halls whose roofs were supported by columns. In these buildings precious materials like ivory, gold, silver, and brass and imported woods, like cedar, were used. To columns and walls color and carving were somewhat applied. The successive Temples were undoubtedly devised with an eye to beauty and impressiveness. But aside from very general accounts (as in I K 6; II Ch 3; Ezk 40–44) and some scattered references to details, we have but meager data for forming an architectural conception. Remains of synagogues are found in Galilee, showing a rectangular plan, some bases for pillar-supports, and slight carved decoration of doorways. Detached tombs are found in some places, as a rule constructed upon Greek or Roman plans. (See also CITY, HOUSE, PALACE, TEMPLE, SYNAGOGUE, TOWER, TOMB.)

ARCTURUS. See ASTRONOMY, § 4.

ARD, ārd (אַרְדְּ, 'ard): The ancestral head of a Benjamite clan. In Gn 46 21 he is counted as a brother, in Nu 26 40 as a son of Bela. In I Ch 8 3 the name is given as Addar. E. E. N.

ARDON, ār'don (אַרְדּוֹן, 'ardōn): "Son" of Azubah, wife of Caleb (I Ch 2 18). Perhaps a place- or clan-name. E. E. N.

ARELI, a-rī'lai (אַרְאֵלִי, 'ar'ēlī): Ancestral head of a Gadite family (Gn 46 16; Nu 26 17). E. E. N.

AREOPAGUS, ê''rẹ-ɵp'a-gus: A bare rock NW. of the entrance to the Acropolis of Athens; called Ἄρειος Πάγος ('Hill of Ares') from the near-by temples of Ares. It was generally the seat of a criminal court with jurisdiction over murder, immorality, etc. The Areopagites were drawn from the noblest-born and wealthiest citizens, all state officials being ex-officio members. It was a self-perpetuating, conservative, all-powerful court, practically governing Athens. Its power was modified by Draco, but Solon extended its jurisdiction to criminal, political, and moral cases. Under Roman rule all its ancient powers were restored. Before this court Paul was summoned and, at least, not found guilty of serious offense, but rather dismissed in contempt. One of the court, Dionysius, was converted to the Christian faith (Ac 17 16-34).

ARETAS, ar'ẹ-tas (Ἀρέτας, more properly Ἀρέθας, transliteration of Aram. חרתת): The name of a number of the Nabatæan kings (see ARAB, § 4). 1. A ruler (Gr. τύραννος) of the Arabians c. 169 B.C. (II Mac 5 8). 2. A king of the Arabians c. 96 B.C. (cf. Jos. Ant. XIII, 13 3). 3. The king mentioned in II Co 11 32 in connection with the escape of Paul from Damascus. His original name was Æneas (Jos. Ant. XVI, 9 4). In the inscriptions and coins from his reign (cf. CIS, Pars II, Aram. Nos. 196–217), he is frequently called "Carithath, King of the Nabatæans, lover of his people," in distinction from some of his predecessors who were called "lovers of the Greeks." His reign dates probably from about 9 B.C. to 40 A.D. (cf. CIS, Pars II, Aram. Nos. 216, 217). There are no Damascene coins extant bearing the image or inscription of Roman emperors between 34 and 62 A.D., so that Damascus may have been ceded to Aretas during the last years of Tiberius' reign, or, more probably, upon the accession of Caligula (37 A.D.). This would explain the statement of II Co 11 32 that an ethnarch of Aretas guarded the city to prevent Paul's escape. As Aretas and Herod Antipas were enemies, such an alliance of the former with the Jewish priestly party is not unlikely (Jos. Ant. XVIII, 5 1, 3).

ARGOB, ār'gob (אַרְגֹּב, 'argōbh): A region in Bashan. According to the O T, Argob was a portion of the conquered territory of Og, assigned to the half tribe of Manasseh (Dt 3 4). In ver. 14 "all Bashan" is made coextensive with "the region of Argob." Within it were situated "60 great cities with brazen walls and bars." Its western border was the land of the Geshurites and the Maacathites. Dt 3 14 (cf. I K 4 13) makes these 60 cities identical with Havvoth-jair (tent villages of Jair), but this is probably a gloss (cf. Driver and also Dillmann, ad loc.). The Targum identifies A. with Trachonitis (Tarkōnā), the el-Leja, a region 30 m. S. of Damascus, and 40 m. E. of Galilee, covered with lava from the volcanoes of the Hauran range. It rises from 20 to 30 ft. above the level of the surrounding plain, and its greatest length is 22 m. with a maximum breadth of 14 m. It contains, in a good state of preservation, many remains of towns, built of the black basaltic rock. Similar ruins are found in the territory to the S. and E. Archeologists are agreed in referring all these remains to cities of the Greco-Roman period, which may, however, have been built upon sites previously occupied by cities of the Mosaic age. Viewed from the plain, el-Leja looks like a rugged coast, and "the region (lit. ḥebhel; boundary-line, Dt 3 4) of Argob" has been interpreted as referring to this rough stretch of rocks. Authorities are skeptical about this identification. Wetzstein placed A. and the Zumleh range about 15 m. farther E.; Guthe locates it between Edrei and Nawa, E. of Jolan (ZDPV, 1890, p. 237 f.). Dillmann fixed upon the region between Gerasa, Edrei, and Ashtaroth on the W. and Jebel Hauran on the E. From the evidence at our disposal, it is probable that G. A. Smith's cautious statement, "within Bashan lay Argob," is all that is justifiable (HGHL, p. 551).

ARIDAI, a-rid'a-ai (אֲרִידַי, 'ărīdhay): A son of Haman (Est 9 9). E. E. N.

ARIDATHA, a-rid'a-tha (אֲרִידָתָא, 'ărīdhātha'): A son of Haman (Est 9 8). E. E. N.

ARIEH, ē'ri-e (הָאֲרִיֵה, hā-'aryē): The statement (II K 15 25) is not clear. If Arieh be a man's name, he was either one of the conspirators against Pekahiah or one of his servants who fell with him. The text may be corrupt. E. E. N.

ARIEL, ē'ri-el (אֲרִיאֵל, 'ărī'ēl), 'lion of God': 1. A Moabite (II S 23 20). 2. One of Ezra's leading helpers, designated more especially teachers (Ezr 8 16). 3. A mystical name of Jerusalem (Is 29 1-7). The original text here may have read אראל '(altar) hearth of God.' A. C. Z.

ARIMATHÆA, ar''i-ma-thī'a (Ἀριμαθαία): The home of Joseph, the counselor (Mt 27 57 and ‖s). Probably the same as Ramathaim-zophim, or Ramah (q.v.). E. E. N.

ARIOCH, ar'i-ok (אַרְיוֹךְ, 'aryōkh): 1. King of Ellasar (Larsa) who served under the king of Elam, in his campaign against Palestine c. 2260 B.C. (Gn 14 1, 9); probably identical with Rim-Sin, King of Larsa, whose name is also written Eri-Aku. 2. The captain of the guard of Nebuchadrezzar (Dn 2 14 f., 25).

J. F. McC.

ARISAI, a-ris'a-ai (אֲרִיסַי, 'ărīsay): One of the sons of Haman (Est 9 9). E. E. N.

ARISTARCHUS, ar''is-tār'cus (Ἀρίσταρχος): One of Paul's traveling companions, a Macedonian of Thessalonica (Ac 27 2). He was attacked by the Ephesian mob (19 29), but escaped death, and accompanied Paul to Jerusalem (20 4) and to Rome (27 2). J. M. T.

ARISTOBULUS, ar''is-to-biū'lus (Ἀριστόβουλος): 1. They "who are of the household of Aristobulus" are greeted by Paul in Ro 16 10. This Aristobulus was probably the grandson of Herod the Great, who lived and died at Rome and was a friend of the Emperor Claudius. If the members of his "household" became the property of the emperor, they might still bear the name of their former master. Among them were the Christians whom Paul remembers. This is substantially the explanation of Lightfoot. 2. The Jewish teacher of Ptolemy Philometor (II Mac 1 10). J. S. R.

ARK (אָרוֹן, 'ārōn), 'chest' or 'box.' The Ark of the Covenant was an oblong box of acacia-wood, two and one-half cubits long by one and one-half deep and wide, overlaid with gold, with a rim or molding around the top. There were golden rings at each corner for the staves that were used for carrying it. Covering its lid, there was a solid gold plate, called the Mercy-seat, with two cherubim of gold at each end (Ex 25 10-22). Some of the names of the ark are significant. It was termed the "Ark of the Covenant of Jehovah" (Dt 10 8), and the "Ark of the Testimony" (Ex 25 22), because it contained the two tables of stone on which were engraved the words constituting the basis of the covenant between Jehovah and Israel. It led the way through the wilderness (Nu 10 33), at the crossing of the Jordan (Jos 3), and in the march around the walls of Jericho (Jos 6). Joshua took it to Gilgal and finally to Shiloh (Jos 18 1), where we find it in the time of Samuel. It was captured in battle by the Philistines, who were forced to return it (I S 4 1-7 1). David removed it from Kirjath-jearim to Jerusalem (II S 6). Solomon placed it in the Temple (I K 8 4 ff.). Its subsequent history is unknown, unless Jer 3 16 ff. implies its presence in Jerusalem in the prophet's day. Shishak may have taken it. Some critics interpret the tables of stone as two meteorites in which the divinity of Sinai resided, and consequently relics of fetish worship. This subjective view has no support in the O T. The significance of the ark lay in its connection with the cherubim (q.v.); they were symbols of the presence of Jehovah, so where the ark rested there was a manifestation of the God of Israel. Its designations "the throne of God" (Jer 3 16 ff.), "His footstool" (Ps. 99 5), and the idea that it could not be looked into without danger of death (I S 6 19), all indicate that it symbolized the immediate presence of the God of Israel. To the popular mind it was a palladium (I S 4–7). Mercy-seat (Heb. Kappōreth) should be rendered 'propitiatory,' or, more literally, 'propitiating thing.' Deissmann, in his luminous article in EB, has proved that simple 'covering,' a favorite rendering with German writers, is wholly inadequate. The LXX. term ἱλαστήριον and its significance in the ceremonies of the Day of Atonement (Lv 16) point to it as being an instrument of propitiation.

The full description of the ark is confined to P, but JE must have had its own account (a fragment of which we find in Dt 10 1 ff.) which was omitted by R in favor of P. J. A. K.

I. OFFENSIVE WEAPONS: Without doubt the oldest weapon which the Israelites brought with them into Canaan from their nomadic life was the spear (ḥănīth I S 18 10 f., javelin, AV; rōmaḥ Jg 5 8, called lance [lancets AV] in I K 18 28). It consisted of a wooden shaft (II S 21 19, 23 7) with a point of bronze—later of iron (I S 13 19), which because of its glitter was called lahabh, or lehābhāh ("head," literally 'flame,' I S 17 7) or baraq ("glittering," literally 'lightning,' Nah 3 3). The kīdhōn ("javelin," Jos 8 18), which is mentioned nine times in the O T, signifies perhaps a smaller type of weapon, which probably was used mainly as a projectile, while the spear was essentially a thrusting weapon, and maintained its importance even alongside of the sword. The dart, shēbheṭ, referred to in II S 18 14, and the dart, maṣṣā', and the pointed shaft, shiryāh (habergeon AV), mentioned in Job 41 26, are probably varieties of this kind of weapon.

The sword (dagger AV, Jg 3 16 ff.), ḥerebh (from ḥārabh, 'to be sharp'), most likely did not become Israel's chief weapon until they had settled in Palestine. The blade, lahabh (Jg 3 22), was perhaps generally of iron (I S 13 19; Is 2 4), straight, at times two-edged (Jg 3 16; Pr 5 4), held in a sheath, ta'ar (from 'arāh, 'to open out,' hence 'that which is emptied,' I S 17 51; II S 20 8; nādhān, I Ch 21 27), probably of leather—from which fact the terms hērīq ('to make empty,' Ex 15 9; Ezk 5 2, 12) and pāthaḥ ('to open,' Ezk 21 33) are often used for drawing the sword. It was fastened by means of a girdle over the coat, and probably, as in the case of the Assyrians, on the left side (cf. Ex 32 27; I S 17 39, 25 13). It was used both as a cutting weapon, "to smite with the sword" (II S 12 9; "to smite with the edge of the sword," Jg 21 10), and as a thrusting weapon, "to thrust through with the sword" (I S 31 4; II S 2 16).

2. The Sword.

Along with the sword and spear, the bow, qesheth, was from early times the most used weapon. It was made of elastic wood (cf. II S 1 22), sometimes of bronze (II S 22 35). There were probably different sizes. The small bow was strung most likely with the hand (cf. II K 13 16); the usual way was to place the foot upon the bow (cf. Ps 7 12, "he hath bent his bow," lit. 'trodden his bow,' from dārak, 'to tread')—that is to say, one end of the bow was placed upon the earth and held fast with the foot, while the other was bent down with the hand. The bowstring was made of the intcstines of oxen or camels; the arrows, ḥitstsīm, of reed or light wood. Arrow-heads were at first probably of stone, later of bronze and iron. They were sharpened (cf. Is 49 2), also poisoned (cf. Ps 120 4) and provided with barbs (Job 6 4), and in time of siege were wound with tow and pitch, and ignited (cf. Ps. 7 13). The quiver, 'ashpāh (Job 39, 23, etc.), or tēlī (Gn 27 3), in which the arrows were kept, was carried by the foot-soldier on the back, or at the left side; the chariot-warrior had it fastened at the side of the chariot. On the march the bow was probably carried in a leather covering, which, however, enclosed perhaps only the middle portion of the bow (cf. Hab 3 9).

3. The Bow.

From earliest times the sling, qela', was used by the Israelites, not only in warfare (II Ch 26 14; cf. Jg 20 16), but also as a weapon of the shepherd (I S 17 40) and of the hunter (Job 41 20), as was the case with the Assyrians, Egyptians, and Persians. It consisted of a leather thong, or was woven from rushes, or hair, or the sinews of animals. It was made wider in the middle than at the ends and contained a hollow place (kaph haqqela', I S 25 29) in which to set the stone. The slinger grasped the sling by both ends and whirled it in a circle about his head several times, and then hurled the shot by letting go of one end of the sling. The missile was generally a smooth, rounded stone (I S 17 40; Zec 9 15). The Benjamites are said to have been especially celebrated as slingers (Jg 20 16).

The maul or war-club, mēphīts (Pr 25 18), or battle-ax, mappēts (Jer 51 20), was of no great importance among the Israelites. The battle-ax referred to in the marginal reading of Ps 35 3 corresponds probably to the σάγαρις of the Persians (Herod. I, 214).

5. The Battle-Ax.

The chariot, rekebh (Jos 11 4) and merkābhāh (Ex

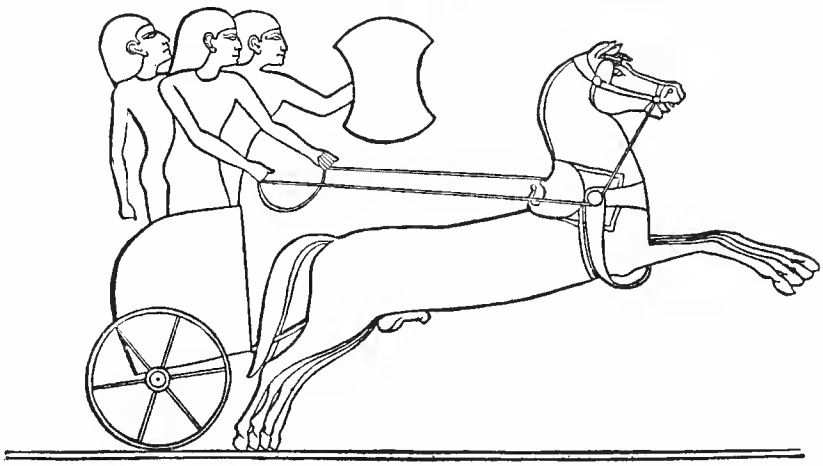
15 4), with which the Israelites had long been acquainted through the Egyptians and Canaanites, was first introduced in the time of Solomon. Even David disabled all the chariot-horses which had been captured (II S 8 4). In the time of Solomon the number of chariot-horses is said to have been four thousand (I K 10 26). The chariots were probably two-wheeled and open behind—similar to those of the Egyptians and Assyrians. They were most likely made of fig-wood. They were not provided with scythe-blades—a type of chariot which was first introduced by the Persians—but were overlaid with iron or bronze (cf. Jg 4 3). Probably three persons usually stood in the chariot—the chariot-driver, the warrior, and the shield-bearer, shālīsh = 'the third man' [?]—as among the Assyrians, Hittites, and others; whereas among the Egyptians only two occupied the chariot. According to I K 10 29 a chariot imported from Egypt cost, in the days of Solomon, 600 shekels (about $360), a horse 150 shekels (about $90).

6. The Chariot.



Hittite War Chariot, Containing Three Soldiers, One of Whom Carries the Small Shield.

II. Defensive Weapons: The shield was of two sizes: (a) the small shield, māgen = ἀσπίς (II S 1 21), often called buckler, which was also borne by bowmen (I Ch 5 18; II Ch 14 8); (b) the large shield, tsinnāh (I S 17 7) = θυρεός, the Homeric σάκος, which covered the greater part of the warrior's body. We do not know the form of these shields; probably there were several forms—as among the Egyptians and Assyrians; in the Roman period the Jews are said to have used the oval shield. The material was either wood or wickerwork, covered with leather, or thick leather arranged in layers. The latter was treated with oil to make it pliable, more durable, and capable of resisting moisture (II S 1 21; Is 21 5). Sometimes the shields were studded with bosses of bronze (Job 15 26). We are to understand the shields mentioned in I K 14 26 ff. as probably of this sort. With such shields Rehoboam replaced the gold-decorated shields of Solomon which had been seized by Shishak (I K 10 16 ff., 14 25 f.) and used them in solemn processions to the House of God (I K 14 27 f.). On the march the shield was probably carried, as among the Grecks, slung from the shoulder by a strap, and provided with a cover, which was removed before battle (Is 22 6). In battle it was carried on the left arm.

7. The Shield.

The helmet, qōbha' or kōbha', in early times was used only by prominent persons, as kings, commanders of armies, and similar officers. I S 17 38 mentions helmets of bronze; among the Egyptians leather helmets also were used. Perhaps the Israelites were acquainted with helmets of this substantial sort—made of leather and protected with bronze or iron (cf. II Ch 26 14). Possibly the round caps which are found on the Assyrian monuments most nearly resemble those of the Israelites; see also the representations on the temple walls at Karnak.

8. The Helmet.

The cuirass, or breastplate, shiryōn (Is 59 17; cf. Eph 6 14), was evidently not very common (I S 17 38 ["coat of mail"]; I K 22 34 ["armor"]; Jer 46 4, 51 3 [brigandine AV]). I S 17 5 shows acquaintance with a coat of mail, shiryōn qasqassīm, of bronze. Among the Assyrians, as among the Israelites, only kings and the prineipal chariot-warriors wore the long coats of mail reaching to the ankles or to the knees; on the other hand, the common soldier protected the upper part of his body by means of bands or sleeveless jackets of felt, linen, or leather. Often these jackets were strengthened with plates of iron, or studded with iron or bronze bosses. Perhaps something of this sort is meant in II Ch 26 14, where reference is made to the preparing of coats of mail for the common soldiery.

9. The Breastplate or Coat of Mail.

Greaves of bronze, mitsḥāh, are mentioned only in the case of Goliath (I S 17 6).

10. Protection for the Legs.

Military boots, ṣe'ōn, are mentioned only in Is 9 5 (cf. margin). We know nothing more about them. Probably neither greaves nor boots were widely used among the Israelites. W N.

ARNAN, ār'nan (אַרְנָן, 'arnān): One of the descendants of David (I Ch 3 21). E. E. N.

ARNI (Ἀρνεί): The N T equivalent of the O T Ram in the genealogy of Jesus (Lk 3 33, Aram AV). E. E. N.

ARNON, ār'non (אַרְנֹן, 'arnōn): A river of Moab, formed by the union of many smaller streams spoken of as the "valleys" of the Arnon (Nu 21 14). It flows through a deep trench into the Dead Sea and is one of the three principal watercourses E. of the Jordan. It is first mentioned in Nu 21 13 as forming the boundary between the Moabites, and the Amorites who had robbed them of their territory N. of the river. It was considered, theoretically, as marking the boundary between Moab and the E.

Jordan possessions of Israel, but the Moabites were actually in possession of a large district N. of the Arnon. See MOAB and MESHA, STONE OF.
E. E. N.

AROD, ār'ŏd (אָרוֹד, 'ărōdh): The ancestral head of one of the Arodites, a clan of Gad (Gn 46 16; Nu 26 17). E. E. N.

AROER, a-rō'ẹr (עֲרוֹעֵר, 'ărō'ēr): The name of three cities: 1. On the N. bank of the Arnon, the modern 'Arâ'ir, built by the children of Gad (Nu 32 34), and subsequently assigned to the tribe of Reuben, marking the S. boundary of Israelitic territory E. of the Jordan (Dt 2 36, 3 12; II K 10 33) (Map II, J 3). 2. A city of Judah (I S 30 28), probably the same as the modern 'Arâ'ra, about 12 m. SE. of Beersheba, Map II, D 5. Possibly the Adadah (q.v.) of Jos 15 22 is a corruption of Aroer. 3. E. of Rabbah in Ammon, belonging to Gad (Jos 13 25; Jg 11 33). The allusion to "the cities of Aroer" in Is 17 2 is both difficult and doubtful. The LXX. reads "abandoned forever." A reference to one of these cities is found in the gentilic name Aroerite (I Ch 11 44). G. L. R.

ARPACHSHAD, ār-pac'shad, ARPHAXAD, ār-fax'ad. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

ARPAD, ār'pad, ARPHAD, ār'fad (אַרְפָּד, 'arpādh): A city mentioned in the OT always with some reference to its overthrow by Assyria (II K 18 34, 19 13 = Is 36 19, 37 13; Is 10 9; Jer 49 23). It lay about 13 m. N. of Aleppo and was once the capital of a prosperous Aramean kingdom; several times conquered by the Assyrians and finally made into an Assyrian province by Tiglath-pileser III in 740 B.C.

ART: In contrast with what was true of the great nations on either side of them, the people of Palestine seem to have had but very meager interest in the arts of design. In their pottery, their textile fabrics, and in some architectural fittings there are traces of attention to form, color, and decorative treatment. But the rigorous religious ban upon the making of 'graven images' (Ex 20 4) was in later times so interpreted as effectually to repress both sculpture and painting as fine arts. The only striking exception was the cherubim, said to have been used in the Tabernacle and the Temple (Ex 26 1; I K 6 23-35, etc.). Though the representation of plant-forms was unrestricted, yet little of it is recorded, and this is altogether confined to architectural ornament. (On the art of building, see ARCHITECTURE and the references there; for the particulars regarding the building of dwellings, see HOUSE; concerning the literary fine arts, see MUSIC and POETRY.) W S. P.

ARTAXERXES, ār"tax-ẹrc'sîz (אַרְתַּחְשַׁשְׂתְּא, 'artaḥshaṣt'): A name (Old Persian, Artakhshatra, 'great kingdom') borne by three kings of Persia. The one referred to in the Bible is A. Longimanus (465–425 B.C.), third son of Xerxes (Ahasuerus). It was he who granted the request of his cup-bearer Nehemiah to visit Jerusalem and rebuild its walls, appointing him at the same time governor of the district (Neh 2 1 ff., 5 14). He also (probably later) patronized the migration of Ezra and his companions to Jerusalem, and provided supplies for them from the Syrian satrapy (Ezr 7). The mention of his name in Ezr 4 7 is, along with the whole section vs. 6-23, at best a gross anachronism, to be referred to the time of the rebuilding of the walls, and in 6 14 it is simply interpolated. J. F. McC.

ARTEMAS, ār'tẹ-mas (Ἀρτεμᾶς): A companion of Paul (Tit 3 12) of whom nothing else is certainly known. E. E. N.

ARTILLERY: In AV of I S 20 40 this term means simply weapons, as in RV. E. E. N.

Artisan industry in Biblical Palestine was mainly concerned with the construction and furnishing of the house and with the manufacture and care of personal apparel and articles of adornment. Neither the OT, however, nor the NT employs a common term to designate all its different forms. The nearest approach to a group designation of the artisan industries is that in the word "trade," τέχνη (Ac 19 25, craft AV; also "art," Ac 17 29; craftsman, τεχνίτης, Ac 19 24, 38, ḥārāsh, Dt 27 15; rendered smith in Is 13 19). The Hebrew term, however, includes only those arts which are concerned with the carving of wood and metal: (1) ḥārāsh 'ēts, "carpenter"; (2) ḥārāsh neḥōsheth, "coppersmith"; (3) ḥārāsh barzel, "blacksmith"; (4) ḥārāsh 'ebhen, "stone-mason."

1. In General.

I. CONSTRUCTION AND EQUIPMENT OF HOUSES: The antiquity of the tent as a shelter from unpropitious weather is beyond dispute. An ancient tradition traces it back to the very origin of the human race (Gn 4 20). It survived to the latest Biblical generation. Paul, Aquila, and Priscilla were tent-makers (Ac 18 3). Just how the art of tent-making was practised is learned from data outside the Bible. In the most ancient times the materials used were the skins of animals (Ex 35 23). Later tents were constructed out of a special kind of cloth woven from goat's or camel's hair. The colors brown and black seem to have been preferred for this purpose

2. Tent-making.

(Song 1 5). The tents made in apostolic times were of Cilician cloth and used in the Roman army. The cloth was woven to the required width, stitched together and provided with cords and loops and spread over poles about 6 ft. in height and securely fastened to the ground by tent-pins. (See HOUSES, I, §§ 1 and 2.)

3. Masonwork. The work of the mason (oftener in EV "builder," bānāh, I K 5 18; Ex 3 10; Neh 4 5) in Palestine was diverse according to the material he had to use. For very ordinary purposes (houses for the poor) sun-burnt brick similar to that used in Egypt was considered satisfactory. The frailty of such structures, however, and their liability to the vicissitudes of weather and to attack on the part of robbers (Mt 6 19, 7 24 f.), rendered them less desirable for those who could afford better ones (Job 4 19). Public buildings, such as the Temple, the royal palace, and many private houses were constructed of stone. It is to those who prepared the stone for such structures that the name mason is more specifically given (ḥārāsh 'ebhen, 'cutter of stone,' II S 5 11; called "engraver in stone," Ex 28 11; hārāsh qīr, I Ch 14 1; gādhār, 'maker of a wall,' II K 12 12, and ḥōtsēbh, I Ch 22 2; or 'hewer,' I K 5 15). Engraving, Ex 28 11, 21, etc., is literally the 'opening' of the stone.

4. Mason's Tools; Mortar. Of the implements used in masonwork occasional mention is made of the hammer (maqqebheth, I K 6 7), which, however, may be also the tool used in the quarry in cutting the stone from its native rock (paṭṭīsh, Is 41 7; Jer 23 29). The plumb-line ('ănākh, Am 7 7 f.) and plummet (mishqōleth, II K 21 13; 'ebhen ha-bedhīl, Zec 4 10) were evidently employed in securing straight vertical lines, and the "measuring-line [rod]" (middāh, Jer 31 39; Ezk 40 5; Zec 2 1) for the laying out of ground-plans. The stones built into walls were held together by mortar (morter AV, ḥōmer = bitumen, in Gn 11 3). But by mortar is meant probably also something more than the equivalent to modern cement, namely, the plaster used to smooth the interior of the walls of houses (Nah 3 14; Lv 14 42 f.). For this purpose clay or lime and sand mixed with straw is known to serve at the present day in the construction of Oriental houses. (On §§ 2–4, see also HOUSE.)

5. Carpenter. Closely associated with the mason in the building of houses was the carpenter (ḥārāsh 'ēts, II S 5 11; II K 22 6, τέκτων, Mt 13 55). Carpenters assisted in building and repairing the Temple, I K 6 ff.; II K 12 11, 22 6. But the carpenter's art was oftener devoted to the manufacture of the furniture of the house and of wooden agricultural implements. The range of his productions was therefore very wide, including articles of the crudest form, benches, tables, plows, and yokes (cf. Justin Martyr, Dial. c. Trypho. 88) as well as the nicest finished carvings, inlaid work, and veneering (miqla'ath, I K 6 18; piṭṭuḥē, I K 6 29). In the latter type of carpentry, the finer woods often formed the materials (cedar, fir, and olive), and opened the way for the development of taste and the beginnings of the fine arts.

Besides the ax and hammer and measuring-line, mentioned as used by the mason, suitable forms of which were also used by the carpenter, the saw, the plane, the pencil, seredh, mg. "red ocher" (RV Oxf. He. Lex. "stylus," Is 44 13), and compasses are distinctly alluded to. In finer carpentry the Israelites were dependent not only in the earlier periods (I K 5 6b), but also as late as the date of Ezra (3 7) on the Phœnicians for the best results. As far as Palestine is concerned no great development took place even to the latest day; and the work done by Joseph, the husband of Mary (Mt 13 55), and by Jesus (Mk 6 3), both called carpenters, was of the general type above described. In any case the occupation did not lead to the expectation of a high degree of culture or intellectual training.

6. The Carpenter's Tools.

Next in importance to wooden furniture in the house were earthen vessels (Lv 6 28, 11 33). These were naturally numerous and of many kinds and imply the existence of a large industry. Potters were numerous enough to organize into gilds (I Ch 4 23). The name given to the potter (yōtsēr, Jer 18 2; I Ch 4 23; κεραμεύς, Mt 27 7) also indicates that his art was looked upon as preeminently calling into activity creative skill. Allusions are abundant to the potter's work in its various phases of progress. He takes the clay furnished in the soil and treads it with his feet (Is 41 25; cf. also Wis 15 7); he kneads it with his hands like dough, puts it upon the wheel (Jer 18 3) and fashions out of it vessels according to his pleasure. Even God's sovereignty is compared with the potter's power to make out of the same clay some vessels unto honor and some unto dishonor (Jer 18 6; Ro 9 21). When the form of the product is satisfactory to him the potter fixes it permanently by firing the clay. The process of glazing was also evidently familiar (Pr 26 23; Jer 19 2; Sir 38 29 ff.).

7. Potter.

The chief implement of the potter was his wheel, or rather wheels (Jer 18 3, "frames or seats," AVmg.). These were circular slabs of wood so arranged that they could be made to revolve in opposite directions. The potter controlled their motions by his feet, thus leaving his hands free to do the shaping of the clay, while the wheels were changing the face presented to him.

8. The Potter's Wheel.

It is natural to suppose that such a necessary industry as that of the potter should have had a considerable history even in the simple conditions of Palestinian life. This assumption is borne out by the results of excavations on the site of the ancient Lachish (Tell-el-Ḥesy), under the direction of Prof. Flinders Petrie and Dr. F. J. Bliss in 1890–93 (cf. Petrie, Tell-el-Ḥesy, 1901; Bliss, Mounds of Many Cities, 1894). These of late have been enriched by other excavations at Tell-Zakarya, Tell-es-Ṣafi, and Tell-ej-Judeideh, especially under Stewart Macalister, at Gezer (PEFQ, 1899–1906). From the discoveries made in these places and some in Jerusalem (Bliss and Dickie, Excav. in Jerus., 1898), it appears that the history of pottery must be traced back to as early a date as the 18th cent. B.C. Its first stage of development has been called the Earlier Pre-Israelite (Amorite). Bowls and jars, which Petrie thinks show the influence of Libyan art, have been identified with this type. The second is the later Pre-Israelite (Phœnician) and shows traces of Phœnician influence. Its products are dated as between 1400 and 1000 B.C. The third stage, called the Jewish ([better] Israelite), includes specimens of productions of the years 1000 to 300. At the latter date the art fell under the influence of Greek models and was assimilated to the Greco-Roman type. For pottery as emblematic of frailty, cf. Is 29 16, 30 14, 41 25; Jer 19 1 ff. It was into a piece of pottery that Jeremiah (32 14) placed a deed of purchase.

9. Pottery.

THE POTTER AT WORK.

II. METAL WORK: The working of metals is traced back to Tubal Cain (Gn 4 22). Among the Canaanites, it appears to have been common in the period of the Judges ("they had chariots of iron," Jg 1 19). From there the Israelites may have learned the elements of work in metals. The materials most commonly used are gold, silver, copper, and iron (see METALS). Of the method of working the lower metals nothing is learned directly from the text of the O T and little from without. The term forger used in Gn 4 22 ("instructor of every artificer," AV and RVmg., "whetter," AVmg.) is in reality too obscure to serve as a basis for investigation. The manufacture of weapons of war, such as swords and spears made of iron, must have been early resorted to. In the later portion of the period of Judges it was one of the conditions which the victorious Philistines imposed upon Israel, that no blacksmith should be allowed to ply his trade in their territory, "lest the Hebrews make them swords and spears" (I S 13 19).

10. Smiths.

The use of copper was probably developed in the Orient even earlier than that of iron. For practical purposes, however, it was commonly used with some alloy of tin or zinc (brass, bronze, n'ḥōsheth, Job 28 2; Ezk 22 18 ff.). Brass is enumerated with gold and silver as if regarded one of the precious metals (II S 8 10; Ezr 8 27; "copper" AV, "yellow brass" AVmg.); but it is not probable that such enumeration indicates any great scarcity, since copper-mines are known to have existed at Sinai from the 3d dynasty of Egypt downward (Petrie, Researches in Sinai, 1906). Moreover, the list of articles manufactured from this metal is long, including household utensils such as pots and pans and other implements necessary in the construction of furniture (cf. Ex 25 ff.; see TEMPLE, §§ 18, 19); also weapons of war such as shields, greaves, javelins, and helmets (I S 17 5 ff.; II S 22 35). In N T times the mention of Alexander the Coppersmith (II Ti 4 14) indicates the specialization of work in this metal. (See also METALS.)

Gold and silver were imported into Palestine by Solomon from Ophir (I K 9 26-28). But the art of working them was introduced from Phœnicia. The accomplished goldsmith, refiner ('founder,' tsōrēph, Jg 17 4), was one who knew how to separate the pure metal from its alloy (Is 1 25) by melting the ore in the refining pot (Pr 17 3) to purify it of its dross (Pr 25 4, 26 27), and to fashion it into useful and ornamental articles. The various ways of working the precious metal are beating ("turned work" RV, Ex 25 18, 31) with the hammer (hammering), plating, overlaying (Ex 25 11, tsāphāh; cf. also I K 6 20 ff.), soldering, debheq, Is 41 7, "the goldsmith and he that smootheth with the hammer, him that smiteth the anvil, saying of the soldering ["sodering" AV], it is good." Casting, i.e., forming into a given shape by pouring into a mold the heated liquid, is also implied in such expressions as "molten image" (Nu 33 52; Hos 13 2; cf. the distinction between "graven image" and "molten image," Nah 1 14; II Ch 34 3, 4). Finally gold was beaten into very thin plates, which were cut into strips, or threads, and these again used in embroidering garments or woven into cloth (Ex 39 3, 28 6). (See also METALS.)

10 (b). Goldsmith.

III. OTHER INDUSTRIES: Of the industries which center about the manufacture of clothing, the first in point of order is that of spinning. The materials used were goat's hair, wool, and flax; but the process is that familiar elsewhere in the world and the implement the spindle, or distaff (Pr 31 19). Likewise, as among other people, this was work usually done by women at home rather than in public shops by men (Ex 35 25 f.).

11. Spinning.

Cloth for use in making garments was imported from Egypt and Damascus (linen from the former, damask from the latter, Ezk 27 7, 18; II Ch 1 16). Babylon too had a reputation for work of superior quality in this class. But Israel was not destitute of its home productions. The Egyptian monuments present the art of weaving with somewhat crude implements. In Palestine these must have been still more primitive. The shuttle is, however, especially mentioned (Job 7 6). The weaver's beam (I S 17 7; II S 21 19), to which Goliath's spear is compared in size, was the heavy post of the frame to which the warp of the prospective cloth was fitted in. Cloth was woven in lengths suited for one garment, not in large pieces from which parts might be cut off according to need. When it is said that Samuel's mother annually made him a robe it is meant that she wove a single piece as above described (I S 2 19). See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 4.

12. Weaving.

The fuller (kōbhēṣ, II K 18 17; Is 7 3, 36 2, γναφεύς, Mk 9 3) took charge of the cleaning and bleaching of cloth. He washed the material with a preparation of lye, beat or rubbed it and dried it in the sun. For this purpose he must own or have use of an open tract of land ("fuller's field"; cf. Is 7 3). From samples of fulling work found in Egyptian graves it is gathered that the art was highly developed.

13. Fuller's Work.

Of the sewing of garments or the modern tailor's art nothing is said in Scripture. Sewing (tāphar) was probably limited to the repairing (patching) of worn-out or torn apparel (Ec 3 7; Mk 2 21) and the stitching of one piece to another in case more than one was to be used in making a garment (Ezk 13 18; Gn 3 7). Needlework (ma'ăsēh rōqēm, Ex 26 36, 27 16, etc., "work of the embroiderer" RV; riqmāh Jg 5 30; Ps 45 14, "broidered work" RV) is rather the working in for ornamental purposes of figures in colored thread or of silver and gold strands on a background of woven cloth.

14. Needle-Work: Embroidery.

The art of dyeing must have been known in Israel; but the only clear mention of it has reference to the coloring of the skins of animals (Ex 25 5, 26 14). In AV "dyed attire" (Ezk 23 15) is a mistranslation for "flowing turban" (so RV). The "dyed garments" of the conquering hero in Is 63 1 are more literally his clothes steeped red in the blood of the foes he had slain (so RVmg. "crimsoned").

15. Dyeing.

The production of leather from the hides of animals was certainly a common industry in O T times, but the only leather articles explicitly mentioned are girdles (II K 1 8; cf. also Mt 3 4). To these sandals and thongs must be added (Mk 6 9; Ac 12 8). In the N T the employment appears distinctly in the well-known but unique case of "Simon a tanner" (Ac 9 43, 10 6).

16. Tanning.

ARTS, MAGICAL: Ac 19 19, Curious AV See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 9.

ARUBBOTH, a-rūb'bōth (אֲרֻבּוֹת, 'ărubbōth): One of Solomon's provision districts, probably including much of W. Judah (I K 4 10). E. E. N.

ARUMAH, a-rū'mā (אֲרוּמָה, 'ārūmāh): A town near Shechem (Jg 9 41). Map III, F 4. E. E. N.

ARVAD, ār'vad (אַרְוָד, 'arwādh): A Phœnician city on the Med. coast 125 m. N. of Tyre. The inhabitants (Arvadites, Gn 10 18) are described in Ezk 27 8, 11 as skilful seamen as well as good soldiers. The city was in existence as late as the Maccabean age (Aradus, I Mac 15 23). A. C. Z.

ARZA, ār'za (אַרְצָא, 'artsā'): Palace-overseer of Elah, King of Israel (I K 16 9). Possibly an accomplice in the murder of the king which took place in his house. E. E. N.

ASA, ê'sa (אָסָא, 'āṣā'): 1. Third king of Judah (c. 917–876 B.C.), son of Maacah and brother of Abijah. His reforming energy was great, and by bringing sacred articles from other shrines to Jerusalem (I K 15 15) he enhanced the Temple's preeminence. Fearing Baasha's blockade (I K 15 17 f.), he purchased Aramean aid, thereby incurring prophetic censure (II Ch 16 7), and bequeathing to his successors a heritage of war. His defensive works were long remembered (Jer 41 9). The Chronicler alone records the invasion of Zerah (q.v.), the Ethiopian (II Ch 14 9), and perhaps implies a resort to the Black Art in his final illness (II Ch 16 12). 2. A son of Elkanah (see I Ch 9 16). A. S. C.

ASAHEL, as'a-hel (עֲשָׂהאֵל, 'ăsā'ēl), 'God does': 1. A son of Zeruiah, David's sister (I Ch 2 16). With his brothers Joab and Abishai he was among the earliest and most valiant of David's followers (II S 23 24; I Ch 11 26). A. was especially renowned for his fleetness (II S 2 18). The statement in I Ch 27 7 that he was the "fourth captain for the fourth month" in David's army is a mistake, since A. was slain by Abner before David had organized his larger army. The death of A. at the hands of Abner (II S 2 18-23) was an act of self-defense on Abner's part, but was nevertheless avenged later by Joab (II S 3 27-30). 2. A Levite under Jehoshaphat (II Ch 17 8). 3. A Levite under Hezekiah (II Ch 31 13). 4. Father of Jonathan (Ezr 10 15). E. E. N.

ASAIAH, a-sē'yā (עֲשָׂיָה, 'ăsāyāh): 'J" has made (or done)': 1. A trusted servant of King Josiah (Asahiah AV, II K 22 12, 14 = II Ch 34 20). 2. A Levite (I Ch 6 30, also 15 6 and 11?). 3. The ancestral head of a branch of the Simeonites (I Ch 4 36-43). 4. A Shilonite (I Ch 9 5 = Maaseiah, Neh 11 5?).

ASAPH, ē'saf: A Levite repeatedly named by the later historians (Ezr 2 41, 3 10; Neh 7 44, 11 17, 22, 12 35, 46; I Ch 6 39, 9 15, 15 17, 19, 16 5, 7, 37, 25 1, 2, 6, 9 [26 1?]; II Ch 5 12, 20 14, 29 13, 30, 35 15) as originally one of the leaders of the Temple psalmody and the founder of a family or gild of singers. His name appears in the captions of twelve Psalms (50, 73–83). It is not clear what relation this shadowy personage bears to the other Asaphs named (under Hezekiah, II K 18, 18, 37; Is 36 3, 22, and after the Exile, Neh 2 8). The word (אָסָף, 'āsāph) means "collector" and may be a title. See PSALMS AND MUSIC. W. S. P.

ASAREL, as'a-rel (אֲשַׂרְאֵל, 'ăṣar'ēl, Asareel AV, a-sē'rē-el): An individual or clan (probably Calebite) of Judah (I Ch 4 16). E. E. N.

ASARELAH, as"a-ri'la. See ASHARELAH.

ASCALON. See ASHKELON.

ASCENT: A word applied to a natural ascent as from a valley to a hill or mountain (e.g., Nu 34 4; Jos 10 10; II S 15 30, etc.). In I K 10 5 = II Ch 9 4 we should probably read "the burnt offerings which he offered" (RVmg.). See also JERUSALEM, § 23. E. E. N.

ASCENTS, SONGS OF. See PSALMS, § 4.

ASENATH, as'ē-nath (אָסְנַת, 'āṣnāth): The Egyptian wife of Joseph (Gn 41 45, 50, 46 20); the daughter of the priest of On (Heliopolis). Her name is usually explained as standing for Nes-Neith, i.e., who belongs to Neith, the goddess of Sais. J. F. McC.

ASER, ē'sẹr (Ασήρ): The AV form in the N T for Asher (q.v.) (Lk 2 36; Rev 7 6).

ASH. See PALESTINE, § 21.

ASHAN, ē'shan (עָשָׁן, 'āshān), 'smoke': A Levitical city (still unidentified) in western Judah (Jos 15 42; I Ch 6 59, called Ain in Jos 21 16). Bor-Ashan (Chor-Ashan AV, I S 30 30) probably indicates the same place. E. E. N.

ASHARELAH, ash"a-ri'lā (אֲשַׁרְאֵלָה, 'ăshar'ēlāh, Asarelah AV, as"a-ri'lā): An 'Asaphite' musician (I Ch 25 2). Called Jesharelah in ver. 14. E. E. N.

ASHBEA, ash'bẹ-a (אַשְׁבֵּעַ, 'ashbē'a): The place or family name of a Judahite family, weavers of fine linen (I Ch 4 21). E. E. N.

ASHBEL, ash'bel (אַשְׁבֵּל, 'ashbēl): The ancestral head of the Ashbelites, a clan of Benjamin (Gn 46 21; Nu 26 38; I Ch 8 1). E. E. N.

ASHDOD, ash'dod (אַשְׁדּוֹד, 'ashdōdh): The modern Esdud, located 3 m. from the sea almost midway between Joppa and Gaza (Map I, B 8). It was one of the five famous cities of the Philistines, and the residence of Anakim (Jos 11 22). The city was assigned to Judah (Jos 15 46 f.), but was probably not occupied until King Uzziah broke down its walls (II Ch 26 6). Thither the captured Ark of God was carried by the Philistines and placed in the temple of Dagon (I S 5 1). About 760 B.C. the prophet Amos denounced its inhabitants (1 8), and in 711 B.C. the Assyrian tartan, or general, of Sargon fought successfully against it (Is 20 1). According to Herodotus (ii. 157), Psammetichus, King of Egypt, besieged it for 29 years (c. 630 B.C.), only a remnant surviving (Jer 25 20). When Nehemiah, in 445 B.C., attempted to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, the Ashdodites were among those who opposed him (Neh 4 7 f.). Both Judas Maccabæus (c. 165 B.C.) and his brother Jonathan (c. 148) sacked the city (I Mac 5 68, 10 84). It is mentioned once in the N T by its Greek name Azotus in connection with Philip (Ac 8 40). G. L. R.

ASHDOTH-PISGAH, ash"doth-piz'gā. See PISGAH.

ASHER (אָשֵׁר, 'āshēr), popularly taken to mean 'happy,' though possibly an old deity name: A son of Zilpah, Leah's handmaid, and one of the tribal ancestors of Israel (Gn 30 12 f.). See TRIBES, § 4.

ASHERAH, a-shi'rā. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 11.

ASHES. See MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 2.

ASHHUR, ash'ūr (אַשְׁחוּר, 'ashḥūr, Ashur AV): A Calebite (clan?), "father" of Tekoa (I Ch 2 24, 4 5). E. E. N.

ASHIMA, a-shai'ma. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 12.

ASHKELON, ash'kẹ-lon (אַשְׁקְלוֹן, 'ashqᵉlōn): The modern 'Askelan, 12 m. N. of Gaza on the seacoast (Jer 47 7), was one of the five principal cities of the Philistines (Map I, B 9). The city was built on a rocky amphitheater overlooking the sea. Extensive ruins of the town remain. It was the seat of the worship of the fish goddess Derceto, with temple and lake E. of the city. Judah is said to have captured it (Jg 1 18; cf., however, the LXX reading; also Jos 13 3), but the Philistines still occupied it in the days of Samson (Jg 14 19), of Samuel (I S 6 17), and of David (II S 1 20). Three prophets predicted its overthrow (Jer 47 5; Zeph 2 4; Zec 9 5). It was captured twice by Jonathan the Maccabee (I Mac 10 86, 11 60), by the Crusaders, and by Saladin. Herod the Great was born there, and built it up (Jos. Wars, I, 21 11). Its name seems to have been derived from a characteristic product, a kind of onion, which grew there, called shallot, or escallot, whence Ashkelon. Its inhabitants were called Ashkelonites (Jos 13 3, Eshkalonites AV). G. L. R.

Capture of the Castle of Ashkelon by Rameses II.

ASHKENAZ, ash'kę-naz. See Ethnography and Ethnology, § 11.

ASHNAH, ash'nā (אַשְׁנָה, 'ashnāh): The name of two cities in Judah (Jos 15 33, 43), not yet identified. E. E. N.

ASHPENAZ, ash'pę-naz (אַשְׁפְּנַז, 'ashpᵉnaz): Chief of the eunuchs of Nebuchadrezzar (Dan 1 3). E. E. N.

ASHRIEL, ash'ri-el. See Asriel.

ASHTAROTH, ash'ta-roth (עַשְׁתָּרוֹת, 'ashtārōth): The plural form of the name of the goddess Ashtoreth. This is found as the name of a city (Jos 9 10, 12 4, 13 12, 31; I Ch 6 71) taken by Israel, before the passage of the Jordan, from Og, King of Bashan. It is possible, but not probable, that the same city is meant by Ashteroth-Karnaim (Gn 14 5), an abode of the Rephaim at the time of the invasion of Palestine by Chedorlaomer of Elam and his vassals. Eusebius and Jerome speak of two places bearing the latter name, five Roman miles apart, in the Decapolis. One of these may be the modern Tell Ashtarah, 21 m. E. of the Lake of Galilee (see Map I, H 4). There is also a Tell Ashari, 5 m. to the N. of the former. Other sites have also been suggested for one or the other. It is not known what sense was borne by Karnaim as an epithet of Ashtaroth (of which Ashteroth is merely the construct form), nor is it clear what was the force here of the plural form of the name of the goddess. Similar place-names have been found in Egyptian lists relating to Palestine and in the Amarna tablets. Be-eshterah, probably for Beth-eshterah, is mentioned in Jos 21 27 as a Levitical city, and apparently as equivalent to Ashtaroth of I Ch 6 71. The coincidence of the form with Tell Ashtarah (see above) is worthy of attention.

J. F. McC.

ASHTERATHITE, ash'tẹ-rath-ait (עַשְׁתְּרָתִי, 'ashtᵉrāthī), 'man of Ashteroth': The gentilic of Ashtoreth, the home of Uzzia, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 44). E. E. N.

ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM, ash'tẹ-rŏth-kār-nê'-im. See ASHTAROTH.

ASHTORETH, ash'tō-reth. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 14.

ASHUR, ash'ūr. See ASHHUR.

ASHURITES, ash'ūr-aits (אַשּׁוּרִי, 'ăshūrī): In II S 2 9 the Massoretic text reads "Ashurites" in the enumeration of districts subject to Ishbosheth. This is perhaps a textual error for "Geshurites" (so Vulg. and Syr.), the Aramean people N. of Gilead, or, more probably, for "Asherites" (so the Targum), i.e., the Israelites N. of the plain of Esdraelon. In Ezk 27 6 the AV rendering "company of Ashurites" is wrong. The correct Heb. reading bith'ashshūrīm means "in boxwood" (or some similar wood), as in RV. E. E. N.

ASHVATH, ash'vath (עַשְׁוָת, 'ashwāth): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 33).

1. General Introductory Description.

The meeting-place of the nations, and the scene of great struggles between the East and the West, was inhabited in prehistoric times by the Hittites, whose descendants were later known by the Greeks as "White Syrians." The Hittites have left traces of cities, palaces, rock-sculptures from Pteria to Carchemish. They had a system of writing and worshiped the Asiatic goddess or patroness of sexual instinct. True marriage was unknown, girls gained dowries by prostitution, which was a religious exercise and respectable. Descent was reckoned from the mother. The Hittites built roads, and their road-system was inherited by the Persians (see the 'royal road,' under Lycaonia, § 7, below). The Phrygians and Bithynians began to invade A. M. in the second half of the second millennium B.C. The Phrygians settled first in Troas, then advanced to the Smyrna region, then to the interior, where Midas-town became the capital. Here are found indelible traces of Phrygian art and civilization, in the rock-cut city and tombs of the kings (Midas, Gordius) who greatly impressed the Greeks. The invasions of the Cimmerians (8th and 7th cent.) crushed the Phrygians. The Lydian kingdom, which became independent of Phrygia about 716 B.C., and lasted to about 546 B.C., was in constant intercourse with the Greeks. The Lydians were great traders and amassed fabulous wealth (Lydia, § 9, below). Greek colonies, founded everywhere along the Asiatic seaboard (8th cent)., brought Greek civilization to A. M., which sent back literature (Homer, Epos), art, and philosophy to Greece. The colonies, weakened by luxury and intermarriage with Asiatics, were conquered by Crœsus (568 B.C.), then, along with Lydia, by the Persians (546 B.C.). Unassimilated by the Persians, they remained Greek with Greek governors under Persian satraps. The Ionian Revolt (500 B.C.) proved unsuccessful, but, owing to the intervention of Athens, brought about the Persian wars. Alexander destroyed the Persian Empire (333–331 B.C.), and under his successors A. M. was the scene of struggles for supremacy. The kingdom of Pergamum, founded in 283 B.C., was celebrated for its art and letters, great library, and the invention of parchment. Its ruins are magnificent. Attalus III bequeathed the kingdom to the Romans (133 B.C.). The Gauls under Brennus invaded Greece and A. M. (to Syria), but were defeated by Attalus I (230 B.C.) and settled in Galatia (below, § 6). Seleucid kings founded many cities in A. M. Their power was broken in 191 B.C. when A. M. passed under Roman control (Asia, § 2, below). The Mithridatic wars by Lucullus (74–71 B.C.) and the conquest of the Armenians and Cilician pirates by Pompey (67 B.C.) completed the conquest by Rome. The Roman provinces were: Asia, Cilicia, Lycia-Pamphylia, Bithynia-Pontus, Galatia, and Cappadocia. Christianity spread with amazing rapidity in Central A. M., and fixed the general use of the Greek language.

2. Asia.

The Roman Provincia Asia (Ac 16 6, 19 10, 22, 26; I Co 16 19, etc.), organized after the death of Attalus III of Pergamum in 133 B.C., comprised Mysia, Lydia (probably Caria also), and the islands of the seaboard including Astypalæa and Amorgos. Phrygia Major, temporarily annexed in 116 B.C., was not permanently incorporated until 49 B.C. Sulla reorganized the province in 84 B.C. (the Sullan Era). In imperial times A. belonged to the Senate, which elected as annual governor a consularis with the title of proconsul (residence at first Pergamum, then Ephesus), under whom were three legati and one quæstor. The kingdom of Attalus had included many free cities (exempted from taxation). The Romans reduced the number gradually under varying pretexts, until Ilium alone preserved libertas and immunitas, i.e., the jus Italicum. A. was divided into nine judicial districts (conventus): Laodicea ad Lycum, Synnada, Apamea, Alabanda, Sardis, Smyrna, Ephesus, Adramyttium, and Pergamum, though courts were occasionally held elsewhere. A. was further divided (144 B.C.) into 44 regiones (city districts), responsible for the taxes (a tenth in kind, exclusive of customs duties and taxes on pasture-lands), which were farmed out to Roman knights, until Cæsar introduced a fixed tax, less than a third of the former tax, but producing 16,000 talents annually. Under the emperors each city paid a stipulated tax based on the size and productivity of its district. The procurator Augusti Provinciæ Asiæ was the tax commissioner for the whole province; in each city he was represented by an exactor republicæ, to whom ten citizens were personally responsible for the city's taxes.

The cities of A. retained their native institutions (usually timocratical). But only citizens had a voice in the ἐκκλησίαι and magistrates alone might introduce bills. The annually elected βουλή, or council, survived. The γερουσία, or Senate, had no political significance. The λογισταί (chosen by the emperor) had charge of the city's finances. The governor appointed the policemen, from a list submitted by the βουλή. Tribal unions (κοινά) for the worship of the tribal god flourished everywhere; the κοινὸν Ἀσίας (Commune Asiæ) instituted games and cared especially for the worship of Roma and Augustus; its delegates met yearly, wherever there were provincial temples, to offer prayers for the emperor, the Senate, and the Roman people, and to deliberate on matters affecting the whole province; it might criticize the proconsul and appeal to Rome; its president (called ἀρχιερεὺς Ἀσίας because of the predominating cult character of the κοινὸν Ἀσίας in the imperial state religion) alone originated bills. The games held on these occasions were also called κοινὸν Ἀσίας. These unions ceased to exist when Diocletian (297 A.D.) divided A. into seven provinces. The δῆμοι were individual cities, while an ἔθνος was a union of cities.

A. suffered greatly during the civil wars, especially at the hands of Antony, but recovered rapidly and was immensely wealthy during the first two centuries of our era. Her woolen industries and dyeing establishments (rugs and seamless garments) were famous, as also were her banks (cf. Rev. 1–3).

3. Bithynia.

The boundaries of Bithynia (Ac 16 7; I P 1 1) varied much from time to time, but roughly speaking it was separated from Asia on the S. by the Rhyndacus and Sangarius, from Pontus on the E. by the Parthenius. In general mountainous, it has several broad plains and one large river (Sangarius). It still abounds in forests. In the Argonaut myth B. is inhabited by Bebrycians, who were displaced and absorbed by Thynian and Bithynian Thracians at a time unknown to history. The Thracians crossed the Bosporus gradually and maintained their language and customs in their new home. The name Bithynii, alone used in historical times, is an expansion of Thynii. The Bithynians appear occasionally in early history as an independent, warlike, inhospitable people. In Persian times they were still under native chieftains, whose power grew gradually after the death of Alexander, when Zipoetes defeated Lysimachus (297 B.C.) and Antiochus (280 B.C.). His son, Nicomedes I, hired Gallic mercenaries, subdued all Bithynia, founded Nicomedia (264 B.C.), and extended his kingdom. His son Ziaëlas and his grandson Prusias I continued his policy. Prusias sided with Rome against Antiochus, but Rome failed to confirm him in his possessions. In the consequent war Hannibal led the Bithynian troops, but had to surrender Phrygia Epictetus. Prusias II, a weakling, was humbled by Rome, and conquered by Attalus II, who placed Nicomedes II on the throne. His son, Nicomedes III, was reinstated by the Romans, to whom he bequeathed his kingdom in 74 B.C.

Besides Priapus, the native god of the Bebrycians, the Bithynians worshiped Zeus on mountain-tops under the name of Papas, the Phrygian Attis, Ares, and the Thracian Bendis. B. was organized as a Roman province (65 B.C.) by M. Iuncus, governor of Asia, but after the annihilation of Mithridates by Pompey (66 B.C.) Pontus was annexed to B. (Pontus et Bithynia, 62 B.C.). B. belonged to the Senate, and was governed in imperial times by a proconsul of pretorian rank. Both B. and Pontus retained their κοινά, presided over by the ἀρχιερεὺς Πόντου and the ἀρχιερεὺς Βειθυνίας. The native legislative bodies βουλαί, ἐκκλησίαι, ἄρχοντες, remained in power under the Romans, who, however, gave them a timocratical character (Asia, § 2, above).

4. Cappadocia.

Cappadocia, an Old Persian word katpa-tuka ('land of Tucha'), applied by Persians to the country NE. of the Taurus to the Euxine and from Lake Tatta to the Euphrates. The Assyrians called all C. Tabal. The inhabitants were also called Syrians, or White Syrians, as contradistinguished from the darker-hued natives of Syria (perhaps a folk-etymology). The Cappadocians were Aryans, though probably there were Semitic settlements in C. The country was partially conquered by the Assyrians, probably by Tiglath-pileser I (1115–1100 B.C.), certainly by Shalmaneser II (859–825 B.C.), Sargon (722–705 B.C.), and Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.). The Persians divided C. into two satrapies, which ultimately became kingdoms: Cappadocia ad Taurum and Cappadocia ad Pontum (later simply Pontus). The Antitaurus and the cañon of the Sarus divide C. into two halves: in the western half Mt. Argæus rises to a height of 13,100 ft., in Strabo's time a smoldering, but now extinct, volcano. The whole surrounding country is volcanic. There are deep beds of pumice-stone overlain by lava, worn by erosion into lofty cones (excavated into dwellings; the cañon bluffs are also excavated into thousands of chambers). Many of these cones have Doric façades (temples), while others display Byzantine architecture (churches). The inhabitants are still troglodytes. The whole region has but little water and few trees (though it is the home of the apricot), and was always thinly populated. In earliest times Tyana was the chief city of western C. The plains of Tyana and the Halys region are famous for fat-tailed sheep and for horses (light roadsters, race-horses in Byzantine times). Mazaca, residence of the Cappadocian kings, later named Eusebia, was refounded by Claudius and renamed Cæsarea (still Kaisariye). C. became a Roman frontier province in 17 A.D. and was united with Armenia Minor in 72. Cæsarea was captured by Sapor in 268 A.D. It then contained 400,000 inhabitants, many of whom were massacred. It was always prosperous, because it lay on the ancient and modern trade-routes. It became Christian at an early period (I P 1 1). To the Church C. furnished Gregory of Nazianzus and St. Basil. N. of the Halys lies Pteria, a Hittite capital, on the Persian royal road from Sardis to Susa. Here are great rock sculptures. Pteria was supplanted later by Tavium, a trade-emporium and center of the Roman road-system. The eastern half of C. was known as Melitene, whose earliest capital, also Melitene (Assyrian, Melittu) on the Euphrates, was the center of an Assyrian and Roman road-system. The later capital of the Cappadocian priest-kings was at Comana Aurea, in a narrow gorge. It was the seat of the impure worship of the great Asiatic goddess of fertility, here known as Ma. Six thousand hierodouli served in her temple, practically as religious prostitutes and suffered no disgrace by such service.

5. Cilicia.

By Cilicia was usually meant a country in southeastern Asia Minor, bounded on the E. by the Amanus range, on the N. and the W. by the Taurus range (Lycaonia, Isauria); but in earliest times C. (Assyrian, Khilaku) lay N. of the Taurus range, extending N. to beyond the Halys River (Pteria) and E. to the Euphrates (Melitene). Cilicia proper ('The Plain') was always intensely fertile, populous, and wealthy. It is well watered by the rivers Sarus, Pyramus, and Cydnus. The coast is marshy. The climate is intensely hot in summer, very malarious, and deadly to travelers. The vegetation is rank (cotton, sugar-cane, tobacco, dyestuffs, sesame, wheat, barley), with semitropical trees (myrtle, oleander, fig, palm, orange, lemon, citron). The marshes pasture great herds of cattle and sheep. Western C., because mountainous, was called 'Rugged Cilicia' (Τραχεῖα, Τραχειῶτις). Its chief river is the Calycadnus, where the Emperor Barbarossa was drowned.

C. (Assyrian, Que) was conquered by Assyria in 834 B.C. At that time Tarsus (Assyrian, Tarzi) was its capital. Que was invaded by people from Khilaku, who changed the name of the country from Que to Cilicia, after their own name. C. became an independent kingdom in 607 B.C., under native princes, and was not conquered by the Persians till c. 400 B.C. After experiencing many vicissitudes C. became, with Lycia, a Roman province, 100 B.C. It was reorganized by Pompey, 66 B.C., after his defeat of Mithridates, and the pirates whom he settled at Soli (Pompeiopolis). In 22 B.C. it became an imperial province. Rugged Cilicia was long independent, under native kings, whose residence was at Olba. In 137 A.D., it formed one province, with Lycaonia and Isauria, but was finally constituted a province restricted to its natural limits by Vespasian, with Tarsus as capital. C. is difficult of access by land: on the N. the Cilician gates (a narrow crevasse-like cleft in Taurus 83 m. long) constitute a dangerous, easily defended passage; on the E. are the Syro-Cilician gates and the Amanic gates, less difficult than the Cilician gates. Under Seleucid kings many Greeks settled in Tarsus, which became a center of trade and the seat of a school of philosophy. (See TARSUS.)

6. Galatia.

The Gauls, or Celts, appeared on the Adriatic coast about 300 B.C., and from 280 B.C. distracted the Roman world under Belgius and Brennus. After the repulse of Brennus at Thermopylæ-Delphi, remnants of the mutinous army under Lutarius and Leonnorius crossed the Hellespont (278 B.C.) at the invitation of Nicomedes I (278–250 B.C.; see Bithynia, § 3, above), helped him subdue Bithynia, then settled in Lydia, Mysia, and Phrygia, whence they harassed western Asia Minor as far as Syria, which paid them tribute. They were defeated by Antiochus I (281-261 B.C.) in one great battle (hence his title Soter, 'Savior' [ἐξελάσας]). They were afterward defeated by Attalus I (about 235 B.C.), who confined them to a part of Phrygia (from Pessinus to Tavium), thenceforth known as Galatia (from Γάλλοι, Γαλάται). They were divided into three tribes: Tolistobogii (in the Pessinus region), Tectosages (in the Ancyra region), Trocmi (in the Tavium region); each tribe was subdivided into four tetrarchies; the twelve tetrarchs were controlled by a Council of 300 to judge cases of murder. This pasture-region—famous for its Angora goats and cats—suited the Gallic pastoral nomads, who prospered, and, though defeated, were independent and continued to be troublesome. They became amalgamated with natives, and adopted the Greek language so rapidly—though still speaking Celtic in the time of Jerome—that the Romans called them Gallo-Græci. They fought with Antiochus the Great against Rome and after his defeat (189 B.C.) they were conquered by Manlius, who placed them under the suzerainty of Pergamum (q.v.). In 65 B.C. the tetrarch Deiotarus, Cicero's friend, was aided by Pompey in return for services rendered against Mithridates in suppressing the other eleven tetrarchs; Pompey made Deiotarus king of G. He died about 40 B.C., when Antony made Amyntas, secretary and general of Deiotarus, king of G., Pisidia, and parts of Lycaonia and Pamphylia in 36 B.C. Amyntas annexed Derbe in 35 B.C. At his death (25 B.C.) G. became a Roman province, with Ancyra as the residence of the pretorian legate. This Provincia Galatia comprised G. proper (the kingdom of Amyntas), and included portions of Phrygia, Lycaonia (Iconium, Lystra, Derbe), Isauria, and western Pisidia to the Pamphylian frontier. Further territory was annexed to the Provincia Galatia from time to time: the principality of Deiotarus Philadelphus (western Paphlagonia) in 7 B.C., Sebastopolis in 2 B.C., Comana Pontica (Pontus Galaticus) in 35 A.D. All this was the country known by Paul as Galatia (see GALATIANS, EP. TO THE, § 4). Pontus Polemoniacus was annexed in 63 A.D., Cappadocia and Armenia Minor in 72 A.D. About 72 A.D. the Pisidian part of G. was given by Vespasian to Lycia-Pamphylia, under a pretorian legate, while the governor of G. was a consular legate. Trajan (106) divided it into two provinces: (1) G. proper, Paphlagonia, Lycaonia, and parts of Phrygia, and Pisidia united under a pretorian legate. (2) Cappadocia, Armenia Minor, Pontus (Galaticus, Polemoniacus, Cappadocius) under a consular legate. In 137 A.D. Lycaonia and Isauria were transferred to Provincia Cilicia. Between 386 A.D. and 395 A.D. Theodosius divided G. into Prima (capital, Ancyra) and Secunda, or Salutaris (capital, Pessinus). G. is now famous for its mohair. The inhabitants still bear traces in their blue eyes and red hair of their Celtic descent.

Lycaonia was situated on a high table-land (3,000 ft.) N. of the Taurus range. Its boundaries fluctuated from time to time according to its varying political fortunes, but in general L. was bounded by Cappadocia, Phrygia, Pisidia, Isauria, and Cilicia. The northern part, in which Iconium is

7. Lycaonia. situated, is a vast, treeless, waterless (wells reach water at a depth of 20–30 ft.) plain or steppe (frequent mirages); the rivers that flow into this great land-locked basin disappear gradually and completely; the soil contains much salt and in places is semi-barren, but in general suitable for pasturing vast herds of fat-tailed sheep, of which Amyntas, King of Galatia (36–25 B.C.), had 300 herds. The Lycaonians were wild, warlike border-men, who maintained their independence in Persian times, but were conquered by the Macedonians. Their ethnical affinities are unknown. Luke's mention of the "speech of Lycaonia" (Ac 14 11) means only that they did not speak Greek in his day, and does not prove that the Lycaonians were neither Semitic nor Indo-European, as has been assumed.

L. belonged to the Seleucids till 190 B.C., when it was given to Pergamum. In 39 B.C. Polemon was made king of L. and of a part of Cilicia by Antony, but was transferred to the kingdom of Pontus in 38 B.C. In 35 B.C. Amyntas, King of Galatia (§ 6, above) defeated Antipater Derbetes, robber prince of southern L. (see DERBE), and annexed his principality to Galatia. After the death of Amyntas (25 B.C.), most of L. passed with the kingdom of Galatia into Roman hands, and along with Galatia proper, parts of Phrygia, and western Pisidia to the Pamphylian frontier, formed the Provincia Galatia (see Galatia, § 6, above).

The chief cities of L. were Iconium, Lystra, Derbe, Laodicea Combusta, Laranda, Parlais. The whole region S. of Iconium abounds in Christian inscriptions and ruins of Christian churches. The Hittite road from Pteria, via the Cilician Gates, to Tarsus (the entire Hittite road-system: Sardis-Pteria-Cilician Gates-Susa was known to Herodotus as the "Royal Road") left L. to one side, though much of her exports passed through the Cilician Gates. But other roads led through the Tarsus passes direct from L. to the seaboard at Anemurium, Cclenderis, Seleucia, along which the wheat, wool, and salt, the chief products of L., were transported to the sea. Said Pasha's new road to Seleucia follows the line of one of these roads. Salt is made by crudest processes from the water of Lake Tatta (Tuz Giöl) in sufficient quantities to supply all interior Asia Minor.

Lycia (Ac 27 5) was bounded by Caria, Phrygia, Pisidia, Pamphylia, and the sea. The country is very mountainous, Mts. Cragus and

8. Lycia. Massacytus being over 10,000 ft. high, Mt. Solyma (the 'ladder'), between L. and Pamphylia, 8,000 ft. The views from such alpine highlands are the finest in Asia Minor. The mountain valleys are fertile. There is only one broad valley, that of the Xanthus, distinguished for its fertility and its many cities. The ancient name of L. was Milyas, which persisted only in the northern highlands.

The first inhabitants of L., known as Solymi, who were conquered by the Tramili (Tremilæ, Termilæ), were famed among the Greeks as builders of Cyclopean walls in Greece; they have left proof of their cunning in sculptures and rock-cut tombs which imitate wood construction. The only mention of writing by Homer is in connection with Bellerophon and L. The numerous inscriptions in the Lycian language are written in an alphabet peculiar to L., but based on the Dorie alphabet. Not any of them are very old and they do not settle the nationality of the Lycians, though they prove them to have been Aryans. It is not known why the Greeks called this people Lycians (Leka in the Egyptian inscriptions). In Homer Lycians (Sarpedon, Glaucus) appear as allies of the Trojans. The Lycians defended their freedom successfully against Crœsus, but were conquered by the Persians under Harpagus after a heroic resistance, when the Xanthians cremated themselves and their property rather than surrender. The Lycians joined the Ionian revolt, were conquered, and became a Persian satrapy. They sent 50 ships to Xerxes' fleet, then joined the Athenian maritime league. They readily submitted to Alexander. For a time they belonged nominally to the Seleucids of Syria, but practically from Alexander to 189 B.C. L. was an independent confederation of 23 republics (70 cities), at whose head stood the Lyciarch, assisted by a general assembly, held at Xanthus, in which the six chief cities (Xanthus, Patara, Pinara, Olympus, Myra, Tlos) had two votes each. The internal affairs of each city were managed by a council and general assembly (see § 2, above). In 189 B.C. L. was given to Rhodes by the Romans, though it continued practically free. It is uncertain when L. became a Roman province. It espoused the cause of Cæsar and was conquered by Brutus, when the inhabitants of Xanthus again cremated themselves. L. was given freedom by Antony, but in 43 A.D. it was again a Roman province, under a legate; about 72 A.D. Vespasian added Pamphylia to L., thus instituting the Provincia Lycia-Pamphylia, under a pretorian legate, which also included the western end of Pisidia, that hitherto belonged to Galatia (see § 6, above). In Roman times L. had become thoroughly Hellenized in speech and manners, and her people were very prosperous, as the remains of magnificent theaters and other buildings attest.

Lydia was named from Lydus, son of the sun-god Attys. In Assyrian the Lydians were called Luddi (660 B.C.). The earliest Greek name

9. Lydia. was Mæonia (in Homer, who calls its capital Hyde, afterward Sardis). The Greeks assigned two dynasties to L. in mythical times: Attyadæ and Sandonidæ, or Heraclidæ. The Attyadæ were descendants of Attys. Eusebius says that Sardis was taken by the Cimmerians 1078 B.C., but as the Cimmerians did not appear till about 670 B.C., the Cimmerians of Eusebius were probably Hittites. With the decay of the Hittite Empire the second mythical Lydian dynasty came into power, the Sandonidæ, so called because they were descendants of the god Sandon. The founder was Ninus, evidently a myth, because the Assyrians never crossed the Halys River prior to the times of Asshurbanipal; the same dynasty was called Heraclidæ (from Heracles and Omphale) by the Greeks. It reigned for about 450 years, and was supplanted by the Mermnadæ in the person of Gyges about 690

B.C. Henceforth the name L. was used exclusively, and the term Mæonia was restricted to the "burnt" (volcanic) region of the upper Hermus. During Gyges' reign the Cimmerian invasion took place. Asshurbanipal aided Gyges (660 B.C.) and therefore claimed suzerainty over L. Gyges was slain by the Cimmerians (652 B.C.). Ardys, Gyges' son, was tributary to Assyria. Alyattes (fourth Mermnad, 612–563 B.C.) expelled the Cimmerians, destroyed the Phrygian Empire, and took the Greek cities of the seaboard, allowing them to retain their native institutions, though they paid tribute. He made L. great and wealthy. Alyattes' son Crœsus conquered all Asia Minor W. of the Halys River (except Lycia). He became famous for his wealth (his gifts to Delphi alone aggregated $6,000,000). After ruling 15 years, he was conquered by Cyrus (546 B.C.), who annexed L. to Persia, when Sardis became the western capital of the Persian Empire. The Lydians, who hitherto had been brave and warlike, were made effeminate by the Persians. They were natural merchants, devoted themselves to commerce, and became business mediaries between Asia and Greece. The 'Lydian market' was famous and followed every army. They manufactured costly garments, rugs (Giördiz, Ushak), dyed woolen stuffs (madder, Turkey red), cast bronze, and were the first to coin money by stamping a rude ingot of electrum, which Crœsus replaced by gold and silver. They were musicians, and also kept the first inns. They gradually lost their nationality and adopted the Greek language. They inherited from the Hittites the nature-worship of Cybele (also called Ma and the Ephesian Diana [q.v.]) and the sun-god Attys, the sun-husband of Cybele (Semitic Tammuz = Greek Adonis), who mutilated himself and was therefore served by eunuch priests. His death by a boar meant that summer was slain by the boar-tusk of winter.

Mt. Tmolus (6,000 ft. high) divides L. into two regions. Famous fertile plains are the Cilbian, Caÿstrian, and Hyrcanian. The rivers are the Caÿstrus, Hermus (tributaries Cyllus, Cogamus, Pactolus). The Gygæan lake was noted; on its bank were the earliest settlements of the Lydians, who after their removal to Hyde-Sardis retained it as the great national cemetery, whose pyramidal grave monuments are still extant, among them the tomb of Alyattes (200 ft. high, 381 yards in diameter). After Alexander's death L. passed first to Antigonus (about 320 B.C.). Later, Aehæus was King of Sardis (about 218 B.C.) until defeated by Antiochus (214 B.C.). In 189 B.C. L. was given by the Romans to Eumenes, and at the death of Attalus III of Pergamum (133 B.C.) it passed to Rome and was incorporated into the Provincia Asia. The plains of L. are very fertile. In ancient times they produced wine and saffron. At present tobacco, cotton, famous melons, and Tchaoosh grapes are grown.

The chief cities of L. were Sardis (the capital and the terminus of the Persian 'Royal Road'), Philadelphia, Thyatira, Magnesia ad Sipylum, Hypæpa. L. was Christianized at an early period as a result of the labors of Paul and his companions.

Mysia, a country in the northwestern corner of Asia Minor, whose boundaries fluctuated from time to time, but, loosely speaking, was bounded by Lydia (Mt. Temnus), Phrygia, and Bithynia (Mt. Olympus, 6,000 ft.). It was divided into Troas (probably the first settlement of the Thracian Briges, or Phrygians, on Asiatic soil), Phrygia Parva on the Propontis (so named because subject to Phrygia when the Greeks were founding colonies), Æolis (Greek colonists), Teuthrania (Pergamum region), and M. proper, which in Lydian and Persian times was confined to the interior. The appellation Mysia was not applied to all this territory until Pergamenian and Roman times. The Mysians maintained their tribal independence under the Persian kings, though they were never really an independent nation. Their origin is not positively known, but they are thought to have been akin to the Lydians and Carians. Their language was a combination of Phrygian and Lydian. They appear first as allies of Troy. They were conquered successively by Crœsus, by the Persians (nominally), and by Alexander, after whose death M. passed to the Seleucids till 189 B.C., when it was given by the Romans to Eumenes, King of Pergamum. When in 133 B.C. Attalus III bequeathed his kingdom to Rome M. became a part of the Provincia Asia (§ 2, above).

10. Mysia.

The interior of M. is a table-land, stepped by mountains running E. and W. It was once covered by forests, and had but few cities, but the whole seaboard was dotted with cities colonized by Greeks from Elæa in Æolis to Cyzicus. The most important city of the interior was Pergamum; among those on the coast were Cyzicus (on the Propontis, founded by Miletus), Lampacus, Abydus, Alexandria Troas, Assos, Adramyttium (now 6 m. inland), Myrina, Elæa. The most famous mountains were Ida (5,750 ft.) in Troas, and Olympus (7,600 ft.). The largest rivers were the Rhyndacus and Macestus, but the most famous were the Scamander, Simoeis, Granicus, Caicus. The inhabitants of M. were Phrygians, Trojans, Æolian Greeks, and Mysians proper in the interior: the latter were a pastoral folk, who played but a small rôle in history.

Pamphylia, a name applied originally to the level coastal plain lying between Lycia and Cilicia, S. of the Taurus Mountains (Pisidia). The plain is a chalky soil, being a deposit made by rivers, with carbonate of lime, which here, as in many places in Asia Minor and Greece, is rapidly discharged, forming land. The plain is about 75 m. long by 30 m. wide. At an early period Greek colonies were founded at Olbia (afterward Attalia) and Side, whose sphere of influence was extended inland to Perga, Sillenus, and Aspendus. The Pamphylians were never independent and never made their mark in history; they seem to have been an admixture of aborigines (probably of the same stock as the Cilicians) and Greek colonists; their language and institutions also were partly Greek, partly barbarian. P. shared the varying fortunes of Asia Minor; conquered by Alyattes, King of Lydia (612–563), then successively by Persians, Macedonians, Seleucids. After the defeat of Antiochus III (190 B.C.) P. was presented by the Romans to Attalus II, King of Pergamum, who made Attalia

11. Pamphylia.

(formerly Olbia) the capital of P. It passed, by the will of Attalus III (133 B.C.), to Rome, but it is not known just when P. was united with Cilicia into a Roman province; it is known, however, that Cicero was governor of Cilicia-Pamphylia-Cyprus. For a short time P. was a part of the kingdom of Amyntas of Galatia (36–25 B.C.). It formed a procuratorial province from 25 to 50 A.D. In 74 A.D. Vespasian united Lycia and P. into one province, to which he added the western end of Pisidia, the mountainous country hitherto belonging to Galatia. Both Cilicians and Pamphylians were notorious pirates, whose chief center and slave-market was at Side. These pirates were suppressed by Pompey (67 B.C.) and settled at Soli (Pompeiopolis) in Cilician territory. The chief cities were Olbia (Attalia), Side, Perga, Sillenus, Aspendus (excellent theater). Famous rivers were the Eurymedon (the scene of Cimon's naval battle), the Cestrus (whose ultimate source is the Egherdir lake, whose water flows under the Taurus Mountains, and rises as the Cestrus, a fact discovered by the present writer), Melas, Catarrhactes (or Duden Su, 'sinking river'—it sinks twice, a phenomenon common in Asia Minor and Greece). In winter the Circassians now bring herds of horses from mountains of Paphlagonia to pasture in plains of Pamphylia. In summer the climate is deadly, giving rise to pernicious fever.

12. Phrygia.

The original boundaries of Phrygia were vague, but in prehistoric times it included the whole western interior of Asia Minor, extending through Propontis to the Hellespont (Phrygia Parva). The Greeks considered the Phrygians the primeval people, who spoke the original language of man, while her kings were peers of gods (Tantalus). The Phrygian kingdom supplanted a part of the Hittite Empire (the Hittite road, afterward the 'Royal Road' of the Persians, passed near 'Midas-town'). P. was an independent kingdom for a long time under Midas-Gordius. The Cimmerians, 680–670 B.C. (Midas committed suicide) held P. for about 80 years. They were expelled by Alyattes (590–585 B.C.), who annexed P. to Lydia, when the Halys became the boundary between Lydia and Media (585 B.C.). After the fall of Sardis (546 B.C.) P. was incorporated into the Persian Empire. After its conquest by Alexander it fell to Antigonus. After the battle of Ipsus (301 B.C.), it belonged to the Seleucids of Syria. The quartering of Gauls in P. by Attalus I brought ruin to the country (see § 6, above). The western part of P. was annexed to Pergamum in 189 (Phrygia Epictetus). It passed, by the will of Attalus III (133), to Rome, and was incorporated (120, after the death of Mithridates) into the province of Asia (§ 2, above).

The Phrygians were akin to the Greeks, who thought them akin to the Armenians. They probably came from Europe via the Hellespont to Asia Minor, though some may have come overland via Armenia-Cappadocia. They were most famous in prehistoric times (Homer, Troas, Sipylus, Sinope) and made a tremendous impression on the Greek mind (cf. Midas, Gordius, Marsyas, Olympus, the flute). Their religion, too, had a great influence on the Greeks; their chief deities were Cybele (Matar Kubile [Phrygian designation of Cybele], the 'Asiatic Mother,' associated with the nature-worship of procreative power in animals and plants) and her son-husband the sun-god Sabazius-Attys (i.e., Tammuz, the Greek Adonis). The sun-god slain by a boar represents summer slain by winter. Therefore, his autumnal festivals were sad, accompanied by orgiastic rites and self-mutilations, while in his spring festivals frenzied joy prevailed at the reappearance of the god, expressed by orgiastic dances, bacchanalian wanderings in forest to the music of the flute—which was therefore banished by Plato and Aristotle from their republics. There was no real marriage, only temporary unions. Women gained dowries by prostitution before the deity, without losing caste, therefore descent was reckoned from the mother. These orgiastic, obscene rites were adopted by and maintained a hold on common Greeks and Romans till a late period. Meantime P. was converted to Christianity at an early period (entirely Christian by 300) and abandoned what she had passed on to the Græco-Romans. But their early training in mysticism bore fruits in Montanism, which was strenuously opposed by Abercius, the great Phrygian saint (a real personage).

P. is a high plateau, given chiefly to agriculture (now wheat and opium) and sheep. The Phrygians invented not only the flute but farming implements and wagons. Industries also flourished; especially embroideries, rugs (still made in the Giördiz-Ushak region). A rug-pattern appears on the tomb of Midas. Monuments of Phrygian art are abundant at 'Midas-town,' on the tombs of the kings, on the Acropolis, and at the fortified town hewn in the rock (Pidgmish Kale, 'digged castle'). They used the Greek alphabet, but the inscriptions are not fully deciphered.

13. Pisidia.

Pisidia was a district of southern Asia Minor. Its boundaries fluctuated much at different times, especially in the western end. Loosely speaking, it was bounded by Isauria, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Caria, and Phrygia. The nationality of the Pisidians (first mentioned by Xenophon) is uncertain. Some regard them as Milyans (see Lycia, § 8, above), others as Solymi, but Strabo says that the language of the Pisidians was distinct from that of the Solymi and Lydians. They were brave, wild, lawless, liberty-loving border-men, who made frequent predatory incursions into neighboring territory. Though under the Persians they nominally belonged to the Lydian satrapy, they were never really conquered. They offered a stubborn resistance to Alexander and continued to be governed by native dynasts, even when nominally a part of a Roman province. Indeed, up to 189 B.C. part of the western end of P. formed a separate principality (capital Cibyra). It belonged nominally to the Seleucids till 189 (the eastern end till 102). Under the Pergamenian kings it was united with Pamphylia. In 36 B.C. Antony made Amyntas (former secretary and general of Deiotarus) king of Galatia, western Pisidia, and parts of Lycaonia and Pamphylia. At the death of Amyntas (25 B.C.) his kingdom (including western P.) became a Roman province with Ancyra as the residence of a pretorian legate. In 44 A.D. the western end of P.

was added to Phrygia as part of Asia (§ 2, above), and in 72 A.D. to Lycia-Pamphylia. (See also Galatia, § 6, above.)

In northern P. lies Lake Egherdir (30 m. long, 3,000 ft. above the sea), whose waters sink under the Taurus Mts. and rise beneath Baulo as the Cestrus. Other important rivers rising in P. and flowing through deep narrow valleys are: the Catarrhactes (Duden Su), the Eurymedon, and the Melas. P. is a rugged, impassable, alpine country containing the highest peaks of the Taurus range with thrilling scenery, and a salubrious climate on its elevated table-lands. The memory of Paul's visit (see ANTIOCH, 1) is still preserved in a village named Baulo (corruption of Paulus), on a lofty plateau above the source of the Cestrus. The name was given to the place probably because Paul rested some time in the invigorating climate of Baulo, with its sublime views (to cure malaria, the "thorn in the flesh"? See also PAUL, § 1). P., strangely enough, had many important wealthy cities. The chief ones were: Antioch (q.v.), Sagalassus (on an elevated plateau at the foot of an overhanging mountain), Cremna (on very top of a lofty, inaccessible crag; streets still clear and distinct), Termessus, Selge, and Pednelissus (a fortress on the Lycian frontier).

Educated Pisidians adopted the Greek language, while the peasantry clung to the native tongue and had but a smattering of Greek. P. contains many magnificent ruins and Greek and Latin inscriptions, chiefly of the Roman period.

14. Pontus.

Pontus means 'sea.' It is not an ethnic but a territorial designation, applied after Alexander to the country lying between the River Halys and Colchis, part of which originally belonged to Cappadocia (first known as Cappadocia ad Pontum, i.e., 'toward the sea,' and then simply Pontus for short); while the rest remained independent under native dynasts. From the 4th cent. B.C. P. was nominally Persian, one of whose satraps, Ariobarzanes, assumed the title of king, but the real importance of P. begins with the kings of Persian stock named Mithridates. Mithridates I (337) was expelled from Bithynia and killed by Antigonus (302). Mithridates II (302–266) extended his kingdom from Amastris-Ancyra to the Tibareni. Mithridates III was busied in fighting the invading Gauls (see Galatia and Phrygia, §§ 6 and 12, above). Mithridates IV annexed Sinope. Mithridates V (Euergetes), 156–121, rendered aid to Rome in the third Punic war and received in return a part of Phrygia. Mithridates VI (Eupator), the Great, 121–63, reigned over a kingdom which included most of Asia Minor and extended around the Black Sea to the Cimmarian Bosporus (Tauric Chersonesus). Defeated and driven out of P. by Pompey in 66, he retreated to Tauric Chersonesus, where, besieged by his son Pharnaces, he committed suicide (63 B.C.), which ended the kingdom of P. Nicomedes III of Bithynia bequeathed his kingdom to Rome (74 B.C.), and after the annihilation of Mithridates (66) P. was annexed to Bithynia (62), and the combined province was known as Bithynia et Pontus (a senatorial province in 27 B.C.). The rest of Mithridates' kingdom was given to native dynasts, and Deiotarus (see Galatia, § 6, above) received the western interior between the Iris and Halys rivers (Pontus Galaticus). Pontus Polemoniacus got its name because it was given by Antony (36 B.C.) to Polemon Eusesebes of Laodicea ad Lycum, part of whose kingdom went with his widow Pythodoris (granddaughter of Antony) to Archelaus of Cappadocia (thenceforth known as Pontus Cappodocius). Polemon II inherited the throne of Pontus Polemoniacus, but ceded the kingdom to Nero 63 A.D., when P. became a separate province, but in 111 A.D. Pliny was consular legate with proconsular power in Bithynia et Pontus.

The people of P. were rude, warlike, barbarous, and known in earliest times by Greeks as "White Syrians" (see Cappadocia, § 4, above). In the 7th and 6th cent. Greek colonies were established on the coast, at Sinope, Amisus, Side, Themiscyra, Cerasus ('Cherry'), and Trapezus. The mountainous country is intersected by fertile plains of the Iris, Lycus, and Thermodon rivers, in which were many native cities: Amasia (in the Iris valley) was the birthplace of Strabo, and capital of Mithridates VI and from 7 B.C. the residence of the Roman governor. Comana (in the Iris valley, called Pontica, to distinguish it from Comana Aurea; see Cappadocia, § 4, above) was a seat of the worship of Ma, and the residence of independent priest-kings (cf. the Amazon myth).

ASIARCH, ê'shi-ārc (Ἀσιάρχης): Brandis has proved erroneous the identification (Marquardt, Lightfoot, Ramsay) with the ἀρχιερεὺς Ἀσίας and has shown that the Asiarchs were not officials, but delegates of individual cities to the provincial congress (κοινὸν Ἀσίας, Commune Asiæ; see ASIA MINOR, § 2). Therefore there might be several at the same time in the same city ("chiefs of Asia," Acts 19 31; see Strabo, xiv, 649). The dignity could be held along with a civil or religious office. It was held for one year, not for life. The institution ceased to exist at the end of the 3d cent., along with the κοινὸν Ἀσίας, when Diocletian divided the Provincia Asia into seven provinces. The dignity was much sought for and was perpetuated on coins and inscriptions. Only the wealthy were eligible, for besides other expenses Asiarchs had to institute games and gladiatorial contests. J. ASS: The ass was domesticated very early and is mentioned in the earliest literature of the O T as an animal with which the Hebrews were well acquainted and used extensively. The ox and the ass were the two animals that the ordinary Israelite, as a farmer, would be most likely to have (Ex 20 17, etc.). The horse came into use in Israel at a comparatively late period and then only as an animal for riding or for war, not as a work-animal (cf. the figures for the two animals at the Return, Ezr 2 68 f.). The ass, on the other hand, was used both for riding and for work. The O T distinguishes between (1) the ḥămōr, the male animal, the ordinary beast of burden (cf. Gn 42 26 ff., 49 14, etc.), also used for riding, frequently by women (cf. Ex 4 20; Jos 15 18; I S 25 23). (2) The 'āthōn, the she-ass, a favorite for riding (Nu 22 21 ff.; II K 4 22); white (or nearly so) she-asses were considered especially valuable (Jg 5 10). (3) The 'ayīr or ass's colt, i.e., probably a young in distinction from an old, worn-out animal, finds frequent mention (Jg 10 4; Is 30 6, 24; cf. Mk 11 2 and ‖; Jn 12 15). The possessor of large herds of asses was a rich man (cf. Gn 12 16, 32 15; Job 1 3, etc.).

The wild ass, pere' and 'ārōdh, which goes in herds, but also loves solitude (Hos 8 9), untamable, rejoicing in its freedom (Job 39 5), is at home only in the desert (Job 24 5; Jer 22 4). See also PALESTINE, § 24.
E. E. N.

ASSASSINS ("murderers" AV): The RV so renders σικάριοι, Sicarii (derived from sica, a curved sword, small enough to be carried under the cloak), meaning strictly 'daggermen.' They were a semi-political party and were called "assassins" from their promptly resorting to murder to accomplish their ends. A band of such men led by the "Egyptian" into the desert is referred to in Ac 21 38.

ASSEMBLY: I. In O T: (1) mōēdh, an 'appointed' meeting (Ps 74 4; La 1 15, 2 6). (2) mōshābh, 'seat' (Ps 107 32). (3) miqrā', 'convocation' (Is 1 13, 4 5). (4) ṣōdh, 'circle of intimate friends' (Jer 6 11, 15 17). (5) 'ēdhāh, an 'appointed' gathering (the "congregation" of Israel); in RV only in Pr 5 14. (6) 'ătsereth, a 'compulsory' meeting, generally rendered "solemn assembly" (Lv 23 36, etc.). (7) qāhāl, the 'assembly' of Is. as a theocratic unit, frequently used with 5; nearly always rendered "assembly" in RV (Ex 12 6, 16 3, etc.). A derived word, q'hitlāh, is used in Dt 33 4; Neh 5 7.

II. In N T: (1) ἐκκλησια, the concourse in the theater (Ac 19 32, 41; cf. ver. 39). (2) συναγωγή, 'synagogue,' i.e., church meeting (Ja 2 2). (3) πανήγυρις, a 'whole assembly' (Heb 12 23).

ASSOS, as'os (Ἄσσος, Ac 20 13 f.): A town situated on a lofty hill on the southern coast of the Troad. Its ruins are extensive. The docks at Constantinople were constructed from its ancient buildings. The mole is still extant. Excavations have been conducted here by the American Archeological Institute. It is now called Bekhram, from a Byzantine officer, Machram.

Assyria is the Gr. form of Heb. אַשּׁוּר, Asshur, which designates in O T, for the most part, the Assyrian land and people, and also the extension of the kingdom as embracing the whole Assyrian Empire. In some later writings, the empires succeeding the Assyrian are referred to by the same name, e.g., the later Babylonian (Lam 5 6) and the Persian (Ezr 6 22), the reason being that Assyria was the original comprehensive type, and therefore a natural representative of a great Asiatic empire.

1. The Name.

Asshur was first of all the name of the patron god of a community of Babylonian emigrants, who named after him their first permanent settlement, founded on the right bank of the Tigris, north of its junction with the lower Zab. This city remained for a time the principal seat of the new nation and was always the chief frontier station toward the south, the lower Zab being normally the border of Assyria proper. Gradually the colonists moved northward, and passing the upper Zab they established several fortresses between that river, the Tigris itself, and the Zagros chain of mountains to the north.

2. Earliest History.

The chief of these walled cities were Calah and Nineveh, which formed the center of the kingdom. This historical process is outlined in Gn 10 10, where Nimrod (cf. ver. 9) represents the eponymous founder (Mic 5 6) of Babylonian and Assyrian civilization and history. "Out of that land he went forth into Assyria, and built

3. Nineveh and Its Group of Cities.

Nineveh and Rehoboth-Ir and Calah and Resen between Nineveh and Calah." In this list Rehoboth-Ir is probably a suburb of Nineveh, and the site of Resen is unknown. No mention is made of the city of Asshur in the O T, perhaps because it had ceased to have any importance by the time when the Hebrew traditions took shape.

4. National Character.

The Assyrians, as contrasted with the Babylonians, were a more hardy, warlike, independent people, with less general intellectual talent and enterprise, but with more political genius than the Babylonian or indeed than any other branch of the Semitic race. Their territory, being almost entirely mountainous or rugged, though fertile, was not, upon the whole, as productive as the Babylonian. The struggle for existence was made keener by attacks from robber bands of the northern and eastern mountains. Wars on a larger scale with the Gutē and the Kasshites, or Cosseans, of the S. and E., and with many tribes and nations of the N., such as the Kurds, who still control the same region as of old, trained them for systematic military operations and gave these Romans of the East a discipline unprecedented among Oriental peoples.

5. Purity of Race.

The Assyrians, in contrast with the Babylonians, represented also the idea of Semitic independence and exclusiveness. Their emigration was made either before or at the time of the subjugation of Babylonia by the Elamites. They successfully resisted the attacks of the Cosseans, who later ruled in Babylon for nearly six centuries. Their religion, though essentially Babylonian, was less adulterated with foreign elements. Their ancestors in N. Babylonia were of that genuine Semitic stock which has left no trace of 'Sumerian' influence either politically or in its oldest literary monuments. Finally, the numerous sculptured representations of Assyrian faces bear an unmistakable Semitic stamp.

Head of an Assyrian.

6. Periods of History.

The history of Assyria may be divided into three periods marked respectively: (1) by dependence upon Babylonia, (2) by a long struggle for supremacy, (3) by the attainment and maintenance of preeminent dominion.

7. Dependence on Babylonia.

I. Period of Dependency. The first period may be regarded also as a section of Babylonian history, for not only Assyria but the whole region W. to the Mediterranean was during most of the time under the control of Babylonia. The relations of friendship with the parent country were undisturbed, as far as we know, during the centuries between the founding of the colony, perhaps about 2300 B.C., and the era of the collapse of the old Babylonian world-empire, about 1650 B.C., when Babylonia proper came under the control of the non-Semitic Cosseans. During this period the supreme rulers were not 'kings,' but 'regents of the god Asshur.' Such an appellation implies semi-independence of Babylonia, which was wisely permitted under the régime of Hammurabi and his successors. Complete independence and the assumption of kingship on the part of the rulers probably came at last without any violent break.

8. Rivalry with Babylonia.

II. Struggle for Supremacy. The second period (c. 1650–745 B.C.) shows Assyria as a rival of Babylonia and an increasingly aggressive power generally. The Cossean domination in Babylonia gave the Assyrians the opportunity and justification for proclaiming themselves heirs of the old Babylonian dominion, and the great rulers of Assyria speak of themselves frequently as successors of the famous kings of the oldest dynasties of Babylonia. The inheritance naturally included the right first of all to the Mesopotamian territory through which passed the highways of western traffic. This was secured after several centuries of bitter conflict with the growing Aramean settlements E. of the Euphrates. Assyria on the whole became continually stronger and Babylonia continually weaker. Already in the 12th cent. B.C., under the great Tiglath-pileser I, Assyria had, in addition to Mesopotamia, subdued the most formidable nations or the northern and northwestern highlands as far as Cappadocia, and Assyrian armies had overrun Syria as far as the Phœnician coast-line. But these efforts could not be repeated; and it was not till the 10th cent. that they were systematically resumed. Meanwhile the Aramæans had founded their great settlements W of the Euphrates, and Palestine had come largely under the control of the Hebrews, while both Assyria and Babylonia were enfeebled and inactive.

9. First Contact with Israel.

It was in consequence of another revival of Assyrian power and aggression that Israel first came in contact with the empire of the Tigris in 854 B.C. The situation created in that year was typical. Shalmaneser II (860–824 B.C.), whose annals are engraved on the famous black obelisk in the British Museum, was now king of Assyria. He was repeating and extending the conquests of his father, the warlike and cruel Asshurnasirpal (885–860 B.C.). He was approaching Hamath from the N., and a combination of twelve of the western states was formed against him. The lead was taken by Ben-hadad II, the king of Damascus, by this time the most powerful nation on the Mediterranean coast-land. Damascus was also normally a bitter enemy of northern Israel; but just in that year the peace of Aphek (I K 20 36) had been concluded, and Israel under Ahab is mentioned by Shalmaneser as contributing a strong contingent to the defensive force. Other peoples represented were Ammonites and Arabians from E. of Palestine. The battle which ensued was indecisive, but Shalmaneser was interrupted in his march of conquest.

As a result of subsequent campaigns the Assyrians succeeded in breaking the leadership of Damascus in the W., so that in 842 Jehu, the usurping king of Israel, found it to his interest to send gifts to Shalmaneser and thus become an Assyrian vassal. Assyria, however, was overstraining herself, and Damascus had a reprieve from attack for forty years, during which time the Syrians were able to exert their strength, especially under Hazael, against both Israel and Judah. But the Aramean capital was at last taken in 797, and never again became the seat of a first-class power. The strength of Assyria, however, became exhausted by strenuous attempts at extension in all directions, and for nearly half a century it had enough to do to maintain its hold even upon Mesopotamia.

10. Attempts on the Westland.

III. Assyria Supreme in Southwest Asia. A series of insurrections in several important centers was ended in 745 B.C. by the accession to the throne of the most original and far-seeing of Assyrian rulers, Tiglath-pileser III (q.v.), also known in the Bible by his Babylonian name of Pul (II K 15 19). His policy was to put all troublesome states under direct Assyrian administration, and to hold the tributaries under a rigid system of probation whereby sedition or intrigue with outside peoples was punished with heavy fines and increase of tribute. Such penalties were usually so severe that insurrection was resorted to for relief, and direct annexation was the almost invariable reprisal. Thus the work of empire-building was reduced to a system for the first time in the world's history. His military policy was to keep in check the northern and eastern mountain tribes by occupying their territory, a process which involved terrible and frequent wars; to make Assyrian provinces of the recalcitrant states; to make tributaries of the rest by virtue of his rightful prerogative, since all of them had at one time or another become vassals or wards of Assyria; to bring Babylonia under Assyrian control; and to make Nineveh the capital of the Semitic world.

11. Reorganization of the Empire.

By 738 B.C. all northern and middle Syria had been made an integral part of the Assyrian realm. In that year Menahem of Israel bought off Tiglath-pileser with an immense sum of money (II K 15 17-20). In 734 the Assyrians returned to Palestine, where the new king Pekah had formed an alliance against the invaders and attempted to coerce Ahaz of Judah into joining the combination (Is ch. 7). Ahaz sought Assyrian protection. Tiglath-pileser, within the next two years, dethroned Pekah and put him to death, made a province of Israel N. of the plain of Jezreel, took the city of Damascus, extorted enormous tribute from the Phœnician seaports, and appointed his own creatures to rule over the Philistine cities (II K 15 29 ff.).

12. Achievements of Tiglath-pileser III.

Hoshea, who was placed over the dismembered kingdom of Israel, kept up tribute-paying till the death of the great Assyrian, but he revolted at the instigation of the Egyptian princes of the Delta in 724, the third year of Shalmaneser IV. Samaria was at once invaded and was taken at the close of 722. The principal inhabitants were deported to distant provinces of the empire (II K 17). The fall of Samaria coincided with the death of Shalmaneser and the accession of Sargon, the founder of the last and greatest Assyrian dynasty.

The reign of Sargon (722–705 B.C.) was almost as important as that of Tiglath-pileser, since he consolidated and confirmed the work of the latter. During his reign the empire assumed permanent shape and substantive existence. The west was carefully watched, and the way to Egypt prepared and guarded. A rebellion in Ashdod was put down in 711 (cf. Is 20), and Judah, now a recognized vassal state, was warned against intriguing with Egypt and the Philistines. More important was the work accomplished in Babylonia. There the priesthood of Babylon had been favorable to Assyrian intervention under Tiglath-pileser. But a formidable rival had arisen in the south, by the Gulf, where the Chaldean chiefs were asserting their claims against all intruders (see Babylonia, § 19). The famous Merodach-baladan (q.v.) had, in fact, made himself king of Babylon, and it was not until the twelfth year of Sargon that he was dislodged. Sargon then made himself regent of the country under the gods of Babylon.

13. The Work Done by Sargon.

On the death of Sargon and the accession of his son Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.) a great revolt was set on foot. It was headed by Hezekiah of Judah in the west with the cooperation of the Philistines and the backing of Egypt. In 701 Sennacherib invaded the country. The allies of Hezekiah were defeated, Judah itself ravaged up to the gates of Jerusalem, and many of its inhabitants carried into exile, while the capital was saved only after a terrible plague had decimated the Assyrian army when about to invade Egypt (II K 18 13–19 37).

14. Sennacherib.

Politically this disaster to Assyria was only a minor incident, and Judah remained a vassal of Assyria until the fall of Nineveh. Esarhaddon (681–668), the best of the Assyrian kings, enlarged the empire by the annexation of Egypt. Asshurbanipal (668–626) put down revolt in Egypt, but had to relinquish its sovereignty in or about 645 B.C. A great rebellion in Babylonia, headed by Asshurbanipal's brother as viceroy, was put down with terrible severity, and Elam, which had long opposed the Assyrian advances in Babylonia, was finally conquered.

15. The Acme of Power.

This rounded out the achievements of Assyrian empire-building. But the majestic structure soon began to fall apart through internal strain and the assaults of the Scythians of the north; and at last its cornerstone, the mighty fortress of Nineveh, was stormed by the soldiers of the new and virile empire of the Medes (607 B.C.). Their allies, the Chaldeans, who had already thrown off the Assyrian yoke, succeeded to the headship of the Semitic world and to the providential mission which Assyria had unconsciously fulfilled.

16. Fall of Assyria.

The resurrected monuments of Assyria, abundant and varied as they are, are perhaps of less importance to the student of civilization than the vast and ever-increasing array of Babylonian antiquities. They do, however, supply great defects and gaps in the Babylonian records, partly because the longer-lived nation had little taste for the chronicling of political and military events, and partly because much of the best Assyrian literature consists of transcripts of invaluable Babylonian documents whose originals have not yet been found. On the other hand, the Assyrian inscriptions, and especially the royal annals, are the most valuable material illustrative of the O T which antiquity has yielded up. By means of them we have obtained a reliable framework for Biblical chronology during the most important period of Hebrew history, and the history itself during the same period has been rearranged, readjusted, and made organically intelligible. More important still is the commentary upon O T prophecy which they afford. For example, the records of Assyrian warfare explain and vindicate the most powerful exposure and arraignment of imperialistic aggression ever made, and at the same time help us to understand, better perhaps than any modern instances, the other declaration of prophecy, that vainglorious national ambition and even international strife have a providential mission of chastening and humiliation. Perhaps most important of all is that we are now shown by the Assyrian annals how prophecy itself was conditioned by and shaped in accordance with the successive movements of Assyria upon the western lands, and the complications that resulted therefrom.

17. Importance of Assyrian Monuments.

The Assyrian people in the arts of architecture and sculpture alone excelled the contemporary Babylonians. Of more importance to us is their religion, not only because it affected the worship of Israel (II K 23 11 f.; cf. 16 10 ff.), but also because it stands in such close causal relation with the political and military system of the Assyrians themselves. Just because the empire of the Tigris was a concentrated unit, ever striving to realize itself in action, the cult of Asshur, the patron god of the Assyrians, became more and more emphasized, as contrasted with that of the other gods whom they worshiped in common with the Babylonians, their political and military rivals. It is true that the foundation of their religious system was of Babylonian origin, and certain of the gods, such as the theoretical supreme triad, Anu, Bel, and Ea, Shamash the sun-god, Sin the moon-god, Adad the thunder-god, and Ishtar the deification of the female principle, were retained and honored. But their own deity, Asshur, who was not in the Babylonian pantheon, came to be looked on as the potential possessor of all the moral attributes of the other divinities. Thus there was in Assyria a stronger tendency toward monotheism than in the parent state, even when Marduk (or Merodach), the god of the city of Babylon, became supreme in Babylonia, the chief distinction being that while Marduk was recognized as specially the patron of the capital city, Asshur was always the god of the whole state and indeed of the whole empire. Asshur was also first and foremost a war-god, because war was the most genuine and spontaneous expression of the national religion. Thus it happened that when Assyria passed away as an empire the cult of Asshur was ipso facto extinguished, while Marduk of Babylon survived the political destruction of Semitism under Cyrus and the Persians.

In the current cosmology of Biblical times, the earth is not a part of the starry universe, but a flat surface, on which the heavens rest like an inverted bowl. Astronomy does not therefore include an account of the earth, but only of the heavenly bodies. These were thought to be fixed in the firmament, not absolutely, for they move along certain paths in definite periods (Jos 10 12; Is 38 8), and can be detached thence and fall (Mt 24 29; Rev 9 1). The whole view is not animated by scientific interest and therefore can not be called a theory. It takes cognizance of those facts only which have practical bearings. This is true both of the O T and the N T. Winckler's theory, that the Semitic peoples, including the Hebrews, conceived of the world and human history as constituted upon and ruled by principles resident in the heavenly bodies (see Winckler, Himmels und Weltenbild der Babylonier, 1901; Die Babylonische Weltschöpfung, 1906) finds no support in Biblical data.

1. Scope and Nature.

The sun (shemesh, ἥλιος) is the most splendid of God's works (Ps 19 5-7). Its course is continuous and includes a section under the earth traversed at night (Ec 1 5). It is the source of heat and light for the earth. Its darkening is the sign and expression of great calamities. Hence, "the sun shall be darkened at midday" may describe the occurrence of an eclipse, always an occasion of superstitious dread among unscientific peoples (Is 13 10; Jl 2 10; Am 8 9; Mt 24 29; Mk 13 24; Rev 6 12). The moon (yārēaḥ, poet., *l*ᵉ*bhānāh*, σελήνη) is the substitute of the sun for the night period (Gn 1 16; Ps 121 6, 136 9). Eclipses of the moon may be alluded to in the expression "the moon turned into blood" (Jl 2 31; Rev 6 12).

2. The Sun and Moon.

3. The Stars. Of the stars (kōkhābhīm, ἀστέρες) as objects of interest in themselves, no account is made. In a small number of allusions, however, it is possible to detect current astronomical notions. The whole of the starry firmament as a body is called "the host of heaven" (Gn 2 1), though that phrase does not always convey the same meaning (I K 22 19; II Ch 18 18). Of individual stars, including planets, Venus is mentioned under the name "Day Star" ("Lucifer, son of the morning" AV, Is 14 12). Saturn appears under the name of Chiun (Am 5 26; AV and ERV, but ARV, "the shrine"). But the fact that the star is alluded to as an object of worship renders the reference to Saturn quite probable (cf. also Ac 7 43, "Rephan," probably Saturn).

4. Constellations. The grouping of the stars into constellations appears in general (Is 13 10), and in the mention of individual constellations as follows: (1) Orion (kᵉṣīl, Am 5 8), which, according to the Semitic conception, represents a slow-witted giant chained to the skies; hence the question in Job 38 31, "Canst thou loose the bands of Orion?" suggesting the impotence of man as compared with the omnipotence of God (cf. also Job 9 9). (2) The Great Bear ('āsh, Job 9 9, 38 32, Arcturus AV). In the latter passage the sons of the Bear ("the train" RV) are the three stars in the tail of the constellation. By some, however, this constellation is identified with the Pleiades, which is compared to a hen with her brood. Schiapparelli argues convincingly (Astr. in O T, 1905, p. 54 ff.) for the Hyades. (3) The Pleiades (kīmāh, Job 9 9) is identified by its designation as a compact group. From this view we get the expression in Job 38 31, "Canst thou bind the cluster ('chain' RVmg.) of the Pleiades?" making the parallelism of the clauses perfect. (4) Mazzaroth (Job 38 32). This seems to be not a constellation (Corona Borealis, Hyades) nor the circle of the zodiac (Job 38 32; AVmg. and RVmg.), with its twelve signs, but the planet Venus or the planets collectively (so II K 23 5, but mg. "the twelve signs"). (5) The Chambers of the South (hadhrē thēmān, Job 9 9), probably some constellation of the Southern hemisphere. (6) The Swift Serpent (nāḥāsh bārīaḥ, Job 26 13). There is some uncertainty as to whether this phrase designates a constellation. It is certainly the name of a celestial phenomenon, and, if a constellation, it is probably the Dragon located between the Great and the Little Bear. (7) In Job 37 9, though EVV read "north," and mg. "scattering winds," there is reason to believe that the Hebrew mᵉzārīm designates the two constellations of the northern skies, the Great and the Little Bear (cf. Schiapparelli, p. 67 ff.).

5. Star of Bethlehem. The Star of Bethlehem (Mt 2 2 ff.) has been sometimes interpreted as a conjunction of planets (Kepler; cf. Munter, Stern d. Weisen, 1827), but was more probably either a comet or a meteor.

Metaphorically, a star stands for a guide because stars are so often taken as guides in travel at night, and such expressions as "sun of righteousness" (Mal 4 2), "the bright, morning star" (Rev 22 16) are self-explanatory. The apocalyptic use of astronomical facts includes such instances as the "seven stars" (Rev 1 16 ff.), symbols of the protecting spirit of the Seven Churches; the great star Wormwood (Rev 8 10 f.), symbol of distress, and the moon subjected to the Church (Rev 12 1) with others less clear.

6. Figurative Usage.

That astronomy is in the Bible geocentric has already been intimated. It might better be called theocentric. It views the material heavens as the handiwork of God and the instrument of His pleasure in ministering to men. He created them in the beginning (Gn 1 1, 14 f.) in order to be the means of lighting the earth and marking the beginnings and endings of the seasons. They impress the mind by their multitude (Gn 15 5), their brilliancy, their elevation above the earth (Pr 25 3; Jer 31 37; Job 22 12). Poetically, they are conceived as personal beings, declaring the glory of God (Ps 148 3-5). They sing together for joy and in many other ways praise their Creator (Job 38 7).

7. Religious Interest.

This is in contrast with the ideas of the other peoples of Biblical lands. These in most cases worshiped the heavenly bodies. The contrast is all the more significant because it is certain that the cosmological and astronomical ideas of the Hebrews are vitally connected with those of Babylonia. The faithful Israelite was taught that the heavenly bodies as creatures could receive no homage from men; but lest he should be too dull to perceive that their creaturehood precluded their being worshiped, he was explicitly forbidden to offer it (Dt 4 19). Violations of this law were severely denounced by the prophets and prophetic writers (Jer 19 13; Ezk 8 16; Zec 1 4 f.; cf. also Ac 7 43, quoted from Am 5 26, "star of the god Rephan").

8. Star-Worship.

Astrology is the art of interpreting the motions of the heavenly bodies as portents of future events. It was practised probably among the majority, if not all, of the nations mentioned in the Bible; but like star-worship it found no favorable soil in Israel. Astrologers are spoken of as altogether outside of Israel. In Is 47 13 Babylon is challenged to save herself from the doom merited by her sin and invited to resort "to the astrologers ('dividers of the heavens' RVmg.), the star-gazers, and monthly prognosticators." All these terms appear to be synonymous and, as the words which follow indicate, are different names of men who professed to foretell the future by observing the stars. Jeremiah (10 2) counsels Judah not to be "dismayed at the signs of the heavens." Astrologers are named also in Dn 1 20, 2 2 AV, but RV renders more correctly "enchanters." The Hebrew word for astrologers (ḥōbhrē shāmayīm, 'dividers of the heavens') suggests the method employed, which was the sectioning of the firmament and assigning a particular meaning to each section according to its relation to the object sought to be foreshadowed.

9. Astrology.

ASUPPIM, a-sup'im (אֲסֻפִּים, 'asuppīm): In I Ch 26 15, 17, AV, this word occurs as a proper noun, but it is given more correctly in RV as "storehouse." E. E. N.

ASYNCRITUS, a-sin'cri-tus (Ἀσύνκριτος): A Christian mentioned in Ro 16 14, to whom Paul sends a salutation. J. M. T.

ATAD, ê'tad (הָאָטָד, hā'āṭādh): "The [threshing]-floor of Atad" (Gn 50 11 f.). Apart from the statement that it lay "beyond (i.e., E. of) the Jordan" no information is given of its location. But this is more likely a later addition, since to go from Egypt to Hebron one has no cause to cross the Jordan. E. E. N.

ATARAH, at'a-rā (עֲטָרָה, 'ăṭārāh): One of the wives of Jerahmeel, perhaps a clan-name (I Ch 2 26). E. E. N.

ATAROTH, at'a-roth (עֲטָרוֹת, 'ăṭārōth): 1. A city of Moab, occupied by Gad (Nu 32 3, 34 and Stone of Mesha, line 10). Map II, J 2. 2. A town on the S. border of Ephraim (Jos 16 5, in 16 2 A. Addar). Map III, E 5. 3. A town on the NE. border of Ephraim (Jos 16 7). Site unknown. 4. Atroth-beth-Joab, a locality belonging to the Calebites (I Ch 2 54). 5. Atroth-Shophan, a town of Gad (Nu 32 35). Site unknown. E. E. N.

ATER, ê'ter (אָטֵר, 'āṭēr): 1. The ancestral head of the 'sons' of Ater of Hezekiah, one of the large families of returned exiles (Ezr 2 16; Neh 7 21, 10 17). 2. The ancestor of a family of gate-keepers (Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45). E. E. N.

ATHACH, ê'thac (עֲתָךְ, 'ăthākh): A place in S. Judah not yet identified (I S 30 30). E. E. N.

ATHAIAH, a-thê'yā (עֲתָיָה, 'ăthāyāh): A Judahite, the son of Uzziah (Neh 11 4). E. E. N.

ATHALIAH, ath"a-lai'ā (עֲתַלְיָהוּ, 'athalyāhū), 'J" is great': 1. A daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and wife of Jehoram, King of Judah. She introduced the worship of the Phœnician Baal into Judah. After the death of her son Ahaziah (q.v.) she usurped the throne, securing her position by murdering all the seed-royal except Joash, the infant son of Ahaziah, who was kept hidden in the Temple, under the tutelage of the priests, for six years. Finally Jehoiada, the high priest, taking advantage of the change of the palace guards on a Sabbath, assisted by the guards, proclaimed Joash king and put Athaliah to death (II K 11 1 ff.). 2. A Benjamite who dwelt in Jerusalem (see I Ch 8 26 and cf. ver. 28). 3. The father of Jeshaiah who went up with Ezra from Babylon (Ezr 8 7). J. A. K.

ATHARIM, ath'a-rim (אֲתָרִים, 'āthārīm): The only occurrence of this word (Nu 21 1) seems to imply that it was a place-name. Its use with the article, "the way of [the] Atharim," has led some to think of it as an appellative, e.g., "the way of the spies," AV (which rests on a wrong reading), or the 'caravan way' (Dillmann). Both the meaning of the word and the site remain uncertain. E. E. N.

ATHENS (Ἀθῆναι): The capital of Attica, first called Cecropia from Cecrops (autochthonous founder). Theseus (semimythical) united the outlying demes (Panathenæa). The Acropolis was the seat of worship of Athene and the kings. After Codrus the kings were replaced by archons chosen from the family of Codrus, elected for life (1068–752 B.C.); then the archonship was open to Eupatrids chosen for ten years (752–682 B.C.). Later, there were nine annual archons chosen from the Eupatrids. The chief archon (epōnymos) gave the name to the year; the second (basileus) was chief priest; the third (polemarchos) commanded the forces; the other six were thesmothetæ (legislators). The Areopagus was supreme in religious matters. Draco codified the laws in 621 B.C., and Solon instituted the timocracy in 594; 6,000 judges, chosen by lot, controlled the officials, and a council of 400 aided the archons, whose presidents were called prytanēs. Pisistratus the tyrant (561 B.C.) embellished A., patronized literature and art, built the altar of the Twelve Gods (center of the state), Enneacrounos, began the Olympieum, finished the old Hecatompedon and other buildings. Clisthenes reorganized the tribes in 508 B.C. A. sent twenty ships against Darius in 498 and defeated the Persians at Marathon in 490. Xerxes destroyed A., but was defeated in 480 by Themistocles. As head of the confederacy in 474 under Pericles, A. enjoyed her 'golden age,' when the Parthenon, Propylæa, Erechtheum, and Odeum were built. In spite of the eloquence of Demosthenes, the liberties of Greece were crushed at Cheronæa in 338 B.C. A. was the great home of literature, art, and science and taught the world everything worth knowing except the science of government and religion. Paul's work in A. (Ac 17 16-34) appears not to have been very significant. J. R. S. S.

ATHLAI, ath'la-ai (עַתְלַי, 'athlay): An Israelite who had taken a foreign wife whom Ezra induced him to divorce (Ezr 10 28). E. E. N.

ATONEMENT: This word does not occur in the RV of the N T and in the AV only at Ro 5 11. In the O T it is often used to translate Heb. kāphar (see PROPITIATION). The English word simply means to make two people 'at one' who have been separated. In theological discussion it is applied to the means by which reconciliation between man and God has actually been brought about (see RECONCILIATION). The N T asserts that the person and work of Christ, especially His sacrifice on the Cross (see SACRIFICE), was that means (Mk 10 45, 14 24; Jn 3 14f., 10 15; Ac 3 26, 4 12; Ro 3 21-26, 8 3 f.; He 9 14; I P 3 18; I Jn 4 10). The new fact—this consciousness of reconciliation with the living and holy God—undoubtedly implies the forgiveness of sins. No other religion has ever offered this as something within reach of all men, not even the O T. It is the substance of the Gospel, the essence of Christian experience, the life of the Church. It was, as a mere matter of history, produced by Jesus Christ; it is to-day sustained by faith in His name, and so spreads over the world.

No one doubts that the N T connects this new life with the sacrifice of Christ. The problem before the theologian is a triple one: (1) How does the N T describe this connection between the Cross and the forgiveness of sins? (2) What are the principles by which theology can explain that connection in the light of those descriptions? (3) What authority has this whole view over the modern mind and will?

1. NT Material. The following classification of passages, not exhaustive, indicates the chief methods of describing the relation of Christ's sacrifice to forgiveness. Some passages belong to more than one group.

(a) The general idea that Christ suffered for or in behalf of persons: I Th 5 9f.; Gal 2 20; II Co 5 14f.; Ro 5 6-11; I P 3 18; He 2 9; Jn 3 14-17, 10 15, 12 32 f.; I Jn 3 16. (b) The special idea that His death was related in some way to our sins: Ro 4 25, 5 8; I Co 15 3; Gal 1 4, 3 13; I P 2 24; He 9 28. (c) Sacrificial allusions, in which Christ's death is likened to that of the animals sacrificed under OT laws, and generally connected directly with sins: Mt 26 28; Ro 3 24-26, 5 9, 8 3; II Co 5 21 (cf. Lev 4 21 LXX); Eph 2 13; I P 1 19; He 7 27, 9–10; Jn 1 29; I Jn 1 7, 2 2, 4 10; Rev 1 5 f., 7 14. (d) Terms implying purchase or ransom: Mk 10 45; I Th 1 10; Ro 3 24; I Co 6 20; Eph 1 7; I Ti 2 5, 6; Tit 2 14; He 9 15; Rev 5 9.

2. Theories of Atonement. For many centuries little attention was given by theology to the problems involved here. The crude notion, founded on passages under (d), that a payment was made to the devil for man's release was never seriously worked out and perished as soon as the subject was earnestly considered. In the course of discussion, since Anselm (1033–1109) definitely opened the problem, two main classes of opinion have emerged: (a) Those, called moral or subjective theories, which hold that our dread and selfishness were the only obstacles to reconciliation, and that Christ so manifested the righteousness and love of God that men's hearts are won to faith and obedience. (b) Those, called objective, or vicarious, or expiatory, which maintain that in sin there lay an obstacle to God's offer of mercy, that this obstacle was removed by the sacrificial death of the God-man. Of course within these two main groups there are many varieties of opinions; and of some theories there is dispute as to whether they belong more properly to (a) or to (b). (For one of the best classifications of Atonement Theories see Introduction to Dr. Simon's The Redemption of Man; cf. Stevens, The Christian Doctrine of Salvation, Pt. II.)

Two extremes in each direction may well be condemned at once. On one side the notion that the sufferings freely assumed by Christ and inflicted by God form a quantitative equivalent over against those due from man as penalty for sin, and that men are saved by consenting to that transaction; on the other side the notion that Christ's holy life and martyr death—as of other prophets, but more powerfully and widely—stimulates the acts of repentance and faith. The former is too shallow in its view of the problem of forgiveness for God and the latter too shallow in its view of the problem of repentance for man.

An unhelpful distinction has lately been drawn between ethical and forensic theories. The only complete opposition to 'ethical' is 'mechanical.' Punishment, substitution, vindication of righteousness, etc., are ethical facts even when expressed in terms of forensic procedure. On the other hand 'ethics' is in danger, if it be maintained that God's love does not reckon with law, that God's holy character is not involved in the forgiveness of sin.

All truly Christian theories agree in the following points: (a) God, the eternal Father in His holy love, is the source of salvation, the sender of the Son. (b) Christ in His sinless life, His complete self-sacrifice, has revealed God's holy love. (c) The contemplation of Christ in life and death moves the human heart to repentance and faith. hope and love. But the objective, vicarious theories recognize in the Scripture account elements of vital importance which must be added to these. The unique emphasis on His Cross is due to unique values in His self-sacrifice. Hence the following additional points are to be noted: (d) The sinless Son of God did actually experience the various results of sin in (1) the opposition and hatred of men; (2) His deep sorrow over human wo; (3) His submission to death; (4) the mysterious and awful clouding of the Father's face, both in His various temptations partially (Mt 4 1-11; Jn 12 27 ff.; Mk 14 32-39), and on the Cross (Mk 15 34). (e) This phase of His experience (even His death) was not an incident in His calling as the revealer of God, but the crowning work to which He had been appointed by the Father (Mk 10 45, 14 24, 36; Jn 3 14-16, 10 17, 18, 27, 15 13; Ro 3 25 f., 5 8, 8 3; II Co 5 21; Col 1 12-14, 20; He 5 5, 10; I P 1 17-21; I Jn 4 9, 10) and the ground of reconciliation on which pardon is offered. (f) The necessity for this is found in that the righteousness of God must be vindicated in the very act of offering His mercy. The vindication is no mere formality, nor does it consist in setting so much suffering as equivalent of so much penalty. It consists in fulfilling the righteousness which man had broken, and in doing so at all costs to God Himself in Christ His Son. To be utterly righteous among men and for men Christ must die. In a world of sin nothing short of that would be complete. But to do this was to manifest the supreme holiness of God's will. (g) This necessity existed on man's side also. In every covenant the conscience of each side judges for both sides. Man can not accept sincerely a pardon whose righteousness is not as completely assured as its love. That which breaks the heart of the penitent is not only the sight of God's love, but of that love in all its stern righteousness—a love that sacrifices all not merely for mercy but also for righteousness. The death on the Cross is therefore an act of God in which He dealt with the race as a whole, with the general and eternal principles of a righteous mercy, of a holy love. On that objective basis the message, the call comes to each soul.

On these grounds the various NT forms of describing the work of Christ are interpretable without prevarication, and an objective atonement is as directly applicable and potent to-day as in any past generation.

AUGURY. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3.

AUGUSTAN BAND (σπεῖρα Σεβαστή): Probably the special title of one of the five cohorts of provincial troops stationed in Cæsarea (Ac 27 1; cf. Jos. Ant. XX, 8 7; CIL VI, No. 3,508). The Italian Band (Ac 10 1) consisted of native Italian troops (CIL III, Suppl. No. 13,483a). As the presence of the latter in Syria is not attested before 69 A.D. (Arch. Epig. Mittheilungen XVII, 218), the author of Ac may be guilty of an anachronism in 10 1. J. M. T.

AUGUSTUS, originally Caius Octavius, renamed Caius Julius Cæsar Octavianus when adopted by Cæsar (47 B.C.), born 63 B.C., was the son of Caius Octavius and Attia (niece of Cæsar). He was a student in Apollonia when Cæsar was killed (44). Though Cæsar's heir, his property was refused him by Antony. He defeated Antony (Mutina 43); became consul in 43; and forming a triumvirate (with Antony and Lepidus), defeated Brutus and Cassius at Philippi (42). In the distribution of provinces A. received Italy, and Antony Asia. He defeated Lepidus (36) and Antony at Actium (31). He was now master of the Roman Empire. He organized a standing army of 25 legions (300,000 men). Though opposed to wars of conquest, he conquered Spain (27–19), the Parthians (20), and the Germans (16–9). His stepsons (mother Livia) were Tiberius and Drusus. He adopted Tiberius (4 A.D.) and died in 14 A.D., at the age of 76, having reigned 44 years. A. was cautious, mild, just, and forbearing; founded colonies, built roads, enacted laws in the interest of religion and morality. His autobiography is given on the Monumentum Ancyranum. On the decree (Lk 2 1) see CHRONOLOGY OF N T, § 1. J. R. S. S.

AUL. See AWL.

AVA, ê′va, AVIM, ê′vim, AVITE, ê′vait. See AVVA, etc.

AVEN, ê′ven (אָוֶן, 'āwen), 'trouble,' 'wickedness': 1. An Egyptian city (Ezk 30 17). Since the LXX reads Heliopolis ('city of the Sun,' i.e., On), Ezekiel probably wrote אֹן (On, cf. Gn 41 45, 50), which was changed to Aven perhaps because of the meaning of the word Aven. 2. In Hos 10 8 (cf. ver. 5) "high places of Aven" means probably 'high places of idolatry'—though many take it to refer to Bethel. 3. In Am 1 5 "Valley of Aven" may indicate some place in Syria not yet identified, or the name of a deity. E. E. N.

AVENGER OF BLOOD. See BLOOD, AVENGER OF.

AVITH, ê′vith (עֲוִית, 'ăwīth): An ancient capital of Edom (Gn 36 35; I Ch 1 46). Site unknown. E. E. N.

AVVA, av′va (עַוָּא, עַוָּה, 'awwāh): A city somewhere in the Assyrian Empire whence colonists (Avvites) were imported to Samaria (II K 17 24, 31, called Ivvah [Ivah AV] in II K 18 34, 19 13; Is 37 13). E. E. N.

AVVIM, av′vim, AVVITES, av′vaits (עִוִּים, 'awwīm): 1. An ancient people dispossessed of their territory by the Caphtorim (Dt 2 23). In Jos 13 3 they are counted with the Philistines. 2. The Avvim (i.e., 'the ruins'), a place of Benjamin (Jos 18 23). Site unknown. E. E. N.

AWL (מַרְצֵעַ, martsē'a, from רָצַע, rāts'a, 'to pierce'): A small boring instrument (Ex 21 6; Dt 15 17, aul AV). E. E. N

AX, AXE. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 6.

AZAL, ê′zal. See AZEL II.

AZALIAH, az″a-lai′ā (אֲצַלְיָהוּ, 'ătsalyāhū): The father of Shaphan the scribe of Josiah, King of Judah (II K 22 3; II Ch 34 8). E. E. N.

AZANIAH, az″a-nai′ā (אֲזַנְיָה, 'ăzanyāh): The father of Jeshua (Neh 10 9). E. E. N.

AZAREL, az′a-rel (עֲזַרְאֵל, 'ăzar'ēl, Azareel, Azarael, AV), 'God helps': 1. One of David's followers (I Ch 12 6). 2. A musician (I Ch 25 18, Uzziel in ver. 4). 3. One of the sons of Jeroham, a prince of the Danites under David (I Ch 27 22). 4. One of the "sons of Bani" who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 41). 5. A priest who dwelt in Jerusalem (Neh 11 13, 12 36). E. E. N.

AZARIAH, az″a-rai′ā (עֲזַרְיָהוּ, 'ăzaryāhū), 'J" hath helped': 1. King of Judah. See UZZIAH. 2. A son of the Kohathites, an ancestor of the prophet Samuel (I Ch 6 36). 3. A son of Zadok, priest under Solomon (I K 4 2; cf. I Ch 6 9). 4. Son of Nathan, an officer at Solomon's court (I K 4 5). 5. A prophet, son of Oded, who met Asa returning from the defeat of Zerah, the Ethiopian, and exhorted him to persevere in his religious reforms (II Ch 15 1-8). 6. A son of Jehoshaphat, massacred by his brother Jehoram (II Ch 21 2 ff.). 7. The father of Amariah, high priest under Jehoshaphat (I Ch 6 10; Ezr 7 3). 8. A son of Jehoram (II Ch 22 6). But see AHAZIAH, 2. 9. Two captains who assisted Jehoiada (II Ch 23 1 ff.). 10. A high priest, who withstood Uzziah's attempt to desecrate the altar of incense (II Ch 26 17, 20). 11. An elder of Ephraim, who rebuked Pekah for taking Judæan captives in the Syro-Ephraimitish war (II Ch 28 12 ff.). 12. Two Levites, active under Hezekiah (II Ch 29 12). 13. Chief priest under Hezekiah (II Ch 31 13). 14. A son of Hilkiah, and grandfather of Ezra (I Ch 6 13; Ezr 7 1). 15. A Judæan leader who opposed Jeremiah's counsels (Jer 43 2). 16. Two persons in the genealogy of Judah (I Ch 2 8, 38 f.). 17. A common name among the exiles who returned (Neh 3 23, 7 7, 8 7, 10 2, 12 33). 18. The Hebrew name of Abednego (q.v.) (Dn 1 6). J. A. K.

AZAZ, ê'zaz (עָזָז, 'āzāz): A Reubenite, the son of Shema (or Shemaiah) (I Ch 5 8). E. E. N.

AZAZEL, ą-zê'zel (עֲזָאזֵל, 'ăzā'zēl), Scapegoat AV, 'removal' RVmg. (Lv 16 8, 10, 26): A name used in connection with one of the goats selected for the service of the Day of Atonement (Lv 23 26 ff.). It is not, however, the name of the goat, for that was entitled "unto Azazel" just as the other goat was entitled "unto Jehovah." Azazel must, therefore, be the name either of the act of sending the goat away into the wilderness or, preferably, of the person to whom it was sent, possibly a demon in the wilderness.

Apart from this ceremony, however, it is not easy to trace the existence of belief in such a person among the Israelites, though it was common enough among other peoples (Wellhausen, Reste Arab. Heid., pp. 135–140). In Israel it survived as a shadowy vestige of primitive Semitic demonology and was used to express the thought that sin belongs to a power or principle hostile to J" and its complete purgation must include its being sent back to its source.

A. C. Z.

AZAZIAH, az"ą-zaĭ'ā (עֲזַזְיָהוּ, 'ăzazyāhū), 'J" is strong': 1. A musician (I Ch 15 21). 2. The father of Hoshea, prince of Ephraim, in the reign of David (I Ch 27 20). 3. A Levite overseer of the tithes under Hezekiah (II Ch 31 13). E. E. N.

AZBUK, az'bŭk (עַזְבּוּק, 'azbūq): The father of Nehemiah, ruler of part of Beth-zur, who assisted in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 16). E. E. N.

AZEKAH, ą-zĭ'kā (עֲזֵקָה, 'ăzēqāh): A town in NW. Judah. It is mentioned with Makkedah (Jos 10 10 f.) as a place to which Joshua pursued the Canaanites at the battle of Gibeon. It is also mentioned with Socoh (Jos 15 35; I S 17 1), but these references are not clear enough to identify the site, which remains uncertain. A. was fortified by Rehoboam (II Ch 11 9), besieged by Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 34 7), and reoccupied by the Jews after the Exile (Neh 11 30). E. E. N.

AZEL, ê'zel (אֶצֶל, 'ātsēl): A descendant of Jonathan, son of Saul (I Ch 8 37 f., 9 43 f.). E. E. N.

AZEM, ê'zem. See EZEM.

AZGAD, az'gad (עַזְגָּד, 'azgadh), 'Gad is strong,' or 'fate is strong': The ancestral head of a large family of post-exilic Jews (Ezr 2 12 = Neh 7 17; Ezr 8 12 = Neh 10 15). E. E. N.

AZIEL, ê'zi-el (עֲזִיאֵל, 'ăzī'ēl), 'God is (my) strength': A Levite who played the psaltery and who was chosen by David to play before the ark (I Ch 15 20, Jaaziel in ver. 18). E. E. N.

AZIZA, ą-zaĭ'zą (עֲזִיזָא, 'ăzīzā'), 'strong': One of the "sons of Zattu" who had taken a strange wife (Ezr 10 27). E. E. N.

AZMAVETH, az-mê'veth (עַזְמָוֶת, 'azmāweth), 'death is strong': I. 1. One of David's heroes (II S 23 31; I Ch 11 33). 2. A descendant of Saul (I Ch 8 36, 9 42). 3. Apparently the father of certain followers of David (I Ch 12 3). It is likely, however, that a place-name is here used genealogically. See II, below. 4. One of David's treasurers (I Ch 27 25).

II. The home of a colony of returned exiles (Ezr 2 24; Neh 12 29), called Beth Azmaveth in Neh 7 28. It lay a little N. of Anathoth, Map II, F 1.

E. E. N.

AZMON, az'mŏn (עַצְמוֹן, 'atsmōn): A town on the S. border of Judah (Nu 34 4 f.; Jos 15 4) called Ezem (Azem AV) in Jos 15 29, 19 3; I Ch 4 29. Site unknown. E. E. N.

AZNOTH-TABOR, az"nŏth-tê'bōr (אַזְנוֹת תָּבוֹר, 'aznōth tābhōr), 'ears of Tabor': A place, probably hills, near Mt. Tabor on the border of Naphtali (Jos 19 34). E. E. N.

AZOR, ê'zōr ('Αζώρ): One of Christ's ancestors; son of Eliakim (Mt 1 13). E. E. N.

AZOTUS, ą-zō'tŭs. See ASHDOD.

AZRIEL, az'rĭ-el (עַזְרִיאֵל, 'azrī'ēl), 'God is (my) help': 1. A chieftain of the half tribe of Manasseh E. of Jordan (I Ch 5 24). 2. The official head of the tribe of Naphtali under David (I Ch 27 19). 3. The father of Seraiah (Jer 36 26). E. E. N.

AZRIKAM, az-rai'kam (עַזְרִיקָם, 'azrīqām): 1. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 23). 2. A descendant of Saul (I Ch 8 38, 9 44). 3. A Levite (I Ch 9 14; Neh 11 15). 4. An officer of Ahaz (II Ch 28 7). E. E. N.

AZUBAH, ą-zū'bā (עֲזוּבָה, 'ăzubhāh), 'forsaken': 1. The wife of Caleb (I Ch 2 18 f.). If A. is a place-name, it may indicate that it was once occupied by Calebites and afterward deserted. 2. The mother of King Jehoshaphat (I K 22 42; II Ch 20 31). E. E. N.

AZUR, ê'zūr. See AZZUR.

AZZAH, az'zā. See GAZA.

AZZAN, az'zan (עַזָּן, 'azzan), 'strong': The father of Paltiel, prince of Issachar (Nu 34 26).
E. E. N.

AZZUR, az'zūr (עַזּוּר, 'azzūr, 'helped': 1. The father of Hananiah, the prophet of Gibeon (Jer 28 1, Azur AV). 2. The father of Jaazaniah, a prince of the people (Ezk 11 1, Azur AV, same as 1 [?]). 3. One of the signers of the covenant (Neh 10 17).

BAAL, bê'al or bā'al. I. Significance of the term: The word Ba'al (בַּעַל) occurs many times in the Heb. O T with various meanings. 1. In the sense of 'master' or 'owner,' as in Ex 21 28, 34; Jg 19 22; Is 16 8. 2. In the sense of 'husband,' as in Ex 21 3; II S 11 26; see esp. Hos 2 16. 3. To denote the inhabitants or men of a town, as in Jg 9 2 f. 4. To denote one who is skilled in some practise or intimately connected with some particular thing (cf. RVmg. at Gn 37 19). 5. As the name of the Semitic deity Baal (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 15). 6. In compound personal or place-names. In personal names Baal referred to the deity. Such compounds were very common among the Phœnicians and Canaanites. In Israelitic personal names compounded with Baal the term was used as the equivalent of Jehovah—i.e., Jehovah was called Baal. He was the maker, owner, lord. In later times (after the 8th cent.) such compounds were viewed with disfavor. Place-names compounded with Baal are ancient and in such "Baal" stood for the local deity. II. 1. A Reubenite (I Ch 5 5). 2. A Benjamite (I Ch 8 30=9 36). III. A town in the S. of Judah, called Bealoth (Jos 15 24), also Baalath-beer in the list of the cities of Simeon (Jos 19 8), where it seems to be identified with Ramah of the South. Aside from the fact that it was somewhere on the border of Simeon's territory (I Ch 4 33) its site is altogether unknown.
E. E. N.

BAALAH, bê'a-lā (בַּעֲלָה, ba'ălah): 1. A city on the N. border of Judah (Jos 15 9 f.; I Ch 13 6), also called Baale-judah (II S 6 2), Kiriathbaal (Jos 15 60), and Kiriath-jearim (q.v.). 2. A city in the S. of Judah (Jos 15 29), also called Balah (Jos 19 3) and Bilhah (I Ch 4 29), and counted as belonging to Simeon. Site unknown. 3. A range of hills between Ekron and Jabneel (Jos 15 11). For general location see Map III, C 5.
E. E. N.

BAALAH, bê'a-lā, BAALATH, bê'āl-ath: Variant forms of Baal. See BAAL, III.

BAALATH-BEER, bê'al-ath-bî'ẹr. See BAAL, III.

BAAL-BERITH, -bî'rith (בַּעַל בְּרִית, ba'al bᵉrīth), 'Baal of the covenant': The name of the Canaanite deity of Shechem (Jg 8 33, 9 4), called Elberith in 9 46. What the 'covenant' referred to in the name was is uncertain. There is no evidence that it was a covenant between the original (Canaanite) inhabitants of Shechem and the Israelites. This Baal had a temple at Shechem which, like most pagan temples, served as the treasury of the community.

BAALE-JUDAH, bê'al-î-jū'dā. See BAALAH, I.

BAAL-GAD, -gad (בַּעַל גָּד, ba'al gadh), 'Baal of good fortune': A place in the valley of Lebanon (Jos 11 17, 12 7), "under Mt. Hermon" (13 5). In these passages it marks the N. limit of Israel's conquest of Canaan. Though often identified with Dan (Banias) its site is uncertain.
E. E. N.

BAAL-HAMON, -hê'mon (בַּעַל הָמוֹן, ba'al hāmōn): A place mentioned in Song 8 11. The location is unknown.
E. E. N.

BAAL-HANAN, -hê'nan (בַּעַל חָנָן, ba'al ḥānān), 'Baal was gracious': comp. the Carthaginian name Hannibal. 1. The seventh king of Edom (Gn 36 38 f. = I Ch 1 49 f.). 2. An official under David (I Ch 27 28).
E. E. N.

BAAL-HAZOR, -hê'zōr (בַּעַל חָצוֹר, ba'al ḥātsōr): A town in Ephraim, where Absalom had a sheep-range (II S 13 23). Probably the hilltop Tell 'Aṣur. Map III, F 5.
E. E. N.

BAAL-HERMON, -hẹr'mon (בַּעַל הֶרְמוֹן, ba'al hermōn): A town or place near Mt. Hermon (Jg 3 3; I Ch 5 23). Perhaps the same as Baal-Gad (cf. Jos 13 5).
E. E. N.

BAALI, bê'al-ai: Used as an appellation of J" in Hos 2 16. See BAAL, I, 2.
E. E. N.

BAALIM, bê'al-im. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 15.

BAALIS, bê'al-is (בַּעֲלִיס, ba'ᶜlīṣ): A king of the Ammonites (Jer 40 14).
E. E. N.

BAAL-MEON, -mî'ẹn (בַּעַל מְעוֹן, ba'al mᵉ'ōn), 'The Baal of Meon' ('the dwelling'?): A prominent town of Moab (cf. Ezk 25 9), assigned to Reuben (Nu 32 38; I Ch 5 8; Jos 13 17, where it is called Beth-baal-meon). It is called Beth-meon in Jer 48 23 and Beon in Nu 32 3. In the inscription of Mesha (q.v.) it is called Beth-baal-meon and represented as "built" (cf. Nu 32 38), i.e., 'built up' or 'fortified' by Mesha. Map II, J 1.
E. E. N.

BAAL-PEOR, -pî'ẹr (בַּעַל פְּעוֹר, ba'al pᵉ'ōr), 'The Baal of Peor': The god who was worshiped at the Moabite town, or place, Peor (cf. Nu 23 28). The deity was probably Chemosh, the national deity of the Moabites. During Israel's sojourn in Moabite territory, the Israelites were drawn away by Moabite women to the corrupt worship of the deity (Nu 25 3; Dt 4 3; Ps 106 28; Hos 9 10). See also PEOR.
E. E. N.

BAAL-PERAZIM, -pẹ-rê'zim (בַּעַל-פְּרָצִים, ba'al pᵉrātsīm), 'Baal of [the deeds of] breaking through':

The scene of one of David's victories over the Philistines (II S 5 20; I Ch 14 11). The name is significant of the use by the Israelites of Baal=Jehovah. Is 28 21 refers probably to this event. The site is unknown. E. E. N.

BAAL-SHALISHA, bê″al-shal'i-sha (בַּעַל שָׁלִשָׁה, ba'al shālīshāh): A place in Ephraim (II K 4 42). Map III, E 4. Perhaps identical with Shalisha (q.v.) (I S 9 14). E. E. N.

BAAL-TAMAR, -tê'mar (בַּעַל תָּמָר), 'Baal of the palm': A place near Gibeah (Jg 20 33), not yet identified. E. E. N.

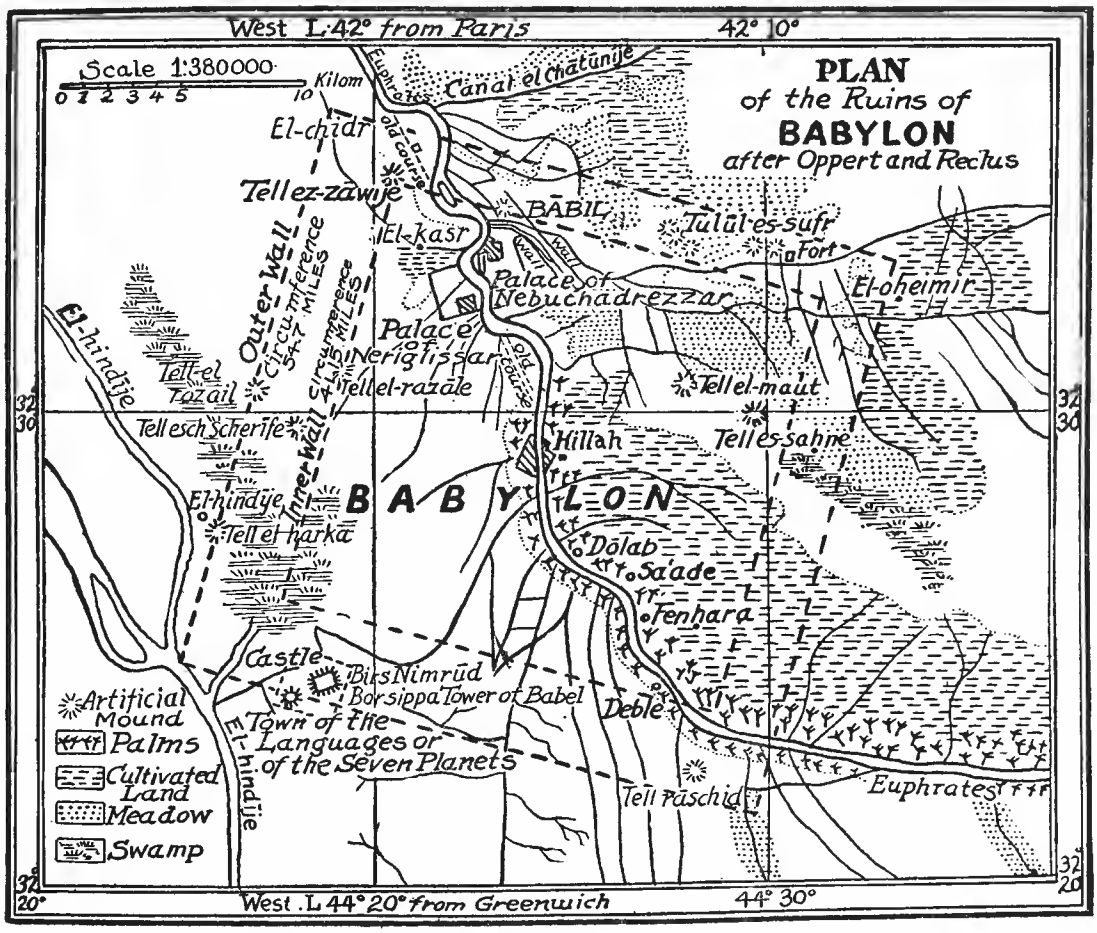
BAAL-ZEBUB, -zî'bub. See Beelzebub.

officers of Ishbosheth, son of Saul, who murdered him and were executed by David's order (II S 4 2 ff.). 3. The ancestral head of a family of returned Exiles (Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7, 10 27). E. E. N.

BAARA, bê'a-ra (בַּעֲרָא, ba'ărā'): One of the wives of Shaharaim, the Benjamite (I Ch 8 8). E. E. N.

BAASEIAH, bê″a-sî'yā (בַּעֲשֵׂיָה, ba'ăsēyāh): A Gershonite Levite, ancestor of Asaph (I Ch 6 40). E. E. N.

BAASHA, bê'a-sha (בַּעְשָׁא, ba'ᶜshā'): The third king of Israel, who gained the throne by assassinating



Plan of the Ruins of Babylon.

BAAL-ZEPHON, -zî'fon (צְפוֹן בַּעַל, ba'al tsᵉphōn), 'the Baal of Zephon': A place near which the Israelites encamped before crossing the Red Sea (Ex 14 2, 9; Nu 33 7). The site is unknown. E. E. N.

BAANA, bê'a-na (בַּעֲנָא, ba'ănā'): 1. The name of two of Solomon's officials (I K 4 12, 16). 2. The father of Zadok, one of those who "builded the wall" of Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time (Neh 3 4). E. E. N.

BAANAH, bê'a-nā (בַּעֲנָה, ba'ănāh): 1. A Netophathite, the father of Heleb (or Heled), one of David's warriors (II S 23 29=I Ch 11 30). 2. One of the two Nadab. His reign of 24 years was spent in continual warfare with Asa, who forced him to give up Ramah by forming an alliance with Ben-hadad (I K 15 16 ff., 16 1 ff.; Jer 41 9). J. A. K.

BABEL, bê'bel (בָּבֶל, bābhel): The Hebrew form of Babylon; used in the EVV only in Gn 10 10, 11 9. See Babylonia, §§ 2, 25. J. F. McC.

BABYLON, bab'i-lun (בָּבֶל, bābhel): The city of Babylon, as it preceded the making of the kingdom of Babylonia (see Babylonia, § 16), so also long survived its extinction. It undoubtedly owed its rise at some unknown early period to the development of trade with the western oases and along the great western canal (Pallakopas) on which lay the sister city Borsippa, 7 m. to the SW.

1. Origin. The native name Babil meant 'gate of God.' The form Babbil (Babel) might also in Babylonian mean 'confusion' (cf. Gn 11 9); but perhaps both of these words are folk-etymologies. The city lay mainly on the left bank of the Euphrates, as is indicated by the three great mounds along with lesser ruins. It was not until the new empire (see BABYLONIA, § 21) that the opposite settlement on the right bank was built up on a large scale.

2. Influence of Religion. As in all other Babylonian cities it was the religious institutions that chiefly promoted the development of Babylon. In the hands of the priesthood were ample lands held in fee simple or by mortgage, and great properties accruing therefrom as well as from separate loans and investments. The priests also were the teachers of youth and the promoters of learning and research, controlling the schools, workshops, and observatories which were connected with the temples. The temple-buildings themselves were as imposing as the royal palaces and more numerous. Chief among these in Babylon was E-sagila ('the lofty house') sacred to Bel-Merodach (see BABYLONIA, § 16, and SEMITIC RELIGION, §§ 16, 25), now lying under the most southerly of the three mounds that occupy the site of the city proper. This, and not the somewhat smaller temple of Nebo in Borsippa, marked by the better-preserved lofty ruin Birs Nimrūd, was the original of the 'Tower of Babel' (cf. Gn 11 1-9).

3. The Babylon of Nebuchadrezzar. Babylon owed most of its prosperity and opulence to its two greatest kings. Hammurabi (c. 2200 B.C.; see BABYLONIA, § 16) made it not only the political and business but also the religious center in place of Nippur, and E-sagila became henceforth the pride and inspiration of true Babylonians. As enlarged and beautified by Nebuchadrezzar (605–561 B.C.; see BABYLONIA, § 21), the city was surrounded by a wall of over 50 m. in circuit, the largest structure of antiquity. This was protected by a broad moat with enclosing walls of its own and pierced by a hundred gates of bronze. A space of 4,000 cubits intervened between it and the ramparts, within which was a moat guarding the inner wall. In the city proper the streets were at right angles to one another, as in our modern towns, and a canal ran through it from N. to S. parallel to the Euphrates. The temple of Merodach, like the other great Babylonian sanctuaries, was of two main parts. There was the temple proper, having a vestibule, a long inner court, and an oracle entered once a year to learn the will of Merodach. Attached to it was a ziggurat or 'high tower,' 600 ft. square at the base, divided into seven stages, for the sun, moon, and five planets.

4. Decline of Babylon. Under Cyrus (538–529 B.C.) Babylon was made one of the Persian capitals. It revolted twice against Darius Hystaspis (521 and 514 B.C.) and each time was besieged, taken, and severely punished. Its religion, however, was encouraged by the Persian rulers. Under the Seleucidæ it was despoiled in favor of Seleucia, which was made their eastern capital. Parthian misgovernment and neglect of agriculture completed its decay, though its worship and even its written language survived till within a generation of the Christian era. In the N T Babylon is referred to directly only in passages reminiscent of the O T (e.g., Ac 7 43). The other uses of the name are metaphorical, one instance (I P 5 13) referring to the city of Rome, and the others (Rev 14 8, etc.) to the Roman world-power as opposed to Christianity. In N T times and later there was no Christian community in Babylon. After the Parthian régime there was a mere village of Babil; and the town of Hillah, 3 m. to the S., has long been the only center of any permanent settlement.

INTRODUCTORY: Babylonia is, upon the whole, the most important to the Biblical student of all countries except Palestine. In it is laid the scene of the creation of mankind, of the earliest history of the race, and of the ancestors of Israel. It was also the land where in exile Israel was purified and reformed. It was the source and nursery of ancient wisdom and knowledge, the pioneer of civilization in Western Asia, the proprietor and educator of Syria and Palestine for thousands of years before Israel became a nation. Its literature profoundly influenced the form and even the contents of the early portions of the Bible, and it is one of the main problems of archeology to discover to what extent the religious institutions of Israel were tinctured with Babylonian elements.

1. Importance of Babylonia.

I. NAME AND FEATURES: The country known as Babylonia was so called by the Greeks and Romans, who named it from its capital city Babylon (q.v.), the Greek and the Latin form of the native Babil. The Hebrew בָּבֶל, Babel, which is an exact equivalent of the latter, is used in the O T for both the city and the country, and therefore the modern versions also use Babylon in both senses. After the city of Babylon had been established and recognized as the capital, the kingship of Babylon implied sovereignty over the whole country as though it were a city-state, so that in an important sense Babylon really stood for Babylonia.

2. Name.

3. Limits of the Country.

Babylonia properly embraced all the alluvial land lying between and beside the lower Euphrates and Tigris. This included the territory varying greatly in breadth, stretching from Hit on the Euphrates southeastward to the Persian Gulf. The length of the country thus defined was considerably less in ancient times than it is at present; for the detritus brought down by the great rivers from the Armenian mountains and mingling with the desert sands has long been gaining upon the sea. In the time of the earliest known Babylonian kingdom the seashore was at least 150 m. farther to the NW. than it is at present, and the Euphrates and Tigris flowed into the gulf by separate mouths.

4. Soil and Products.

The most striking feature of the soil of Babylonia is the absence of metals and stone of any kind. In ancient times the land, except where the sand predominated close to the seashore, was everywhere very fertile. Its present condition of desolation simply implies a lack of proper care, skill, and industry. The inhabitants in the earliest historic ages drew off the superfluous water into canals and reservoirs, and in the months when the soil was driest it was constantly and systematically irrigated. Its productiveness was enormous, especially in wheat, with other cereals, and dates. A very large variety of herbs also was cultivated in gardens.

5. River and Canal System.

The general aspect of the country was determined by this level alluvial soil, intersected by innumerable canals, which in the northern part of the country above Babylon formed a perfect network. South of this system a long waterway, originally a separate branch of the Euphrates, now known as the Shatt-en-Nil, ran a course almost parallel to the main stream. From it were deflected several canals in its downward course. The Tigris from Bagdad southward ran nearly parallel to the Euphrates, till opposite Babylon it began to diverge rapidly and ran an easterly course. At its point of farthest removal, over 100 m. from the Euphrates, it was in its turn relieved of redundant water by a great canal, the Shatt-el-Hai, running nearly due S. across to the lowest stretch of the Euphrates. Lesser watercourses also formed a portion of this third system.

6. Divisions Determined by Waterways.

II. Divisions: These waterways and canals determined the location of the chief settlements which developed into cities or city-states; and the three main systems above indicated gave rise respectively to three well-marked divisions of the whole country into what we may designate North, Central, and South Babylonia.

7. Southern Cities.

Nearly all the many important cities of Babylonia were situated between the Euphrates and Tigris. An exception was Ur in South Babylonia, the city of the moon-god, which lay on the right bank of the Euphrates. E. of Ur and close to the old mouth of the Euphrates was Eridu, the most southerly city of all Babylonia. To the NW. of Ur was Erech, the sacred city of Ishtar. E. of Erech was Larsa (the O T Ellasar), and farther to the NE. Lagash, the modern Tello. Still farther N. were Isin, and Adab, the modern Bismya. There does not seem to have been any general native designation for the territory embraced by these southern cities.

8. Middle Cities.

The middle group of ancient cities begins on the S. with Nippur (the modern Nuffar) in the geographical center of old Babylonia. Of the other cities the most important in later times was Babylon. Borsippa, the seat of the prophet-god Nebo, lay 35 m. NW of Nippur and 7 m. SW. of Babylon, on the right bank of the Euphrates; 15 m. NE. of Babylon, and half-way to the Tigris, was Cutha, the modern Tell-Ibrahim, the seat of Nergal, the god of the dead and the underworld. In that same group lay the important cities of Kish and Isban, whose sites, however, are still uncertain. This group of cities from Nippur to Cutha probably represented the very ancient kingdom of Shumer (Shinar).

9. Northern Cities.

Proceeding northward we come to the series of numerous canals running across to the Tigris. On the northern border of these was Sippar (the modern ruin Abu-Habba), a very ancient seat of the sun-god, as Larsa was in the south. Near it, and probably to the S., was the still more ancient Agade or Akkad which gave its name to North Babylonia. This designation was preserved to the latest Babylonian times, while the combination 'Shumer and Akkad' seems to have originally designated North and Middle Babylonia, and not the whole of Babylonia as is generally assumed.

10. Region of Earliest Civilization.

III. History: The development of early Babylonian civilization was necessarily slow, and a great antiquity is to be assigned to its beginnings. But it is probable that in no region of the world can the conditions of the first steps in human culture be so easily inferred. The starting-point must be assumed to have been not the south but the central region of Babylonia. It was riparian and not maritime soil that furnished the occasions of the decisive beginnings of agriculture, and in the most ancient times the rivers could have played no part in the historical lower Babylonia. In those days also the desert had more numerous and larger oases than those which have been known to later times, and the inhabitants of one or more of these, perhaps not far W. of Babylon, became accustomed to observe that vegetables and cereals grew luxuriantly in small areas in the neighborhood of the overflow of the three-branched Euphrates.

The natural impulse to repeat and multiply the favorable conditions thus noted led by degrees to systematic drainage, irrigation, sowing, and planting. Then fixed settlements were made; private property in land was conceded; fields and gardens were set apart in allotments, making earth-measuring or 'geometry' and mensuration a matter of gradual invention and development. When standards of measurement had been adopted they were transferred to products of the soil and other articles of value, whence arose a system of weights as well as measures. From the beginning religion played a leading part in tribal and family affairs. In Babylonia it was largely astral and solar, and hence measurement of the sky and its divisions went hand in hand with measurement of the earth, while temple-building employed incessantly all the arts of primitive science. Perhaps most of the first working tools were modified weapons; but vessels of various sorts were readily made from the unsurpassed potter's clay that abounded everywhere; while cement was furnished by the bitumen that here and there welled from the soil. The use of the hand in thus modeling objects of utility led to skilled labor and the making of objects of primitive art. With the growth of agriculture and the increase of town life came exchange and trade, and therewith and thereafter the use of marks or rudimentary writing for record and reference. Such were the essential foundations of Babylonian culture, and, it may be added, the principal elements of the derivative science of Babylonia, which found its way to other peoples and regions in very early days along with many mythological and religious conceptions and traditions.

11. Progress of Culture.

To what race the people belonged who chiefly contributed to this momentous development it is very difficult to determine. The written and monumental records for many hundreds of the earliest years point to a mixture of races. The final determining element was Semitic, akin to the Aramean, the Canaanite, and the Arabian. But the cuneiform system of writing, the chief factor in the final stage of cultural evolution, gives much striking evidence in the names and values of its many characters of a non-Semitic origin; and a vast number of inscriptions, especially in the south, which are partly ideographic and partly phonetic, at first sight point the same way. The non-Semitic language, supposed to be thus indicated, and its speakers and writers, have been designated 'Sumerian.' The term is a misnomer (cf. §§ 8, 9); but the theory as a whole is now accepted by most scholars.

12. Earliest Type of Culture.

A fixed point in the chronology is afforded by the date of one of the very ancient dynasties, that of Sargon, of Agade or Akkad (§ 9), about 3800 B.C. The recent researches on the site of Nippur, along with excavations made at Tello, the ancient Lagash in South Babylonia, make it probable that at a date preceding 4500 B.C. Nippur was an important political and religious center. The earliest rulers mentioned were apparently not kings of Nippur, but had made that city their religious capital and En-lil (the Semitic Bēl) the great object of their reverence. For example, the king of the city of Kish (§ 8), when victorious over his foes, made acknowledgment in the temple at Nippur. Kish also allied itself with another city-state, Isban, apparently situated in the same central region. Afterward Isban secured control of the whole of Babylonia, and its successful king, Lugalzaggisi, even dominated all the country W. to the Mediterranean. He in his turn also recorded his thanks and homage in the temple at Nippur.

13. Predominance of Central Babylonia.

The leading place seems to have passed next to South Babylonia. Lagash (§ 7) became supreme over South and Central Babylonia not later than 4000 B.C., and a series of energetic rulers laid there the foundation of a great empire. Before 3800, however, the Semites of the north attained to power, and for a time eclipsed the splendor of the southern rulers. Inscriptions found in various regions show that Semitic communities to the NE. (cf. § 15) were civilized and in close contact with those in Babylonia. Of the latter Akkad came to the front under Sargon I, who brought under his dominion the whole of Babylonia and the western lands as far as the island of Cyprus. His son, Narām-Sin, inherited his power and ambition. The building up of Sippar (§ 9) was one of his projects, and in view of the extent of his dominions he assumed the title of "king of the four quarters of the world." Soon after his death the hegemony returned to Lagash, whose rulers are found not only asserting a wide-spread authority, but promoting architecture, sculpture, and other arts of civilization. Abundant inscriptions attest the energy and resources of this dynasty. But the leadership passed at length from its hands to the ancient city of Ur about 3000 B.C. Its rulers, by adding to their own proper title that of "king of Shumer and Akkad," showed it to be their purpose to unify the whole of Babylonia. This dynasty was followed (c. 2500) by one whose capital was Isin; but Ur not long after regained the supremacy, after which Larsa (§ 7, c. 2400) took the lead.

14. Northern and Southern Dynasties.

The hegemony of Larsa was ere long interrupted by an invasion of the Elamites (c. 2300), which ended in their complete subjugation of Babylonia, Larsa naturally being made their capital. From Gn 14 we learn that these Elamites (under King Chedorlaomer) as rulers of Babylonia continued its rôle of suzerainty over the 'westland.' The expeditions there described had as their object to secure control of the trade route from Damascus to the peninsula of Sinai (cf. vs. 5-7), which in those early days was even more important than it is at present. From the same secondary source we are informed that the sovereignty of Babylon included that of the northeastern country as well ("Goiim," "nations," AV, Gn 14 1 = the Bab. Gutē).

15. Rule of the Elamites.

The Elamitic yoke was thrown off by Hammurabi, King of Babylon, probably the "Amraphel, King of Shinar" (Shumer or Central Babylonia) of Gn 14, who at the same time united all Babylonia under one administration. Babylon, which thenceforth became the undisputed capital of the whole of Babylonia and the leading city of Western Asia, was not by any means a new city at this era, though its earliest history is as yet obscure. The dynasty to which Hammurabi belonged, though known as 'the first,' was not native but Arabian, and he was the fourth of the line. He was the real founder of the Babylonian type of nationality, and one of the world's greatest men. His work was epoch-making in religion, civic administration, provincial organization, legislation, irrigation, and national defense. His paternal care extended to hundreds of cities and towns from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean coastland. Among his chief monuments were his temples and palaces, his great canals, his legislative code, and the city of Babylon itself, of which he was the virtual creator, which he made the successor of Nippur as the center of Semitic religion and culture, and whose patron god Merodach was invested with the prerogatives and attributes of Bēl himself and even with his name (cf. Is 46 1). This first dynasty of Babylon lasted till about 2100 B.C. The second dynasty ran till near 1700 B.C. Little is known of it, but it must have been active all over the western country, for the Amarna letters of the next period show that Babylonian influence had permeated the life and thought of Palestine and Syria for hundreds of years before their date (1450–1400 B.C.).

17. The Cossean Dynasty.

The rulers of this second dynasty, especially toward the close, had to suffer from inroads of Elamites and Cosseans, the latter of whom succeeded in obtaining control of Babylon about 1700 B.C. Their rule was long and on the whole not very prosperous. Their influence was mainly political. They conformed to the religion of Babylonia, and in their measure they were molded by its civilization. They were not devoid of enterprise and daring, but they lacked culture and resources. Their empire was contracted by other causes also. Assyria was becoming continually stronger, and was barring the way to the west. Mesopotamia became a bone of contention between the two nations, and their rivalry resulted in the loss of the 'westland' altogether. This was also the period of the expansion of Egypt. By 1600, when the Asiatic Hyksos were expelled from that country, no Semitic force was strong enough to keep the Egyptians from successfully invading Palestine and Syria. They were succeeded there by Hittites and Arameans, and finally Assyrians and not Babylonians resumed the empire of the west. Meanwhile the two powers were engaged in frequent warfare with occasional treaties of peace; and both of them cultivated friendship with Egypt in the 16th and 17th centuries while it was a power in Asiatic affairs.

18. Native Rule Resumed.

The Cossean intruders were finally expelled by Nebuchadrezzar I, an early member of the 4th dynasty, about 1130 B.C. He made a desperate effort to reclaim Syria, but had to succumb to the superior power of Assyria. Not long after his time Babylon itself was captured by the Assyrians, but not permanently held. Peaceful relations seem to have been maintained for many years thereafter. The next dynasty is called that of the 'Sea-land,' which was probably the result of the first effort of the Chaldeans to assert themselves on a national scale. The 5th, 6th, and 7th dynasties, regarding which little is known, were of short duration. The 7th had at least one Elamitic ruler. After 1000 B.C., the native kings were again in power. With the revival of Assyrian aggression on a world-conquering scale Babylonia gradually took an inferior place, but it was not till the era of Tiglath-pileser III that Assyria gained a permanent footing in the mother-country. Early in the reign of Nabonassar (747–733), the first king of the Canon of Ptolemy, the Assyrians occupied Akkad, and in 729 Babylon itself was taken by Tiglath-pileser, who assumed the throne under the name of Pulu (the "Pul" of II K 15 19).

19. Chaldeans and Assyrians.

The chief obstacle to the progress of the Assyrians was presented by the Chaldeans from the shores of the Persian Gulf, who had now begun systematic plans for gaining possession of Babylon (§ 18). Their aims seem not to have been purely ambitious. They wished to maintain a native Babylonian dynasty, while the all-powerful priestly party in Babylon was quite willing to tolerate Assyrian rule for the sake of its protection and better chances of settled government. Merodach-baladan II was the leading spirit of the first great struggle. He was three times in possession of the capital and for two periods actual king. For thirty years he kept intriguing, fighting, or actually reigning in Babylon. It was in 704 that he sent the embassy to Hezekiah of Judah seeking help in organizing a general revolt against Sennacherib (cf. II K 20 12; Is 39 1). He finally disappeared, embarking in his flight for the eastern shore of the Persian Gulf. Native opposition to the Assyrians was still maintained till in 690 Sennacherib captured and destroyed Babylon itself, turning the Euphrates over its site. During these struggles the Elamites rendered faithful and substantial assistance to the Chaldeans.

20. Assyrian Rule and Ruin.

Babylon was restored (680 B.C.) by the good Assyrian king, Esarhaddon, who forebore to assume the title of "King of Babylon" and called himself "viceregent of Merodach." Under his régime Babylonia was prosperous and happy. After his early death Asshurbanipal became King of Assyria and his brother viceroy of Babylon. For fifteen years the brothers kept on good terms, and when a combination of Chaldeans, Elamites, and Arameans of the Tigris pasture-lands was made against Assyria, Babylon held aloof. But the viceroy took part in an insurrection which began in 652 and extended through the whole breadth of the empire. The chief cities of North and Central Babylonia were besieged and yielded only to starvation. Babylon was the last to be taken, and the viceroy immolated himself in the flames of his palace (648). During the rest of his life, till 626, Asshurbanipal reigned as "king" over Babylon. Within the next three years (648–645) Elam also was finally subdued, and Susa captured and destroyed.

21. New Babylonian Empire.

Yet, after all, the successor of Asshurbanipal in Babylon was a Chaldean, Nabopalassar (625–605), who threw off the yoke of the hated Assyrian, and founded the new Babylonia. As Assyria declined and shrank in dimensions the Chaldean régime was being constantly strengthened. Nabopalassar allied himself with the rising power of the Medes, and after the fall of Nineveh (607 B.C.) the whole Assyrian Empire W. and S. of the mountains fell to him. His son, Nebuchadrezzar, completed the reduction of Syria and Palestine, which had fallen under the dominion of Egypt, by driving out Pharaoh Necho after the battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.). He became king upon the death of his father during this campaign. Only the western districts furnished serious trouble to him. Jerusalem rebelled twice and was finally destroyed in 586. Tyre withstood a siege of thirteen years, since the besiegers lacked a competent navy. But Egypt was overrun and for a time, it would seem, occupied by the Babylonians. Throughout the rule of Nebuchadrezzar peace reigned between his empire and Media, which extended itself mainly westward. His career as a ruler was long and successful. While his outlying dominions were generally peaceful and contented, Babylonia itself prospered beyond precedent. Waste lands were reclaimed; irrigation was extended; new settlements were formed; commerce, industry, learning, research, architecture, and above all temple-building were promoted; and the city of Babylon became more than ever the metropolis of Asia.

22. Decline and Fall.

The glory of the Chaldean régime was of short duration. Nebuchadrezzar died in 562. His successors were all incompetent. The fourth and last, Nabonidus, a usurper (555) and a religious and antiquarian enthusiast, was distasteful to his own people. Cyrus the Great, in 539 B.C., added the Babylonian to the other empires which he had acquired and consolidated with magical ease and celerity. A midsummer campaign of less than a week ended in the surrender of the capital, after which the whole Semitic world came under Persian control. Babylon henceforth had no higher rank than a province.

23. Continued Importance of Babylonia.

But its importance for Biblical history did not thereby cease; rather it set itself in a new relation. It was because Babylonia was a province of Persia that the restoration of Jerusalem and the return of the Babylonian exiles were made possible and the maintenance of the precarious settlements in Palestine secured. Even Persian modes of thought had only a slight influence on the latest canonical writings. Of Judaism Babylonia was the center and focus for over a thousand years. After the fall of Jerusalem (70 A.D.), Babylonia took the place of Palestine as a seat of Jewish schools and the interpretation of the Law. Under the Parthian, the Sassanid, and even the Mohammedan rulers, the Jewish scholars and teachers of Babylon still held a leading place, and it was not till the Mongolians and Turks converted the country into a desert that it ceased to be a nursery of Judaism.

BABYLONISH GARMENT (properly, "mantle of Shinar," Jos 7 21 mg.): If the reading were correct, this would be a sample of the excellent and costly embroidered robes of various patterns which are frequently mentioned in the Inscriptions, and of their wide-spread export from the place of manufacture. It is probable, however, that instead of "Shinar" we should read se'ar, 'hair.' J. F. McC.

BACA, bê'ca, VALLEY OF (עֵמֶק הַבָּכָא, 'ēmeq habbākhā', Ps. 84 6, Valley of Weeping RV; "balsam-trees," RVmg.): Whether there was a real valley bearing the name Baca is not clear. The context in Ps 84 clearly shows that the phrase is used as emblematic of the hard experiences of life which faithfulness and constancy in devotion to God may transform into sources of joy. A. C. Z.

BACHRITE, bac'rait. See BECHER.

BACK: Used of God in an anthropomorphic sense (Ex 33 23; Is 38 17).

BADGER, BADGERS' SKINS. See SEALSKIN.

BAG: The rendering of (1) ḥărīṭ (II K 5 23), a bag of skin, here one large enough to hold a talent of silver. A smaller variety is mentioned in Is 3 22 ("satchel" RV, "crisping pin" AV); (2) kīṣ, a bag or purse in which was carried money (Is 46 6; Pr 1 14 ["purse"], 16 11; Is 46 6), or weights for the balance (Dt 25 13; Mic 6 11); (3) kᵉlī, lit. any sort of receptacle or instrument, used of the shepherd's bag in I S 17 40, 49; (4) tsᵉrōr, from tsārar, 'to bind' (cf. the vb. in II K 12 10), a "bundle" (Gn 42 35) or bag (Job 14 17; Pr 7 20; Hag 1 6). (5) βαλάντιον, "purse" RV (Lk 12 33), the same as (2), above. The term γλωσσόκομον in Jn 12 6, 13 29 means a small box (RVmg.) rather than a bag. E. E. N.

BAGGAGE: RV for "carriages" AV (I S 17 22; Is 10 28; Ac 21 15), and for "stuff," AV and ERV (I S 10 22, 25 13, 30 24). In every case but Ac 21 15 it means the impedimenta of an army. E. E. N.

BAHARUMITE, ba-hê'rum-ait: In I Ch 11 33 we read "Azmaveth, the Baharumite," but in the parallel passage (II S 23 31), "the Barhumite," the "h" and "r" being transposed. The former is probably the more correct. See BAHURIM. G. L. R.

BAHURIM, ba-hū'rim (בַּחֻרִים, baḥūrīm): A place in Benjamin on the way from Jerusalem to the Jordan (II S 3 16, 16 5). B. was the home of Shimei, who cursed David on his flight from Absalom (II S 16 5, 19 16 ff.; I K 2 8). Here also Ahimaaz and Jonathan concealed themselves when acting as David's spies (II S 17 18). Site unknown. E. E. N.

BAJITH. See BAYITH.

BAKBAKKAR, bak-bak'ār (בַּקְבַּקָּר, baqbaqqar): The head of a Levite family (I Ch 9 15). E. E. N.

BAKBUK, bak'buk (בַּקְבּוּק, baqbūq): The founder of a family of Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 51; Neh 7 53). E. E. N.

BAKBUKIAH, bak"bū-kai'ā (בַּקְבֻּקְיָה, baqbuqyāh): A name occurring three times in Neh (11 17, 12 9, 25), all the references being perhaps to one individual, a Levite of the "sons of Asaph."

BALAAM, bê'lam (בִּלְעָם, bil'ām): The son of Beor and a magician (enchanter) of Pethor, on the banks of the River Euphrates (Nu 22 5; but according to another reading he was of the bᵉnē 'ammō [by omission of a final n for bᵉnē 'ammōn, 'sons of Ammon'], hence an Ammonite). As the narrative stands in Nu 22 3–24 25 [JE] it presents in the character of B. the incongruous, though not necessarily contradictory qualities of a heathen soothsayer (24 1) and those of a man touched by the spirit of J″ The incongruity is removed when the narrative is analyzed and its separate portions referred to the documents from which they were drawn. But the analysis is not an easy one (cf. Kent, Beginnings of Hebrew History, 233–239; Addis, The Documents of the Hex., I, 175–184); and the story as it stands has a distinct function and spiritual value. It presents the heathen occultist as coming under the power of the spirit of J″ and revealing the irresistible nature of this force. Balaam was summoned by Balak, King of Moab, just after the defeat of the Amorites by the hosts of Israel, and bribed to curse the victorious invaders, but is led first by the miracle of the speaking ass, and afterward directly, to bless them. In four poetically constructed oracles (Nu 23 7-10 [E], 19-24 [E], 24 3-9 [J], 16-24 [J]), he foreshadows the uniqueness of J″'s people, their strength, the beauty and fruitfulness of their land, their glorious victories, and finally the great king ("Star") who shall create an empire out of Moab, Edom, Amalek, and Kain. After this B. is for a time lost sight of, and when he reappears, it is as the corrupter of Israel. Through the means of Midianite women he lures many to idolatry and is slain with others for this sin (Nu 31 8, 16 [P]). In the O T B. stands for the unavailing curse of the heathen enchanter (Dt 23 5; Jos 24 9; Mic 6 5; Neh 13 2); in the N T he is the type of the tempter to idolatry, especially that form of it in which lust plays a large part (II P 2 15; Jude ver. 11; Rev 2 14); cf. Gray on Numbers, chs. 22–24, in Int. Crit. Com., 1903.

BALAK, bê'lak (בָּלָק, bālāq; Balac, Rev 2 14, AV): King of Moab in Moses' day (Nu 22–23) and famous for his connection with Balaam (q.v.). E. E. N.

BALANCE. See Weights and Measures, § 4.

BALD LOCUST. See Palestine, § 26, and Locusts.

BALDNESS: As to location, the O T contrasts baldness of the forehead (gabbaḥath, only Lv 13 41 ff.) with baldness of the crown (qorḥāh; cf. the proper names Korah, Kareah). As to origin, baldness was either natural or artificial. The former, which is seldom mentioned, was believed to result from hard labor (Ezk 29 18), as well as disease (Is 3 17, 24), and was perhaps considered a reproach (II K 2 23). Baldness was not itself unclean, but apparently aroused suspicions of some unclean skin-disease (Lv 13 40 ff.). See Disease and Medicine, I (1).

Artificial baldness, produced by clipping or shaving (cf. Ezk 5 1) is frequently mentioned. The ancient belief that the hair was a seat of the vitality (cf. Jg 16 17) caused the ceremonial shaving of the head to be regarded as a sacrifice to a deity or to the dead; hence this was a sign of mourning forbidden to the Israelites (Dt 14 1; Lv 21 5). It seems, however, to have been common in pre-exilic times (Is 22 12; Am 8 10, etc.; cf. Job 1 20); and baldness is therefore used figuratively for mourning (Jer 48 37; Ezk 7 18, etc.). See Mourning and Mourning Customs, § 4. The Arabian practise of shaving all the head except a circular patch in the middle (Jer 9 26, 25 23) was likewise prohibited (Lv 19 27, 21 5) on account of its connection with heathen worship. At the expiration of the Nazirite's vow, the shaven hair was offered as a sacrifice to J″ (Nu 6 18; cf. Ac 18 18, 21 24). See Nazirite. Paul says that "it is a shame to a woman to be shorn or shaven" (I Co 11 6). See Hair; Shaving. L. G. L.

BALM. See Disease and Medicine, IV, (1), and Palestine, § 21.

BAMAH, bê'mā (בָּמָה, bāmāh), 'high place': In Ezk 20 29 the word is used with reference to a supposed derivation from bā', 'to come' ('go'), and māh, 'what.' Hence, 'What whereunto go ye?' with evident contempt for it. This allusion to its etymology makes the word a quasi-proper noun as rendered in EVV. A. C. Z.

BAMOTH, bê'moth (בָּמוֹת, bāmōth), 'high places': A town of Moab, probably the same as Bamoth Baal (Jos 13 17) and the Beth Bamoth of the stone of Mesha (line 27). It was one of the last stations on Israel's march through Moab before the final encampment near Pisgah (Nu 21 19 f.). The identification, Map II, J 1, is uncertain. E. E. N.

BAND: Often used in O T and N T for divisions of an army (cf. II S 4 2; II K 6 23; Job 1 17; Mt 27 27). See Warfare, § 4; also Beauty and Bands.

BANI, bê'nai (בָּנִי, bānī): 1. One of David's heroes (II S 23 36 = Mibhar, I Ch 11 38). 2. A Merarite (I Ch 6 46). 3. A Judahite, descendant of Pharez (I Ch 9 4). 4. "Sons of Bani," a post-exilic family (Ezr 2 10, 10 29, 34 ff. = Binnui in Neh 7 15. 5. Name of one or more Levites (Neh 3 17, 8 7, 9 4, 5, 10 13, 11 22). 6. A term used for one of the divisions of the post-exilic community (Neh 10 14); cf. 4. E. E. N.

BANK. See Trade and Commerce, § 3.

BANNER: Banners or standards were used in ancient armies very much in the same way as they are to-day. (1) The most common word for standard is nēṣ (of uncertain root significance); cf. Ex 17 15 (niṣṣī='my banner'); Jer 4 6, 51 12, often rendered ensign (e.g., Is 5 26, 31 9). (2) Another word is degel ('that which is seen'), confined to Nu 1 52, 2 2 ff., 10

14 ff., and Song 2 4, 6 4, 10. In Nu (if the text be correct) it is implied that each tribe had its special standard. 3. 'Oth, 'sign,' is used for banner or ensign in Nu 2 2; Ps 74 4. One form of Assyrian banner is shown in the accompanying illustration. There were many other forms. E. E. N.

BANQUET. See MEALS, § 3.

BAPTISM, BAPTIZE (βάπτισμα, βαπτίζειν): The words used to designate the rite characteristic of John the Baptist's ministry (Mk 1 4, 9 and ‖s; 6 14, 24, 11 30 and ‖s; Lk 7 29; Ac 1 5, 22, 10 37, 13 24, 18 25, 19 3f.), as also the rite imposed from the beginning upon converts to the Early Church's preaching of Jesus Christ (Ac 2 38, 41, 8 12-16, 36, 38, 9 18 [with 22 16], 10 47f., 16 15, 33, 18 8, 19 3-5; cf. also I Co 1 13-17; Eph 4 5; I P 3 21).

1. In John's Ministry.

The call of the Baptist was not only to moral purification, but to this as leading to an entirely new condition of life to be established in the Messianic kingdom which he announced (Mt 3 2f.). As administered by the Baptist, therefore, this rite symbolized the candidate's repentance in preparation for this coming kingdom (Mt 3 6-12 and ‖s; Lk 3 10-17) and consequently in its form must have been influenced largely by the O T purification rites, especially as these were involved in the rite of initiating proselytes into Israel (cf. Schürer, HJP, Eng. trans. II (2), 319–324; cf. also Edersheim, Life of Jesus, I, 272–274).

The baptism of Jesus (Mk 1 9-11 and ‖s) was in accord with this idea; for while with the people generally this rite signified their moral attitude of receptivity toward the coming Messianic work, with Jesus it was a testimony to His moral attitude of consecration toward His own work. Consequently the statement of Jesus in Matthew's narrative that in this baptism both John and Himself would be fulfilling all righteousness (3 15) refers simply to the carrying out, in this ceremony, of the form thus offered for expressing this relation of consecration to the great work of whose commission to His hands He had become conscious. The term "righteousness" (δικαιοσύνη) is thus taken in its natural O T sense of living up to the divinely prescribed forms of relationship between God and man—the only sense in which the Baptist is likely to have understood it in connection with the question of the debated administration of the rite to Jesus (very much as Jesus uses it later in speaking of the Baptist's ministry, Mt 21 32). The Baptist was to live up to these forms by administering this rite to Jesus as publicly consecrating Him to His work; Jesus was to live up to them by submitting to this rite as publicly announcing His consecration.

This view of Jesus' baptism is confirmed not only by the supernatural incidents following it, whose evident intent was to express approval of the consecration involved in the act (Mk 1 10f. and ‖s), but by the subsequent fact that the Messianic spirit, with which this Divine approval had then and there endowed Him, was the Spirit by which He was led immediately into the Wilderness for the testing of the consecration He had publicly confessed. (For other views see JESUS CHRIST, § 5.)

2. In Jesus' Ministry.

The general statement in Jn 3 22-26, that Jesus administered the rite of baptism, is corrected later by the Evangelist to the effect that "Jesus himself baptized not, but his disciples" (4 1f.). This is not contradicted by the Synoptists; so we gain the impression that, while baptism may have been an accompaniment of Jesus' ministry, it was not administered personally by Him.

That it should have been such an accompaniment we can easily understand—at least in the early part of His work, when John's disciples were coming over into His following and His work was being done in the neighborhood of John's. If the Baptist had felt it necessary by this rite to commit his disciples publicly to their attitude toward the Messianic work, these disciples may well have felt the need of committing in a similar way those who came directly into contact with this work in the person of the Master.

The fact, however, that with His actual presence among them the time had passed for organizing a following in preparation for His work and the fact that the time had not yet come for organizing any following in the carrying of it on in the world, made needless during Jesus' ministry any rite of baptism. The call which He made was for personal relationship to Himself (Mk 1 15), which seemed all the public announcement necessary in the personal following of Himself in the daily ministry of His actual work.

It is clear, therefore, that the administration of this rite by His disciples in the early part of His ministry was simply temporary and did not belong vitally to the work He was carrying on. His statement that He 'had a baptism to be baptized with and would be straitened until it was accomplished' (Lk 12 50) and His question to the ambitious disciples 'whether they were able to drink the cup that He was to drink, or to be baptized with the baptism with which He was to be baptized' (Mk 10 38 f.), are manifestly figurative expressions based on the fact of the consecration involved in His baptism at the beginning of His work and drawn out by the fact that this consecration was now, as His passion approached, coming to its supreme and final test.

After His resurrection, as He unfolded to His disciples the work which lay before them (Lk 24 46-49), His commission of them to "make disciples of all nations and to baptize them" (whether the longer Trinitarian formula be understood as having been used by Jesus [Mt 28 19] or the simpler one, current in the Early Church [Ac 8 16, 10 48, 19 5, 22 16], cf. article "Baptism" in EB) is obviously a recognition on His part of the fact that, with the withdrawal of His personal presence, there would arise the need of an organized following of His disciples and of a gathering into its membership, through such an initiatory rite as had been used by John in the following he had brought together in preparation for His coming.

3. In the Ministry of the Early Church.

In view of this commission it is not surprising to notice at the very beginning of the Church's life in Jerusalem the appearance of this condition of membership in the following of the disciples (Ac 2 38, 41); nor is it in any way unnatural that realizing, as the disciples must have done, that the rite was of the same initiatory character as that administered by John, it was connected in the apostolic preaching with the requirement of repentance rather than with that of faith (Ac 2 38). In fact, the emphasis upon repentance in the early preaching of the Church was part of the strictly Jewish conceptions with which the Church's life began (Ac 5 31) and which were recognized by Christ Himself in His final words to the disciples (Lk 24 44-47). It was only with the growth and development of the Church's consciousness of the personal relations to Jesus in the matter of salvation that the emphasis came to be placed upon faith (Ac 10 43, 13 39, 26 18) —as Christ Himself had placed it in His ministry (Mk 5 34 and ||s, 9 23; Mt 8 10-13, 9 28 f., 15 28; Lk 7 50), and faith came to have baptism connected with it in the entrance into the disciples' brotherhood (Ac 10 43-48, 11 17, 16 30-33, 18 8, 19 3-5; cf. the transitional phases in Ac 8 12 f., 36-38, and notice the interpretation placed upon 9 18 by Paul in his later statement of 22 16; cf. also Eph 4 5; I Co 1 13-15).

It is in this close connection of the rite with personal relations to Jesus Christ that we are to understand Paul's figurative references to baptism (Gal 3 27; Col 2 12; Ro 6 3 f.; I Co 12 13; cf. also I Co 10 2). The reference in I Co 15 29 is most obscure. (For various views see Expos. Greek Test., ad loc.)

The reference to "baptisms" in He 6 2 (where βαπτισμός is used instead of βάπτισμα) is doubtless to the various ceremonial washings for purification, either of the person, as He 9 10 (cf. Lk 11 38), or of things, as Mk 7 4.

That the rite had no high sacramentarian value in the Early Church is evident from the secondary importance attached to it in his ministry by Paul (I Co 1 14 ff.) as well as from the spiritual emphasis placed upon it in his Epistle by Peter (I P 3 21).

We have no record in the N T of the baptism of infants; but the fact that the question as to when entrance into the Church took place must have early come to the front in a community so accustomed to theocratic ideas as the Jewish-Christian Church in Jerusalem, and the parallelism between baptism and circumcision as initiatory rites gives significance to such statements of household baptism as we have in Ac 16 15, 31-33; I Co 1 16 (cf. Ropes, Apostolic Age, p. 198). As to the form of baptism it is clear that in so far as the rite of John's ministry was derived from purification and initiatory ceremonies it was administered in running water, with a partial or entire submergence of the body; and further that in so far as the rite of the Early Church was a reproduction of John's, it was administered after the same general form. At the same time the fact that in Jewish lustrations immersion of the whole body was often symbolized by an ablution of a part, as in the washing of the hands before meals (cf. Lk 11 38, where βαπτίζειν is used), opened the way for an early modification of the form in the direction of affusion and sprinkling (cf. Didache, ch. vii, and the representations in Studia Bibl. et Eccles., vol. v., pt. iv.)

BAR. See HOUSE, § 6 (1).

BAR-: In proper names compounded with Bar-, seven instances of which occur in the N T, this element signifies 'son' (Aramaic בַּר, bar = Heb. בֵּן, bēn), e.g., Bar-Jonah, son of Jonah (Mt 16 17). E. E. N.

BARABBAS, bār-ab'as (Βαραββᾶς): The prisoner released at the instigation of the chief priests by Pilate according to a customary but otherwise unknown act of clemency at Passover (Mk 15 7 f. and ||s). He was a notable criminal in Jerusalem imprisoned with accomplices for robbery, sedition, and murder. The name Barabbas ('son of the Father')—probably in the sense of 'Teacher'—is not unknown, there being two rabbis with this surname mentioned in the Talmud. The reading "Jesus Barabbas" for his full name in Mt 27 16 f., found by Origen in many MSS., and still extant in some cursives and in the Sinaitic-Syriac and Armenian versions, is doubtless due to an early scribal error. R. A. F.

BARAK, bar'ak (בָּרָק, bārāq), 'lightning': A hero who shares with Deborah the credit of the victory over Sisera and the Canaanites (Jg 4 6, 5 12). He was a native of Kedesh-Naphtali, and is usually reckoned among the judges of Israel in succession to Othniel and Ehud. In He 11 32 his name occurs among those who achieved great things through faith. A. C. Z.

BARBARIAN. See GENTILE.

BARBER: Mentioned in the O T only in Ezk 5 1, showing, however, the existence of professional barbers. 'Temple barbers' are mentioned on Phœnician inscriptions. Compare the frequent references to shaving in the O T (cf. also Is 7 20). See RAZOR. E. E. N.

BAREFOOT: The removal of the sandals was indicative of awe or reverence, of profound emotion, or was a symbolic act. When one was on especially holy ground or felt himself in the immediate presence of Deity, it was incumbent on him to take off his shoes (Ex 3 5; Jos 5 12). The underlying reason for this wide-spread custom is not certainly known (cf. Dillmann on Ex 3 5). The removal of the sandals in experiences of great sorrow and humiliation, or as symbolic of such, is illustrated in the case of David (II S 15 30) and Isaiah (Is 20 2-4). The humiliation of the condition of being unshod is well illustrated in a detail of the peculiar law of levirate marriage (Dt 25 9 f.; cf. Ruth 4 7 f.). See BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 7; also MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 4. E. E. N.

BARIAH, ba-rai'ā (בָּרִיחַ, bārīaḥ): One of the later descendants of David (I Ch 3 22). E. E. N.

BAR-JESUS, bār-jī'zus (Βαριησοῦς, 'son of Jesus'): A Jewish magician and false prophet attached to the court of Sergius Paulus when the latter was proconsul of Cyprus. For interference with Paul's work B. is represented as stricken with temporary blindness (Ac 13 6-12). In ver. 8 B. is called Elymas, which may be a second magical name assumed by the same person (but see Dalman, Aram Gr., p. 162), possibly to be connected with the Aram. root אֵלִים, 'strong.' Ὁ μάγος (ver. 8) is not necessarily an exact translation of the word, but may be a general description of its meaning. A similar title seems to have been borne by Simon Magus (q.v.) (Ac 8 9 f.). For later legends concerning B. see Lipsius-Bonnet, Apoc. Apgesch., II, p. 299 f. J. M. T.

BARNABAS, bār'na-bas (Βαρναβᾶς [Βαρνάβας WH]): The surname given by the Apostles to the Cyprian-Levite Joseph and interpreted by the author of Acts as meaning "Son of exhortation" (Ac 4 36).

Considerable difficulty exists in tracing the etymology of the name. Of the several suggestions perhaps the most likely is that of Deismann (Bibelstudien, pp. 175–178 [Eng. tr., pp. 187 f., 307–310]), who considers Βαρναβᾶς the Jewish Grecized form of Βαρνεβοῦς, a personal Semitic name recently discovered in Asia Minor inscriptions, and meaning 'Son of Nebo.'

If this be correct, then, being thus an old theophoric name whose heathen origin had been disguised, either it was borne by Joseph prior to his conversion, its Christian interpretation (υἱὸς παρακλήσεως) being alone due to the Apostles, or else it was given Joseph by the Apostles at his conversion on the basis of its popular interpretation, its heathen origin being unknown. The latter could very easily have been the case. Nebo being the herald of the gods, the popular idea of Barnabas as a 'Son of proclamation,' or 'exhortation,' would be natural.

This interpretation was evidently suggested by the special gifts of exhortation which B. displayed (cf. Ac 11 23) and which belonged to him as a NT prophet (cf. Ac 15 32 with 13 1).

He first appears as a generous contributor to the community of goods in the Jerusalem Church (Ac 4 36 f.), of which circle, through the fact of his aunt's home being in the city (cf. Ac 11 12 with Col 4 10), he was at the time doubtless a resident member. Among the discipleship here he was of sufficient reputation to become sponsor for Saul upon his first visit after his conversion (Ac 9 26 f.)—which seemingly implies a previous acquaintance, possibly in Tarsus, an inference which is confirmed by the fact that when later B. was delegated by the Mother Church to investigate the mission activity in Antioch, he brought Saul from Tarsus to the service of the newly established work and labored with him in it for a year (Ac 11 21-26).

Here also he seems to have come into prominence. With Saul he was appointed to carry up to Jerusalem the contributions of the brethren in Judæa (Ac 11 27-30), and upon their return, as the foremost prophet and teacher in the community, he was sent out with Saul on the first extended mission of the Christian Church (Ac 13 1). Through the importance and efficiency of his service he came to be designated an "apostle" (Ac 14 4, 14) in that broader usage of the word to which the Church grew in virtue of its widened work and life (see APOSTLE). He was sympathetically committed to Paul's liberal views, entering with him into the controversy which arose at Antioch upon the close of the first mission tour (Ac 15 1 f.) and standing with him in the subsequent Council at Jerusalem for the admission of the Gentiles into the Church (Ac 15 4, 12; Gal 2 3-5). At the same time, with most of the other leaders, he appeared unable to carry his convictions to their logical conclusions (cf. Gal 2 11-13).

Owing to a dispute over the taking with them of his cousin, John Mark, he did not accompany Paul on his second mission tour, but returned with Mark to his native place, Cyprus (Ac 15 36-40), where we lose sight of him, except for such evidence as may be contained in I Co 9 6 that he continued in his missionary work, declining, like Paul, to impose himself upon the support of the churches. From the Apostle's references to him in his subsequent correspondence with the churches (Gal 2 1, 5, 9, 13; I Co 9 6; Col 4 10) there is nothing to show that the relations between them continued strained; rather the contrary.

Tertullian and others in the Western Church held B. as author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (q.v.). The Sinaitic MS. contains, at the close of the NT writings, an Epistle under his name; there is an apocryphal Acts of Barnabas and there are obscure references (e.g., in the Decretum of Pope Gelasius, 496 A.D.) to a Gospel ascribed to him. BARREL: The AV rendering of kadh in I K 17 12-16, 18 33 ("jar" RV). In the latter passage a large earthen water-jar is meant. In the former, the kadh may have been of earthenware, or, as is common among Palestinian peasants to-day, made of a mixture of clay, dung, and straw, perhaps divided into two compartments. See plate of POTTERY, fig. 1. E. E. N.

BARREN. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

BARSABBAS, bär'sab-bas (Βαρσαββᾶς, Barsabas AV): 1. Joseph. Surnamed Justus, was "put forward" with Matthias as the successor of Judas (Ac 1 23). In the post-apostolic literature he is reckoned among the 'Seventy' (Chron. Pasch., ed. Bonn, I, 400), and several apocryphal tales concerning him are extant (cf. Eus. HE, III, 39, 9; Lipsius-Bonnet, Apoc. Apostelgesch., I, pp. 108, 116). J. M. T.

2. Judas (Ac 15 22, 27, 32). A leading prophet of the Jerusalem Church, who accompanied Silas with the decree of the Council to Antioch, and afterward returned to Jerusalem. Nothing more is known of him. Barsabbas being a patronymic, he may have been a brother of Joseph Barsabbas (Ac 1 23). R. A. F.

BARTHOLOMEW, bär-thol'o-miū (Βαρθολομαῖος, 'son of Talmai'): One of the twelve Apostles and mentioned in all four of the lists (Mk 3 18; Mt 10 3; Lk 6 14; Ac 1 13). Concerning B. there is no trustworthy tradition. For his supposed identification with Nathanael see NATHANAEL. J. M. T.

BARTIMÆUS, bär"ti-mî'us (Βαρτιμαῖος, "son of Timæus," perhaps equivalent to Aram. bartimi, 'son of Timi'): A blind man restored to sight by Jesus near Jericho (Mk 10 46-52 and ‖s). In Mt and Lk no name appears, and it is possible that Bartimæus was inserted in Mk for the sake of vividness (cf. JAIRUS). J. M. T.

BARUCH, bê'ruc (בָּרוּךְ, bārūkh), 'blessed': 1. Son of Neriah, said by Josephus (Ant. X, 9 1) to have come of a very illustrious family, one of Jeremiah's associates, first mentioned as his trusted friend (Jer 32 12), and later as his secretary and agent (Jer 36 4). Jeremiah dictated his oracles to B., who read them to the people. These prophecies roused the wrath of Jehoiakim, who commanded the arrest of B., and also burned the roll written by him. B., however, rewrote the oracles. After the murder of Gedaliah, he was accused by the leaders of unduly influencing Jeremiah to dissuade the people from leaving Judæa (Jer 43 3). Together with Jeremiah he was taken into Egypt. Here all authentic records about him cease. According to one tradition, he died in Egypt at the same time with Jeremiah. According to another, he survived the prophet and went to Babylon, where he died twelve years after the fall of Jerusalem (574 B.C.). 2. The son of Zabbai (Zaccai RVmg.) who repaired the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 20). 3. One of those who sealed the covenant in Nehemiah's time (Neh 10 6); possibly the same as 2. 4. The son of Col-hozeh, a descendant of Perez (Neh 11 5). A. C. Z.

BARUCH, BOOKS OF: I. The Apocryphon: The Greek Book of Baruch is based upon the tradition which represents Baruch the son of Neriah as spending the last portion of his life in Babylon (see BARUCH 1). The book purports to be a treatise addressed by him to the exiles and consists of an introduction and three sections. In the first section (1 15–3 8) the exiled Israelites are furnished with a form of confession of sin to which is appended a prayer for the return of the divine good pleasure toward them. In the second section (3 9–4 7) the praises of Wisdom are sung in words that recall the panegyrics of Job 28 and 38, and the Book of Proverbs. In the third section (4 8–5 9) words of encouragement and comfort are addressed to the exiles similar to the expressions of the Deutero-Isaiah.

1. Contents.

These three sections bear the marks of different ages and environments. (1) The form of confession of sin (1 15–3 8) is of the same class as Ezr 9 6-15 and Dn 9 3-9; but while it is evidently of later origin than the former, it is earlier than the Daniel passage. It was therefore produced probably about 300 B.C. (2) The section which eulogizes Wisdom (3 9–4 7) betrays the effect of a long-standing contact with the Gentile world, and can best be accounted for upon the view that it originated in the first half of the 1st cent. A.D. (3) The last section (4 8–5 9) must be, from its dependence on the Psalter of Solomon, dated at the earliest after the fall of Jerusalem (70 A.D.) and may be a product of the last years of the 1st cent. The introduction (cf. 1 1-15) is a redactorial addition embodying the tradition of Baruch's activity in Babylon and therefore the latest of all the parts of the book.

2. Dates of Its Parts.

These differences of setting correspond with a marked difference in language as between the first and the last two sections. The last two are purer and more choice in particular words and expressions, thus pointing to the conclusion that they were originally composed in Greek. As to the original language of the first section, the evidence is not so clear, but the probability is that it was composed in Hebrew.

3. Original Languages.

As far as the ascription to Baruch is concerned, his known intimacy with Jeremiah and his concern in the events attendant on the deportation to Babylon are sufficient to account for the use of his name. The book has been known continuously from its first appearance and early secured a place among the Apocrypha of the O T.

4. Ascription to Baruch.

II. The Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch: This is an apocryphon discovered and published in a Latin translation in 1866, and later in a more primitive Syriac text in 1871. Its contents consist of a purely apocalyptic section (from which the whole takes its name), and a letter purporting to be written by Baruch to the nine and a half tribes of Israel deported into Assyria at the time of the fall of Samaria (722 B.C.). The first of these parts consists of a series of seven sections of which the first gives a sketch of the circumstances in which Baruch saw his visions. It was at the time of the fall of Jerusalem into the hands of the Chaldeans. Jeremiah, by Divine command, went to Babylon with the captives, while Baruch stayed amid the ruins of Jerusalem. What he saw in the visions there together with the conversations which he held with heavenly personages are narrated in detail in the next six chapters. The sum and substance of these is that while Israel may suffer for a time, the Messiah will soon appear, and bring to naught the counsels of his enemies. The letter to the nine and a half tribes is designed to encourage and strengthen the people in the time of their distress. It represents their condition as fully known to God, and their sufferings intended for their own good.

1. The Book.

The author of the book was evidently a Jew, and wrote some time between the middle of the first Christian century and before the opening of the second, or approximately about the year 100. The original language of the document was probably Hebrew. Its relations to 4th Ezra (II Esdras) have roused the keenest interest. Both books seem to issue from the same conditions, are designed to meet the same need, and contain the same type of thought. They have been called the 'twin Apocalypses.' The Syriac text of the book may be found in Ceriani's Monumenta Sacra, V, II (1871). An English translation with introduction and notes was published by Charles (The Apocalypse of Baruch, 1896) and a German translation by Rothstein in Kautzsch's Pseudepigrapha (1900).

2. The Author, Date, and Original Language.

III. The Greek Apocalypse of Baruch: A book containing a report of a visit by Baruch to the seven heavens was mentioned by Origen in his treatise De Principiis, but nothing further was known of it until it was discovered in 1896 by Rev. E. Cuthbert Butler in a Greek MS. in the British Museum (subsequently published by Prof. M. R. James in the Cambridge Texts and Studies, Vol. V, 1897, No. 1, pp. 84–94). Almost at the same time a Slavonic translation of the production in an abridged form was made known by Bonwetsch. These two versions are related to each other as the longer and shorter recensions of the same writing. Neither one, however, is probably the full text of the Apocalypse known to and mentioned by Origen. In that work Baruch is reported to have described seven heavens, whereas in the Greek Apocalypse he is represented as visiting five, and in the Slavonic only two.

1. The Discovery of the Book.

The relation of the work to the Syriac Baruch is probably explained by referring to 76 3 f. of that work. Here God promises to give Baruch after the lapse of 40 days a further revelation regarding the world of material elements, including the cycle of the earth, the summits of the mountains, the depths of the valleys and of the seas, and the number of the rivers. The fulfilment of this promise is not recorded in what follows, and the Greek Apocalypse was composed to show that it was fulfilled and how it was fulfilled. A German translation of the work is given in Kautzsch's Pseudepigrapha (1900). The Greek text is to be found in James's edition above alluded to. A. C. Z.

2. Criticism.

BARZILLAI, bär-zil'a-ai (בַּרְזִלַּי, bārzillay): 1. An aged and wealthy Gileadite of Rogelim who substantially befriended David when he fled from Absalom (II S 17 27). As he was returning to Jerusalem, David invited B. to spend the rest of his days with him at the capital, but B. refused, asking, however, favors for his servant (or sons? II S 19 31-39; cf. I K 2 7). 2. The father of Adriel (II S 21 8). 3. The ancestor of a family of priests who married a daughter of 1 (supra), but whose descendants could not prove their genealogy (Ezr 2 61; Neh 7 63). E. E. N.

BASE. See TEMPLE, § 18.

BASEMATH, bas'e-math (בָּשְׂמַת, bāsemath, Bashemath AV): 1. One of the wives of Esau, daughter of Elon the Hittite (Gn 26 34), but in 36 3 the daughter of Ishmael (cf. 28 9, where Mahalath may = Basemath). 2. A daughter of Solomon (I K 4 15, Basmath AV). E. E. N.

BASHAN, bē'shan (הַבָּשָׁן, bāshān), in Heb. usually with the definite article prefixed: The broad, rolling, fertile region E. of the Lake of Gennesaret, extending, roughly, from Gilead on the S. to Hermon on the N. Map I, GH 4, 5. To-day it is one of the granaries of Palestine. In ancient times the region was celebrated for its oaks (Is 2 13; Zec 11 2; Ezk 27 6) and fine cattle (cf. Ps 22 12; Am 4 1). Its general altitude is about 2,000 feet above sea-level. In the NE. portion there is a peculiar, pear-shaped region, known to the Arabs as the Leja, which is literally a 'petrified ocean' of basaltic lava. This district is not improbably identified with "the region of Argob," which the Israelites wrested from Og, together with its "threescore cities" all fortified with high walls, gates, and bars (Nu 21 33 ff.; Dt 3 4 f.). This whole region was assigned to the half tribe of Manasseh (Dt 3 13, 4 43; Jos 13 29 f.). Edrei, Ashtaroth, Golan, and Salechah were its chief cities (Dt 1 4, 3 1, 10, 4 43). Solomon taxed Bashan (I K 4 13). Hazael put an end to the Heb. supremacy over it (II K 10 33). Tiglath-pileser seems to have carried its inhabitants into captivity (II K 15 29). Under Trajan (106 A.D.) it was incorporated into the province of Arabia. To-day it is inhabited by a fierce, warlike sect, the Druses. G. L. R.

BASILISK. See PALESTINE, § 26.

BASIN (or BASON) and BOWL are the English renderings of eight Hebrew words. According to modern usage a bowl is deeper or rounder than a basin and is used chiefly for food or drink; but it is difficult to preserve this distinction in naming ancient vessels whose size and shape are largely a matter of conjecture.

Basins are most frequently mentioned in connection with the sacrificial ritual, beginning in Egypt (Ex 12 22) and Sinai (Ex 24 6). Among the furniture of the Tent were bowls of gold (Ex 37 16) and basins of "brass" (Ex 38 3). Solomon's Temple contained basins of gold (I K 7 50), "brass" (I K 7 45), and silver (I Ch 28 17), which were carried away by the Chaldeans (II K 25 14 f.; Jer 52 18 f.), but returned by Cyrus (Ezr 1 7 ff.). For basins as offerings see Nu 7 passim; Neh 7 70 (cf Ezr 8 27).

Bowls for wine (Jer 35 5, "pots," AV; Am 6 6) or ordinary household use (Jg 5 25, "dish," 6 38; II S 17 28) were doubtless common. Among bowl-shaped objects were the reservoirs of lamps (Zec 4 2 f.; cf. Ec 12 6), the rounded capitals of pillars (I K 7 41 = II Ch 4 12), and the "cups" of the golden candlestick (Ex 25 31).

The νιπτήρ used by Jesus (Jn 13 5) was probably a large foot-basin, provided for the purpose. φιάλη (AV "vial") is correctly rendered "bowl" by ARV in Rev (5 8, etc.). See also CUP, and LAVER, and TEMPLE, § 18. L. G. L.

BASKET: The uses of the various "baskets" of the O T are more evident than their form and material. The dūdh, used for figs (Jer 24 2), as well as clay or bricks (Ps 81 6), was probably a large, shallow basket, such as was used by masons in ancient Egypt. The ṣal or 'plaited' basket used for carrying bread (Gn 40 16; Ex 29 3) or meat (Jg 6 19) was apparently smaller, and dish-shaped. The ṭene' was large and deep, shaped like an inverted cone (cf. LXX. κάρταλλος), and is mentioned only in connection with products of the soil (Dt 26 2, 28 5). The kᵉlūbh (Am 8 1) seems to have been a coarsely woven cage-like receptacle with a lid.

The N T κόφινος (Mk 6 43, 8 19 and ‖s) was a stout wicker hand-basket, often carried by the Jews when traveling, in order to avoid buying food from Gentiles. Apparently each of the Twelve (cf. Mt 14 20) disciples had one. The σπυρίς (Mk 8 8, 20 and ‖s) was a larger flexible provision-basket of plaited ropes or reeds. The basket in which Paul was let down was probably a large rope hamper. It is called both a σπυρίς (Ac 9 25) and a σαργάνη (II Co 11 33), the latter word denoting especially the 'plaited' structure. See plate of HOUSEHOLD UTENSILS, II. Figs. 2, 3, 4, 6. L. G. L.

BAT. See PALESTINE, § 24.

BATH. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3.

BATH-: The element Bath- in compound proper names means daughter. It occurs in only two or three instances in the O T. E. E. N.

BATH, BATHING. See PURIFICATION, § 2.

BATH-RABBIM, bath''-rab'im (בַּת־רַבִּים, bath-rabbīm,) 'daughter of multitudes': The name of a gate of Heshbon (Song 7 4). Nothing further is known of it. For a bold conjecture, see Cheyne in EB. E. E. N.

BATH-SHEBA, bath''-shî'ba (בַּת־שֶׁבַע, bath-shebha'), 'daughter of Sheba': The wife of Uriah the Hittite, who committed adultery with David and after Uriah's death became one of David's wives. She was a woman of beauty and energy. Her first child after her union with D. died, but she later became the mother of other sons including Solomon (cf. I Ch 3 5). She retained her influence over D. until his death, and doubtless it was she who was chiefly instrumental in D.'s choice of Solomon as his successor (II S 11 2 ff., 12 24 f.; I K 1 11–2 19).

In II S 11 3 her father's name is given as Eliam, but in I Ch 3 5 she is called Bath-shua, the daughter of Ammiel (only a variant form of Eliam). Ahithophel, D.'s counselor, may have been the grandfather of B. (cf. II S 23 34). E. E. N.

BATTLE. See WARFARE, § 4.

BATTLE-AX. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 5.

BATTLEMENT: On the use of this term in Jer 5 10 AV compare the RV rendering. See also HOUSE, § 6 (d).

BAVVAI, bav'a-ai (בַּוַּי, bawway, Bavai AV), (Neh 3 18). See BINNUI.

BAY. See COLORS, § 2.

BAYITH, bā'yith, Bajith, bê'jith: This word is treated as a proper name in the EV of Is 15 2. If a proper noun the RV margin is the more correct reading. But bayith (בַּיִת) may be only a textual error for bath (בַּת), 'daughter,' and in that case we should read 'The daughter of Dibon is gone up to the high places.' E. E. N.

BAY TREE (Ps 37 35 AV): In RV the correct reading is given: "a green tree in its native soil." LXX. reads: "like the cedars of Lebanon." E. E. N.

BAZLITH, baz'lith (בַּצְלִית, batslīth), and BAZLUTH (בַּצְלוּת, batslūth): The ancestor of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 52; Neh 7 54). E. E. N.

BDELLIUM. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 3.

BEALIAH, bî''a-lai'ā (בְּעַלְיָה, bᵉ'alyāh), 'Jehovah is Baal (Lord)': One of David's soldiers (I Ch 12 5). E. E. N.

BEALOTH, bē-ê'loth (בְּעָלוֹת, bᵉ'ālōth): A town in the "South" (Jos 15 24). Perhaps the same as Baalath-beer. See BAAL, III. E. E. N.

BEAM (δοκός): One of the main timbers of a building. The term is used figuratively in Mt 7 3; Lk 6 41 f. in contrast to mote (q.v.) in order vividly to suggest the inconsistency of criticizing the minor faults of others when our own are so much more conspicuous. J. M. T.

BEANS. See PALESTINE, § 23, and FOOD, § 3.

BEAR. See PALESTINE, § 24.

BEARD: The Israelite was accustomed to wear a full beard which was to be shaved only in exceptional cases, as that of a leper (Lv 14 9), or of extreme mourning (Jer 41 5), although this was contrary to the stricter spirit of the law (cf. Lv 19 27, 21 5), which viewed such defacements as heathenish. To compel one to cut off his beard was thus to inflict upon him an insulting disgrace (II S 10 4 f.). See also MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 4. E. E. N.

BEAST: In EVV this term designates: 1. A brute animal, as distinguished from man (Ezk 14 13). 2. A quadruped, as distinguished from other living creatures (Gn 6 7). 3. A wild, as distinguished from a domesticated, animal (Job 5 22 f.; Ps 79 2). 4. An apocalyptic symbol of brute force, as set over against the divine power, or distinguished from humanity (Dn 7 3; Rev 4 6 ff., AV; but RV "living creatures"). A. C. Z.

BEATEN GOLD. See METALS, § 1.

BEATEN OIL. See OIL.

BEATING. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (b).

BEAUTIFUL GATE. See TEMPLE, § 32.

BEAUTY AND BANDS: Two terms used symbolically in Zec 11 4-14 (better rendered, "grace and union"), signifying God's gracious purpose toward His people which they stubbornly opposed. E. E. N.

BEBAI, bî'ba-ai (בֵּבָי, bebhāy): 1. The ancestral head of a large post-exilic family (Ezr 2 11; Neh 7 16, 8 11, 10 28). 2. One of this family (Neh 10 15). E. E. N.

BECHER, bî'kẹr (בֶּכֶר, bekher) 1. The ancestral head of one of the clans of Benjamin (Gn 46 21; I Ch 7 6-8). 2. The ancestral head of the Becherites, a clan or family of Ephraim. But in I Ch 7 20 we read Bered, which may be the correct form, or there may have been some genealogical confusion, owing to the contiguity of the territory of the two tribes Benjamin and Ephraim. E. E. N.

BECORATH, bẹ-cō'rath (בְּכֹרַת, bᵉkhōrath, Bechorath AV): An ancestor of Saul (I S 9 1). E. E. N.

BED, BEDSTEAD (Couch in RV of I Ch 5 1; Est 1 6, 7 8; Job 17 13; Ps 41 3; Pr 7 16): In the simpler conditions of life reflected in the Bible it was customary to sleep in one's ordinary clothing, using the outer garment or cloak for a covering (Ex 22 27). In more advanced conditions, an ordinary rug or mat was used as a bed. Later, a mattress either took the place of the mat or was used with it, and together with a pillow and a simple coverlet or quilt for cold nights made up the bed furniture of a common individual. The mattress was rolled up and put away for the day within a closet. But bedsteads must have been used occasionally, as may be inferred from the fact that the sarcophagus of Og, King of Bashan, is called his "bedstead" (Dt 3 11). But more usually such bedsteads were made of lighter material and more easily movable. The place of a bedstead was sometimes taken by the raised platform or immovable divan along the walls of a room (miṭṭāh, Gn 47 31; II K 4 10; mishkābh, Song 3 1). This was covered with cushions and used as a sofa during the day.

More elaborate and ornamented bedsteads are mentioned in Am 6 4, 3 15 ("beds of ivory") and Est 1 6 ("couches of gold and silver"). These were used by the wealthy, and offered an opportunity for indulging the love of display and luxury. Such bedsteads were further furnished with pillars and a canopy like those of palanquins (Song 3 10; Est 1 6). A. C. Z.

BEDAD, bî'dad (בֶּדַד, bᵉdhadh): The father of Hadad, King of Edom (Gn 36 35; I Ch 1 46). E. E. N.

BEDAN, bî'dan (בְּדָן, bᵉdhan): 1. Referred to in I S 12 11 as one of the early deliverers of Israel. The text is probably wrong. LXX. and Syriac read Barak, but perhaps the original reading was Abdon; cf. Jg 12 13 ff. 2. The head of a Manassite family (I Ch 7 17). E. E. N.

BEDCHAMBER. See HOUSE, §§ 1 and 6 (h).

BEDEIAH, be-dî'yā (בְּדֵיָה, bedhyāh): One of the "sons of Bani" who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 35). E. E. N.

BEE. See PALESTINE, § 26.

BEELIADA, bî''ẹ-lai'a-da (בְּעֶלְיָדָע, bᵉ'elyādhā'), 'Baal [in sense of Jehovah] knows': A son of David (I Ch 14 7), called Eliada in II S 5 16 and I Ch 3 8. E. E. N.

BEELZEBUB, be-el'zẹ-bub: 1. The Heb. בַּעַל זְבוּב, ba'al zᵉbhūbh, Baalzebub, 'the god of flies,' worshiped by the Philistines of Ekron (II K 1 2 f., 6, 16). It is not clear whether this Baalzebub was regarded as a special divinity, sender of flies, or the sun as the healer of disease through his piercing rays. 2. The Greek form of the same is Βεελζεβούλ (Beelzebul, so also AVmg. and RVmg., Mt 10 25, 12 24, 27; Mk 3 22; Lk 11 15 f.). Jerome calls him the "Chief of the devils"; Cheyne renders "Lord of the Mansion," i.e., of the nether world; Lightfoot, "Lord of Dung." A. C. Z.

BEER, bî'ẹr (בְּאֵר, bᵉ'ēr): 1. A place where the Israelites made a station during the wilderness journey (Nu 21 16), also called Beer-elim, 'well of terebinths' (Is 15 8). 2. The place where Jotham took refuge from his brother Abimelech (Jg 9 21). Both sites unknown. A. C. Z.

BEER-, bî'ẹr- (בְּאֵר, bᵉ'ēr), 'a well': On account of the necessity of a constant water-supply, sites of towns were often chosen because of nearness to a well or wells, and named accordingly, as Beer-elim, Beer-lahai-roi, Beer-sheba, Beeroth (plural of beer). A. C. Z.

BEERA, bî'ĕr-a (בְּאֵרָא, be'ērā'), 'well': A son of Zophar of the tribe of Asher (I Ch 7 37).
E. E. N.

BEERAH, bî'ĕr-ā (בְּאֵרָה, be'ērāh), 'well': A Reubenite "prince," carried away captive by Tiglath-pileser III (I Ch 5 6). E. E. N.

BEER-ELIM, bî"ĕr-î'lim (בְּאֵר אֵילִים, be'ēr 'ēlīm), 'well of [sacred] trees': According to the common Heb. text, 'well of mighty ones,' Is 15 8. Site unknown. E. E. N.

BEERI, bĕ-î'rai (בְּאֵרִי, be'ērī): 1. A Hittite, father of Judith, one of Esau's wives (Gn 26 34). 2. The father of the prophet Hosea (Hos 1 1).
E. E. N.

BEER-LAHAI-ROI, bî"ĕr-la-hai'-roi" (בְּאֵר לַחַי רֹאִי, be'ēr laḥay rō'ī): The well (probably not far from Kadesh) near which Hagar had her theophany (Gn 16 7-14) and where Isaac lived for some time (Gn 24 62, 25 11). The interpretation of the name given in RVmg., "the well of the living one who seeth me," is not entirely satisfactory. The Heb. expression offers difficulties of interpretation which have not yet been cleared up. In the context (Gn 16 12 f.) the emphasis is on God's 'seeing,' but nothing is said that explains laḥay, taken to mean 'living one.' The same Heb. letters would ordinarily be taken to mean 'jaw bone' (cf. Jg 15 17 ff.), but this does not explain rō'ī, 'who seeth me.' Many scholars think that rō'ī stood originally for the name of some animal. In that case the whole name must be considered a place-name much older (and no longer understood) than the origin of the story in Gn 16, which simply gives it an interpretation. See Comm. on Gen., esp. Driver (p. 183, note) and Gunkel, ad loc. E. E. N.

BEEROTH, bĕ-î'roth (בְּאֵרֹת, be'ērōth), 'wells': 1. A Canaanite city once leagued with Gibeon and included with it in the treaty between Israel and the Gibeonites (Jos 9 17). It was in the territory assigned to Benjamin (Jos 18 25; II S 4 2). After the Exile it was again occupied by the Jews (Ezr 2 25; Neh 7 29). Its inhabitants were called Beerothites (II S 4 2, 23 27; I Ch 11 39). Map III, F 5.

BEEROTH BENE JAAKAN, bî'nĕ jê'a-kan. See JAAKAN.

BEER-SHEBA (בְּאֵר שֶׁבַע, be'ēr shebha'): The residence of the patriarchs (Gn 21 31, 26 23, 28 10); the name signifying 'well of seven' (Gn 21 30 f.), or 'well of oath' (26 31-33), or, as Strabo states it (xvi. 4, 24), "seven wells" (cf. Kiriath-arba, 'fourfold city'). It is pretty safely identified with the modern Bīr'es-seba, 28 m. SW. from Hebron. Map II, C 4. The neighboring district was called the Wilderness of Beer-sheba (Gn 21 14). Being situated on the S. border of the country, the expression naturally arose "from Dan to Beer-sheba" (Jg 20 1; I S 3 20), which is used conversely by the chronicler "from Beer-sheba to Dan" (I Ch 21 2; II Ch 30 5). It was a city of Simeon (Jos 19 2). Samuel's sons became judges at Beer-sheba (I S 8 2); Elijah fled to Horeb via Beer-shcba (I K 19 3). The mother of King Joash was born there (II K 12 1). In the days of Amos there was at Beer-sheba an important sanctuary (Am 5 5, 8 14). G. L. R.

BEESHTERAH, bĕ-esh'tĕ-rā (בְּעֶשְׁתְּרָה, be'eshtērāh) (called Ashtaroth in I Ch 6 71; possibly an abbreviation for Beth-Ashtaroth, 'house of A.'): A city in Bashan (Jos 21 27). See ASHTAROTH.

BEETLE. See PALESTINE, § 26.

BEGGAR: The Mosaic legislation was designed to prevent the formation of a beggar class among the Hebrews (cf. Dt 15 4, 7, 9, 11; Ex 23 11). Accordingly, though such a class is common enough in the Orient, there is no mention of beggars in the O T (except in I S 2 8, AV for the Heb. ebhyōn, 'poor'). The term 'poor,' however, may often mean such destitute persons as were dependent upon the bounty of their more prosperous brethren for their means of daily subsistence (Ps 41 1, 82 4). Likewise in the N T the term "beggar" (Lk 16 20, 22) represents the Greek πτωχός, 'poor.' See also ALMS. A. C. Z.

BEGOTTEN. See ONLY-BEGOTTEN.

BEHEAD. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (a).

BEHEMOTH, bî'he-moth (בְּהֵמוֹת, bĕhēmōth), apparently an intensive plural, from bĕhēmāh, 'beast' (so Cheyne, EB), hence 'colossal beast': A monstrous beast, used as an illustration of the Divine creative power in Job 40 15 ff. The details of the description fit the hippopotamus more nearly than they do any other animal. But the description (like that of 'Leviathan,' ch. 41) goes beyond the bounds of nature into the mythological realm, borrowing details from Egyptian or Babylonian mythology, simply to make the impression more forcible and show how God is absolutely supreme over all beings, natural or supernatural. Possibly there is a similar instance in Is 30 6 ("beasts" = Behemoth?). (See Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos, p. 64 f., and Cheyne in EB.) See PALESTINE, § 24. E. E. N.

BEL. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 16.

BEL AND THE DRAGON. See DANIEL, ADDITIONS TO.

BELA, bî'la (בֶּלַע, bela'): I. 1. A king of Edom, the first in the list given in Gn 36 32 ff. He is called the "son of Beor," which has led many scholars to identify him with Balaam, son of Beor (Nu 22 5 ff.), but this is very uncertain. 2. The ancestral head of one of the clans of Benjamin, the Belaites (Gn 46 21; Nu 26 38 ff.; I Ch 7 6 f., 8 1 ff.). 3. The ancestral head of one of the clans of Reuben (I Ch 5 8-10).

II. A city near the Dead Sea, one of the five attacked by Chedorlaomer (Gn 14 2, 8), identical with Zoar. E. E. N.

BELIAL, bî'li-ɑl (בְּלִיַּעַל, bᵉlīya'al), bᵉli, 'not,' and ya'al [in Hiphil], 'profit'): Primarily 'unprofitable.' From this neutral sense, however, the term soon passed into the more positive one of 'wickedness.' It is used in the O T almost invariably in connection with some prefixed word, such as "son," "daughter," "children," "man," and designates a very wicked character (Dt 13 13; Jg 19 22; I S 1 16, 10 27, 25 25, etc. AV). In the apocalyptic literature Belial is personified and identified with the genius of all evil, Satan. By a change in the last sound of the word it was made into Beliar, 'Lord of the Forest' (II Co 6 15).

BELLOWS. See ARTISAN LIFE, §§ 10–12, and METALS, § 1.

BELLS: Mentioned in Scripture only in the following instances: 1. The golden bells (pa'amōnīm, fr. pa'am, 'to strike') which alternated with the pomegranates upon the skirts of the high priest's robe (Ex 28 33 f., 39 25 f.). 2. The bells used on horses were called mᵉtsillōth, fr. tsalal, 'to clang' (Zec 14 20).

BELSHAZZAR, bel-shaz'ɑr (בֵּלְשַׁאצַּר, bēlsha'-tstsar): The last Chaldean king of Babylon, according to Dn 5; but prince-regent and son of Nabonidus, the last king, according to the Babylonian inscriptions. His name appears in his father's and other records as Bel-shar-uzur ('may Bel protect the king'). He was commander of at least a portion of the army in its final stand against Cyrus in 538 B.C. His relation to Nebuchadrezzar was simply that of successor in power and not 'son,' as Dn 5 18 implies. His death described in Dn 5 may have been narrated in portions of Nabonidus's annals that have been lost. Whatever view we may take of the Book of Daniel it may be affirmed with confidence that B. is a historical character, that he was the son of Nabonidus, and that he occupied a prominent place in the government of Babylonia just before it fell into the hands of Cyrus.
I. M. P.

BELTESHAZZAR, bel''tę-shaz'ɑr (בַּלְטְשַׁאצַּר, bēlṭᵉsha'tstsar, Babyl. Balaṭ-sharuṣur, 'guard the life of the king'): The Babylonian name given to Daniel (Dn 1 7, 2 20, etc.).

BEN-ABINADAB, ben''-ɑ-bin'ɑ-dab (בֶּן־אֲבִינָדָב, ben-'ăbhīnādhābh), 'son of Abinadab': An official under Solomon (I K 4 11).
E. E. N.

BENAIAH, bę-nê'yā (בְּנָיָה, בְּנָיָהוּ, bᵉnāyāh), 'J" has built': 1. A son of Jehoiada, of priestly family (I Ch 27 5), commander of David's body-guard, reckoned among the heroes (II S 23 22) with a name 'like the three' (cf. Smith in Int. Crit. Com.), a man of prowess and the victor over both Moabite and Egyptian champions. In David's later years his star was in the ascendant, while between the lines appears the story of a bitter rivalry with Joab. When the latter's shrewdness forsook him, and Adonijah's coup failed, Benaiah's loyalty was rewarded by the chief command, and he became his rival's executioner (I K 2 28-35). 2. A Pirathonite, another of the thirty heroes (II S 23 30). 3. A Simeonite prince (I Ch 4 36). 4. A Levite of the second degree who played "with psalteries set to Alamoth" in the time of David (I Ch 15 18-20). 5. One of the priests who "did blow the trumpets before the ark of God" (I Ch 15 24). 6. A forefather of Jahaziel (II Ch 20 14). 7. A Levite overseer of the Temple in Hezekiah's time (II Ch 31 13). 8. The father of Pelatiah, a "prince of the people" (Ezk 11 1-13). 9-12. Names of four Israelites who married foreign wives (Ezr 10 25 ff.).

BEN-GEBER, -gê'bęr (בֶּן־גֶּבֶר, ben gebher), 'son of Geber': One of Solomon's officials (I K 4 13).
E. E. N.

BEN-HADAD, ben''hê'dad (בֶּן־הֲדַד, ben ḥădhadh), 'son of Hadad': The name Ben-hadad is the Heb. form of the name Dadda-'idri or Adad-'idri (=Hadad-ezer, II S 8 3) found in the Assyr. inscriptions as the name of the king of Damascus contemporary with Ahab. The god Hadad (or Adad, the same as Ramman or Rimmon) was a weather- or storm-god, widely worshiped in SW. Asia and, apparently, the national god of Damascus. Adad-'idri means 'Adad is my help.'

The O T speaks of three kings of Damascus with this name: 1. The son of Tabrimmon, who was hired by Asa of Judah to attack the NE. frontiers of Israel (I K 15 18 ff.; II Ch 10 2 ff.). 2. The son of the preceding and the contemporary of Ahab of Israel, with whom he was frequently at war. He was an able, energetic king, who waged a long and fairly successful struggle against Shalmaneser II of Assyria (860–824), who has left a record of a great defeat inflicted on B. and a number of confederates (including Ahab) at Karkar in 854. This victory was really indecisive, for Shalmaneser did not take Damascus and undertook several other campaigns against B. without attaining any permanent advantage. This B. was succeeded by Hazael (who perhaps murdered him; cf. II K 8 15), about 844 (I K 20, 22; II K 5, 6 24–7 20, 8 7-15). Many scholars consider 1 and 2 to be identical. 3. The son and successor of Hazael. He is called Mari in the Assyr. inscriptions. He was conquered by Ramman Nirari III of Assyria, c. 803. This event broke the power of Damascus and gave Israel a chance to recover from the crushing defeats inflicted by Hazael (II K 13 3-5, 24). E. E. N.

BENHAIL, -hē'il (בֶּן־חַיִל, ben ḥayil), 'son of strength': A prince of Judah, one of the company of "teachers" appointed by Jehoshaphat (II Ch 17 7). E. E. N.

BEN-HANAN, -hē'nan (בֶּן־חָנָן, ben ḥānān), 'son of the gracious one': A Judahite, the son of Shimon (I Ch 4 20). E. E. N.

BEN-HESED, -hī'sed (בֶּן־חֶסֶד, ben ḥeṣedh), 'son of Hesed': One of Solomon's officials (I K 4 10). E. E. N.

BEN-HUR, -hūr' (בֶּן־חוּר, ben ḥūr), 'son of Hur': One of Solomon's officials (I K 4 8). E. E. N.

BENINU, bę-naı'nū (בְּנִינוּ, bᵉnīnū): A Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 13). E. E. N.

BENJAMIN, ben'jā-min (בִּנְיָמִין, binyāmīn), 'son of the right hand': I. 1. A son of Jacob (see TRIBES, § 4). 2. A Benjamite, the son of Bilhan (I Ch 7 10). 3. One of the "sons of Harim" (Ezr 10 32; Neh 3 23, 12 34).

II. The tribal name Benjamin was naturally applied to the territory occupied by the tribe. This territory is defined in Jos 18 11-20, and included the towns enumerated in the immediately following paragraph (vs. 21-28). It is not clear whether Bethel and Jerusalem were within it. The site of Jerusalem was just on the border between Benjamin and Judah, and, ideally considered, might have belonged to the former during the earlier days when it was still a Jebusite city. There are evidences, however, that at the time of the Exile it was quite firmly fixed in possession of the larger tribe (Jer 37 12).

As to Bethel, after the destruction following the accession of Rehoboam, it is found within the borders of Ephraim and was made by Jeroboam one of the two shrines of the northern kingdom (I K 12 32). In Jos 18 32, however, it is said to belong to Benjamin. It is possible that part of Benjamin joined in the revolt against Rehoboam. It has been held that such was the case upon the basis of I K 12 20 ("There was none that followed the house of David but the tribe of Judah only"). But against this stand a series of explicit statements (I K 12 21, 23; II Ch 11 10, 12, 23, 14 8, 15 2, 9, etc.), and the fact that even in N T times Benjamin was regarded as a portion of the Jewish commonwealth. Paul belonged to this tribe.

III. One of the gates of Jerusalem, Jer 20 2, 37 13, 38 7; Zec 13 14 f.; see JERUSALEM, § 32. A. C. Z.

BENO, bī'no (בְּנוֹ, bᵉnō): A son of Merari (I Ch 24 26 f.). E. E. N.

BENONI, ben-ō'ni: Another name for Benjamin. See TRIBES, § 3.

BEN-ZOHETH, ben-zō'heth (בֶּן־זֹחֵת, ben zōḥēth), 'son of Zoheth': A son of Ishi, a man of Judah (I Ch 4 20). E. E. N.

BEON, bī'on. See BAAL-MEON.

BEOR, bī'ȯr (בְּעוֹר, bᵉ'ōr): 1. The father of Bela, the first king of Edom (Gn 36 32). 2. The father of the seer Balaam (Nu 22 5, etc.). Some would identify him with 1. E. E. N.

BERA, bī'ra (בֶּרַע, beray): King of Sodom (Gn 14 2). E. E. N.

BERACAH, ber'a-ca (בְּרָכָה, bᵉrākhāh, Berachah, ber'a-cā, AV): I. A Benjamite who came to David at Ziklag (I Ch 12 3). II. A valley where an army invading Judah in the days of Jehoshaphat was destroyed (II Ch 20 26). Perhaps the modern ruins Berekût indicate the locality. Map II, E 2. E. E. N.

BERACHIAH, ber"a-cai'ā. See BERECHIAH.

BERAIAH, ber"a-ai'ā (בְּרָאיָה, bᵉrā'yāh), 'J" creates': A Benjamite, one of the sons of Shimei (I Ch 8 21). E. E. N.

BEREA, bę-rī'a. See BEROEA.

BERECHIAH, ber"ę-cai'ā (בֶּרֶכְיָה, berekhyāh), 'J" blesses': 1. The father of Zechariah the prophet (Zec 1 1, 7). (In some editions of AV called Barachiah.) 2. The father of Asaph the singer (I Ch 6 39, 15 17). 3. A Levite doorkeeper for the ark (I Ch 15 23). 4. A chief of the Ephraimites (II Ch 28 12). 5. A post-exilic Levite (I Ch 9 16). 6. The father of Meshullam (Neh 3 4, 30, 6 18). 7. One of the sons of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 20). E. E. N.

BERED, bī'red (בֶּרֶד, beredh): 1. A place in the wilderness S. of Beersheba (Gn 16 7, 14). Site unknown. 2. See BECHER, 2. E. E. N.

BERI, bī'rai (בֵּרִי, bērī): The head of a family of Asher (I Ch 7 36). With this family the Berites (II S 20 14) had nothing to do. Perhaps the original reading was Bichrites (see BECHER, 2). E. E. N.

BERIAH, bę-rai'ā (בְּרִיעָה, bᵉrī'āh): 1. One of the sons of Asher who migrated to Egypt with Jacob (Gn 46 17) and therefore the designation of one of the clans of the tribe of Asher, the Beriites (Nu 26 44 f.). 2. The designation of an Ephraimitic clan with a Benjamite intermixture. According to 1 Ch 7 21 ff. Ezer and Elead, sons of Ephraim, lost their lives in a cattle raid against Gath. After a period of mourning, their father, Ephraim, begat another son, Beriah. In I Ch 8 13 Beriah and Shema are two Benjamites who put the men of Gath to flight. Scholars interpret these names in the tribal sense, B. being a clan composed of individuals from two tribes. 3. A son of Shimei, the Gershonite (I Ch 23 10). J. A. K.

BERNICE, bęr-nai'sê (Βερνίκη): Daughter of Herod Agrippa I and sister of Herod Agrippa II. She was thrice married. At the time of Paul's trial before Festus (Ac 25 13 ff.), she had recently left her third husband, Polemon, King of Pontus. During the war with Rome (66–70) she became the mistress of Titus and afterward lived with him at Rome. Public policy alone prevented him from acknowledging her to be his wife. See Jos. Antiq. (passim) and Schürer HJP I. § 19 (supplement).

BERODACH-BALADAN, be-rō″dac-bal′a-dan: A king of Babylon (II K 20 12; Is 39 1). See MERODACH-BALADAN.

BERŒA, be-rî′a (Βέροια): A city of Macedonia in the province of Emathia, at the foot of Mt. Bermius, founded by Theron (Beron) or by Berœa, daughter of Beros. It was the scene of the defeat of Demetrius by Pyrrhus (288 B.C.). After the battle of Pydna (168 B.C.) it was the first city to surrender to the Romans. Pompey was quartered here in 49 B.C. B. was the most populous city in Macedonia in the 1st cent. A.D. Paul preached here with some success to the Jewish colony on his second missionary journey (Ac 17 10, 13). B. was destroyed by an earthquake in 900 A.D. The modern name is Verria.

BEROTHAI, be-rō′thai (בֵּרֹתַי, bērōthay): A city belonging to Hadadezer, King of Zobah, conquered by David (II S 8 8). It is identified by some with Bereitān, a little S. of Baalbek.
E. E. N.

BEROTHITE, bî′ro-thait (בֵּרֹתִי, bērōthī): Naharai the Berothite (I Ch 11 39) was probably a man of Beeroth (q.v.).

BERYL. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 2.

BESAI, bî′sai (בֵּסַי, bēṣay): The ancestral head of a Nethinim family (Ezr 2 49, Neh 7 52).
E. E. N.

BESIEGE: The offensive wars in which the Israelites were engaged were usually of short duration and probably did not involve any long or elaborate siege-operations. Though we read of sieges (e.g., in Jg 9 46-52; II S 20 15; I K 15 27) these were little more than the brief investment of a town by the blockading army. The methods for destroying the wall, etc., were of the simplest kind. It was otherwise with the operations of the Egyptian and Assyrian armies. These were provided with scaling-ladders, with protected cars which could be pushed close to the walls (as depicted on their wall inscriptions), with battering-rams (Ezk 21 22, the covering of which is perhaps meant by mantelet, Nah 2 5), etc. Later kings of Judah sought to provide themselves with like engines of warfare (II Ch 26 15). Naturally, with this development of offensive methods there went a corresponding development of defensive works. Walls were made stronger, furnished with bulwarks or outer walls, etc. By the Romans the science of siege-operations was carried to a high state of perfection (cf. Josephus' descriptions in BJ, passim).

BESODEIAH, bes″o-dî′yā (בְּסוֹדְיָה, bᵉṣōdhyāh), 'in the secret of J″' (?): The father of Meshullam (Neh 3 6).
E. E. N.

BESOM, bî′zǫm: An old English word meaning a broom. The Heb. term maṭ'ăṭē' in Is 14 23 is rare, but means probably some kind of sweeping instrument.
E. E. N.

BESOR, bî′sōr (בְּשׂוֹר, bᵉsōr): A wady or brook mentioned in I S 30 9, 10, 21. Probably the Wady esh Sheriah, a tributary of Wady Ghusseh, Map II, B 3.
E. E. N.

BESTEAD, bę-sted′, for early Eng. bested, i.e., 'placed' (Is 8 21 AV). The RV reads "sore distressed." The Heb. (נָקְשָׁה) has reference to being in great difficulty or hardship.

BETH-ABARA, beth″-ab′a-ra. See BETHANY, 2.

BETH-ANATH, beth″-ê′nath (בֵּית עֲנָת, bēth-ănāth), 'temple of Anath': An old Canaanitish fortress later occupied by Naphtali (Jos 19 38; Jg 1 33). Though mentioned in Egyptian lists, its exact site is uncertain.
E. E. N.

BETH-ANOTH, beth″-ê′noth (בֵּית עֲנוֹת, bēth-ănōth): A town of Judah (Jos 15 59). Probably the modern Beit 'Ainûn, Map II, E 2. E. E. N.

BETHANY, beth′a-ni (Βηθανία): 1. Bethany near Jerusalem, now called el'Azariyeh from Lazarus, the place of Jesus' arrival on His last journey to Jerusalem (Mk 11 1; Mt 21 1; Lk 19 29; Jn 12 1); also the place of His ascension (Lk 24 50). Map II, F 1.

2. Bethany beyond Jordan (Jn 1 28, early changed in some MSS. to Bethabara, so AV). One of the places where John baptized (cf. also Jn 3 23). The site of this second Bethany is uncertain. J. M. T.

BETH-ARABAH, beth″-ar′a-bā (בֵּית הָעֲרָבָה, bēth hā-'ărābhāh), 'the house of (or in) the Arabah': A town on the NE. border of Judah. Site unknown (Jos 15 6, 61); Jos 18 22 may refer to a different place. E. E. N.

BETH-ARAM, -ê′ram. See BETH-HARAN.

BETH-ARBEL, beth″-ār′bel (בֵּית אַרְבֵאל, bēth 'arbē'l), 'house of Arbel': In Hos 10 14 we read "as Shalman destroyed Beth-arbel in the day of battle." Many conjectures have been advanced to explain this statement, as e.g., that Shalman =Shalmaneser II, King of Assyria, and Beth-arbel =Arbela (Irbid in Gilead, Map I, G 5), but none of them rests on certain grounds. E. E. N.

BETH-AVEN, -ê′ven (בֵּית אָוֶן, bēth 'āwen): A place E. of Bethel near Ai (Jos 7 2; I S 13 5, 14 23). Near it was a "wilderness" (Jos 18 12). The exact site is unknown. According to the pointing of the present Heb. text bēth 'āwen means 'house of wickedness,' but the original pronunciation may have been bēth 'ōn (so LXX. [B] in Jos 18 12). It was easy to transform b.'ōn into b. 'āwen and use this as a contemptuous designation for Bethel ('house of God'), the seat of corrupt worship, as seems to have been done by Hosea (4 15, 5 8, 10 5). E. E. N.

BETH-BIRI, -bî′rai (בֵּית בִּרְאִי, bēth bir'ī), B. birei AV: A place in Simeon (I Ch 4 31), called Beth-lebaoth in Jos 19 6 and Lebaoth in Jos 15 32. Site unknown. E. E. N.

BETH-CAR, -cār″ (בֵּית כָּר, bēth kār): A place, possibly a height, marking the limit of a pursuit of the Philistines by Israel (I S 7 11). Site unknown. E. E. N.

BETH-DAGON, -dê′gon (בֵּית דָּגוֹן, bēth dāgōn), 'house of Dagon': 1. A town of Judah (Jos 15 41). Map III, C 5. 2. A town on the border of Asher (Jos 19 27). The identification, Map IV, B 6, is somewhat uncertain. Both places were doubtless once seats of Dagon-worship. E. E. N.

BETH-DIBLATHAIM, -dib″la-thê′im. See ALMON-DIBLATHAIM.

BETHEL (בֵּיתְאֵל, bēth'ēl), 'house of God': A locality 12 m. N. of Jerusalem on the way to Shechem. Two accounts are given of the origin of the name. According to one, Jacob fleeing from Esau to Paddan-aram became aware through a dream of God's special presence at the place, and called it "the house of God" (Gn 28 19 [J]); according to the second, on his return from Paddan-aram he received the assurance of a blessing from God at that spot, "and set up a pillar in the place where he spoke with him, a pillar of stone, and poured out a drink-offering thereon and poured oil thereon, and Jacob called the name of the place where God spake with him Bethel" (Gn 35 14 f. [P]). Originally, the name probably belonged more narrowly to a high place or shrine in the vicinity of Luz. Later, it passed on to the neighboring city with its adjacent country (Jg 1 23). In Jos 18 22 it is reckoned among the cities of Benjamin; but from Jg 1 22-25 it appears that "the house of Joseph" secured possession of it by treachery, and in Jos 8 17 its capture is associated with that of Ai. In I Ch 7 28 it is mentioned among the possessions of Ephraim. When Jeroboam led the ten tribes to break away from Rehoboam, Bethel became the most prominent shrine in the new kingdom. To this end its history contributed materially, for even before the days of Jacob, Abraham had built an altar at the place (Gn 12 8, 13 3-6), and Jacob's experience gave it a permanent name for sacredness (Gn 28 18-22, 31 13, 35 15). To the prophets Bethel became a symbol of the idolatrous worship of the northern tribes which was evidently thoroughly organized with its own priesthood and ritual. In modern geography, Bethel is to be identified with Beitin. Map III, F 5. (Cf. for fuller history G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 250 ff.) A. C. Z.

BETH-EMEK, -î′mek (בֵּית הָעֵמֶק, bēth hā-'ēmeq), 'house (place) of the valley': A place on the border of Asher (Jos 19 27). Possibly the modern 'Amḳā, Map IV, B 6. E. E. N.

BETHER, bî′ther (בֶּתֶר, bether): In Song 2 17 we read "the mountains of Bether." The name may be only figurative, 'mountains of divisions or separations.' But a Bether is mentioned in LXX. of Jos 15 19—probably the modern Bittīr on a hill about 6 m. SW. of Jerusalem. Map II, E 1. E. E. N.

BETHESDA, bę-thez′da. See JERUSALEM, § 12.

BETH-EZEL, -î′zel (בֵּית הָאֵצֶל, bēth hā'ētsel), 'place near by': A place in the Shephelah (Mic 1 11). Site unknown. E. E. N.

BETH-GADER, -gê′dęr (בֵּית גָּדֵר, bēth gādhēr): A place inhabited by a Calebite clan (I Ch 2 51), otherwise unknown. E. E. N.

BETH-GAMUL, -gê′mul (בֵּית גָּמוּל, bēth-gāmūl): A town of Moab (Jer 48 23), probably between Kiriathaim and Beth-meon. E. E. N.

BETH-GILGAL, -gil′gal (בֵּית הַגִּלְגָּל, bēth haggilgāl), 'house of Gilgal,' so AV (Neh 12 29). Same as GILGAL (q.v.). A. C. Z.

BETH-HACCHEREM, -hac'kę-rem (בֵּית הַכֶּרֶם, bēth hakkerem, Beth-Haccerem AV), 'place of the vineyard': A place in Judah (Jer 6 1; Neh 3 14). Site unknown. E. E. N.

BETH-HARAN, -hê'ran (בֵּית הָרָן, bēth-hārān): A city E. of Jordan in the territory of Gad (Nu 32 36, called B.-Haran in Jos 13 27 [B.-Aram AV]), identified by some as Tel Ramah, Map II, H 1, by others as Beit Harran. At the latter place Herod built the palace in which he celebrated his birthday (Mt 14 6-12). A. C. Z.

BETH-HOGLAH, -hǫg'lā (בֵּית חָגְלָה, bēth-ḥaglāh): A town of Benjamin, near the NE. border of Judah, not far from the Dead Sea (Jos 15 6, 18 19, 21). Map II, H 1. E. E. N.

BETH-HORON, -hō'rǫn (בֵּית חוֹרֹן, bēth ḥōrōn), 'house of a hollow,' perhaps from a bowl-shaped valley in the vicinity: Two neighboring places (II Ch 8 5) about 3 m. apart, distinguished from each other as the "upper" (Jos 16 5) and "nether" (Jos 16 3) Beth-horon. They were both on the boundary between Ephraim and Benjamin to the W. of the watershed of the hill-country (Jos 10 10 f.). Map III, E 5. Josephus (BJ II, 19 8) places the region on the way from Jerusalem to Antipatris and Cæsarea. The importance of B. in history lies chiefly in the availability of the spot as a fortified strategic point (Jth 4 4). Solomon evidently appreciated this fact when he "built" it (I K 9 17; II Ch 8 5); so did the Ephraimitess Sheerah, whose interest and authority, however, are very obscure (I Ch 7 24). In the Maccabean period, Jonathan used the spot in a similar way (I Mac 9 50). Beth-Horon was also invested with a sacred character as a Levite city (Jos 21 22; I Ch 6 68). In modern times the two Beth-Horons are known as Beit-Ur el Fōqa and Beit-Ur et-Taḥta respectively, two villages with some old ruins (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, pp. 254, 290). A. C. Z.

BETH-JESHIMOTH, -jesh'i-mǫth (בֵּית הַיְשִׁימוֹת, bēth ha-yᵉshīmōth): A town in the territory of Moab, in the region where Israel encamped (Nu 33 49). It was assigned to Reuben (Jos 12 3, 13 20), but afterward reoccupied by the Moabites (Ezk 25 9). Map II, H 1. E. E. N.

BETH-LE-APHRAH, -lę-af'rā (בֵּית לְעַפְרָה, bēth lᵉ'aphrāh), 'house of Aphrah' (so AV): A town near the western border of Judah (Mic 1 10). Site unknown. E. E. N.

BETH-LEBAOTH, -lę-bê'ǫth (בֵּית לְבָאוֹת, bēth lᵉbhā'ōth), 'place of lions': A town of Simeon (Jos 19 6), also called Lebaoth (Jos 15 32) and Beth-biri (I Ch 4 31). Site unknown. E. E. N.

BETHLEHEM, beth'lę-hem (בֵּית לֶחֶם, bēth leḥem), 'house of bread': 1. A city of Judah, called at times Beth-lehem-judah (Jg 17 7 ff., 19 1 ff.; Ru 1 1 f.; I S 17 12; cf. Mt 2 1, 5 f.), to distinguish it from the city of similar name in Zebulun (see 2), the modern village of Beit Laḥm ('house of flesh'), 5 m. SSW of Jerusalem (Map II, F 1), situated in a region which was, and still is, one of the most fertile in Judæa, though, singularly enough, unsupplied with springs of water.

If the LXX. text of Jos 15 59 is genuine, the name occurs in the list of the cities of Judah. The first reasonably assured mention of the place, however, is in the David narrative, where it is spoken of as the home of his father, Jesse, the Bethlemite (I S 16 1, 17 12, 15, 58) and his own city (I S 20 6, 28), the scene of his anointing (I S 16 4 ff.), and from the well at whose gate he longed for a draft of water (II S 23 14 ff.). If the gloss of Gn 35 19 and 48 7 is correct, it is mentioned under the name of Ephrath (cf. I S 17 12; Ru 1 2, where inhabitants of B. are called Ephrathites), which is given in its longer form Ephrathah (Ephratah AV; cf. also Ru 4 11; I Ch 2 50, 4 4; Ps 132 6), as part of the accepted name of the place by Micah (5 2; cf. the later documents Ru 4 11 [also 1 2]; I S 17 12; Ps 132 6. [In the passage I Ch 2 19 ff. Ephrath is considered as the district in which B. lay]). It is the scene of the story of Ruth (1 19, etc.); the place of the family sepulcher of Asahel, brother of Joab and Abishai (II S 2 32); the home of Elhanan, one of David's mighty men (II S 23 34). It was fortified by Rehoboam (II Ch 11 6). It was near B. that the Jews, who in 586 B.C. fled to Egypt, found a wayside refuge (Jer 41 17), and the site itself was repeopled by the "Children of Bethlehem" after the return from Babylon (Ezr 2 21 || Neh 7 26).

Its special distinction came from its prophetic assignment as the home of the coming Messianic King (Mic 5 2). In fulfilment of this prophecy it appears in the Mt narrative as the birthplace of Jesus (2 1-18). In the N T it is still distinguished as the Judæan B. (Mt 2 1, 5 f.), and as the "City of David" (Lk 2 4; cf. Jn 7 42). As such it was recognized in the Roman administration of the land; since the fact that Jesus was born in the place was due solely to the coming there at that time of Joseph and Mary to be registered as "of the house and family of David" under the Syrian census of Quirinius, c. 6 B.C. (Lk 2 1-7). The statement of Luke (2 7) that, because of the lack of room in the inn, or khan, Mary laid the infant in a manger is confirmed by the early tradition that makes Him to have been born in a cave (Justin Martyr, 140–150 A.D., Dial c. Tryph. § 78) and by the ancient practise of using the limestone caves of the hill-country of Judæa as shelters for cattle. The modern Church of the Nativity is built over a group of caves, some one of which may have been the historic cave of the nativity.

2. A city of Zebulun (Jos 19 15), the modern insignificant village of Beit Laḥm, 7 m. NW of Nazareth (Map IV, C 7), generally held to have been the home and burial-place of Ibzan, who judged Israel seven years (Jg 12 8, 10).

BETH-MAACAH, -mê'a-cā (בֵּית מַעֲכָה, bēth ma'ăkhāh, Beth-Maachah AV): The district where the town Abel was situated. "Abel of Beth-maacah" should be read in II S 20 14. This Abel was attacked by Ben-hadad I (I K 15 20) c. 900 B.C. Its people were borne away by Tiglath-pileser III (II K 15 29) c. 734 B.C. It was an old city, famous for its circle of

"wise" men and women (II S 20 18). The fertility of the site is indicated in its alternate name Abel-maim, 'meadow of waters' (II Ch 16 4). Its situation was strong and advantageous. Map IV, E 4. E. E. N.

BETH-MARCABOTH, -mār'cə-bŏth (בֵּית מַרְכָּבוֹת, bēth markābhōth), 'place of chariots': A town of Simeon not far from Ziklag mentioned along with Hazar-susah in Jos 19 5; I Ch 4 31. The parallel passage (Jos 15 31) has Madmannah (q.v.) and Sansannah (q.v.) as the names of the places. Since B.-Marcaboth = 'place of chariots,' and Hazar-susah = 'place of horses,' it is not impossible that the places had some connection with the trade in horses mentioned in I K 10 28 f.; cf. 9 19. E. E. N.

BETH-MEON, -mī'ŏn. See BETH-BAAL-MEON.

BETH-MERHAK, -mer'hak (בֵּית הַמֶּרְחָק, bēth hammerḥāq), 'the house afar off,' 'the far house' (II S 15 7; cf. AV): Apparently the name of a house or station near Jerusalem, between the city and the Kedron. E. E. N.

BETH-NIMRAH, -nim'rā (בֵּית נִמְרָה, bēth nimrāh): A town of Moab, in the region assigned to Gad. It was further built up and fortified by the Gadites (Nu 32 36; Jos 13 27). It is called Nimrah in Nu 32 3. Map III, H 5. E. E. N.

BETH-PAZZEZ, -paz'ez (בֵּית פַּצֵּץ, bēth patsēts): A town on the border of Issachar (Jos 19 21). Site unknown. E. E. N.

BETH-PELET, -pī'lĕt (בֵּית פֶּלֶט, bēth peleṭ), 'house of escape': A town in Judah (Jos 15 27, Beth-palet AV) reoccupied in post-exilic times (Neh 11 26, Beth-phelet AV). Site unknown. E. E. N.

BETH-PEOR, -pī'ōr (בֵּית פְּעוֹר, bēth pᵉ'ōr), 'house of Peor,' possibly 'house of Baal-Peor,' i.e., a shrine where Baal-Peor was worshiped: A city of Moab, not far from Mount Pisgah, the place where Israel listened to the farewell discourses of Moses (Dt 3 29, 4 46) and the neighborhood in which Moses was buried (Dt 34 6). In the assignment of territory E. of the Jordan it fell to the lot of Reuben. Regarding its more definite identification in modern geography, there is great uncertainty (cf. Conder, PEFQ, 1882, p. 85 f.). Map II, H 1. A. C. Z.

BETHPHAGE, bĕth'fə-jî (Βηθφαγή), 'house of figs' (Mt 21 1 and ‖s): A place on the Mt. of Olives, near Bethany. Site unknown. E. E. N.

BETH-RAPHA, -rê'fā (בֵּית רָפָא, bēth-rāphā'): Probably a place-name in the genealogy of Chelub (Caleb) (I Ch 4 12). E. E. N.

BETH-REHOB, -rī'hŏb (בֵּית רְחוֹב, bēth rᵉḥōbh): A district of Syria, not far from Dan (Jg 18 28; II S 10 6). Its exact limits are not known. The city of Dan was situated in the "valley of Beth-rehob" (Jg 18 28). Syrians of B. were involved in war with David (II S 10 6 ff.). See also REHOB. E. E. N.

BETHSAIDA, bĕth-sē'i-də (Βηθσαιδά), 'house of the fishers': According to Josephus (BJ. III, 10 7; cf. Vit. 72; Ant. XVIII, 2 1), a town situated 120 furlongs S. of Lake Semechonitis (Mērōm, Jos 11 5), the site of the modern et-Tell. Map IV, E 6. Early in the reign of Philip the Tetrarch B. was advanced to the rank of a city and named Julias in honor of Julia, the daughter of Augustus (Ant. XVIII, 2 1). B. was the home of some of Jesus' disciples, Philip, Andrew, Peter (Jn 1 44, 12 21), and was denounced by Jesus for its unbelief (Mt 11 21 and ‖). Jesus and His disciples withdrew to B. in order to escape Herod (Lk 9 10) and to avoid the multitudes (Mk 6 45, 8 22). The N T passages do not require the assumption of a second B. on the W. side of the lake (so Ewing, HBD, I, 282). When Jesus set out from Galilee His destination was B. Julias (Lk 9 10). But this not agreeing with ἐρημον τοπόν (Mk 6 31, 32), it is possible that Mark omitted the name in this passage, inserting it at the end of the accounts of the feeding of the multitude (Mk 6 45, 8 22). For the later history of B. cf. Schürer, HJP, II, i, p. 136. J. M. T.

BETHSHAN, -shan (בֵּית שָׁן, bēth shān), so in I S 31 10, 12; II S 21 12; elsewhere Beth-shean, בֵּית שְׁאָן, bēth shᵉ'ān), 'house of safety': A city in the possession of the western half of Manassch about 4 m. W. of the Jordan, and 12 m. S. of the Sea of Galilee, Map III, G 2. It is generally mentioned as a landmark (I K 4 12), except that in the collapse of the cause of Israel it seems to have been the first and easiest accessible place for the Philistines to celebrate their victory (I S 31 10). Its modern name is Beisan. It had an important history in post-biblical times, for which see G. A. Smith, HGHL, pp. 357 ff. A. C. Z.

BETH-SHEMESH, -shī'mesh (בֵּית שֶׁמֶשׁ, bēth shemesh), 'house of the sun': 1. A town on the border of Judah (Jos 15 10) counted as a priestly city (Jos 21 16). Here, in the field of Joshua the Beth-shemite, the Ark rested on its return from the Philistines, but was not allowed to remain (I S 6 9 ff.). Here Amaziah of Judah was defeated by Jehoash of Israel (II K 14 11 ff.). Later, in the days of Ahaz, it was taken by the Philistines (II Ch 28 18). It was probably an ancient seat of sun-worship. Map II, D 1. 2. A town of Naphtali (Jos 19 38; Jg 1 33). Site unknown. 3. A town on the border of Issachar (Jos 19 22). Site unknown. 4. A city of Egypt, probably On (Heliopolis). E. E. N.

BETH-SHITTAH, -shit'ā (בֵּית הַשִּׁטָּה, bēth-shiṭṭāh), 'place of acacias': A place to which the Midianites were pursued (Jg 7 22). The ordinary identification with Shutta (Map IV, D 8) is not entirely satisfactory. E. E. N.

BETH-TAPPUAH, -tap'pū-ā (בֵּית הַפּוּחַ, bēth-tappūaḥ), 'place of apples' (?): A town of Judah (Jos 15 53), connected possibly with the family named Tappuah (I Ch 2 43), Map II, E 2. E. E. N.

BETHUEL, bē-thū'el (בְּתוּאֵל, bᵉthū'ēl). I. A son of Nahor, Abraham's brother and the father of Rebekah, Isaac's wife, and of Laban (Gn 22 22 f., 24 15, etc., 25 20, 28 2, 5). II. See BETHUL. E. E. N.

BETHUL, bĕth'ŭl (בְּתוּל, bᵉthūl): A town in the S. of Judah (Jos 19 4) called Bethuel (I Ch 4 30) and Chesil (Jos 15 30). Site unknown. E. E. N.

BETH-ZUR, -zūr" (בֵּית צוּר, bēth tsūr), 'house of rock,' or Zur may be the name of a deity: A town of Judah (Jos 15 58; I Ch 2 45), strongly situated, commanding the road between Hebron and Jerusalem (Map II, E 2) and fortified by Rehoboam (II Ch 11 7). It was occupied by a post-exilic colony (Neh 3 16) and was the scene of several conflicts in the Maccabean war (I Mac 4 19, etc.). E. E. N.

BETONIM, bet'o-nim (בְּטֹנִים, bᵉtōnīm), 'pistachio nuts': A place on the border of Gad (Jos 13 26). Site unknown. E. E. N.

BETROTH. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

BEULAH, biū'lā, 'married': The reference in Is 62 4 is to the old Semitic idea that a deity stood in closest relation to the land in which he was worshiped, i.e., he owned it, controlled it, gave fertility to it, etc. The prophet here uses the term, but not in its old purely physical sense. E. E. N.

BEWAIL. See MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 5.

BEWITCH. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION.

BEWRAY: An old English word meaning 'to disclose,' found in the AV of Is 16 3; Pr 29 24, 27 16; Mt 26 73. The Heb. of Pr 27 16 is altogether obscure. E. E. N.

BEYOND THE JORDAN: When this phrase occurs in the reported speeches of Moses it denotes the W. side of the river (Dt 3 20, etc.), but when used by the author who reports them, the E. side (Dt 1 1, 5, etc. Cf. also Gn 50 10). A. C. Z.

BEZAI, bī'za-ai (בֵּצַי, bētsay): The ancestral head of a large post-exilic family (Ezr 2 17; Neh 7 23, 10 18). E. E. N.

BEZALEL, bez'a-lel (בְּצַלְאֵל, bᵉtsal'ēl, Bezaleel AV), 'in the shadow of God': 1. The son of Uri, the son of Hur, who was divinely called to be the chief artificer of the Tent and its furnishings (Ex 31–39; I Ch 2 20; II Ch 1 5). 2. One of the "sons of Pahathmoab" who had taken foreign wives (Ezr 10 30). L. G. L.

BEZEK, bī'zek (בֶּזֶק, bezeq): 1. A town ruled over by Adonibezek, captured by Judah and Simeon in their invasion of Canaan (Jg 1 4 f.). It could not have been far from Jerusalem (cf. ver. 7), but its site is unknown. To identify it with the following without distorting the whole narrative is impossible. 2. The place where Saul rallied the Israelites before marching to the relief of Jabesh-gilead (I S 11 8). Map III, G 2. E. E. N.

BEZER, bī'zęr (בֶּצֶר, betser), 'fortress': I. The head of a family of Asher (I Ch 7 37). II. A city of refuge, also one of the Levitical cities in the tribe of Reuben, Dt 4 43; Jos 20 8, 21 36; I Ch 6 78). It was "in the wilderness in the plain (mīshōr, here 'upland plain')." Of the same place Mesha says (Mesha stone, line 27): "I built B., for ruins had it become." Site unknown. E. E. N.

1. Name and Names.

The word Bible is from the Gr. βίβλος, the inner layers of the papyrus-plant used in making the paper of which books, βίβλοι, were manufactured. The dim. βιβλίον was especially used of a 'book' as a part or division of a larger work. The pl. τὰ βιβλία, 'the books,' was applied to the Scriptures in consequence of their supreme importance. This Greek plural passed over into the Latin as a singular biblia, whence the English word 'Bible.' The oldest name among the Jews for their Scriptures was "the books" (Dn 9 2) or, for the legal part, the "book of the law" or "book of Moses" (Neh 9 3, 13 1). In N T times the Jews were accustomed to say 'the writings' (Heb. kᵉthūbhīm; Gr. γραφαί, Lat. Scripturæ), or, in case of quotation, etc., 'Scripture' (ἡ γραφή; Lat. Scriptura), which term passed over into Christian usage and has maintained itself until the present day.

The term Testament is from the Lat testamentum, 'will,' the LXX. rendering of the Gr. διαθήκη (cf. also Mt 26 28, etc.), which, however, neither in the LXX. nor in the N T, means 'will' but (as e.g., in II Co 3 4) 'covenant.' It was easy, however, to take διαθήκη in the sense of a testamentary document and use it of the Scriptures of the old and new covenants, and in ecclesiastical literature from the 2d cent. this is a common designation of the Scriptures. For the names applied by the Jews to the various parts of the O T see OLD AND NEW TESTAMENT CANON.

2. The Bible a Collection of Books of Various Dates and by Many Writers.

The Protestant Bible in common use is a collection of sixty-six books. Of these thirty-nine originally constituted the Jewish Scriptures and make up the O T. The remaining twenty-seven originated in Christian circles in the Apostolic Age. In the Roman Catholic Church the O T part consists of forty-six books (the seven Apocryphal books Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, I and II Maccabees being counted as Scripture) plus the so-called Additions to Esther and Daniel.

The material in the Bible was composed at different times during a period of more than a thousand years—from the foundation of the Hebrew nation by Moses (c. 1200 B.C.) to about the end of the 1st cent. A.D. The number of writers whose work is preserved in the Bible is unknown. A large number of the O T books and some of the N T are anonymous. The range and variety of subjects are indicative of a corresponding variety and number of authors. The poet, the historian, and the philosopher ('wise man'), the priest, the prophet, and the apostle, the king and the statesman, the popular story-teller, the serious legislator, the antiquarian delighting in genealogy and statistics, the zealous reformer, the faithful teacher, the seer, all these and others, even the Divine Son of Man Himself, find their words or work represented in the Bible.

It is also a world of varied thought and culture that is reflected in the Biblical material. In one part we are face to face with the primitive simplicity of the Semitic nomad; in another we are in touch with the rich culture of the ancient Babylonian civilization; again we share the experiences incident to the predominantly agricultural type of life of the ancient Hebrew commonwealth; at first we witness the crude and petty warfare between clans or tribes, then the larger struggles of Israel with her near neighbors; next we hear the measured tread of Assyria's victorious armies, creators of the first world monarchy; then, in succession, it is the Babylonian, the Persian, the Greek, and finally the Roman empires that form the background of the Biblical history.

The original languages of the Biblical books were Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek. Nearly all the O T was composed in Hebrew, the language spoken by Israel in Canaan before the Exile, but after the Return gradually giving way—as the speech of common intercourse—to the Aramaic, then the lingua franca of all SW. Asia. Parts of Daniel and Ezra and one verse in Jer (10 11) are in Aramaic. There is also an Aramaic coloring to many expressions scattered through the O T. A dialect of Aramaic was the vernacular of Palestine in N T times, and it is probable that Jesus' teachings were spoken by Him in Aramaic and later rendered into Greek by the teachers of the early Apostolic Church (see ARAMAIC LANGUAGE). Apart from this Aramaic basis of the Gospels, especially the first three and of some material in Acts, the N T was composed entirely in Greek, the Greek of ordinary intercourse in the Hellenistic world (see HELLENISTIC AND BIBLICAL GREEK).

3. The Original Language and Text of the Bible.

The text of the Bible has doubtless had a very checkered history. Nothing is known of the means taken to preserve the text of the O T autographs. It is probable that much editorial work was done by exilic and post-exilic scholars on the material in their hands, and we do not know when the text came to be so carefully guarded that no more changes were possible. The Greek translation of the O T, the Septuagint (LXX., begun c. 250 B.C., and perhaps completed by 150 B.C.), shows that in many places the text before the translators differed from the Hebrew text current to-day (see GREEK VERSIONS OF THE O T). The great Hexapla of Origen, c. 225 A.D. (a six-column edition of the O T, one column giving the Hebrew text), and the Latin Vulgate of Jerome (390–405 A.D.), who made use of the Hebrew, also furnish valuable testimony to the ancient Hebrew text. Finally, the Massoretes (Jewish scholars who were careful students of the text, 3d to 10th cent. A.D.) settled upon a uniform text which is that represented in practically all Hebrew MSS. extant.

The text of the N T has had a corresponding history. The autographs, written on papyrus, were perishable and soon disappeared. The first copying was of an unregulated and perhaps at times careless character. With the growth of the Church in numbers and culture more attention came to be paid to the copying of the text. At last, mainly through the influence of the first printed editions, one type of text, unfortunately very corrupt, the so-called Textus Receptus, became dominant. Only within the last half-century have more critical and therefore correct texts become available. (For a full discussion see TEXT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.)

Since the Biblical material was produced under such a variety of circumstances, by so many different authors, and its composition covered such a long period of time, it is evident that the collection in its present form has a complicated history behind it. The O T was already complete before a word of the N T was written. But neither collection was the work of a single age or made at the dictation of any external authority. For full discussion of the formal steps that led to the final results in both cases see the articles on O T and N T Canon. Others of a less formal but fundamental nature will find mention below.

From what has been said in § 2 it is evident that the Bible material, in the process of its composition, sustained a most intimate relation to life and that progressive development of man we call history. This is of fundamental importance to a true understanding of the Bible and appreciation of its value. The Bible, both as a whole and as to its separate parts, was in the first instance a result, not a cause, a product of something that was actual in life and history before a written record of it was made.

4. The Relation of the Bible to Life and History.

The O T is the product of something that was in actual existence in Israel before it found expression in writing. Israel and Israel's religion came first, and it was because there was an Israel with such a religion that a literature like that of the O T was a possibility. The O T is the product of Israel's vital religion and is a competent witness to the vitality and divine character of that religion. While it is true that the older parts of the O T, once written, had an influence on subsequent stages of Israel's religious development, the important fact remains that the strong vital, progressive religion of Israel is the foundation of the written material we have in the O T.

The same general fact is true of the N T. Jesus lived and taught and died and rose and was present by His Spirit in His Church before a book of the N T was written. The earliest N T book was probably a letter of an Apostle to recently planted churches, giving needed advice on matters of pressing importance. It was within a church, alive, vigorous, progressive, and withal not free from faults, that our N T literature originated, and almost without exception do the N T books show themselves to be products of what was already at hand in the possession of the Church at large or in the hearts of the chosen few whose understanding of the common faith was most profound.

Nothing can be further from the truth, then, than to say that the religion of Israel or Christianity are 'book-religions.' In both the book is the product, not the cause; in both the religion was in existence and in a strong vital touch with life and history before the book appeared; in both the book is the expression of and witness to the strength and vigor as well as character of the religion. How different in these respects the Bible is from other sacred books is as evident as is the related fact, the difference between the religions of other sacred books and the religion that produced the Bible.

5. The Gradual Growth of the O T.

Israel, both as a nation and as a nation with a peculiar religion, was the creation of God through Moses. He consolidated the tribes into a national unity the basis of which was a religion—the religion of Jehovah, the God of Israel. This religion was essentially spiritual and ethical in character, simple in its mode of worship and capable of being expressed in comparatively few fundamental propositions. Because of its essential reality and inherent vitality, in virtue of its Divine origin, the apprehension and appreciation on Israel's part of the true character and significance of her religion were capable of great expansion. It was both possible and necessary for her to grow into an ever-deepening and widening knowledge of its theological and ethical principles. As time went on, and environment changed; as new modes of life were adopted, new conceptions of the world—both of nations and of ideas—were forced on Israel's mind; as great national crises were met and bitter experiences endured, Israel was called upon to meet such circumstances and adjust herself to them in the light of her religion. In the course of this long process the O T originated and gradually grew into a distinct body of literature. To say that the O T represents Israel's national literature may be too sweeping a statement. It probably comprehends the most of the religious part of Israel's literature. It is likely that much old Hebrew literature perished with the fall of Samaria in 721 B.C. and of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. Only that which was religious in character was preserved of the pre-exilic literature, and in exilic and post-exilic days those who produced literature in Israel were mainly interested in religion.

There is no very early evidence that Moses wrote more than the statements of the fundamental principles of Israel's religious constitution. The covenant terms (Ex 34 10-27), the Decalogue (Ex 20 2-17), and certain directions as to the attitude of Israel toward the Canaanite cultus (Ex 20 22-26, 23 20-33 || 34 10-17) are all that can be safely affirmed as included by both J and E in the written material of the Mosaic Age. In addition, according to E, an ancient code (Ex 21 1–23 9 in the main) was drawn up by Moses. The Mosaic era and the era of the Conquest and Settlement in Canaan were not conducive to the production of literature, though rich in deeds of courage and faith. These deeds became the subject of popular story and song (oral, not written), the latter especially being generally inspired by strong religious feeling.

Under David, Israel became supreme in Canaan and under the Kingdom conditions were more favorable to the development of literature. History was written first on a small scale, then on a larger. At last the great 'prophetic' histories, J and E (in which popular tradition was used and its religious significance pointed out), were completed (see HEXATEUCH). Legal material, in the form of codes of smaller or larger compass, was written at the great sanctuaries, of which the one at Jerusalem was of chief importance, while poetry, probably almost exclusively religious, was constantly being produced. In the 9th cent. B.C., Elijah did his great work for Israel's religion, but he committed none of his teachings to writing. Later a history of his and Elisha's work was written which was embodied in part by the author of Kings in his large history. In the 8th cent. Israel was face to face with a most serious religious crisis. The old barriers of comparative isolation were broken down. Before the rapidly growing power of the Assyrian Empire the smaller nationalities lost their individual existence, while their religions were either destroyed or amalgamated into the great Assyro-Babylonian pantheon. Such changes threatened the religion of Jehovah with destruction. It was saved, under God, by the prophets, the exponents in new and trying situations of the true character of Israel's religion, a task involving instruction along theological, ethical, political, and Messianic lines. From Amos (c. 760 B.C.) to the Exile (536 B.C.) the messages of prophecy, though in most cases originally spoken discourses (cf. Jer 36 2), came to be committed to writing. Whether this was done by the prophets themselves or by their disciples we do not know. No pre-exilic prophet systematically arranged and published his prophecies in a complete edition. The prophetic oracles were more probably gathered up by disciples into smaller or larger collections which were later made up into the books we have at present.

In the 7th cent., when the light of the true religion of Jehovah was almost extinct, Deuteronomy was written as a statement of the original Mosaic constitution interpreted in the light of the teachings of prophecy (Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah). The literary form chosen was that of a hortatory address by Moses, followed by a code in which much ancient material is preserved and (partially) adjusted to new and changed conditions (see DEUTERONOMY). Through the discovery of this book and the Reform of Josiah (621 B.C.) based upon it, Israel (Judah) came to have for the first time a written religious constitution. The Holiness Code (Lev 17–26) was also a contemporary attempt to codify the main principles of life (for an Israelite) from the point of view of 'holiness to Jehovah.' During this period, under the influence of the teachings of Deuteronomy, the series of historical narratives (Judges, Samuel-Kings) was completed (apart from post-exilic revision). In these, history is almost entirely subordinated to religion. The events simply furnished the occasion for the religious lessons of the history. During the latter part of Josiah's reign and the whole of the reigns of his sons and successors, Jeremiah was opposing in vain the formalism and essential irreligiousness that affected all ranks of society. In the reign of Jehoiakim (608–597) Jeremiah revised and published his earlier oral discourses with additions (Jer 36). His later prophecies (just before and after the Exile, 586 B.C.) were probably taken down and preserved by his secretary Baruch and through him or others at last transmitted to the faithful workers in Babylonia. Among the Exiles the already existing literature was carefully preserved, studied, and edited. New messages were delivered to them by Ezekiel (597–570) and by 'second' Isaiah (Is 40–66), messages looking to the new era which these gifted seers taught was sure to come for Israel. The exilic scholars gave much attention to the Law with a view to making it the perfect standard for Israel as the one people of Jehovah. This revision and perfecting of the Law were incomplete at the time of the Return in 536 B.C. The returned Exiles organized themselves mainly on the basis of the Deuteronomic Code. Their efforts to rebuild the Temple were encouraged by the prophetic messages of Haggai and Zechariah, who addressed themselves directly to the situation. But the tendency of post-exilic Judaism was toward a reduction of religion to formally defined practise. The 'scribe' (generally of priestly descent) rather than the prophet was now the main religious force. At last Ezra succeeded in having his edition of the Law recognized by the public assembly (c. 444 B.C.). If this was not the canonization of the Pentateuch in its present form, it was at least the great step toward such canonization which must have followed in a comparatively short time.

When this was done the remaining literature, historical, prophetic, and poetical, while highly honored and esteemed, was still an unclosed collection. The later minor prophets and the great historical work, Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah, were as yet unwritten. At last—probably before 200 B.C.—it was felt that no more prophetic voices were to be heard and the prophetic succession was considered closed. This, of course, led to the separation of the prophetic writings as a group—next to the Law—sacred and authoritative, into which no recent literature could gain admission.

In the stress and discouragement of the persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes, c. 168–165 B.C., the Book of Daniel, the one apocalypse of the O T, was written to stay and cheer those whose faith was wavering, by teaching that the Kingdom of God is supreme in spite of all appearances to the contrary, and must triumph in the end. This book came too late to be included in the prophetic canon and thus took its place with the 'other books' (such as the Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ruth, Chronicles, etc.), not yet canonized but highly esteemed and considered as of a somewhat different character from other writings (as, e.g., The Book of Ecclesiasticus). Of the books of this division, Job, Proverbs, and Psalms reflect three distinct types of religious experience. In Job a great problem is dealt with. In Proverbs the maxims of practical life are given, while in the Psalms all phases of religious feeling find expression. It is probable that by 100 B.C. the Jews of Palestine had come to a general understanding as to the character and value of these 'other books' and that this third division of the Canon was closed, practically at least, about that time. The Judaism of Alexandria was inclined to a less rigid view and looked upon certain other late books (now called the Apocrypha) as of a sacred or semi-sacred character. (For the whole subject see O T and N T Canon.)

It was the larger (Alexandrian) Canon that at first circulated in the Gentile-Christian world (as the language of this was Greek, not Hebrew). But quite early (from c. 175 A.D. on) the Eastern (Greek) churches came to feel that the only true O T Canon was the Hebrew (Palestinian). In the Western (Latin) churches the Apocrypha continued in general use in spite of protests from men like Jerome and at last its use was made binding by the Council of Trent (1546). (See Apocrypha.)

The O T was the Bible of the Jews in N T times and it was the Scripture of Jesus and His Apostles.

6. The Growth of the N T.

Jesus, so far as we know, wrote nothing and in His work He constantly referred to the O T as the Scripture fulfilled in Him. To Him, what He taught and what He did and what was to follow as the result of His coming were, all in all, the 'fulfilment' of the O T. In other words, the essential religious truths of the O T were the truths on which Jesus built in His work as the founder of Christianity. The real religion of the O T passed over into Christianity. Jesus succeeded in implanting this truth into the hearts of His disciples, although it took time and discipline, even after His resurrection, to get them to see it clearly. The life and work of Jesus are the real fulfilment of the O T, and the N T is the record of Jesus' life and work. Familiar as we are apt to be with the N T, it is easy to fail to see the real order of development of the N T literature and its necessary connection with the progress of Christianity in the Apostolic Age. Because the Gospels and Acts stand first in the lists of the N T Books, it is easy to get the impression that Christianity began with these documents. Christianity began with the Gospel, not with the Gospels, and, after the Resurrection, with the work of the Apostles, not with the Acts of the Apostles. Jesus proclaimed a Gospel of which He Himself was the incarnation. He impressed upon a chosen few, who proved fit to receive it, the fundamental truths of that Gospel and, what is perhaps still more important, He implanted in their souls a knowledge of Himself which was doubtless the most powerful and permanent influence that ever touched their lives. They simply became different men under the tutelage of Jesus. It was not a reasoned-out, intellectual process they went through, but a complete moral and spiritual transformation. They saw life, duty, and destiny in a new light, and the central figure and influence in their new world was Jesus Himself. Deep into their hearts and memories His words and deeds penetrated to be brought out and told and partially recorded in days to come. But as yet nothing was written of all this; it was living in the life experience of living men and women. And Jesus left matters thus, knowing as only He could know that the future was assured.

Under the inspiration of Pentecost the Apostolic preaching of Christianity began. Preaching, oral proclamation, persuasion, not literature, were the means used, and so it continued for decades. Multitudes were converted, a brotherhood was formed, a new type of life manifested itself, all centering about a definite belief in Jesus. The movement spread from Jerusalem outward into all Palestine. Persecution only increased its vigorous growth. It reached Antioch, the great metropolis of Western Asia. Paul was converted, the Gospel was carried into the Gentile world, the First Missionary Journey was completed, and the Council of Jerusalem had met to discuss the question whether the Gospel was something independent of or subsidiary to the old dispensation—all before a single book (except possibly the Epistle of James) of the N T had been written.

This undeniable fact is of sufficient importance to be most carefully considered by all who wish to have a correct view of the nature of the N T. That the Founder of Christianity did His own work and that His followers organized His Church and carried it on through a vigorous, even remarkable, growth for twenty years before any of the N T books were produced is conclusive proof that there is something more fundamental to Christianity than even the N T. It is just here that the real significance of the N T must be sought—in the relation the N T writings bear to that more fundamental something that the Christian Church possessed before it possessed these writings. That fundamental something was the Apostolic Church's conception of Jesus Christ, and this consisted (1) of the knowledge that Church possessed of Jesus' person, teaching, and work, and (2) of the Apostolic interpretation of the significance of Jesus' person, teaching, and work for the life and destiny of man. In the N T writings we find the Apostolic Church's conception of Jesus Christ set forth, not in any formal sense, as in official documents of the Church, but in a no less real sense. These writings originated as special occasions demanded, each being called forth by some particular circumstance or reasons affecting only a limited circle. This is true even of the Gospels. They all deal with living issues, and reflect the actual faith or knowledge of their writers and (in most instances) readers.

The first documents of Christianity were Apostolic letters, one from the Jewish-Christian Church to scattered communities in Palestine and Syria (Epistle of James, c. 50 A.D.?), the others from Paul to the Thessalonians (c. 50–51 A.D.). Before the year 64 Paul had written all his Epistles (except the Pastorals). It was in the decade from 60–70 that the Synoptic Gospel traditions took definite shape (the Logia and Mark both before 70, the Gospel of Matthew probably later). To the same decade the Epistle to the Hebrews belongs, addressed to Jewish Christians to explain difficulties easily likely to trouble such readers, also I Peter. To the next two decades (70–90) probably belong the later writings of the N T (Gospel of Luke, Acts, II Peter, Jude, the Johannine literature). All these were scattered over a wide area, not at once brought together, the very existence of many being probably unknown outside of a limited circle. For the steps by which they became collected into our N T see NEW TESTAMENT CANON.

It was in such a way that the Bible arose, the literature of a living, divinely inspired and guided religious development. It was a development that went hand in hand with historical movements, with enlarging intellectual comprehension, with profound experiences of sorrow as well as of joy, until the "fulness of time" came. Because the Bible arose thus its significance and value must be

7. The Permanent Significance of the Bible. permanent. The older view of strictly verbal inspiration is indeed artificial and untenable, but its real import remains intact. The inspiration of the Bible may be, at places, not far from the letter, but in most cases it is in the vital religion behind the letter. It is thus easily seen how mistakes as to fact may be found in the Bible, yet its essential value remain. Criticism, in its search for the facts as to the origin, composition, authorship, integrity, etc., of the various books, is both necessary and, when rightly conducted, helpful (see § 8, below). The results of all such research only bring us closer to the truths that the Bible, and the Bible alone, contains—the truths of God's revelation of Himself and of His will, in the history and life of Israel first, but fully set forth in Jesus Christ, whom we can know through the Gospels and the interpretation given in the documents of the Apostolic Age. E. E. N.

Criticism is that branch of Biblical study which aims to ascertain with as much precision as possible the facts regarding the origins and

8. Modern Biblical Study. original forms of the books of the Bible. So far as it deals with the question of the original text, it is called the Lower or Textual Criticism, and is properly treated in the articles on the Text. So far as it concerns the origin, i.e., authorship, date, integrity, literary form, purpose, etc., of the separate books, it is called Higher Criticism, and the results of its application will be found in the articles on the separate books or parts of the Bible.

The Higher Criticism, so called, is a comparatively recent branch of study. There were indeed questions raised and hints thrown out regarding a method of inquiry analogous to it even as early as the Middle Ages. Spinoza is supposed to have put forth certain suggestions which, if pressed, must have led to the use of such a method of study. But it is generally admitted that the first to resort to this method was the physician Astruc (Conjectures sur les Mémoires, etc., 1753). He called attention to the use of the names Jehovah and Elohim in successive sections of Gn, and from this fact drew the inference that in the composition of the book Moses had incorporated older documents, each characterized by the use of one of these names.

But this use of the divine name was only one of several features distinguishing the sections (documents) in which they occurred. These were next examined, and their significance developed into the so-called Documentary and Fragmentary theories of the Pentateuch, put forth by men like Eichhorn, J. D. Michaelis, and Geddes. (Eichhorn was the first to use the phrase "higher criticism" as the name of the new method of study.)

Other material for investigation in a similar way was soon brought into view by De Wette and Ewald. This consisted in the mass of historical data furnished by the O T books themselves. From an examination of this historical material, De Wette was enabled to propound the theory that Gn was the work of a writer who found an Elohistic document and used this as a nucleus for the addition of material from Jehovistic and other sources. This was the Supplement theory (or in the form in which Ewald put it, the Crystallization hypothesis). Meanwhile, what was being done in Gn and the Pentateuch began to be extended to the other books of the O T.

But there remained still another class of facts available for criticism, those, namely, which were to be found in the flow of thought. This was arranged in the order of a hypothetical development. The meaning of the facts in this sphere was partially shown by Vatke and George quite early (1835); but it was not fully worked out into a complete theory until Kuenen (1865), Graf (1866), and Wellhausen (1872) fully presented their conception of it, and made it clear how revolutionary the results would prove (see HEXATEUCH).

The development of the critical method, as above summarily sketched, made clear its necessity, its nature, and its danger. Its necessity was seen to lie in the fact that the truth with reference to many phases of real importance regarding the origin of the books of the Bible had been lost or obscured in the course of the ages since their first composition. This led naturally to their being ascribed to others than their real authors, or else their being left anonymous. The original purpose also and the literary form of some of them were forgotten and other designs and forms were attributed to them. Some books of poetry were read as if they were prose, some parabolic or allegorical books were taken as accurate history. All this had to be rectified, and the new method was seen to be helpful in rectifying it.

The nature of the method also became clearly apparent. It is a method which depends upon the observation of internal marks, mainly of three classes, i.e. (1) literary, (2) historical, and (3) such as pertain to the content of thought. The literary marks are those characteristics of style, including the choice of words, the construction of phrases, and the infusion of a tone and spirit into a writing, through which the author reveals his personality. The historical marks are the signs of age, place, and environment which unconsciously betray a forgery or a misplaced production and furnish the ground for assigning it to its true place; or if it is genuine, of verifying its genuineness and dispelling suspicion about it. The marks drawn from the content of thought are those considerations which fix a certain relationship of succession and development of ideas from one book, or one part of a book, to others. To these should be added also such considerations as grow from the relation of the content of the O T books to the religious ideas of contemporary and neighboring nations.

The main danger in the use of the critical method in the O T is that of giving too free a range to subjective considerations. In each one of the fields within which the materials for critical examination lie, there is the possibility of reading much more or much less than the facts warrant. The personal equation is, therefore, paramount. Philosophical presuppositions either for or against what is usually called the supernatural element inevitably enter into the processes and appear in the conclusions of critics, and extreme and sometimes startling views are often propounded in the name of criticism.

As against this danger, two counterbalancing factors may be named: (1) That extreme subjectivism on one side corrects extreme subjectivism on the other. For the student who is approaching the critical method and critical results with intelligence and impartiality, the philosophical bias of one school will nullify the philosophical bias of the other, leaving him in possession of the essential facts. (2) While each part of the method may be used with too much subjectivity and become untrustworthy, there is a cumulative effect from the use of all which is in the main trustworthy.

BIRZAITH, bir-zê'ith; BIRZAVITH, -vith (בִּרְזָוִת or בִּרְזַיִת, birzāwīth or birzayīth): A place (?) in Asher (I Ch 7 31). Site unknown. E. E. N.

BISHLAM, bish'lam (בִּשְׁלָם, bishlām): A Persian official (Ezr 4 7). E. E. N.

BISHOP, BISHOPRIC. See CHURCH, § 8.

BIT, BRIDLE: These words, as used in EV, indicate three different objects: (1) The bridle (metheg, χαλινός), which includes the curb or bit, is mentioned as part of the harness of the horse (Ps 32 9, "bit"; Rev 14 20) and ass (Pr 26 3). It is used figuratively for restraint (II K 19 28 = Is 37 29; Jas 1 26, 3 2 f., of the tongue) and for the authority of the mother-city (II S 8 1). (2) The reṣen is a halter (EV "bridle") and is used metaphorically for restraint of the actions (Job 30 11; Is 30 28). The "double bridle" (Job 41 13, AV) of Leviathan seems to refer to his upper and lower jaws (so ARV). (3) The maḥṣōm was a muzzle, intended to prevent the animal from biting (Ps 39 1; cf. ARVmg.). See plate of ARTICLES USED IN TRAVEL, Fig. 5. L. G. L.

BITHIAH, bith'i-ā (בִּתְיָה, bithyāh): A daughter of Pharaoh whom Mered, a descendant of Judah, married (I Ch 4 18). The statement is a peculiar one and difficult of explanation. E. E. N.

BITHRON, bith'ron (בִּתְרוֹן, bithrōn), 'the gorge': A wady through which Abner fled from the Jordan to Mahanaim (II S 2 29). Perhaps the Wady 'Ajlūn, Map III, H 3. E. E. N.

BITHYNIA, bi-thin'i-a. See ASIA MINOR, § 3.

BITTER HERBS: One of the elements of the Passover meal (Ex 12 8; Nu 9 11). The herbs used were watercress, lettuce, endive, and chicory. They were either mixed or used separately. Regarding their significance different views are held, some alleging that they symbolized the sufferings of the people in Egypt, while others hold that like the prohibition of leaven they were the sign of the haste in which the Exodus took place. A. C. Z.

BITTERN: The AV rendering of קִפֹּד, qippōdh (Is 14 23, 34 11; Zeph 2 14). The meaning of the Heb. is not known. RV renders "porcupine." Cheyne (EB, s.v.) favors bittern. Socin, in Guthe's Bibelwörterbuch, thinks some kind of lizard is meant. See PALESTINE, §§ 25, 26. E. E. N.

BIZIOTHIAH, biz"i-o-thai'ā (בִּזְיוֹתְיָה, bizyōthyāh; Bizjothjah, biz-jəth'jā, AV): The reading found in the Heb. of Jos 15 28, but in LXX. and at Neh 11 27 we read "and the towns thereof" (= Heb. וּבְנוֹתֶיהָ), which is probably the true text. E. E. N.

BLASPHEMY. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (c).

BLAST: The rendering of n'shāmāh, 'breath,' as in II S 22 16; Ps 18 15, where it is followed immediately by rūaḥ, 'wind,' and of rūaḥ in Ex 15 8; II K 19 7, etc. In all cases it refers to a manifestation of God's power, either in the physical world by wind or storm, or by a plague (Is 37 7), except in Is 25 4, where it refers to human violence. E. E. N.

BLASTUS, blas'tus (Βλάστος): The chamberlain of Herod Agrippa I (Ac 12 20), through whose intervention certain men from Tyre and Sidon secured an audience with the king. No mention is made of Blastus in Josephus' account of the death of Herod (Ant. XIX, 8 2). See HEROD AGRIPPA I. J. M. T.

BLOOD: The important meaning attached to blood in the Oriental world was determined by the notion that the life principle either is the blood itself or has its residence in the blood (Lv 17 11). Just how such a notion might originate it is not difficult to understand when one considers that after the blood is allowed to run out of the body the life of the body is extinguished. This is true of both man and the lower animals (Gn 9 4).

From this notion are deducible the prescriptions as to the treatment of the blood: (1) Blood was not to be made an article of food (Lv 7 26 f.; Dt 12 16). This law is applied to all blood, not simply to that of animals slain for sacrificial purposes. (2) The tabooing of the blood of sacrificial victims (I S 14 32). (3) The presentation of the blood of an innocent victim at the altar of Jehovah as pure life to cover the offending life of the offerer (Lv 1 5, etc. See also SACRIFICE). (4) The value of blood as means of ceremonial cleansing, as in the case of purification from leprosy (Lv 14 5-7). (5) The law of blood revenge, i.e., a life for a life (Gn 9 6; Dt 19 6), and (6) the use of blood as a means of establishing a covenant (Ex 24 6). Cf. Trumbull, Threshold Covenant. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 16. A. C. Z.

2. Legislation About Blood.

BLOOD, AVENGER OF (gō'ēl had-dām, Nu 35 19): The next of kin whose duty it became to visit vengeance for the violent death of those related to him. The duty was based on the theory that the family, tribe, and clan constituted sacred units. When the blood of a member of one of these units was shed, atonement was required either through the death of the shedder of the blood or through that of some member of the unit to which the offender belonged (II S 21 1-14; Jg 8 18-21). The earlier law made no distinction between intentional murder and undesigned homicide (Gn 9 6). The later legislation (Nu 35 9 ff.) was a great improvement over the earlier in that it distinguished in this particular and softened the asperities of natural feeling, placing safeguards about the whole practise and thus preventing injustice and cruelty. BLOODGUILTINESS. See BLOOD, 2 (5), and BLOOD, AVENGER OF.

BLOOD, ISSUE OF. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5 (7).

BLOODY FLUX. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5 (2).

BLOODY SWEAT: Taken literally this would mean the oozing of the blood through the pores of the skin, together with the perspiration. That under intense excitement such as was experienced by Jesus (Lk 22 44) perspiration sometimes breaks into bloody sweat is a well-known fact in medical science. But it is by no means certain that the text of Lk is pure (cf. Westcott and Hort, The N T in Greek, Vol. II, App. p. 64 ff.) or that the statement was intended as a literal one (cf. Plummer on Lk in Int. Crit. Com. 1896). A. C. Z.

BOANERGES, bō"a-nęr'jîz (Βοανηργές): A surname given by Jesus to James and John (Mk 3 17), interpreted by Mark to mean "Sons of thunder" (Υἱοὶ Βροντῆς). The nearest known Aram. equivalent is bene regez (see Dalman, Aram. Gr ², p. 144), which, however, means 'sons of wrath,' not 'sons of thunder.' Mark's interpretation is perhaps a reminiscence of the tradition in Lk 9 54. For an explanation of B. as equivalent to the Dioscuri, or Heavenly Twins, see J. Rendel Harris, Expos. Feb., 1907. J. M. T.

BOAR. See PALESTINE, § 24.

BOAT. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 1.

BOAZ, bō'az (בֹּעַז, bō'az), 'swiftness' (so Oxf. Heb. Lex.): A prominent citizen of Bethlehem, kinsman of Naomi (Ru 2 1 ff.). Upon the return of Naomi from Moab with Ruth, her daughter-in-law, Boaz was led to take the latter under his protection by purchasing the right of redemption from the next of kin. And as this right included according to the Law that of levirate marriage (Dt 25 5 ff.), Boaz took Ruth as his wife, and from this marriage sprang Obed, the grandfather of David (Ru 4 21 f.). The importance of Boaz in history is accordingly in the main genealogical (cf. Mt 1 5; Lk 3 32, Booz AV). For the pillar called Boaz at the vestibule of Solomon's Temple, see TEMPLE, § 14. A. C. Z.

BOCHERU, bō'ke-rū or bok'ę-rū (בְּכֹרִי, bōkhʿrū): A Benjamite of the stock of Saul through Jonathan (I Ch 8 38, 9 44). E. E. N.

BOCHIM, bō'kim (בֹּכִים, bōkhim), 'weepers': A place where the Israelites were reproved by an angel (Jg 2 1, 5). In 2 1 LXX. reads "Bethel," which is probably the true reading. In that case "Bochim" would be a place in or very near Bethel. See ALLON-BACUTH (cf. Moore on Judges, in Int. Crit. Com.). E. E. N.

BODY: The earliest Biblical usage has no fixed name for the human body as a living organism. A series of terms is used which designate it from some portion or peculiarity, such as 'belly,' beten (Mic 6 7; Job 19 17), which is quite uniformly, however, a synonym of 'womb'; also 'bowels,' meʿīm (Song 5 14, 15 4); 'back,' gēw, gēwāh, gewiyyāh (Is 51 23; Job 20 25; I S 31 10; also gabh, Job 13 12, AV); 'bone,' ʿetsem (Ex 24 10, AV); 'thigh,' yārēk (Jg 8 30); 'flesh,' bāsār (Is 10 18); also she'ēr (Pr 5 11); 'breath,' nephesh (Lv 21 11); 'carcass,' nᵉbhēlāh (Dt 21 23), together with an occasional metaphorical expression such as "house of clay" (Job 4 19). The later usage added to these gūphāh, 'back' (I Ch 10 12), geshem, 'material' (Dn 3 27), and nidhneh, 'sheath' (Dn 7 15). In the N T the single term σῶμα is comprehensively used (except in Ac 19 12, where χρώς is found). In Paul's conception of the spiritual body, there is a hypothetical counterpart of the animal organism with which the spirit of man is always found associated on earth. Such a hypothetical being, whatever its true nature, removes a difficulty in the way of belief in the resurrection (I Co 15 44). See also MAN, DOCTRINE OF, §§ 6, 7. A. C. Z.

BODY OF CHRIST. See KINGDOM OF GOD, § 8, and CHURCH, § 4.

BOHAN, bō'han (בֹּהַן, bōhan), 'thumb': "The stone of Bohan, son of Reuben," was a landmark on the NE. boundary of Judah (Jos 15 6, 18 17). No mention is made of B. in the genealogies of Reuben. The stone may have had the appearance of a great thumb. E. E. N.

BOIL. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5 (9), and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 16.

BOLLED: The English word "bolled" (Ex 9 31) means 'swollen,' as pods are by seed. But the Heb. term, gibh'ōl, is more correctly rendered by the ARV "in bloom." E. E. N.

BOLSTER: The translation in AV of a Heb. term (m'ra'ăshōth) meaning 'at the head of' or 'near the head' (I S 19 13 ff., 26 7 ff.). E. E. N.

BOLT. See HOUSE, § 6 (1).

BOND: Besides having its more common meaning of a fetter or chain (Jer 27 2; Ac 26 29; Eph 6 20) or of a pledge in connection with an oath or vow (Nu 30 2), the word stands in EV for (1) mūṣār, the bond of a king (Job 12 18), i.e., the obligation imposed by the authority of a king; (2) māṣōreth, the bond of the covenant (Ezk 20 37), i.e., the relation of the theocratic community; (3) σύνδεσμος, "the bond of iniquity," "the bond of peace," "the bond of perfectness" (Ac 8 23; Eph 4 3; Col 3 14), i.e., the fellowship created by the acceptance of these as ideals of conduct. In I Co 12 13, etc., it is used to render δοῦλος, 'slave,' or 'bond servant.' See also SLAVERY, § 1, and TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3. A. C. Z.

BOOKS AND WRITING: In the earliest times leaves, bark, hides, and for certain sacred purposes linen, were used as materials on which to write, but in historical times papyrus and parchment were the only materials of importance for writings intended to be permanent. For writings not intended to be permanent wax tablets were used (cf. Is 8 1; Hab 2 2; Lk 1 63). They were made of wood and resembled our double slates, and like our slates the surfaces intended to receive the writing were sunken panels, whose raised edges served to protect the writing from defacement when the tablets were closed. The sunken surfaces were covered with a thin layer of red or black wax, in which the letters were scratched (hence they were called χαρακτῆρες, from χαρασσεῖν, 'to engrave') with a sharp-pointed stylus (γραφίς) made of bone, ivory, or metal. When the tablet had been filled with writing and was to be used again, the wax was smoothed down by the upper part of the stylus, which was purposely fashioned broad and flat. Papyrus and, after its invention, parchment were too costly to be used in schools or in every-day business life, and therefore wooden wax tablets were kept at hand and used as the depository of memoranda of every kind, such as stray thoughts, verses, outlines of speeches or arguments, contracts, bills, day-books, notes to friends and sweethearts, invitations, etc. Single tablets do not appear, because the writing could not be protected from defacement, but double tablets (diptychs) were in the hands of every one, and in paintings and reliefs, letters and oracular utterances are always depicted as diptychs, but triptychs, tetraptychs, pentaptychs, and polyptychs were common. Double tablets were fastened together by hinges of string or metal, but often, especially in the case of polyptychs, holes were bored in the center of the panels; a string was then passed through the hole and tied. If the diptych or polyptych were to be sent as a letter, the ends of the string were sealed, among the Greeks, with sealing-clay, but among the Romans with wax. The tablets were often supplied with handles by which to carry them or to hang them up. Wax tablets were used even as late as the time of Christ for contracts, bonds, and receipts, and from Pompeii we have 126 such tablets which were the property of a banker in 54 B.C. Every scratch made in the wax is distinct and undefaced after more than 1,900 years.

1. Book Materials. Wax Tablets.

But for documents of length and those intended to be permanent, such as long letters and books, wax tablets were not only too cumbersome but too perishable. In earliest times books were written on hides, tanned and untanned (διφθέρα, membrana), which were both cumbersome and costly. Hides were supplanted by papyrus paper, which was invented and manufactured in Egypt. Papyrus paper was made of the inner lining of the papyrus-reed. Long and necessarily narrow strips were placed side by side on a level surface and then crossed at right angles by other similar narrow strips. Sheets thus manufactured were first soaked in mucilaginous water, and then pressed and dried. A multitude of such sheets were cemented together into a roll (or "scroll," Is 3 44; Rev 6 14), i.e., one continuous sheet of any desired length.

2. Papyrus Paper. Rolls.

In antiquity the word book (βίβλος, liber) did not mean either a volume or a subdivision of a work, but referred solely to papyrus, the material on which the book was written, for βύβλος was the name applied to the papyrus-plant, and later on the word, with a slight change, was transferred from the material to the matter written on the material. The long strip of papyrus paper on which a book had been written was rolled together beginning with the end of the book. The resulting roll was called κύλινδρος τόμος, volumen. As one began to read such a roll, the first column of reading-matter was on the left of the reader, whose right hand unrolled the unread part, while his left hand rolled up the read part in a direction the reverse of that of the original roll. When the book had been read, the student seized the two ends of the umbilicus (see below) with both hands and rolled the whole volume back again into its original form. The rolls were often very large; some found in recent years in Egypt consist of sheets 42 meters long. It is reckoned that the history of Thucydides (23,144 lines) would require a sheet of papyrus 81 meters long, that the Odyssey would require one 42 meters long, that the Iliad and Odyssey—which we know were written on one sheet in antiquity—would require a sheet 90 meters long. Such an unwieldy roll could not be held in the hands and be unrolled and rerolled as read, but could be read only when lying on a table. The writing on the papyrus sheet was not done in unbroken lines extending from one end of the sheet to the other, but in narrow parallel columns perpendicular to the length of the sheet. It was therefore difficult to consult a book, especially if the desired passage was toward the end of a papyrus sheet 45 or 90 meters long. This fact supplies one reason for the inaccurate quotations of the ancients, who usually quoted from memory, not verbatim. Callimachus, one of the Alexandrian librarians, was therefore justified in his famous saying, that "a big book is an awful nuisance," to abate which he took steps to reduce the size of books or rolls to certain limits. So that for poetry, novels, letters, etc., small and easily handled rolls of about 1,000 lines were used (cf. a 'book' of Homer). Larger rolls, averaging 1,500–2,000 lines, were used for prose literature and scientific writings, though some rolls contained 4,000 lines of prose writing. The size of a book was reckoned by lines, not by pages. Poetry fell naturally into lines, and the dactylic hexameter practically fixed the length of the line at 35 letters or 16 syllables. Every column on the papyrus sheet had the same number of lines, so that an author could easily calculate the length of the papyrus sheet needed for his book. The price of books varied in accordance with the number of lines they contained, because the copiers of books were paid by the line. Diocletian fixed the wage of the copier at 40 denarii for each 100 lines, less than 25 cents. Many publishers used their slaves as copiers, and the slaves received merely food and clothes as pay. The work of the ancient authors, such as the Iliad, the Odyssey, the Anabasis, Herodotus, etc., were not divided by their authors into what we call 'books.' They quoted, the Iliad for instance, by ballads or episodes, and the quotation was merely a general reference. The division into 'books' was made by the Alexandrian librarians after the time of Callimachus to avoid the nuisance of the big work, and to make it easier to consult works, so that the 'books' with which we are familiar referred to that part of a work contained in a single roll in the libraries of Alexandria. The Iliad and the Odyssey were divided into 24 'books' solely because there were 24 letters in the Greek alphabet, so that 'Iliad A' meant 'Roll A of the Iliad.'

Writing was done only on one side of the papyrus sheet; the lines were unnumbered; there were no paragraphs, no punctuation, no accents in classical times. When the roll had received the writing, it was soaked in cedar-oil to protect it from moths and bookworms; this soaking gave the roll a yellow tinge; the ends of the roll were polished with pumice-stone and colored, chiefly black. A round stick called ὀμφαλός, umbilicus, was fastened to the papyrus sheet at the end of the volume; the volume was rolled round this stick, from right to left. The ends of these sticks were often even with the edges of the roll, but they often protruded from both ends and served as handles (cornua) by which to roll and unroll the volume (see above). All the rolls belonging to a given work (24 for the Iliad, 7 for the Anabasis) were placed together in a case (capsa) usually of leather, made to fit them. The title of the whole work was on the capsa. A statement of the contents of each roll was made on a slip of leather or deep-red parchment, after the invention of the latter. It was called the σίττυβον, titulus, index, and it was fastened to the umbilicus of each roll. Thus any 'book' could be found easily.

Papyrus was always the favorite material for letters intended to be despatched to a distance. The papyrus letter was either folded or rolled; it was tied in the center and the ends of the string were sealed. Such papyrus letters have been found in recent years in Egypt; the strings are still intact and the addresses still undefaced.

3. Parchment and Codices.

Owing to the non-existence of a postal service in antiquity, letters of private persons were forwarded only as opportunity offered through traveling friends, merchants, or captains of ships. Governments and kings forwarded their letters by special couriers, and rich individuals utilized their slaves as couriers and private secretaries (see Ramsay's Letters to the Seven Churches, pp. 1–14).

Great libraries arose at all the capitals of the Hellenistic kingdoms. The most important were those of Alexandria and Pergamum. Owing to the jealousy and fear felt by the librarians of Alexandria, lest the library of Pergamum should surpass that of Alexandria, the Egyptian Government forbade the exportation of papyrus. The expectation was that, if deprived of the material on which books were written, the library of Pergamum and those of all the rest of the world could no longer add books to their collections. This corner on the book manufacture led to the discovery at Pergamum of a new process of tanning sheepskins. The skins thus tanned were called περγαμηνὴ χάρτα, Pergamenian paper, a term which was soon shortened to περγαμηνή, which in turn was corrupted into the English parchment (the German Pergament is nearer the original). Parchment was not only much cheaper than papyrus paper, but books made of it were far less cumbersome and more easily consulted, for parchment was too thick and heavy to be used in a roll, and it was thick and heavy enough to permit writing on both sides. The roll was therefore abandoned; the new parchment codex consisted of single leaves bound together practically as in our books to-day. The parchment codices were employed chiefly for works of great length, but they did not become common until the 3d cent. A.D., and indeed the papyrus roll maintained itself until the 5th cent. A.D. Papyrus itself was sometimes employed in the codex form.

4. Ink, etc.

The ink used in writing both on papyrus and parchment was called "writing black" (μέλαν γραφικόν). It was made chiefly of pine-soot mixed with gum arabic and then dissolved in water. Sepia, the secretion of the cuttlefish—our India, Chinese, or Japanese ink—was also used, though not extensively. Ink prepared from the galls of the gall-oak was used at a later period for writing on parchment. Red ink, made from red chalk, cinnabar, or red lead, was used for illuminating initial letters, but in Byzantine times the use of red ink was limited to the Emperor.

The inkstand (or inkhorn, Ezk 9 2 ff.)—sometimes double, for red and black ink—was usually a tall cylinder. Sometimes the inkstand had a double metallic cover, each being supplied with holes, which when adjusted directly over each other permitted the dipping of the pen into the ink; the lower cover was fixed, and the top cover, which was movable, served by a mere turn to close or open the inkstand.

The Greeks used a reed pen (κάλαμος γραφικός; cf. Jer 8 8), as do the Orientals to this day. The best reeds for pens grew in Egypt. They were shaped with a knife and split at the point, as were the goose-quill pens of our recent ancestors, and for that purpose a knife (σμίλη, scalprum librarium, 'penknife'; cf. Jer 36 23) for shaping and splitting the reeds is always seen in pictures of the writer's outfit. Goose-quill pens were not used. Iron pens (cf. Job 19 24; Jer 17 1) were used by the Romans of a late period, but pen and penholder formed one piece.

The reed pens, styluses, knives, drawing-pens, compasses, chalk-holders, etc., were kept in a case (θήκη, calamaria). Sponges for cleaning the pens and for erasing miswritten words from papyrus and parchment, and a ruler (κανών) for drawing lines—which are visible in most MSS.—also belonged on the writer's table. The lines were drawn with a circular sheet of lead. Sharp-pointed compasses (with a ring attachment to keep the spread of the compass fixed) were used for fixing the distances between the lines. The holes made by the compass-points are still visible in MSS. Other adjuncts were: a whetstone for sharpening the knife and a pumice-stone for sharpening the point of the reed pen and for smoothing both papyrus and parchment.

BOOTH: In the climate of Biblical lands, the booth or bower (sukkāh), constructed in the form of a tent from branches of trees, is a very convenient refuge from the heat of the sun by day and a comfortable place for sleep at night. It was used for the accommodation of both men and beasts (Gn 33 17; Job 27 18; Jon 4 5). Essentially the same thing is meant by the term 'lodge' in Is 1 8. Cf. also Vines and Vintage, § 1.

BORDER: (1) The word gᵉbhūl, used in most of the geographical notices of the O T, means 'boundary' or 'limit.' Sometimes other terms as gᵉlīlāh, 'circuit' (Jos 13 2, etc.), yarkhāh, 'side' (Gn 49 13), qēts or qātsch, 'end' or 'extremity' (II K 19 23; Ex 16 35, etc.), sāphāh, 'lip' (Jg 7 22), tōtsāōth, 'outgoings' (I Ch 5 16) are used. Yādh, 'hand' (II S 8 3; I Ch 7 29) means dominion or power. In Jos 11 2 "borders of Dor" means the high land, near Carmel, belonging to Dor. In the N T τὰ ὅρια (Mk 7 24; cf. Mt 4 13) means 'boundary' or 'frontier.' (2) The word is used also of the hem or edge (Heb. kānāph, 'wing') of a garment (Nu 15 38; cf. κράσπεδον, Mt 23 5, etc.), of the enclosing edge, miṣgereth, of a table or other structure (Ex 25 25; I K 7 28, etc.). BRANCH (צֶמַח, tsemaḥ): A designation of the Messiah first used as such by Jeremiah (23 5, 33 15), although it had been employed in an impersonal sense as early as by Isaiah (4 2). It was taken up later by Zechariah (3 8, 6 12) and more definitely identified with the ideal king of Israel. Its selection was made at a time when the house of David viewed as a tree was in a decaying condition, showing signs of a speedy and complete collapse. In the prophetic vision the dying away of the tree was not to be its final disappearance. A new branch, shoot, or sprout (nētser) would issue from its trunk in the person of the Messiah (Is 11 1). BREACH: (1) The rendering of bedheq, a rent or break especially in a wall (II K 12 5-12, 22 5). (2) Of bāq'a and derivatives, meaning 'to cleave' (Is 7 6, 22 9; Ezk 26 10). (3) Of pārats (vb.) and perets (n.), 'to break,' 'a breaking,' especially associated with the idea of violence (II S 5 20, 6 8, etc., very frequent). (4) Of shebher, a breaking or crushing that has serious results (Lev 24 20, etc.). In Jg 5 17 both "breaches" AV and "creeks" RV are open to objection. Moore (Int. Crit. Com.) renders "landing-places." On Nu 14 34 AV cf. RVmg. for the true sense. In Am 6 11 the Heb. reṣīṣīm means 'ruins,' rather than "breaches." E. E N.

BRETHREN OF THE LORD, THE (οἱ ἀδελφοὶ τοῦ κυρίου): A term used by Paul in I Co 9 5 (cf. also Gal 1 18) to designate the brethren of Jesus who are referred to in the Gospels (Mk 3 31 ff. and ‖s; Mt 13 55; Jn 2 12, 7 3, 5, 10), and whose names are given as James, Joses (Joseph, Mt 13 55), Judas, and Simon.

As to the specific relationship which they sustained to Jesus there has been question since the early ages of the Church, the discussion formulating itself finally into three theories, termed by Lightfoot (Com. on Galatians, p. 242), after the names of their foremost supporters, the Epiphanian, the Helvidian, and the Hieronymian.

The Epiphanian theory holds that the brethren of Jesus were children of Joseph by a former wife; the Helvidian, that they were children of Joseph and Mary, born after Jesus; the Hieronymian, that they were children of Mary, the wife of Alpheus (Clopas) and sister of the Virgin.

Of these the first two alone occupied the thought of the Church up to the 4th cent., the former being by far the more prevailing view. In that century Jerome, in controverting Helvidius' claim for a relationship of full brotherhood, suggested the novel idea that the relationship was one not of brotherhood, but of cousinship; so that, as he boasted, there was preserved a virginity not only to Mary but to Joseph also.

Modern scholarship has discarded the theory of Jerome, as in fact without the backing of any tradition, confessedly motived in the interests of a distinctive dogma, and wholly without Biblical support. Serious consideration is given to the first two theories alone and both of these claim abundant and scholarly following.

It will be sufficient, therefore, if the main arguments of these two views be presented.

I. ARGUMENT FOR THE EPIPHANIAN VIEW: (1) Mary's reply to the angel's announcement that she should conceive and bring forth a son (πῶς ἔσται τοῦτο, ἐπεὶ ἄνδρα οὐ γινώσκω; "How shall this be, seeing that I know not a man," Lk 1 34) implies that she understood the angel to mean that the child was to be born in the natural way, and that she was conscious of some obstacle to such an event. Mary could not have meant that she did not yet know a man, for the angel was aware of this when he spoke, and her statement would have been no demurrer to his announcement, as her betrothal would have given her every reason to believe it would be fulfilled. It can only mean, therefore, that with Joseph's consent she had devoted herself to a life of virginity even in marriage. This renders impossible that the brethren of Jesus were later children of her own. (2) The brethren of Jesus conduct themselves toward him with a spirit of superiority natural to older brothers. They presume to control His conduct (Mk 3 21 with 31 and ‖s) and advise him in a faultfinding way (Jn 7 2 ff.). This would, however, make it impossible for them to be Mary's children.

(3) At the Cross Jesus commits His mother to the care of his cousin John (Jn 19 26 f.), which would be more natural on His part if His brethren were not Mary's own children than if they were. (4) Besides these evidences from the Gospel narrative itself (a) it is likely that Joseph out of reverence for Mary as the mother of God would have refrained from marital intercourse with her after the birth of Jesus; and (b) the general acceptance of virginity as an ideal state renders it probable that such a woman as Mary would have preserved her virgin life throughout her marriage. (5) The most ancient tradition of the Church—particularly that of Palestine (Hegesippus, a native of Palestine, c. 160 A.D.)—supports this view, and the most reliable of the old apocryphal narratives (Gospel of Peter, Protevangelium of James) and the earliest versions (Curetonian Syriac, Peshiṭto, Thebaic) seem to confirm it.

II. Argument for the Helvidian View: (1) Jesus is called Mary's "first-born son" (πρότοτοκον, Lk 2 7), the natural implication of which is that she had other children later. (2) In Mt 1 24 f. it is stated that Joseph at the bidding of the angel recognized his relationship to Mary and took her to be his wife, "and knew her not till she had brought forth a son" (καὶ οὐκ ἐγίνωσκεν αὐτὴν ἕως [οὗ] ἔτεκεν υἱόν), which clearly implies that he did know her afterward. (3) In confirmation of these specific points are the facts (a) that the natural and unconstrained meaning of brethren (ἀδελφοί) is in the direction of full brotherhood—especially since in the Epiphanian view they would not be blood relations of Jesus at all; and (b) that these brethren not only lived under the same roof with Mary, but are found in her company wherever she went (Mk 3 31 ff. and ‖s; Jn 2 12; Ac 1 14), which would be most natural, if they were her children as well as Joseph's. (4) Though no support for this view is to be found in the Palestinian tradition of the Church, it is maintained by a scholar like Tertullian (160–220 A.D.), whose known advocacy of asceticism makes such an admission on his part highly significant.

In examining the above argument (I) it is clear that the traditional support of the two views is after all about equal. Hegesippus and Tertullian were not far from contemporaries; and though Hegesippus, being from Palestine, is more strictly a local witness, Tertullian, being pronouncedly ascetic, is an unwilling witness. The fact that the Hegesippian view was more widely accepted in the Church is after all largely accounted for by that instinctive sentiment which in every age of the Church has tended to preserve a peculiar holiness for the mother of our Lord. It is this prevalent view that finds its way into the apocryphal Gospels and the early versions; so that their testimony is not in any strict sense of the word independent. (II) It is further obvious that the argument of Joseph's probable marital relations to Mary after the birth of Jesus is the product of this reverent sentiment of the Church and not of any facts, which are confessedly absent; while the statement of the "general acceptance of virginity as an ideal state" is based upon a wholly wrong view of marriage itself, which, from all we know of the Hebrew domestic life, was not the view that either Joseph or Mary is likely to have entertained. As a matter of fact, such determination of the question as may be possible lies in the interpretation of the statements of Scripture.

As to these, (1) it may be at once admitted that not much is to be determined by the usage of the term ἀδελφοί. It is used for relationships outside of full brotherhood (e.g., of first cousins, I Ch 23 21 f.; of first cousins once removed, Lv 10 4; of nephews, Gn 14 14 ff., 29 15) and, though its N T use doubtless is less elastic than its LXX. use, it might easily be used of those who are brothers by less than full blood relationship. If Joseph could be spoken of by Mary herself as Jesus' father, the sons of Joseph could be spoken of by others as His brethren. (2) It may also be admitted that the fact that the brethren of Jesus are found constantly in the company of Mary is not necessarily determinative as to their relationship to her. Assuming, as there is every reason to do, that Joseph was no longer living, that Jesus was busied with the affairs of His public ministry, and that the sisters were settled in Nazareth in homes of their own (cf. Mk 6 3 and ‖), it was but natural that the brethren, whether Mary's own sons or not, should consider themselves responsible for her care. (3) It is evident, consequently, that Jesus' committal of His mother at the Cross to the care of His cousin John throws no light upon the relationship of the brethren to Mary; for, in view of their close and constant companionship with Mary, Jesus' action is difficult to understand, whether they were her own sons or not. It must have been due to some motive not clear from the record. (4) There is more significance in the claim that the brethren conducted themselves toward Jesus in the superior spirit of older brothers. This would seem to find support in the incidents of Mk 3 21, 31 ff. and Jn 7 2 ff. In fact, however, it does only when these incidents are wrongly understood. The reason for the attempt in the earlier part of His ministry to control His actions (Mk 3) was a simple failure as yet to understand the spirit of His mission, and was common to the mother and the brothers and sisters alike; while the spirit of the suggestion of the brethren, toward the close of His ministry (Jn 7), is far more a desire to have Him come to public recognition by the authorities at Jerusalem, now that the popular favor in Galilee had been lost, than a contemptuous scorn of His claims. Indeed, it is quite impossible to understand the brethren's final belief in these claims after the resurrection save as we recognize a growing appreciation of them as Jesus' ministry drew toward its close. In neither incident is there anything to necessitate the brothers' being older than Jesus. (5) The statements of most importance in determining the question are naturally those which record Mary's assertion of her virginity (Lk 1 34), which speak of the marital relations between Joseph and Mary (Mt 1 24 f.), and which refer to Jesus as Mary's first-born son (Lk 2 7).

It must be acknowledged that the natural impression created by these passages is that Jesus was but the first of Mary's children. Admitting, however, the interpretation placed by the Epiphanian view upon Mary's reply to the angel and accepting further the technical meaning of "first born" (Ex 34 19 ff.), which, it is urged by this view, does not imply the birth of subsequent offspring, it is significant that the Gospel of Luke, which records these two statements, most open to ascetic interpretation, was written much later than the Gospel of Matthew and might be supposed to reflect the growth in the Church of later ideas. The earlier Gospel of Matthew, which reflects most strongly the Jewish ideas of the early Church, is the Gospel whose nativity statements convey most simply and most strongly the impression that, supernaturally conceived though He was, Jesus was but the first of Mary's children and that the brethren of Jesus were such in the full sense of the word.

BRIBERY. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, 2 (b).

BRICK, BRICK-KILN: Brickmaking was well understood among the Israelites, since their houses of the more common sort were often constructed of bricks (see HOUSE, § 4), though the references to such are very few in the O T (II S 12 31, Is 9 10). The art of brickmaking was highly developed in Babylonia (cf. Gn 11 3) and in Egypt (cf. Ex 1 14, 5 7-19). From the Egyptian inscriptions and illustrations on the walls of temples, tombs, etc., a very complete knowledge of the ancient process of brickmaking can be gained. The details agree quite closely with those in Ex 5 7 ff. On Jer 43 9 cf. RV for the correct reading. E. E. N.

BRIMSTONE: The Heb. term gophrīth, 'sulfur,' is of uncertain derivation. Many connect it with kopher, 'bitumen,' of which there is an abundance in the Jordan Valley and near the Dead Sea. The 'raining' of brimstone (Gn 19 24, etc.) refers perhaps to combustion of sulfur or petroleum from sulfur or petroleum springs which thus could be used as illustrations of the Divine judgment, especially under the influence of the story in Gn 19. BROAD PLACE. See CITY, § 3.

BROAD WALL. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

BROID, broid, BROIDER, broi'der: The word riqmāh, so rendered in Ezk chs. 16, 26, and 27, means 'variegated' and indicates that the garments were of variegated colors, not that they were embroidered. In Ex 28 4 tashbēts and in I Ti 2 9 πλέγμα are rendered in AV "broidered," but cf. RV for a more correct translation. E. E. N.

BROOCH. See DRESS AND ORNAMENT, § 10.

BROOK: With only a few exceptions the Heb. word rendered "brook" is naḥal, which means either the valley or ravine in which water is found (cf. Gn 26 19; Nu 21 15; Job 30 6) or the brook itself. Naḥal is the word used for the streams that run only a part of the year, drying up in the summer-time, while nāhār is the proper word for the larger permanent river. But this distinction is not always observed. E. E. N.

BRUIT, brūt (from the Fr. bruire, 'to make a noise'): The word means rumor or report (Jer 10 22; Nah 3 19; cf. RV). E. E. N.

BUCKET (דְּלִי, dᵉlī, from דָּלָה, 'to draw'): A vessel for drawing water, usually of earthenware. The word is used in O T only figuratively (Nu 24 7; Is 40 15). E. E. N.

BUCKLER. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 7.

BUKKI, bŭk'ai (בֻּקִּי, buqqī), short for Bukkiah: 1. A priest in lineal descent from Aaron according to I Ch 6 5, 51; Ezr 7 4. 2. A Danite (Nu 34 22). E. E. N.

BUKKIAH, bŭk-kai'ā (בֻּקִּיָּהוּ, buqqīyāh): A musician, 'son' of Heman (I Ch 25 4, 13). E. E. N.

BUL, bŭl: The Heb. term for the eighth month of the old agricultural year (I K 6 38). See TIME, § 3.

BULL, BULLOCK, WILD BULL. See PALESTINE, § 24.

BULRUSH. See REED.

BULWARK: The rendering of (1) חֵל, ḥēl (Is 26 1), properly the lesser wall before the main wall, elsewhere often rendered "rampart" RV ("trench" AV). (2) מָצוֹד, mātsōdh, 'fortification' (Ec 9 14). (3) מָצוֹר, mātsōr, a besieger's wall (Dt 20 20). (4) Of פִּנָּה, pinnāh, 'corner' (II Ch 26 15 AV "battlements" RV). See also BESIEGE, and CITY, § 3. E. E. N.

BUNAH, bū'nā (בּוּנָה, būnāh), 'intelligence': A 'son' of Jerahmeel (I Ch 2 25). E. E. N.

BUNNI, bŭn'nai (בֻּנִּי, bunnī): A personal name occurring three times in Neh. The same person may be referred to in 9 4 and 10 15, while 11 15 seems to refer to a man belonging to an earlier generation. It is possible that in 9 4 and 10 15 we have only a scribal error (dittography) for Bani. E. E. N.

I. PREPARATORY TO BURIAL: Customs and usages connected with death clearly reach back into remote antiquity, and show the family to have been even then a social-religious unit. When death occurred, it was a duty to close the eyes (Gn 46 4), probably also the mouth of the person. It is true this is distinctly mentioned only in the Mishna (cf. Tract. Shabbath 23 5—codified about 200 A.D.), but the custom certainly antedates this tractate. Kissing the dead (Gn 50 1) was probably exceptional. The body was washed (Ac 9 37) and anointed (Mk 16 1; Lk 24 1; Jn 12 7, 19 40). It was wrapped in a white linen sheet (Mk 15 46 and ||s), the hands and feet being bound (Jn 19 40) with grave-bands (RVmg.; Gr. κειρίαι) and the face with a napkin (σουδάριον, 'kerchief'), Jn 11 44. How ancient these customs were it is not possible to determine.

1. Preparation of the Body.

II. BURIAL: The Israelites did not embalm their dead (cf. Gn 50 2 f., 26). From I S 28 14; Is 14 9 ff.; Ezk 32 27, we must conclude that in the ancient period the dead were buried with the garments they had worn while living. According to Jer 34 5; II Ch 16 14, 21 19 (cf. Jos. BJ. I, 33 9), spices were burned beside the bodies of prominent men. Later it was the custom to bury together with the dead objects which had been used by them during life, e.g., inkhorns, pens, writing-tablets, keys, etc. Herod furnished Aristobulus his funeral spices and other articles (Jos. Ant. XV, 3 4). Probably this custom goes back to older times (cf. Jos. Ant. XIII, 8 4; XVI, 7 1). Cremation was not practised in Israel (cf. Comm. on I S 31 12; Am 6 10); the usage was rather to bury the dead, while cremation, e.g., of criminals (Lv 20 14, 21 9; Jos 7 25; cf. Dt 21 23), appears as a disgrace added to the penalty of death (Mishna, Tract. Aboda Zara I, 3 rejects cremation as heathen practise. Cf. Tac. Hist. V. 5 4).

2. Interment Ceremonies.

Not to be buried was considered by the Israelites, as by other peoples of antiquity, a frightful fate which one wished visited only on his worst enemies (Am 2 1; cf. Is 33 12; Jer 16 4; Ezk 29 5; II K 9 10). This is to be explained from the belief that the spirits of the unburied dead were obliged to drift about restlessly. Even in Sheol the lot of the unburied is lamentable. They must shift about uneasily in nooks and corners (Ezk 32 23; Is 14 15, etc.).

3. Importance of Burial.

In all probability burying came usually on the very day of death, as at present in the Orient. Of coffins the Israelites knew as little as the ancient Arabs (II K 13 21). The body was carried on a litter or bier (miṭṭāh II S 3 31; cf. Lk 7 14), and was followed by mourners who chanted lamentations.

4. Mode of Burial.

III. PLACE OF BURIAL: In view of the belief that family unity survived death we can understand the importance attached to the custom of placing bodies in a household grave; it was thus that connection with the family was preserved after death (cf. Gn 15 15, 25 8, 17, 35 29, etc.). It is obvious that in ancient times these household graves were located upon land belonging to the family and in proximity to the house (cf. Gn 23; I S 25 1); accordingly the tombs of the kings down to Ahaz are found in the citadel, later in the "garden of Uzza," which in any case is to be sought for in the vicinity (cf. Ezk 43 7). Preferably such graves were located under shade-trees (sacred trees, Gn 35 8; I S 31 13), or in gardens (II K 21 18, 26). Gradually the habit prevailed of placing them outside of inhabited districts and of making use of clefts and of caves, in which the country abounded. For the most part, however, the graves were excavated and the effort was made to place them on the rocky hillsides and often on heights difficult of access (Is 22 16; II K 23 16); but in view of the dangers from beasts of prey, their openings were closed with heavy stones. The sepulcher was always strictly regarded as family property, in which no stranger should be laid. Only in later times, as older views were relaxed, did strangers, in exceptional circumstances, find burial in them (II Ch 24 16; Mt 27 60). For the destitute (II K 23 6; Jer 26 23) and for pilgrims (Mt 27 7) there were common, i.e., public cemeteries, where criminals also were interred (Jer 26 23; Is 53 9; I K 13 22).

5. The Grave.

Inasmuch as the graves of ancestors were in earlier times places of worship (shrines), and as such, holy ground, it is easy to understand that over the tomb of Rachel a matstsēbhāh ("pillar") was raised (Gn 35 20). It appears probable that the sacredness of some shrines rests upon the fact that they were burial-places of heroes (cf. Hebron, Gn 23, 25 9, 49 31; Shechem, Jos 24 32; Kadesh-barnea, Nu 20 1). The tomb of Deborah was under a sacred tree near Bethel (Gn 35 8). In later times sepulchers as a whole were regarded as unclean, because associated with another worship — i.e., the worship of the spirits of the departed as contrary to the worship of Jehovah, and the custom arose of whitewashing the stones which covered them in order to render them distinguishable from afar and keep passers-by from ceremonial pollution (Mt 23 27).

6. Sanctity of the Grave.

IV. MOURNING: Upon the news of the death of a relative it was customary to rend the clothes (II S 1 11) and gird oneself with the mourning garment (cf. II S 3 31 ff.), which originally was probably nothing but a loin-cloth. Among the Arabians the custom prevailed of going about naked as a sign of mourning. Whether this was practised in Israel is doubtful (Mic 1 8; Is 20 2 f. are not clear evidences of such a usage). But it was customary to go bareheaded and barefoot (Ezk 24 17; II S 15 30), to sprinkle dust and ashes on the head (Jos 7 6; II S 1 2), to cover the head, or at least the beard (Ezk 24 17; Jer 14 3; II S 15 30), or to place the hand on the head (II S 13 18 f.), and to sit in dust and ashes (Jer 6 26; Job 2 8). In addition, various disfigurements and mutilations were self-inflicted. The head was shaved (Jer 16 6, 47 5); the beard was cut off, or at least clipped (Jer 41 5, 48 37; Is 15 2; Lv 19 27); gashes were made on the whole body, or at least on the hand (Jer 16 6, 41 5, etc.). It was quite usual upon the occurrence of a death to follow the wide-spread custom of holding a funeral repast (Hos 9 4; II S 3 35; Jer 16 7 f.; Ezk 24 17, 22). In addition there were separate offerings of food and drink which were placed upon the grave (Dt 26 14). From To 4 18 and Sir 30 18 f., we learn that this custom continued until quite late. Widespread was also the custom, while the women of the house were sitting upon the earth weeping, for professional female mourners to come and chant peculiar rhythmic lamentations beginning with 'ēkh or 'ēkhāh. Evidently this custom of funereal lamentation was a religious usage regulated by nearness of relationship (cf. Zec 12 10 ff.). See also MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 5.

7. Customs of Mourning.

8. Significance of These Customs. How these different customs are to be accounted for is a much-debated problem, which has not yet been brought to a definite solution. Particularly, it is in no way certain that all these customs can be traced back to one original idea and practise. Some may possibly be conceived as expressions of the vivid sense of grief peculiar to the Oriental; but the attempt to say this of all, as Kamphausen and others have done, has failed. As far as one class of these customs is concerned, it is not to be disputed that they probably were connected with the worship of the deceased, once prevalent also in Israel. This in no way means that the Israelites in all ages were conscious of such connection. It is much more likely that in this case, as in many others, such customs continued even when the original idea from which they sprang had long since disappeared.

BUSH, THE BURNING: The instrument of a theophany in the experience of Moses (Ex 3 2 f.; Dt 33 16; Lk 20 37; Ac 7 30, 35). The natural mechanism of the phenomenon may have been electrical (W. Robertson Smith, Rel. Sem.[2] p. 193 f.). The important feature of it is the revelation of God through it to Moses. The effort to identify the species of the bush (Heb. ṣneh) with the seneh, a thorny shrub, is not altogether successful. A. C. Z.

BUSHEL. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3.

BUSINESS: This term is used in EV in a variety of senses, corresponding to the different original Heb. and Gr. terms. (1) As the rendering of dābhār, 'word,' often used in the more general sense of 'matter,' 'affair,' like the Gr. λόγος (Dt 24 5; Jos 2 14, etc.). (2) Of mᵉla'khāh, 'work,' i.e., 'occupation' (Gn 39 11; cf. RV; I Ch 26 30, etc.). (3) Of 'īnyān, 'travail,' or labor (Ec 5 3, 8 16). Most of the other cases need no comment. BYWORD: (1) In Job 30 9 the Heb. millāh means 'word.' (2) In Job 17 6; Ps 44 14 māshal, the ordinary word for 'proverb,' means a saying of more than ordinary significance (in a good or evil sense). (3) In Dt 28 37; I K 9 7; II Ch 7 20 shᵉnīnāh from shānan, 'to sharpen,' means a 'sharp' saying, i.e., one with a 'sting' to it. See TERMS OF BLESSING AND REPROACH. E. E. N.

CAB. See Weights and Measures, § 3.

CABBON, cab'bon (כַּבּוֹן, kabbōn): A town of Judah near Eglon (Jos 15 40), site unknown. E. E. N.

CABINS: This term occurs only in Jer 37 16 (AV), for which RV has, more correctly, "cells." E. E. N.

CABUL, kē'bul (כָּבוּל, kābhūl): A town on the border of Asher (Jos 19 27), Map IV. C 6. In I K 9 13 it is said that Hiram called the 20 cities in Galilee given him by Solomon "the land of Cabul," indicative in some way of his dissatisfaction. The meaning of the term is unknown. E. E. N.

CÆSAR AUGUSTUS. See Augustus.

CÆSAREA, ses''a-rī'a: A city on the coast of Palestine (Map I, C 5). The ancient name of the place, Strato's Tower (Jos. Ant. XIII, 12 2), may have been derived from the name of one of the Sidonian kings (cf. CIGr. 87). The city became a part of the domain of Herod the Great, who rebuilt both city and harbor on a magnificent scale (Jos. BJ. I, 21 5-8), naming the city Καισάρεια and the harbor Λιμὴν Σεβαστός in honor of Augustus. After the deposition of Archelaus in 6 A.D., it became the residence of the Roman procurators (cf. Ac 23 23, 25 1). J. M. T.

CÆSAREA PHILIPPI, fi-lip'ai (Map IV, F 4): The site, near one of the sources of the Jordan, is probably the same as that of Baal Gād (Jos 11 17) and Baal Hermon (Jg 3 3), so called because it was one of the early seats of Canaanitic worship. Under Greek domination city and district were called Paneas (Jos. Ant. XVIII, 2 1, Πανίας, Pliny Hist. Nat. V, 18, Paneas), from a grotto dedicated to the god Pan (τὸ Πάνειον Jos. Ant. XV, 10 3). The tetrarch Philip enlarged the city and called it Cæsarea in honor of Augustus (Jos. BJ. II, 9 1). In the N T (Mt 16 13; Mk 8 27) and Josephus (BJ. III, 9 7; Vita, 13) it is known as Cæsarea Philippi, to distinguish it from Cæsarea on the coast. Under Agrippa II the city was called Neronias, but after the 4th cent. only the old name Paneas occurs, still preserved in the modern Arabic name of the place, Bāniās. J. M. T.

CÆSAR'S HOUSEHOLD (οἱ ἐκ τῆς καίσαρος οἰκίας): A group of Christians mentioned only in Ph 4 22, where greetings are sent from them to the Church in Philippi. Since domus (οἰκία) is used classically to include the dependents as well as the immediate members of the household (Cic. ad Att. IV, 12), it is not necessary to assume that the converts to whom Paul here refers were of distinguished rank (cf. Dissertation by Lightfoot; in Ep. to the Phil., p. 169 f.). See also Pretorium. J. M. T.

CAIAPHAS, kē'a-fas or cai'a-fas (Καϊάφας): The high priest before whom Jesus was tried (Jn 18 14 f.). His original name was Joseph (Jos. Ant. XVIII, 2 2), and he was the son-in-law of Annas (Jn 18 13). He became high priest not later than 18 A.D. (Ant. XVIII, 2 2), and retained his office until about 36 A.D. (Ant. XVIII, 2 2, 4 3). His adroitness and capacity for intrigue are well illustrated in Jn 11 49 f. He naturally presided at the session of the Sanhedrin at which Jesus' arrest was planned (Mt 26 3), and after His condemnation it was his official duty as head of the nation to deliver Him to Pilate with the request for His execution (Mt 26 57 f.; Jn 18 24, 28; cf. Jos. Ant. XX, 10, end; Contra Apionem, II, 23; Schürer, HJP, II, i, 182, 199). J. M. T.

CAIN, kēn (קַיִן, qayin), 'smith,' 'artificer': I. The eldest son of Adam and Eve (Gn 4 1 ff.). In the ancient story of Gn 4 by a popular etymological word-play the name is made to mean 'acquired' or 'possession.' The material in Gn 4 1-24 is not all of the same character. The Cain of vs. 12 ff. (a "fugitive" and a "wanderer") is not the Cain of vs. 16 ff. (a city builder and head, after Adam, of one of the great genealogical lines of descent). The story in vs. 2-15 probably reflects some ancient struggle or antipathy between two different types (or tribes) of men (see Abel). That in ver. 16 ff. is an ancient attempt at tracing the development of civilization by connecting the discovery of the different arts with certain legendary heroes. The two stories later became connected, perhaps through the ancient song of Lamech (q.v.) which may have been originally entirely independent of both (cf. ver. 15 with ver. 24). The "sign" put upon Cain is thought by some to have been the totem sign of the clan or tribe of Cain. II. A town in Judah (Jos 15 57). See KAIN.

E. E. N.

CAINAN, kê'nan (קֵינָן, qēnān): 1. Son of Enosh. See KENAN. 2. Son of Arphaxad (Lk 3 36). In the Heb. text of Gn 10 24, 11 12, there is no mention of Cainan. Luke has followed the LXX., where the name was probably interpolated to make 10 terms in the genealogy. E. E. N.

CAKE. See FOOD, § 2, and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 12.

CALAH, kê'lā (כֶּלַח, kelaḥ, Assyrian kalḥu, kalaḥ): One of the chief cities (next to Asshur and Nineveh) in Assyria, said in Gn 10 11 to have been built by Nimrod. It acquired importance under Shalmaneser I in the 14th cent. B.C. The period of its greatest glory was during the reigns of Assurnazirpal and Shalmaneser II (885–824 B.C.). Many of the inscriptions of these kings have been discovered on its site, which is identified by Layard and G. Smith with the mound Nimrud, about 20 m. SE. of Nineveh (Kuyunjik). It was the first of these kings (Assurnazirpal) who built and fortified the town, adorned it with a palace, constructed a canal, and induced many to take up their residence in the city. A. C. Z.

CALAMUS. See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 1 (3), and PALESTINE, § 23.

CALCOL, cal'cel (כַּלְכֹּל, kalkōl, Chalcol AV): Son of Zerah, son of Judah, according to I Ch 2 6, but in I K 4 31, a famous wise man, son of Mahol. E. E. N.

CALDRON, cōl'drun: In Job 41 20 the RV rendering "rushes" is correct. The other words rendered "caldron" ("pots" in RV in Jer 52 18 f.), all refer to earthenware vessels, but it is now impossible to ascertain how they differed from one another. E. E. N.

CALEB, kê'leb (כָּלֵב, kālēbh), 'dog': 1. One of the twelve spies; son of Jephunneh, of the tribe of Judah (Nu 13 6, 34 19). With Joshua he advised an immediate advance into Canaan. For his faith shown in this attitude, he was rewarded with long life, and entered into the possession of his share of the land allotted to Judah. From Jos 14 6, 14, it appears that Caleb was not a natural descendant of Judah but a Kenizzite adopted into the tribe, within which his name became the eponym of a subdivision (cf. I S 25 2, the kālibbī [Calebite], "of the house of Caleb" EV). The name of Caleb is also given in the variant form of Chelubai (I Ch 2 9, 18), brother of Jerahmeel. In Chronicles he is designated not as the son of Jephunneh but of Hezron, a remoter ancestor, i.e., a Hezronite. 2. Son of Hur and grandson of the preceding (I Ch 2 50). A. C. Z.

CALEB-EPHRATHAH, kê"leb-ef'ra-thā (אֶפְרָתָה כָּלֵב, kālēbh 'ephrāthāh): According to the common text (cf. I Ch 2 24) this term is a place-name. But the Heb. is confused and the true reading probably was "and after Hezron was dead Caleb went in unto Ephrath(ah), the wife of his father Hezron, and she bare," etc. See Kittel in Handkom. E. E. CALF. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING, § 5, and FOOD, § 10.

CALF, GOLDEN, and CALF IMAGES: 1. The account in Ex 32: This narrative is the result of combining two distinct accounts (J and E), neither of which is now preserved intact (see HEXATEUCH, §§ 12–18).

In J's account (vs. 7 and [8] 9-14, 25-29) emphasis is laid on the mutinous disorder in the camp and on the loyalty of the Levites. E gives a detailed account of the making of the calf (vs. 1-6), of Moses' surprise as he enters the camp (15-18), and of his wrath and rebuke of Aaron (19-24). Ver. 8 may be editorial; consequently it is uncertain whether J's original narrative said anything about a calf. It is in E that we get the fullest description of the apostasy as consisting in making a calf to symbolize J" and in worshiping Him by this means. Since E was probably written in northern Israel, this is what might be expected, as calf-worship was practised in the northern kingdom.

There is nothing improbable in the story that the Israelites in the desert fell into this sin. The prohibition of metal images as symbols of deity was one of the fundamental principles of Moses' teaching (see DECALOGUE), while the temptation to symbolize their deity under the form of a young bull, for such is the meaning of "calf" here, was one that might have presented itself very easily to the Israelites even in the desert, not because of their knowledge of the Egyptian animal-worship (which was of a very different type), but simply because of the wide-spread use of the bull as a symbol of deity throughout the Semitic world. The kernel of E's account may then be considered historical, although the narrative itself may well be colored by details drawn from the writer's personal knowledge of calf-worship in N. Israel. It is probable that the bull was a symbol of strength, possibly also of generative power.

2. The bull-worship introduced by Jeroboam I (I K 12 28-30): Jeroboam's motive in this was political rather than religious. He was not introducing a new deity, since his proclamation in ver. 28 evidently refers to J" The plural ("these be thy gods") is remarkable, but is more natural here than at Ex 32 4, 8, which therefore is suspected of having been edited under the influence of I K 12 28. On the other hand, in the ‖ in Neh 9 18 the singular is found, which after all may be the original reading.

Furthermore, Jeroboam was not guilty of making a complete innovation; for the worship of J" by means of images was practised before his time (cf. e.g., Jg 17 4, 18 17, 30-31). Nevertheless, it was a step downward, tending to obliterate the essential distinction between the religion of J" and common Semitic religion. The severe judgment pronounced upon Jeroboam expresses the view of the deuteronomic author of Kings (see HEXATEUCH, § 19, and KINGS, BOOKS OF). It is the view of a later time, after the prophetic polemic (Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah) had aroused and enlightened the conscience as to the true character of such worship.

3. Subsequent history of calf-worship in Israel: Jeroboam I set up this worship at two old and important sanctuaries, Bethel in the S. and Dan in the N. There is no evidence that calf images existed at any other N. Israelite sanctuary, while Judah seems to have been free from the practise—at least in any officially recognized form. The early opposition to it in Israel seems to have quieted down. Elijah and Elisha made no protest against it, though they can not have approved it. It survived the destruction of the Baal-worship by Jehu and possibly then took on new strength. Amos' attitude toward it is not explicitly noted, but Hosea vehemently opposed it (cf. 8 5-6 — where "Samaria" means not the city, but the realm—and 13 2). It maintained its hold until the fall of N. Israel in 721. (See also SEMITIC RELIGION, § 17.)

CALLING (κλῆσις): The primary significance of the Greek word is 'invitation.' Sometimes the object or design of the invitation is explicitly stated (I Th 2 12, "unto his own kingdom and glory"; Col 3 15, "to peace"; I P 2 9, "his marvelous light"). The word is also used without such definition of the object. In that case it signifies God's invitation of men to accept the redemption He offers through Christ (Ro 8 28, 11 29; Ph 3 14). This calling is associated with God's eternal purpose, but is also represented as involving the response of acceptance by man as a necessary condition of its completeness. A difference may be noted between the Pauline and the Synoptic usage. According to the latter it is complete, irrespective of the response of man (Mt 20 16, but text doubtful). A. C. Z.

CALNEH, cal'nę (כַּלְנֵה, kalneh, Am 6 2, also Calno, כַּלְנוֹ Is 10 9): A city in Syria (probably the Kul-unu of the cuneiform inscriptions (cf. Schrader, COT, II, p. 143). It was captured in 738 by Tiglath-pileser III. Calneh in Gn 10 10 is also identified by Delitzsch (Wo Lag d. Parad., p. 226) with Kul-unu; but it is probably a textual corruption for Calbeh, Kullaba, one of the most important early Babylonian cities. A. C. Z.

CALVARY. See JERUSALEM, § 45.

CALVES OF LIPS: In Hos 14 2 we read: "We render as bullocks (the offering of) our lips"; but the LXX. evidently read a text equivalent to "fruits of our lips." If EV be correct, the phrase means: 'that which proceeds from the lips' as an expression of heart devotion in lieu of animal sacrifice.

A. C. Z.

CAMEL (גָּמָל, gāmāl): The camel is referred to in the OT most frequently as in use in the nomadic stage of civilization, as by the patriarchs (Gn 12 16, etc.), the Midianites (Jg 6 5–8 21), Job (Job 1 3, 42 12), the people of Kedar (Jer 49 29), etc. Its use in caravans is referred to in I K 10 2; Ezr 2 67. David is said to have had a herd of camels (I Ch 27 30). Possibly the same thing is to be inferred as to the Pharaoh from Ex 9 3. At the same time it must have been a more or less common possession of many in Palestine (cf. I S 15 3; I Ch 12 40; and the prohibition of the camel as food in Lv 11 4, Dt 14 7). The camel was used mainly as a beast of burden (cf. II K 8 9), or for riding, especially on long journeys and over desert country (cf. Gn 24 61; I S 30 17, etc.). Its milk was also used (Gn 32 15). The structure of its feet, its capacity for going without water for a long period—as much as a week—and its ability to subsist on almost any sort of pasturage, even thistles, fit it preeminently for hard service on the hot, dry, and barren desert. Its wool is woven into coarse cloth much used by the Bedawin (cf. II K 1 8, RVmg. and Mt 3 4). The camel, while generally patient and serviceable, is often vindictive and savage. The word translated "dromedary" (Is 60 6; Jer 2 23) should be rendered "young camel." E. E. N.

CAMEL'S HAIR. See CAMEL and DRESS AND ORNAMENT, § 9.

CAMON, kê'mun. See KAMON.

CAMP: The word maḥăneh, rendered "camp," means the place where the tent is pitched and thus indicates the encampment, or resting-place, of the tribe or clan, and has no necessary connection with warfare. Throughout the Hexateuch it is generally used of Israel, whether stationary or on the march, as dwelling together in tents. In the subsequent OT books (except Psalms) it always refers to a military camp. See also WARFARE, § 3. E. E. N.

CAMPHIRE, cam'fair: Only in Song 1 14, 4 13 AV. See PALESTINE, § 23.

CANA, kê'na (Κανά): A village of Galilee referred to several times in the Gospel of John (2 1, 11, 4 46, 21 2). Since Jesus' mother and apparently His entire family were at the wedding-feast (Jn 2 2, 12), Cana was probably not far from Nazareth, while the fact that Jesus "went down" (2 12) from Cana to Capernaum would imply that it was among the hills. This agrees somewhat better with the modern Khurbet Kānāh (Map IV, C 7), on a ridge above the plain of el Buṭṭauf, than with Kefr Kenna (Map IV, D 7), although the latter is much nearer Nazareth. Khurbet Kānāh is also to be preferred on philological grounds (cf. Jos 16 8, LXX., where, as the Heb. naḥal qanah is evidently the original of the Gr. Χελ-Κανά, Κανά is the equivalent of Qanah). The hints in Josephus (cf. Vita, 16 with 40), and the traditions of the crusaders favor the same identification (see Conder, Tent Work in Pal., p. 79 f.).

J. M. T.

CANAAN, kê'nan (כְּנַעַן, kena'an). I. The son of Ham in the ethnological (really geographical) lists in Gn 9 and 10. It is possible that Canaan and Cain may be but two varieties of the same ethnological-geographical tradition (see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 10 f.). II. One of the old designations for Palestine, the land of the Canaanites whom the Israelites dispossessed. This term can be traced as far back as the Egyptian inscriptions of c. 1800 B.C. in which it is used for the coastland between Egypt and Asia Minor. It appears also in the Amarna letters of c. 1400 B.C. as a designation of Palestine. The etymology and earliest history of the name are unknown. Phœnician traditions show that the Phœnicians themselves were known as Canaanites. Some hold that the name originally belonged to a region of Babylonia and was carried west by the Semitic emigrants who settled on the Mediterranean coast 3000–2000 B.C. The O T uses the word Canaanite sometimes in a wider, sometimes in a narrower sense. In Gn 12 6, 24 3, 37; Jos 3 10, it includes the whole pre-Israelite population, even those E. of the Jordan. In other passages the Canaanites are spoken of as but one of six or seven different peoples dispossessed by Israel (Ex 3 8, etc.). The "land of C." generally refers to the whole W. Jordan land. Canaanite and Amorite are often used synonymously. In Is 23 8, Hos 12 7, the Heb. word rendered "trafficker" is Canaan, the word having become the equivalent of 'merchant,' because of the mercantile activity of the Canaanites, especially the Phœnicians. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 6.

The Canaanites were of Semitic stock, like the Phœnicians to the N., and were but a part of the large Semitic group (Phenicians, Amorites, Canaanites) whose ancestors migrated west from NE. Arabia 3000–2000 B.C. Their language (the 'lip' of Canaan, Is 19 18), the same as that spoken in Phœnicia, Moab, etc., was adopted by the Israelite invaders and is the Hebrew of the O T. They were well acquainted with Babylonian culture long before they were conquered by Israel. They were made subject to Egypt c. 1500 B.C. and continued under Egyptian suzerainty until c. 1300 B.C., when Egypt's hold gradually relaxed. The Canaanites lacked organization. Each city held itself aloof from the rest, jealous of its own independence, and thus fell more easily into the hands of the invading Israelites. The majority of the Canaanites were probably not exterminated, but gradually absorbed into Israel, which eventually contained a large Canaanite admixture. It was the presence of the Canaanites among the Israelites and their close intimacy with them that rendered the religious problem in Israel so serious and difficult. They taught their conquerors agriculture and many other useful arts and also led them to adopt many of their religious practises. The ultimate triumph of Israel speaks loudly for the strength and vitality of Israel's own religion. (See Paton, Early History of Syria and Palestine.) See also TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3. E. E. N.

CANANÆAN, kē″na-nī′an (Καναναῖος, perhaps more correctly Κανναῖος = Aram. qannai, 'a zealous one,' of which the Gr. equivalent was ζηλωτής, 'zealot.' Some MSS. have Κανανίτης = Canaanite, so AV): A title borne by the Simon mentioned toward the end of the lists of the Apostles (Mk 3 18; Mt 10 4). In Lk 6 15, Ac 1 13 the Greek form 'zealot' is used. The Zealots were the party headed by Judas of Gamala in opposition to the census under Quirinius (q.v.), in 6 A.D. (cf. Jos. Ant. XVIII, 1 1, 6). They were intensely nationalistic in their aims and during the civil war committed many excesses (Jos. BJ. IV, 5 1-3). See also Schürer, HJP. I, ii, p. 80 f., and Mathews, The Messianic Hope in the N T, p. 15 f. J. M. T.

CANDACE can′da-sē (Κανδάκη): According to Ac 8 26 f. the queen of the Ethiopians, whose treasurer was baptized by Philip. It is possible that the name was a dynastic title rather than a personal name (cf. Pliny, HN. VI, p. 35). J. M. T.

CANDLE. See LAMP.

CANDLESTICK: In Mt 5 15, Mk 4 21, Lk 8 16, 11 33, for "candlestick" (AV) the RV reads "lamp." See LAMP. For other occurrences see TEMPLE, §§ 16, 23, and TABERNACLE, § 3. E. E. N.

CANOPY: In the ERV of Is 4 5 for AV "defense." The ARV reads "covering," the primary meaning of the Heb. term (חֻפָּה, ḥuppāh). E. E. N.

CAPERBERRY. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 7 (2).

CAPERNAUM, ca-per′na-um (Καφαρναούμ, i.e., Kaphar-Nahum, 'village of Nahum'): A city of Galilee where Peter and Andrew had taken up their residence before Jesus called them to be His disciples (Mk 1 16-21; Jn 1 44). Jesus Himself made it the headquarters of His ministry in Galilee after His rejection at Nazareth (Mt 4 13; Mk 2 1). That it was a town of considerable size in the days of Jesus there can be no doubt whatever. It contained the office of a tax-collector (Mk 2 14), a representative of the king, Herod Antipas (Jn 4 47 mg.), and a military station whose commander had built a synagogue for the people (Mt 8 5-13; Lk 7 1-10). Its present site is a matter of dispute. The view that Tell-Hum is the ancient Capernaum is supported by a tradition going back to the 4th cent., as well as by the excavation of the ruins of a synagogue there. Further, the last syllable of the name (Hum) seems to be a remnant of Kaphar-Nahum. In favor of Kahn-Minyeh the facts are cited that Capernaum must have belonged to the Plain of Gennesaret (Jn 6 1-21), that a place of such size and importance must have been on a highroad, and that the name Minyeh is a remnant of the ancient designation of Christians as Minim, 'heretics.' See Map IV, E 6. (Cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 456.) A. C. Z.

CAPHTOR, caf′tor; CAPHTORIM. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

CAPITAL. See TEMPLE, § 14.

CAPPADOCIA, cap″a-dō′shi-a. See ASIA MINOR, § 4.

CAPTAIN: This term is used somewhat loosely in the Eng. Bible (especially the AV) as the rendering of nineteen different Heb. and Gr. words, only one of which, χιλίαρχος, 'chiliarch,' was specifically a designation of a particular military rank. Most of the others are terms expressive of leadership, but not technical terms for specific grades or ranks in a military organization. In some instances the more correct RV rendering is altogether different from the AV, e.g., "friends," Jer 13 21, "marshal," Jer 51 27, Nah 3 17, "battering-ram," Ezk 21 22. In other cases, the substitutions of "prince" (I S 9 16, etc.), "governor" (Jer 51 23; etc.), "chief," or "chief men" (Jos 10 24; I Ch 11 15, etc.) are not significant. Cf. also the RV in I K 4 19; I Ch 11 11, 12 18; He 2 10 for improvements in translation. In the O T the most frequently used term is שַׂר, sār, a term that could be used for almost any kind of military leadership. Chief captain is used in the N T to render χιλίαρχος, the technical Gr. term for the commander of a cohort, i.e., one-tenth of a legion, for which the Latin term was 'tribune.' In Ac the usage of this term is perfectly regular, but in the Gospels (Mk 6 21; Jn 18 12) and in Rev 6 15, 19 18, it is used to designate any high military rank. See also WARFARE.

CARCHEMISH, cär'kę-mish (כַּרְכְּמִישׁ, karkᵉmīsh): A city of ancient times on the W bank of the Euphrates River, identified with the modern Jerōbīs in upper Syria. It dates from about 2200 B.C., and was for long centuries a Hittite capital and headquarters of commercial and military activity. Though it paid tribute to several Assyrian kings, beginning with Shalmaneser II about 858 B.C., it was not completely overcome and defeated until the disastrous assault of Sargon II in 717 B.C. (cf. Is 10 9). Henceforth it declined, and became merely an Assyrian dependency. It was the scene of Nebuchadrezzar's great victory over Pharaoh Necho (Jer 46 2; II Ch 35 20).

CAREAH, cą-rī'ą. See KAREAH.

CARITES, car'i-tîz: The RV rendering of a Heb. word (kārī) of uncertain meaning (II K 11 4, 19). The AV has "captains." It was evidently the designation of a body of troops, but whether a proper name or a mere appellation is uncertain. E. E. N.

CARMEL (כַּרְמֶל, karmel), 'garden,' 'vineyard': 1. The name of a mountain situated between the plain of Esdraelon and the Mediterranean Sea, so called because of its thickly wooded aspect, which was even more striking in ancient times than it is at the present day (Map IV, A 7). From the single peak, however, the name passed to the range of hills associated with it, thus designating the mountainous territory more than 20 m. in length, and from 3 to 8 m. in breadth to the W. and NW. of Esdraelon. In history Carmel became noted for the contest between Elijah and the Baal prophets (I K 18). It was also famed in literary composition for natural beauty (Song 7 5; Is 35 2). Together with Sharon, Lebanon, and Bashan it is one of the points of Palestine which especially show God's favor to Israel in bestowing such a country upon it (Jer 50 19; Mic 7 14). Its devastation is, therefore, a sign of the decided displeasure of J" (Is 33 9; Jer 4 26; Am 1 2; Nah 1 4). In post-biblical times Carmel continued to be a site of note both among the heathen and among Christians (cf. Jambl. Vita Pythag. 8 15; Tacit. Hist. 2 78; Sueton. Vesp. 5), serving finally as the site of a renowned monastery (the Carmelite).

2. A town in the hill-country of Judæa (Jos 15 53). The residence of Abigail, wife of Nabal, who after her husband's death was taken by David as one of his wives (I S 30 5). Abigail is accordingly called "the Carmelite." This Carmel was also the scene of other incidents in the lives of Saul and David (I S 15 12, 25 2). Its modern name is Karmal, and its exact location 8 m. SE. of Hebron. Map II, E 3.

A. C. Z.

CARMI, cär'mai (כַּרְמִי, karmī): 1. Father of Achan and head of a family of Judah (Jos 7 1, 18; I Ch 2 7). 2. Head of one of the clans of Reuben (Gn 46 9; Nu 26 6, etc.). While it is possible that in I Ch 4 1 Carmi is a textual error for Caleb, it is also possible that the text is correct, the reference being to the preceding. E. E. N.

CARNALLY. See CRIMES and PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (c).

CARPENTER. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 5.

CARPET: The term occurs in the RV of Jg 5 10 for AV "in judgment," and of Pr 31 22 for the AV "coverings." The two different Hebrew words (middīn and marbhaddīm) are of uncertain meaning, but each indicates a covering of some sort.

E. E. N.

CARPUS, cär'pus (Κάρπος): A friend of Paul's, probably a resident of Troas (II Ti 4 13). Later legend made him one of the seventy disciples of Jesus. E. E. N.

CARRIAGE: This term occurs five times in the AV, and in each case the RV substitutes a more correct rendering; in Jg 18 21 "goods"; in I S 17 22; Is 10 28; Ac 21 15 "baggage"; in Is 46 1, "the things that ye carried about." E. E. N.

CARSHENA, cär'shę-ną (Est 1 14). See PRINCES, THE SEVEN.

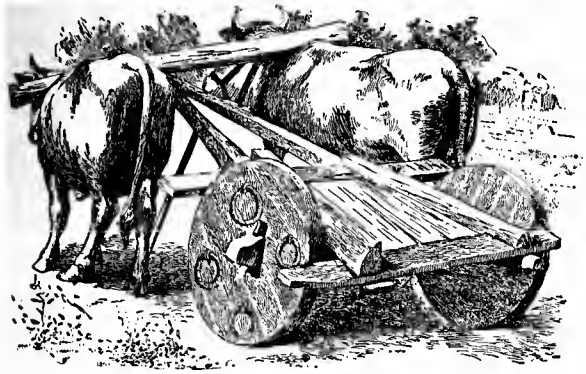
CART (עֲגָלָה, 'agālāh, from 'āgal, 'to be round,' 'to roll'): The cart or wagon of the Hebrews was probably a somewhat rude and clumsy affair. It was two-wheeled, the wheels being of wood, and was furnished with a tongue or pole, as it was drawn by two oxen yoked side by side. The accompanying cut of a modern Syrian cart probably well represents those used in ancient times. In Is 28 27 f. the reference is to the 'rollers' of the threshing-sledge (see



An Ox-Cart, as Seen in Palestine To-Day.

AGRICULTURE, § 6). For "wagons" in Ezk 23 24 AV, the RV renders correctly "chariots."

E. E. N.

CARVING. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 5.

CASEMENT. See HOUSE, § 6 (j).

CASIPHIA, ca-sif'i-a (כַּסִּפְיָא, kāṣiphyā'): A "place" (in Babylonia) which was the home of a colony of Levites and Nethinim (Ezr 8 15-20). Its site is unknown. E. E. N.

CASLUHIM, cas'lu-him. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

CASSIA, cash'ia. See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 1, and PALESTINE, § 23.

CAST. See ARTISAN LIFE, §§ 10, 11, and METALS.

CASTANET. See MUSIC, § 3 (1), (c).

CASTAWAY: In Co 9 27 ἀδόκιμος, "a castaway" AV. is rightly changed in RV to "rejected." The Gr. word means 'not approved,' 'unable to stand the test.' E. E. N.

CASTLE. See CITY, § 2, FORT, and JERUSALEM, § 38.

CASTOR AND POLLUX, cas'tẹr, pel'ux. See TWIN BROTHERS and SHIPS AND NAVIGATION.

CATERPILLAR. See PALESTINE, § 26.

CATHOLIC EPISTLES: A term applied to the Epistles of James, Peter, John, and Jude. Since no one of these seven epistles is addressed to a specifically named church or individual, and all (except II and III Jn) deal with general rather than merely local or individual questions, they easily came to be considered by the early Fathers as addressed to the Church at large, i.e., the catholic (or universal) Church. The AV expresses this idea by the word "general" in the titles of Ja, I P, II P, I Jn, and Jude, which is the translation of καθολική, found in many late MSS. With the early MSS. the RV omits it. E. E. N.

CATTLE. See NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

CAUDA, cō'da. See CLAUDA.

CAUL: The sacrificial term (Ex 29 13, etc.). (1) The Heb. (יֹתֶרֶת, 'the excess' or 'that which is left over') seems to mean the fatty mass near the opening of the liver (cf. Dill. on Lv 3 4). (2) In Hos 13 8 (Heb. סָגוֹר, "enclosure") it means either the pericardium or the breast as a whole. (3) For Is 3 18 see DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 11. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 10. E. E. N.

CAUSE. See LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE, § 4.

CAUSEWAY. See ROADS.

CAVE: In the hilly regions of Palestine caves are very numerous. The O T contains many references to them as places of temporary abode (Gn 19 30), of refuge from invaders (Jg 6 2; I S 13 6, etc.), or from pursuers (Jos 10 16; I S 22 1, etc.), and as burial-places (Gn 23 9 ff.; cf. Jn 11 38). The Horites (Gn 14 6, 36 20 ff.) were probably cave-dwellers, as the word Horite is from ḥor (one of the O T words for cave). E. E. N.

CEDAR (אֶרֶז, 'erets): The cedar so often referred to in the O T is always the cedar of Lebanon with the possible exception of Nu 24 6 (where the text may be corrupt). These cedars were famed throughout all SW. Asia. The lumber made from them, because of its size, durability, and fragrance, was used by the kings of Assyria and other countries for the decoration of their palaces, etc. The various notices of the use of cedar in Israel (Lv 4 14; II S 5 11; I K 5 8, 6 9, 7 2; Song 1 17; Jer 22 14, etc.) illustrate its use in other countries. The tree itself was considered the most beautiful and majestic of trees and was easily made the symbol of strength, glory, and regal power (Ps 92 12; Ezk 31 3, etc.). The cedars now extant on Lebanon are probably only stunted and scattered remains of once large and magnificent forests. See also PALESTINE, § 21. E. E. N.

CEDRON, sî'dron. See JERUSALEM, § 5.

CEILING. See HOUSE, §§ 5 and 6 (a).

CELLAR: In I Ch 27 27 f., the word אֹצְרוֹת ('ōtserōth, plur. of 'ōtsār, rendered "cellars") means merely storehouses or rooms, where wine and oil were stored. In Lk 11 33 (RV) the Gr. κρύπτη means literally 'a hidden place,' i.e., anything similar to a vault, crypt, or cellar. E. E. N.

CENCHREA, sen-crî'a (Κεγχρεία): A harbor of Corinth on the Saronic gulf and a town of some size (Ac 18 18; Ro 16 1). It contained temples of Aphrodite and Artemis, a bronze statue of Poseidon, sanctuaries of Asclepius and Isis, also the Baths of Helen. The mole is still visible. J. R. S. S.

CENSER. See TEMPLE, § 19.

CENTURION (ἑκατοντάρχης [and -os], 'ruler of a hundred,' and κεντυρίων [= Lat. centurio]): The commander of a 'century,' i.e., a hundred men, the sixtieth part of a legion, in the Roman army. The centurion mentioned in Mt 8 5-13; Lk 7 2-6 (=Jn 4 46 ff?) belonged probably to the small military force of Herod Antipas, organized on the Roman model. In all other cases a Roman officer is meant.

E. E. N.

CEPHAS, sī'fas. See PETER.

CERTIFY: The words rendered "certify" mean: in II S 15 28 'to announce or tell'; in Ezr 4 14, 16, 5 10, 7 24 'to let one know.' In Est 2 22 the RV renders, much more correctly, "told," and in Gal 1 11 "make known." E. E. N.

CHAFF: The translation of: (1) mōts, always correctly rendered "chaff" in both RV and AV. (2) hăshash, "dry grass" (Is 5 24 AV, 33 11). (3) 'ūr, Dn 2 35. (4) ἄχυρον (Mt 3 12; Lk 3 17). In Jer 23 28 the RV "straw" is more correct. E. E. N.

CHAINS: These were either voluntarily worn for purposes of personal embellishment or imposed from without as means of preventing movement. (1) Of ornamental chains the most typical are those referred to in the stories of Joseph and Daniel (Gn 41 42; Dn 5 7, etc.). See also DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 11. (2) Of restraining chains those worn by Paul are the best example (Ac 28 20; II Ti 1 16; but cf. also Ac 12 7). In this case for a clearer understanding it must be borne in mind that the prisoner was fastened by the wrist through a chain to a guarding soldier, whose wrist was also attached to the other end of the chain. A. C. Z.

CHALCOL, cal'cŏl. See CALCOL.

CHALDEA, cal-dī'a, CHALDEANS: The Heb. term kasdīm (Gn 11 31, etc.) corresponds phonetically to the form kaldu found on the Assyrian inscriptions. The Chaldeans were a Semitic people who pressed into Babylonia from the S. (c. 12th cent. B.C.), and occupied the whole seacoast region of S. Babylonia. They were not without political ambition and from this time on more than one Babylonian king was of Chaldean origin. The capital city of the Kaldu was Bit Yakin. The Assyrians found in the Kaldu most determined opponents of their supremacy in Babylonia (see MERODACH-BALADAN). Finally, the Chaldean Nabopolassar, c. 626 B.C., on the eve of the downfall of Nineveh, established himself on the throne of Babylon, thereby founding the new Babylonian or Chaldean kingdom of which his son Nebuchadrezzar was the greatest ruler (see BABYLONIA, §§ 18–22). For Chaldeans in another sense see MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 7, and WISE MEN, § 1. E. E. N.

CHALKSTONES: In Is 27 9 the word is used as a symbol of brittleness. The altars of idols were to be as easily destroyed as if made of chalkstones. A. C. Z.

CHAMBER. See HOUSE, §§ 5, 6, and TEMPLE, §§ 11, 20, 21.

CHAMBERLAIN (II K 23 11): The chamberlain occupied a position of trust involving political duty, which was, therefore, somewhat more important than that of the steward. Here the Heb. ṣāris, 'eunuch,' is not to be taken strictly in its literal sense. On Ro 16 23, see ERASTUS. A. C. Z.

CHAMBERLAINS, THE SEVEN: The term "chamberlain" (II K 23 11; Est 1 10 ff.) is a somewhat euphemistic rendering of סָרִיס, ṣārīs, 'eunuch.' The same idea is contained in the phrase ἐπὶ κοιτώνος, 'over the sleeping-room,' applied to Blastus (Ac 12 20). It was the custom for kings to have eunuchs supervise the affairs of their harems. The seven eunuchs of Xerxes, according to Est 1 10 ff., were Mehuman, Biztha, Harbona, Bigtha, Abagtha, Zethar, and Carcas. Others, however, are also mentioned, as Hegai (2 3), Bigthan and Teresh (2 21, 6 2) and Hatach (4 5). To what extent these persons are historical is unknown. See ESTHER, BOOK OF. E. E. N.

CHAMELEON, ca-mī'lę-ən. See PALESTINE, § 26.

CHAMOIS, sham'i or sham'wo. See PALESTINE, § 24.

CHAMPAIGN, sham-pēn': In Dt 11 30 ("Arabah," RV) the original means a low-lying, open plain. A. C. Z.

CHAMPION: In I S 17 51 this word renders gibbōr, 'mighty man.' In I S 17 4, 23, it is a good translation of the Heb. אִישׁ־הַבֵּנַיִם, 'man of the middle places,' i.e., the man who stands between two armies to decide the case of one against the other. E. E. N.

CHANAAN, kē'nan (Χαναάν): The AV spelling for Canaan (q.v.) in Ac 7 11, 13 19. E. E. N.

CHANCELLOR: The title of Rehum, Ezr 4 8-17. The exact significance of the Aram. בְּעֵל־טְעֵם, 'master of discernment,' is obscure. Most modern scholars take it in the sense of 'chief official' (see REHUM). E. E. N.

CHANGE OF RAIMENT. See DRESS AND ORNAMENT, § 5.

CHANGER. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

CHANT. See MUSIC, § 5.

CHAPEL: The AV rendering of miqdāsh, 'sanctuary,' in Am 7 13. E. E. N.

CHAPITER. See TEMPLE, § 14.

CHAPLET. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 11.

CHAPMAN. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

CHAPT (Jer. 14 4, AV; "cracked," RV): The Heb. term ḥattāh means 'broken,' 'terrified,' or 'dismayed.' E. E. N.

CHARASHIM, car'a-shim. See GE-HARASHIM.

CHARGER. See PLATTER.

CHARIOT. See WARFARE, § 4, and ARMS AND ARMOR, § 6.

CHARIOT HORSE. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 6, and HORSE.

CHARITY: The AV rendering in about 28 passages in Paul's Epistles, the Catholic Epistles, and Revelation of the very frequent Gr. ἀγάπη, 'love,' in the sense of 'Christian love for one's fellow men.' "Charity," without doubt, crept into the Eng. Bible used the Latin Vulgate, in which caritas was often from to render ἀγάπη. Caritas, however, means 'dearness,' 'high esteem,' rather than 'love' in the broad sense of the Gr. ἀγάπη; consequently charity should not be used to render ἀγάπη, since, in the modern English, it is not synonymous with love. See also LOVE. S. D.

CHARM, CHARMER. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3.

CHARRAN, cār'an (Χαρράν, Acts 7 2, 4): The AV spelling for Haran (q.v.).

CHASTE (ἁγνός, 'unsullied'): Used to indicate inward, personal purity which shrinks from contamination or pollution, consequently free (1) from imperfection generally (I P 3 2); (2) from carnality (II Co 11 2, "pure" RV; Tit 2 5). S. D.

CHASTEN, CHASTENING; CORRECT, CORRECTION: The Heb. verb yāṣār is used of punishment (Pr 7 22), of chastisement inflicted by love (Pr 3 11), especially of discipline of children by parents (Ps 50 17) and is often joined with yākhaḥ, a milder word (II S 7 14; Ps 6 1; Pr 3 12). In the O T the idea of chastisement is inseparable from the fact of sin. From being an indication of God's anger, suffering, especially through the experience of exile, came to be regarded as purposeful chastisement at the hand of a righteous and merciful God, and in Is 53 5 even vicarious.

In the N T much of the mystery of suffering is removed by the death of Christ, but for its remedial value as chastisement see I Co 5 5, 11 32; II Co 6 9; I Ti 1 20. Chastisement as the discipline of sons issuing in peace, righteousness, and holiness is beautifully described in He 12 5-12 (cf. Rev 3 19). In II Ti 3 16 correction means 'restoration.' R. A. F.

CHEBAR, kī'bār (כְּבָר, kᵉbhār): A river by which Ezekiel and the exiles dwelt in Babylonia (Ezk 1 1, 3, 3 15, etc.), now identified by Clay as a canal, Kabaru, just E. of the ancient site of Nippur. I. M. P.

CHECKER-WORK. See TEMPLE, § 14.

CHEDORLAOMER, ked''or-la-ō'mẹr (כְּדָרְלָעֹמֶר, kᵉdhār lā'ōmer): A king of Elam in the 23d cent. B.C. who also held sway over Babylonia. He was the leader of the two expeditions against Palestine mentioned in Gn 14. Such expeditions were frequent in that remote age, being made by the Babylonians to the Mediterranean coast, and in connection with their trade and colonizing in that region. When Elam became suzerain of Babylonia, as it did a few years before this date, it continued the Babylonian state policy, foreign as well as domestic. The disaster to the second expedition, mentioned in the Biblical narrative, did not permanently affect the Babylonian control of the West-land, which was continued to the 18th or 17th cent. B.C. The dominion of Elam in Babylonia was itself soon brought to an end by the great Hammurabi, the Amraphel of the Biblical story, who expelled the foreigners, perhaps during the lifetime of Chedorlaomer himself, about 2250 B.C. The name Chedorlaomer has not yet been discovered in the cuneiform inscriptions, to which we owe the supplementary details of the story in Genesis; but the two elements, in the forms Kudur and Lagamar, are well attested as Elamitic words. J. F. McC.

CHEESE. See FOOD, § 6.

CHELAL, kī'lal (כָּלָל, kᵉlāl): One of the "sons of Pahath-moab" who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 30). E. E. N.

CHELLUH, kel'ū. See CHELUHI.

CHELUB, kī'lub (כָּלוּב, kᵉlūbh, another form of Caleb): 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Judah, possibly a place-name (I Ch 4 11). 2. The father of Ezri, one of David's officers (I Ch 27 26). E. E. N.

CHELUBAI, kẹ-lū'bai. See CALEB.

CHELUHI, kẹ-lū'hai (כָּלוּהִי, kᵉlūhī, Chelluh, AV): One of the "sons of Bani" who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 35). E. E. N.

CHEMARIM, kem'a-rim. See PRIESTHOOD, § 2

CHEMOSH, kī'mosh (כְּמוֹשׁ, kᵉmōsh): The national deity of the Moabites. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 18.

CHENAANAH, kẹ-nê'a-nā (כְּנַעֲנָה, kᵉna'ănāh): 1. Father of the court prophet Zedekiah (I K 22 11, 24; II Ch 18 10, 23). 2. Head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 7 10). E. E. N.

CHENANI, kẹ-nê'nai (כְּנָנִי, kᵉnānī): One of the assistants at the reading of the Law (Neh 9 4). E. E. N.

CHENANIAH, ken''a-nai'ā (כְּנַנְיָהוּ, kᵉnanyāhū), 'J" establishes': 1. A prominent Levite musician (I Ch 15 22, 27). 2. One of David's officers (I Ch 26 29). E. E. N.

CHEPHAR-AMMONI, kī''fār-am'ẹn-ai (כְּפַר הָעַמּוֹנִי, kᵉphār hā'ammōnī, Chephar-Hammoni, AV), 'village of the Ammonites': A town of Benjamin (Jos 18 24), perhaps the mod. Kefr Ânâ, Map III, F 5. E. E. N.

CHEPHIRAH, kẹ-fai'rā (כְּפִירָה, kᵉphīrāh): One of the cities of the Gibeonites (Jos 9 17), later assigned to Benjamin (Jos 18 26) and reoccupied after the Exile (Ezr 2 25; Neh 7 29), Map II, E 1. E. E. N.

CHERAN, kī'ran (כְּרָן, kᵉrān): A Horite clan (?) (Gn 36 26; I Ch 1 41). E. E. N.

CHERETHITES, ker'ẹ-thaits (כְּרֵתִי, kᵉrēthī): The name of a people in the S. of Philistia, perhaps a division of the Philistines themselves (I S 30 14; Ezk 25 16; Zeph 2 5). That the word has anything to do with Crete is doubtful. The Cherethites and Pelethites are frequently mentioned as composing David's body-guard (II S 8 18, 15 16, etc.). The word Pelethite (פְּלֵתִי, pᵉlēthī) is probably but a variant form of 'Philistines.' Thus David's guard was recruited largely from the Philistines. E. E. N.

CHERITH, kî'rith (כְּרִית, kᵉrīth): The torrent-valley or wady where Elijah sojourned for a while (I K 17 3-5). The statement that it was "before," i.e., E. of the Jordan, is indefinite and the site remains uncertain. E. E. N.

CHERUB (כְּרוּב, kᵉrūbh, pl. CHERUBIM): The Hebrew conception of the cherubim varied at different periods of history. In the O T they are referred to in four connections. After the expulsion of Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden, they appear as guardians of the tree of life (Gn 3 24 J). A different version of this story is alluded to by Ezekiel (28 14, 16): a cherub expels the Prince of Tyre from Eden, the Garden of God. In the Tabernacle there were two golden cherubim at each end of the propitiatory or mercy seat (see ARK). Figures of cherubim were embroidered on the curtains and the other hangings of this sanctuary (Ex 25 18, 26 1, 31 P; cf. He 9 5). In Solomon's Temple two huge cherubic figures of olive-wood overlaid with gold stood in the Holy of Holies. Their outstretched wings overshadowed the ark (I K 6 23-28). Cherubim, sculptured in bas-relief and alternating with palm-trees, ran in a frieze round the wall of the Temple, and decorated the base of the great sea, the capitals, and doors (I K 6 29, 32, 35). They were figures connected with religious symbolism; they acted as bearers of Deity, and were consequently emblematic of Jehovah's presence. Cf. the phrase "Thou that sittest above the cherubim" (Ps 80 1). In the Holy of Holies they were guardians of the ark and its treasures, as well as symbols of God's presence, and consequently emblematic of His unapproachability. We have a similar conception of the cherubim in the living creatures of Ezekiel's vision (Ezk 1; cf. 10 2). These composite figures, each with four wings and four faces—man, lion, ox, and eagle—carry the firmament which supports the throne of Jehovah. In discussing the origin and significance of the cherubim, a crucial passage is Ps 18 10 (cf. II S 22 11). The poet describes the descent of Jehovah on the lowering thunder clouds: "He rode upon a cherub, and did fly; Yea, he soared upon the wings of the wind." The function of the cherub in this passage is similar to that of the symbolic figures in the sanctuary and the living creatures in prophetic vision. But we also have here a hint of their origin. Primarily they were a personification of the storm cloud or wind, and this poetic passage has preserved this ancient popular conception of the cherubim. Three theories have been held in regard to the form and nature of the cherubim: (1) That they were real existences, (2) that they were mythological beings, (3) that they were mere symbols. The view that they were supernatural spiritual essences is now generally discarded, although it was long dominant in the Church. The facts point to a combination of the symbolic and mythical theories as the true view. The religious imagination of the Hebrews, working on mythological figures which they had in common with their neighbors, produced these symbolic forms. To them they were not mere allegories, but had a real existence. As to their actual shape and form there is considerable uncertainty. They were winged and composite, and consequently have been compared to the colossi at the entrances to Babylonian temples and palaces. These often had a man's head, a lion's body, and eagle's wings; sometimes they were winged bulls with human heads. Cheyne thinks they were more like the Hittite griffins in figure, and had a similar function as guardians of sacred things. In later Jewish theology they are one of the three highest classes of angels, and are evidently the original of the four living creatures of the Apocalypse (Rev 4 6-8).

CHERUB, kî'rub (כְּרוּב, kᵉrūbh): A Babylonian locality where a colony of exiles lived (Ezr 2 59; Neh 7 61). J. A. K.

CHESALON, kes'a-lon (כְּסָלוֹן, kᵉṣālōn): A town on the boundary-line between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15 10), between Kirjath Jearim and Beth Shemesh, modern Kesla, 10 m. W. of Jerusalem. Map II, E 1. A. C. Z.

CHESED, kî'sed (כֶּשֶׂד, kesedh): A 'son' of Nahor (Gn 22 22). Probably the name of an Aramean clan. E. E. N.

CHESIL, kî'sil (כְּסִיל, kᵉṣīl): A town of Judah (Jos 15 30) called Bethul in 19 4. See also BETHUL. E. E. N.

CHEST: In II K 12 9 f.; II Ch 24 8 ff., the Heb. 'ārōn means simply a box or chest suitable for the purpose mentioned. In Ezk 27 24 the term gᵉnāzīm is of doubtful meaning. There is no sound basis for the rendering "chest." Rich garments or cloths may be meant. E. E. N.

CHESTNUT. See PLANE-TREE and PALESTINE, § 21.

CHESULLOTH, kę-sul'oth (כְּסֻלֹּת, kᵉṣullōth): A town of Issachar (Jos 19 18), probably the same as Chisloth-Tabor (Jos 19 12), the mod. Iksal, Map IV, C 7. E. E. N.

CHEZIB, kî'zib. See ACHZIB 2.

CHIDON, cai'don. See NACHON.

CHIEF: The rendering of a number of Heb. and Gr. terms, all of which express the idea of headship, but generally in a somewhat loose and non-technical sense. The most commonly used term is רֹאשׁ, rō'sh, 'head.' In Nu 25 14 f., Jos 22 14, the Heb. is 'ābh, 'father,' and RV renders "fathers' house." For other cases needing special mention see CHIEF MEN. See also FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 4, and WARFARE, § 1. E. E. N.

CHIEF MEN: A term used in the N T to render two Gr. words. (1) οἱ πρῶτοι. (a) In Mk 6 21 ("chief estates" AV) it refers to the leading provincials of Galilee, who doubtless formed the unofficial retainers of Herod's court. These, with the chief civil dignitaries (μεγιστᾶνες) and the chief military officers (χιλίαρχοι), constituted the invited guests at the feast. (b) In Ac 13 50 it refers to the board of magistrates of the city. (c) In Ac 28 7 it is used in the singular ("chief man"). It is not clear whether it refers to Publius as the procurator of the island—an official assigned to Malta under the Empire (CIL, x, 7494), or as the actual Governor of the island (CIL, x, 6785), or whether it was simply a title of compliment (CIG, 5754 =Kaibel, IGSicil. 601). (d) In Lk 19 47 it is rendered "the principal men ["chief" AV] (of the people)," in Ac 25 2 "the principal men ["chief" AV] (of the Jews)," and in Ac 28 17 "the chief (of the Jews)." In the first passage it is seemingly unofficial and has reference to the socially prominent laymen among the people, who were sympathetic with the "chief priests and the scribes" in their hostility to Jesus. In the second passage it is probably official and refers to the Sadducean leaders in the Sanhedrin (cf. v. 15, 24, 23 14). In the third passage it is more general and includes doubtless the elders (πρεσβύτεροι) and chiefs (ἄρχοντες) of the congregation, and the synagogue rulers (ἀρχισυνάγωγοι) of the various communities into which the Jews in Rome were divided (cf. Schürer, HJP. II, ii. § 31).

(2) ἡγούμενοι, which in Ac 15 22 refers to Judas Barsabbas (q.v.) and Silas (q.v.) in a wholly unofficial sense, simply as men prominent in the Christian community for their work and counsel and instruction (cf. v. 32) and so preeminently fitted to accompany Paul and Barnabas on their return mission to the brethren in Antioch. CHILEAB, kil'ę-ab (כִּלְאָב, kil'ābh): According to the Heb. text of II S 3 3, a son of David by Abigail. In I Ch 3 1 he is called Daniel. The LXX. of II S 3 3 reads Δαλονία, which may imperfectly represent the original name, but this can not now be recovered. E. E. N.

CHILION, kil'i-ǫn (כִּלְיוֹן, kilyōn): Chilion and Mahlon were sons of Elimelech and Naomi (Ru 1 2). They married two Moabite women, Orpah and Ruth, Chilion being the husband of Orpah, and both died in the land of Moab (Ru 4 10, 1 5). The names Chilion, 'wasting,' and Mahlon, 'sickness,' are significant possibly of artificial elements in the story. E. E. N.

CHILMAD, kil'mad (כַּלְמַד, kilmadh): A place mentioned in Ezk 27 23 along with Sheba, Assyria, etc. The identification is doubtful. Some, following the Talmud, would read כָּל־מָדַי, 'all the Medes,' or 'all Media,' but this is only a conjecture. E. E. N.

CHIMHAM, kim'ham (כִּמְהָם, kimhām): The son (probably) of Barzillai of Gilead who was given a place at David's court in return for kindness shown to the king (II S 19 37-40; I K 2 7). Geruth-Chimham, 'the habitation of Chimham' (Jer 41 17; cf. RVmg.) near Bethlehem, may refer to a lodging-place or inn erected by this person. Another well-supported reading is "sheepfolds of Chimham." E. E. N.

CHIMNEY. See House, § 6 (j).

CHINNERETH, kin'ę-reth (כִּנֶּרֶת, kinnereth); CHINNEROTH, -rǝth (כִּנְרוֹת, kinrōth); CINNEROTH, sin'ę-rǝth: 1. The name of a town (Jos 19 35) extended also apparently to a district (I K 15 20). The name is old, being found on the Egyptian list of towns captured by Thotmes III (16th cent. B.C.), the form there being Kinneroth. Its significance is a matter of dispute, also its relation to the name Gennesaret. It was located probably in the plain of Gennesaret. 2. For the Sea of C. (Jos 11 2, etc.), see Galilee, Sea of. E. E. N.

CHIOS, kī'os or cai'ǝs (Χίος): A mountainous island, off the Asiatic seaboard (Ac 20 15). It joined Cyrus in 546 B.C., but fought the Persians in 480. It became independent in 355 and later favored Rome. It has now about 100,000 inhabitants and a considerable commerce in blue marble, antimony, ocher, silk, mastic, fruits, and brandy. J. R. S. S.

CHIRP (occurs only in Is 8 19, "peep," AV). See Magic and Divination, § 3.

CHISLEV, CHISLEU, kis'liu. See Time, § 3.

CHITHLISH, kith'lish (כִּתְלִישׁ, Kithlish, AV): A town of Judah, in the Shephelah (Jos 15 40). Site unknown. E. E. N.

CHITTIM, kit'im. See Kittim.

CHIUN, cai'ǝn: A deity mentioned in Am 5 26. See Semitic Religion, § 19.

CHLOE, clō'ę (Χλόη): Paul was informed of the conditions in the church at Corinth by "them which are of the household of Chloe" (I Co 1 11). It is unknown whether this woman had her home in Ephesus or in Corinth and nothing whatever is known of her relation to the church. E. E. N.

CHOR-ASHAN, cōr''-ash'ǝn. See Ashan.

CHORAZIN, cō-rē'zin (Χοραζείν): One of the cities condemned by Jesus for its unreceptivity to His works (Mt 11 21; Lk 10 13). The site is not identified with absolute certainty, but is probably the modern Kerāseh, N. of Tell Hum (Map IV, E 6). J. M. T.

CHOSEN: The word is sometimes used in the general sense of 'choice,' 'superior' (cf. Ex 14 7, "six hundred chosen chariots," or Jg 20 15, "seven hundred chosen men"). In a more restricted and quasi-technical sense, it is applied to believers, and denotes from the Divine point of view their distinctive character. "Ye are a chosen generation" (I P 2 9; cf.

also Rev 17 14). In a still more restricted sense, it is applied to the people of God as a whole (I Ch 16 13, "children of Jacob, his chosen ones"; cf. also Ps 105 6; Is 43 20). See also ELECTION. A. C. Z.

CHOZEBA, co-zî'ba. See ACHZIB, 2.

CHRIST. See JESUS CHRIST and MESSIAH.

CHRISTIAN: The name applied to the followers of Christ by the heathen populace of Antioch (Ac 11 26; cf. Tac. Annal. XV, 44)—a city famous, as was Alexandria, for its habit of nicknames. The reason for its giving was not simply the extended size and the organized form which the disciples had assumed, but the preponderating Gentile element which in that city had entered its membership and which marked it as distinctly different from Judaism.

As an adjective derived from a personal name its ending (-ιανός) is Latin and not Greek (cf. Zahn, Introduction, § 40, n. 10; Blass, NTGr., § 27. 4). If its primary form was Chrestianos (Χρηστιανός), as we might be led to suppose from Suetonius (Claud. 25; cf. Kaibel, IGSicil. 78, 754; CIL. X, 7173; also codex ℵ, in all the N T passages, and the possible word-play in I P 2 3), then there was a mild contempt intended in its giving, Chrestos (Χρηστός) signifying a 'worthy fellow.' It is in this spirit that the name is used by Agrippa in his reply to Paul's impassioned appeal (Ac 26 28), whether the form he actually used was Chrestianos, or Christianos which came to be adopted by the disciples and which consistently is used in the N T.

In I P 4 16 the name is used from the point of view of the hostile heathen world, and indicates a date for the Epistle when the followers of Christ were condemned if they confessed to being Christians (cf. Ramsay, Church in Rom. Empire, Index [s.v.], and see PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF).

The references in Ac 5 41 and Ja 2 7 are not to the appellative, Christian, but to the personal name, Christ. M. W. J.

CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF: The Books of Chronicles, together with those of Ezra and Nehemiah, are the compilation of an author whose name has not been handed down to us, but who may be conveniently termed the 'Chronicler,' and who wrote probably not before 300 B.C. The books embrace the period from Adam to the edict of Cyrus permitting the exiles to return to Judah, 537 B.C.: they thus cover substantially the same period as the other great series of historical books, Gn to II K (from the Creation to 561 B.C.); but they are written from a very different point of view, and with a much more limited aim. Their main object, viz., is to give a history of Judah, with special reference to the institutions connected with the Temple; and whatever has no bearing upon one or the other of these subjects is either passed over rapidly or omitted altogether. The author begins (after the manner of the later Semitic historians) with Adam; but I: 1 consists merely of genealogies, excerpted from Gn, leading up (ver. 34) to Esau and Jacob; 2 1f. enumerates the sons of Jacob; and the rest of ch. 2 is devoted to statistical particulars (genealogies of clans and clan settlements) of the tribe of Judah, as ch. 3 is devoted to the descendants of David. In I: 4–8, dealing from the same point of view with the other tribes, the priestly tribe of Levi is treated at greatest length (I: 6). I: 9 1-34 is on the post-exilic residents in Jerusalem and certain arrangements relating to the Temple. The introduction (I: 1 1–9 34) ended, the history proper begins. The account of Saul is limited to his genealogy (I: 9 35-44) and the narrative of his death (I: 10). The history of David begins with his election as king over all Israel at Hebron: all events in his reign of a personal or private character (e.g., the revolt of Absalom) are omitted; on the other hand, the arrangements for a temple attributed to him are narrated at considerable length (I: 22–29). After the division of the kingdom the history of Judah occupies almost entirely the compiler's attention, the N. kingdom being referred to only where absolutely necessary. The writer dwells throughout with the greatest satisfaction upon the ecclesiastical aspects of the history. The same interest is not less apparent in Ezr, Neh; and hence the entire work (Ch, Ezr, Neh) has been not inaptly termed by Reuss the "Ecclesiastical Chronicle of Jerusalem." The compiler, it is often supposed, was a Levite, perhaps in particular a member of the Temple choir.

1. Contents.

The basis of the Chronicles consists of a series of excerpts from the earlier historical books (Gn to II K; I: 9 3-17a is also from Neh 11 4-19a), with which is combined much entirely new matter. These excerpts are not made throughout upon the same scale. In the preliminary chapters (I: 1–9) they are often condensed, and consist chiefly of genealogical notices; in I: 10–II: 36 (which is parallel to I S 31–II K 25) passages are, as a rule, transferred in extenso with but slight variations of expression; not infrequently, however, the excerpted narratives are expanded, sometimes remarkably, by the insertion either of single verses or clauses, or of longer passages, as the case may be. It is impossible to give here a list of all the Chronicler's additions; the following are, however, the principal longer passages: I: 12, 21 26b–29 (dealing mostly with David's preparations for a temple, and organization of the Levites, etc.), II: 11 5-23, 12 1, 2b-9a (inserted between I K 14 25 and 26), 13 3-22, 14 3–15 15, 16 7-10, 17 1b-19, 19 1–20 30, 21 2-4, 10b-19, 24 15-22, 25 5-10, 12-16, 26 5-20 (to "because"), 27 4-6, 28 5-15, 17-20, 29 3–31 21 (Hezekiah's passover, etc.), 32 2-8, 25-29, 33 11b-19 (Manasseh's captivity, repentance, and restoration), 34 3-7, 35 1b-17 (Josiah's passover), 21-23 (inserted between II K 23 29 and 30).

2. Character of Contents.

The reader who desires properly to understand the method and point of view of the Chronicler should mark in his RV—by underlining in the case of simple words or verses, and by drawing a line along the margin in the case of longer passages—these and the other passages peculiar to him. He will then soon discover that they have a character of their own, in language and expression, not less than in subject-matter, which differentiates them materially from the parts transferred unaltered from Samuel or Kings.

Thus (1) they often comprise statistical matter, genealogies, lists of names, etc. (e.g., most of I: 2–9, 12, 15 4-10, 25 9-31, etc.).

(2) Very frequently they relate to the organization of public worship, or describe religious ceremonies, especially with reference to the part taken in them by Levites and singers, as I: 13 1-5, 15 1-28, 16 4-42 (where the older narrative of the transference of the ark to the city of David has been enlarged, or, as in 15 25-28 = II S 6 12b-15 altered, from this point of view) and most of I: 22–29, II: 8 13-15, 20 14, 19, 21, 28, 29 3–31 21, 35 1b-17.

(3) In many cases they have a didactic aim: in particular they show a tendency to refer events to their moral causes, to represent, for instance, a great calamity as a punishment for wickedness, and a great deliverance as the reward of piety; notice, for example, II: 12 1, 2b-8 (the cause of Shishak's invasion), 13 18, 17 10, 21 10b, 22 7, 24 23-24, 26 5, 16-20 (only the fact of Uzziah's leprosy is narrated in II K 15 5), 27 6, 32 25 f., 33 11-13, 35 21-23; and in speeches put into the mouths of various prophets, II: 12 5-8, 13 4-12, 16 7-10, 19 2-3, 20 14-17, 37a, 21 12-15, and elsewhere. Attention should also be directed to the short insertions introduced often into the narratives excerpted from Samuel or Kings for the purpose of supplementing them from the points of view just indicated. Comp., for instance, the notes of this kind on ritual, or the parts taken by Levites, singers, etc., in II: 5 11b-13a (inserted in the middle of I K 8 10), 6 13, 7 1-3, 6, 23 2, 4, 6a (and much besides in this ch., altered from II K 11), 34 12b-13; and the explanations, or reflections, in I: 10 13 f. (the cause of Saul's death), 21 6 f., 29 f. (justifying David's sacrifice on Zion), II: 1 3b-6a (legalizing the worship at the high place of Gibeon), 8 11b, 12 12, 14, 16 12b, 18 31b, 22 3b, 4b, 24 25 (middle), 25 20b, 27a.

3. Sources Used by the Compiler.

One main source of the Chronicler has been sufficiently indicated, viz., the earlier historical books from Gn to II Kings (especially I Sam–II Kings). What, however, were the sources from which the additional matter contained in Ch was derived? The notices contained in I: 1–9 were derived, it is natural to think, from genealogical and other tribal records (cf. I: 5 17, 9 1). But from the time of David onward the Chronicler, like the compiler of Kings, refers, as a rule, at the end of each reign, to some definite source where further particulars are to be found. The source most frequently cited is the "book of the kings of Judah and Israel" (or "of Israel and Judah"), II: 16 11, 27 7, etc.; elsewhere (where this book is not mentioned) he refers to some special authority bearing the name of a prophet (I: 29 29, II: 9 29, 12 15, 13 22, 20 34, 26 22, 32 32, 33 19); once (II: 24 27) he cites the "Commentary (midhrash) of the Book of the Kings" (cf. II: 13 22, the "Commentary (midhrash) of the prophet Iddo"). That the first of these books is not the canonical Book of Kings is apparent from its being cited for particulars which this does not contain (as II: 27 7, 33 18): inasmuch, moreover, as the prophetic histories just mentioned are never cited with the "Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel" (though this must have extended at least from Asa, II: 16 11, to Jehoiakim, II: 36 8), and as two of these histories are stated to have formed part of that book (II: 20 34, 32 32), it is generally supposed that they were not independent works written by the prophets in question, but sections of the great "Book of the Kings" relating to them, and hence familiarly cited under their names. Whether the "Commentary of the Book of the Kings" (II: 24 27) is another name for the "Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel" is uncertain; but in any case the name is significant; for 'midhrash' (common in postbiblical Hebrew) means a didactic or homiletic exposition, or an edifying religious story (such as To or Sus): the 'midhrash' here referred to will thus have been a post-exilic work intended to develop the moral or religious lessons deducible from the history of the kings. Now this is just the leading motive in many of the narratives peculiar to Chronicles, which have been apparently derived by the compiler from the "Book of the Kings"; the last-named work, therefore, even if not (as many scholars suppose) identical with the "Commentary of the Book of the Kings," will have been similar in character and tendency. The "Commentary of the Prophet Iddo" will have been either a particular section of the same work or a separate work of the same kind, in which Iddo was the prominent figure.

4. Historical Value.

Much of the additional matter peculiar to Chronicles can not be historical. In some cases the figures are incredibly high; in others the scale or character of the occurrence is such that, had they really happened precisely as described, it is difficult to think that they would have been passed by in Samuel and Kings; while as regards the speeches assigned to historical characters, and the motives attributed to them, these are nearly always conceived largely from a point of view very different from that which prevails in the earlier narratives, and agreeing closely with the compiler's. The compiler lived in an age, two centuries or more after the return from Babylon, when new religious interests and a new type of piety had been developed, and asserted themselves strongly. The Chronicler reflects faithfully the spirit of his age. A new mode of viewing the past history of his nation began to prevail: pre-exilic Judah was pictured as already in possession of the institutions, and governed by the ideas and principles, which were in force at a later day; the empire of David and his successors was projected on a magnified scale: the past, in a word, was idealized, and its history, where necessary, rewritten accordingly. Thus the Levitical organization of the compiler's own time, especially the three choirs, are represented as established by David; the ritual of the Priests' Code is duly observed under the early kings: religious ceremonies, including even some not mentioned in Samuel and Kings at all, are described with an abundance of detail suggested evidently by the usage of the compiler's own day; David amasses for the Temple enormous treasures (I 22 14); and his successors have the command of large armies, and are victorious against forces even larger than their own (e.g., II 13 3, 17, 14 8, 9, 17 14-19). There is doubtless a genuine historical nucleus at the basis of many of these representations; but it has been expanded by the Chronicler and thrown by him into a form adapted to describe past events as he conceived they must really have happened, and to inculcate the lessons which he understood the history to teach. There is thus nothing improbable in the statement that David collected materials for a temple; but the details in I: 22, 29 must be greatly exaggerated. The narrative in II S 6 of the removal of the ark to Zion makes no mention of Levites as present on the occasion; but in I: 13, 15–16 (see above) the Chronicler introduces many additions with the object of making good the omission, and in 16 8-36 places in David's mouth a Psalm composed of parts of three post-exilic Psalms (105 1-15, 96 1-13a, 106 1, 47, 48). In I K 8 3 the ark is borne by priests; but in II Ch 5 4 "Levites" is substituted to make the usage conform to the later Levitical law; I K 8 66 is similarly altered in II Ch 7 9 f. to harmonize with the custom of the Second Temple. In II K 11 Jehoiada's assistants in the deposition of Athaliah are the foreign body-guard; in II Ch 23 they are Levites, in accordance with later usage, which did not allow aliens to approach so near to the holy things; a series of deliberate alterations has been made in the older narrative, and a new coloring given to the entire occurrence. In II:2 3-16 the correspondence between Hiram and Solomon (I K 5 2-9) has been rewritten by the Chronicler in his own style. Other similar instances could be quoted. It is also hardly open to doubt that both the speeches attributed to various prophets, and the representations of the history itself, are in many cases strongly colored by the compiler's theory of the prompt and direct punishment of sin and reward of virtue (comp. above, § 3, and the short insertions quoted just afterward). The Chronicler supplies evidence of the highest value for the ideas and institutions of the age in which he himself lived; but his representations of the past must be accepted with great caution and discrimination. He is not, however, on that account to be regarded as a falsifier of history; on the contrary, he is a man of deep moral earnestness, and a pleasing and doubtless also a characteristic example of the type of godliness prevalent in Israel at his time; he simply viewed the past as his contemporaries viewed it, and described it accordingly.

5. Linguistic Peculiarities.

The Hebrew style of the Chronicler is peculiar: it is marked by many mannerisms (some of which are perceptible even in a translation), and also by the occurrence in it of numerous words and expressions which are not only peculiar, but distinctively late (see particulars in HDB I, 389 ff., or Driver, LOT, p. 535 ff.). This fact is of importance; for it is conclusive evidence that no part of the additions can be an excerpt from the autographs of any pre-exilic writing; if such autographs were accessible to the compiler, the information derived from them must have been entirely recast by him and presented in his own fashion. The speeches contained in the additions form no exception to what has been said: these also, even the shortest, are shown, by their close similarities in both thought and expression to the post-exilic narratives peculiar to the Chronicles, to be one and all the Chronicler's own composition.

LITERATURE: The standard commentary is still that of Bertheau (1873), to be supplemented, where necessary, by Benzinger (1901) and Kittel (1902). The Eng. reader may consult W. E. Barnes' Comm. in the Cambr. Bible; W H. Bennett's vol. in the Expositor's Bible, though not a continuous commentary, contains much that is suggestive and useful, especially on the aims and method of the Chronicler.

CHRONOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

I. The Framework of Contemporary History.

An outline of the relevant political events of the Roman Empire and its dependencies within which Christianity arose will serve as a setting for the chronology of the Apostolic Age.

Augustus, 30 B.C.–14 A.D.

Tiberius his colleague, with power over armies and provinces, probably 12 A.D.

Tiberius, 14–37.

Caligula, 37–41.

Claudius, 41–54.

Expulsion of Jews from Rome, some time between 45 and 54.

Nero, 54–68.

Rome burned 19 July, 64, followed by persecution of Christians chiefly in Rome.

Galba, Otho, Vitellius, 68–69.

Vespasian, 69–79.

Titus, 79–81.

Domitian, 81–96.

Persecution of Christians.

Nerva, 96–98.

Trajan, 98–117.

Herod the Great, king of Palestine, 37–4 B.C.

Temple begun at Jerusalem, probably in Jan. or Dec., 20–19 B.C.

Sons of Herod.

(1) Archelaus, ethnarch of Judæa and Samaria 4 B.C., banished 6 A.D.

(2) Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa 4 B.C.–39 A.D.

(3) Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis, etc., 4 B.C.–34 A.D.

Judæa under procurators, 6–41 A.D.

Pontius Pilate, 26–36.

Aretas probably suzerain of Damascus for a short time after 37.

Herod Agrippa I (Ac 12) after a life of adventure, King of the territory of his grandfather, Herod I, 37–44 (including Judæa 41–44).

Judæa under procurators from 44.

Revolt of Theudas between 44 and 48.

Famine in Judæa 46 (?).

Herod Agrippa II (Ac 25 26), King of Chalcis and parts of Galilee and Peræa, 50–100.

Outbreak of Jewish War 66.

Fall of Jerusalem, Sept., 70.

II. The Life of Jesus Christ.

With no direct evidence from secular history for the life of Jesus, and only indirect and elusive evidence from the Gospels, it is impossible to obtain other than approximate results as to the Gospel chronology.

1. Birth and Opening of Jesus' Ministry.

(a) At first sight Lk 2 1-5 seems to supply a fixed point; but unfortunately scholars are not agreed as to the historical value of these statements, though Professor Ramsay's researches have strongly heightened the probability that Luke used reliable information as to the main facts. Jesus was born in Bethlehem, it would appear, during a periodical imperial census, held by the dependent King Herod ("a procurator with the title of king") in accordance with the custom of his Jewish subjects. It may have been carried out in Palestine about 5 or 6 B.C.

(b) According to Mt 2 1, 16, Jesus was born some time during the last two years of the reign of Herod the Great, so that the earliest date would be 6 B.C. Very little can be inferred from the star seen by the wise men, though a bright constellation, supposed to have followed on the conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn, B.C. 7, is held by some to support 5 or 6 B.C. as the date of the birth.

(c) In Lk 3 1, 23 two difficulties emerge — first, from what point did Luke calculate the fifteenth year of Tiberius? Second, what is implied in "about thirty years of age"? According as they compute the reign from the coregency, or the death of Augustus, or accept different systems for reckoning the imperial year, scholars arrive at dates ranging from 26 to 29 A.D. Most admit that "about" thirty might mean a year or two either way, so that even 6 B.C. would not necessarily be excluded as too early for the birth.

(d) John 2 20. The Temple was begun probably in Dec. or Jan., 20–19 B.C. But was the 46th year completed at the time of this Passover? With our present information the year 27 A.D. seems to suit this statement best, though some leading scholars estimate 28 A.D. But as we can not tell how near Jesus was to thirty, no certain inference can be drawn from this as to His birth.

It would appear on the whole that 5 to 6 B.C. satisfies the various data for the year of our Lord's birth. Nothing at all can be gathered with certainty as to the season of the year.

2. Duration of the Ministry.

There is an early tradition still accepted by a few scholars that the ministry lasted for one year, but though this seems at first sight to agree with the Synoptic narrative, it does not fit the facts. The details of His work as recorded and the impression produced by Jesus throughout Palestine would lead us to expect a longer period than one year. The Synoptic Gospels themselves demand more than one year. For though even Mk does not afford a certain chronological scheme for the life of Christ, it is probable that the references to the ripe wheat (April to June) in 2 23, and to the green grass (early spring) in 6 39, represent a year of ministry; and Lk 13 34 involves several visits to Jerusalem. In the fourth Gospel there are three Passovers—2 13, 6 4 (so true reading), 18 28. We have, therefore, good reason to assume that the ministry lasted at least between two and three years.

3. Results for the Life of Jesus.

The events of Jesus' life may be arranged chronologically as follows:

(a) Birth of Jesus 5 or 6 B.C.

(b) Baptism (Lk 3 1), 15th year of Tiberius, 27 or 28 A.D.

(c) Earlier Ministry in Judæa, Jerusalem, and Samaria, Jn 1 19–4 42. With a Passover in Jerusalem (Jn 2 13), 27 or 28.

(d) Public Ministry in Galilee. This opened after John was cast into prison (Mk 1 14), though Jesus had probably taught in Galilee even before that event (Jn 2 12)—perhaps May of 27 or 28 (Jn 4 35-38?).

To it belong (1) The visit to Jerusalem to an unknown feast (Jn 5 1)—Tabernacles in October (?).

(2) Journeyings to Phœnicia, the Decapolis, Cæsarea Philippi (Mk 7 25–9 30)—during early summer of 28 or 29.

(3) The close of the public Galilean Ministry—perhaps late summer of 28 or 29 (Mk 9 30; cf. Jn 7 1 f.).

(e) Itinerant teaching in Samaria, Peræa, and Judæa (chiefly in Lk 9 51 to 18)—autumn and winter of 28–29 or 29–30, including visits to Jerusalem and neighborhood. (1) Tabernacles (Jn 7), October. (2) Dedication (Jn 10), December. (3) Raising of Lazarus at Bethany (Jn 11), early spring of 29 or 30.

(f) Last week in Jerusalem and environs—from Friday evening of the arrival in Bethany until the next Friday afternoon—Passover of 29 or 30. On the whole, the evidence of the Jewish calendar, which, however, is uncertain, points to 30 A.D.

(g) The day of Jesus' death. An unsolved problem. It was a Friday (Mt 27 62, 28 1; Mk 15 42; Lk 23 54; Jn 19 31), but the Synoptic Gospels seem to say Friday the 15th Nisan, after Jesus had eaten the regular Passover (Mk 14 12; Lk 22 7); John (13 1, 18 28, 19 14, 31, 42) seems to imply that Jesus died on the afternoon of the 14th Nisan. Some try to reconcile John with the Synoptists (Edersheim, LTJM II, p. 490 ff.); others, with better reason, hold that even the Synoptists, by their account of the arrest, trial, and death of Jesus (Mk 14 1 f., 48, 15 1, 11, 21, 46), afford evidence of the superior testimony of John, inasmuch as the Passover would have been profaned by any work except what was necessary for preparing food. If the year was 29, the crucifixion took place probably toward the end of March; if 30, early in April.

III. The Apostolic Age. From 29 or 30 to circa 100 A.D.

4. Accession of Festus.

The crucial date for the chronology of the Apostolic Age is the trial of Paul by Felix and Festus (Ac 24 24, 25 1). The ordinarily accepted date for the accession of Festus is 60, though some incline to 59, others to 61. But of late a few eminent scholars, returning to the date in the Chronicle of Eusebius, have placed it in the year Oct., 55–Oct., 56. However, the opinion prevails strongly that Eusebius is in error, and that even Josephus and Taeitus are mistaken in their referenees to Felix and his brother Pallas. We start then from 60 as being approximately eorrect, and with Ae 13–25 for our guide arrive at the following tentative seheme.

The Missionary Journeys of Paul ean be dated as follows:

5. Missionary Journeys.

(a) First Missionary Journey (Ac 13, 14) to Cyprus and S. Galatia, 47–49 or 50; followed by the Council at Jerusalem (Ac 15), 50 or 51.

(b) Seeond Missionary Journey (Ae 15 36–18 22). S. Galatia revisited, Macedonia, Athens, Corinth (1½ years, Ae 18 11), Antioeh; spring of 51 to spring of 54. Paul arrived in Corinth shortly after the expulsion of the Jews from Rome (18 2); but unfortunately the date of this expulsion can not be fixed, nor that of the proconsulship of Gallio (18 12), exeept that it ean not have been before 50.

(c) Third Missionary Journey (Ae 18 23–21 30). S. Galatia, Ephesus, Corinth, Jerusalem; spring of 55 (or possibly summer of 54) to spring of 58. Ephesus 2½ years (Ae 18 23, 19 1–20 1); summer of 55 to late autumn of 57. Corinth (3 months) and journey via Philippi to Jerusalem (Ae 20 3–21 16); winter of 57–58 to Penteeost of 58.

(d) Two years' imprisonment (Ac 21 17), May of 58 to spring of 60.

6. Paul's Conversion.

Galatians 1 11–2 10 is the seeond souree for our chronology. The visit of Paul to Jerusalem in Ae 15 is almost eertainly to be identified with the seeond visit of Galatians (2 1; cf. 1 18), which was 17 years after his conversion (with mueh less probability some count it 14 years). So the conversion of Saul of Tarsus may be plaeed, after making allowanee for partial years, in 34 A.D. From Ae 8 1, 9 1 we judge that Stephen's martyrdom must be put very shortly before this. We thus gain the following results for the Apostolie Age as a whole:

7. Results for Apostolic Age.

(a) Life of the Church within Jerusalem and in Judæa (Ac 1–7), 29 (or 30) to 34 A.D. Conversion of Saul, 34 A.D.

(b) Extension through Palestine. Antioch a new eenter (Ae 8–12), 34 to 46 A.D. First visit of Saul to Jerusalem (Ae 9 26; Gal 1 18; II Co 11 32), probably in 37. James, son of Zebedee, killed by Herod (Ae 12 2), 44. Visit of Barnabas and Saul to Judæa and Jerusalem with famine funds. Possibly Saul did not go to the eapital.

(c) The missionary aetivity of the Apostle Paul (after his earlier work in Syria and Cilieia, Gal 1 21-23)—narrated in Ae 13–21 16—47 to 58 A.D. (for details see above, § 5). In this period are to be plaeed the two earliest groups of the extant letters of Paul: (1) I and II Thessalonians, written shortly after his first arrival in Corinth, 52. (2) Galatians, probably during his first sojourn in Corinth, 53–54 (see, however, GALATIANS, EP. TO THE, § 5); I and II Corinthians, and other lost eorrespondenee with Corinth, from Ephesus, 56–57; Romans, shortly before final departure from Corinth, winter or spring of 58.

(d) Paul the prisoner:

(1) In Cæsarea (Ae 24 24-27), May of 58 to 60 A.D. (2) Voyage to Rome and two years in Rome (Ae 27, 28), spring of 61 to 63 A.D. During his Roman imprisonment Paul wrote Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, and Philemon. Many seholars infer from Ae 20 25, 38 that his hope of aequittal (Ph 1 25) was not fulfilled and that he was martyred at this time. But the testimony of Clement of Rome, that he died after having reaehed "the boundary of the West"—i.e., probably Spain (cf. Ro 15 24, 28)—and the impossibility of plaeing the Pastoral Epistles in their present form within the period of Aets, are in favor of the view that Paul did not die until after a second imprisonment, perhaps in 65, though some good authorities plaee his death in 66 or 67.

(e) A persistent and thoroughly eredible tradition is that Peter also died as a martyr in Rome under Nero, perhaps in 64 or 65, shortly before whieh the first epistle may well have been written (see PETER, FIRST EP. OF, § 3); and Josephus states that James, the brother of Jesus, was put to death by the high priest after the death of Porcius Festus in 62. Some plaee the Epistle of James prior to the time when the eontroversy between Paul and the Jewish Christians beeame aeute, i.e., before 50. Others put it about 60. Of those who hold that it was not written by James, the Lord's brother, most place it outside the limits of the Apostolie Age (see JAMES, EP. OF, §2 b).

(f) Though the great movements of Chureh life, at least as known to history, were toward the West after the middle of the first eentury, so that the ehurehes in Rome and other plaees rapidly rose into prominenee, the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. left profound and enduring effeets on Christian history. Before this date the earliest sources of the Synoptie Gospels were put into writing, and during the next deeade our present Gospels probably took their present form. Acts follows Luke, and Hebrews may be plaeed within a few years of the fall of Jerusalem (see also special articles on these books).

(g) Ephesus beeomes a eenter of influenee during the last quarter of the eentury, and there is a strongly authenticated tradition, though disearded by some eminent seholars to-day, that John the Apostle presided over this chureh and died there at a great age under Trajan, i.e., not before 98 A.D. The Johannine literature, ineluding the Apoealypse, is to be assigned to the last deeade of the first eentury. Though serious diffieulties surround the Epistles of II Peter and Jude, there is no inherent reason against plaeing them within the Apostolic Age (see also the articles on all these books).

LITERATURE: For the enormous literature of this subject a general reference must be made to articles in the larger encyclopedias: in *PRE*³, Jesus Christus by Zöckler, and Paulus by Zahn; Chronology by C. H. Turner, HDB. (the best conservative statement), and by v. Soden in EB. (highly critical). See also Schürer, History of the Jewish People in the Time of Christ (1890); Harnack, Chronologie der altchrist. Litteratur (1897); Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? (1898), and St. Paul the Traveler and Roman Citizen (1897); Zahn, Introduction to the N. T. (1907), all representative recent works. In James Moffatt's Historical N. T. (1901) there are very complete and useful tables and summaries of recent opinions.

CHRONOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT: While the OT contains a great many chronological notices, as a whole it has no chronological system. A chronological system requires some fixed event or point of time from which all dates may be reckoned. No such event finds mention in the OT, although a limited use is made of several different eras. In the Pentateuch many events are dated according to the year of life of the person concerned, and the life-periods of a long succession of individuals are parts of an era computed from the creation of Adam. But this mode of reckoning ends with Jacob. All such dates, moreover, belong to the late P element of the Pentateuch and are entirely absent from the earlier J and E documents (see HEXATEUCH), which gave only the vaguest sort of dates and had no chronological system whatever.

An attempt seems to have been made at one time to use the Exodus as a starting-point for chronology. The notices Gn 15 13, Ex 12 40, and I K 6 1 seem to belong to calculations connected with such an era. But there is no evidence that this system was generally used. The chronological figures of the Book of Judges give no satisfactory results, partly because they probably rest primarily on vague tradition, partly because they belong to events that were in many cases contemporaneous, not successive (as they are viewed in the book), and partly because they are open to the suspicion that they have been manipulated to work out an ideal scheme of $12 \times 40 = 480$ years from the Exodus to the Temple (cf. I K 6 1).

With the Books of Kings definite chronological data begin. These are not connected with an era but with the regnal years of the kings of Judah and Israel. During the period of the divided monarchy, we have two sets of figures in the Books of Kings. One is a synchronistic scheme in which the accessions of the kings in Israel are dated according to the regnal years of the kings in Judah and vice versa. The other is an independent set of figures for each reign. There can be no doubt that the latter is the older and more trustworthy on the whole and was the basis of the synchronism, although the results obtained from the two systems do not agree, indicating probably that all the figures have not been transmitted correctly.

With II K 24 12 we have the beginning of dating events by the regnal year of the great kings whose sway was supreme over SW. Asia, thus connecting the Biblical chronology directly with that of the larger world of events outside of Palestine. From the Exile on most of the O T dates are of this character (except in Ezekiel).

Fortunately, connection can be made between many events of the O T history and the exact chronological records of Assyria. The correctness of the Assyrian figures, at least for c. 900–625 B.C., can not be doubted, as they are well substantiated and present a practically unbroken record. Thus the earliest fixed date of O T history is given us by the inscription of Shalmaneser II of Assyria (860–824) to the effect that in 854 Ahab of Israel was one of the confederates defeated by him at Karkar. The same monarch records that Jehu of Israel paid him tribute in 842. Since the reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram, sons and successors of Ahab, are given as 2 and 12 years respectively, it is evident the date 842 must belong very near the beginning of the reign of Jehu (Jehoram's successor) and 854 very near the end of Ahab's reign. Since the 2 years of Amaziah may mean really but parts of two successive years and the 12 of Jehoram but 10 full years plus part of two others, the figures $2 + 12$ may represent no more than $\pm 1 + 10 \pm 1 = \pm 12$. 854 B.C., then, may be taken as the date of the close of Ahab's reign and 842 as that of the accession of Jehu. On the basis of these dates, using the figures for the regnal years of the kings as substantially correct (only subtracting about one year from each reign for the overlapping period which otherwise would be counted twice), we can get approximately correct dates back to Saul's reign.

For the period beyond Saul no exact dates can be given. The Exodus and the conquest of Canaan can be given general dates in view of the ascertained facts that Egypt was supreme in Palestine from Thotmes III to the end of the reign of Rameses II (except during one short interval) or, in round numbers, from 1500–1250 B.C. The conquest of Canaan by Israel must have taken place after this supremacy came to an end, especially since there is no trace, in Israel's tradition of the conquest, of any conflict with Egyptian forces in Canaan.

For the Patriarchal Age dates are impossible, as the early traditions were entirely without figures. Only in the case of Abram (contemporary with Amraphel = Hammurabi?) can a possible date be suggested.

The table on pages 130 and 131 presents either generally accepted results or, where no general agreement has been reached, results that appear to commend themselves as reliable. E. E. N.

CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION: The Christian Church, in the proper sense of the word, did not exist in the lifetime of Jesus.

1. Church Not Organized by Jesus. Though the choice of the Twelve, and the references to a church, or new Israel, of His own (Mt 16 18), and to a temple not made with hands (Mk 14 58), may be pointed to as evidence that He had in view the formation of a separate society, He gives no rules for its constitution or organization. It is vain to seek such either in Mt 16 18 ff. or in Mt 18 15 ff. Even the ordinance of baptism is not connected in the N T with the historical but with the risen Jesus, and though we accept as historical the command to repeat the Last Supper (Lk 22 19), nothing is said as to the way in which obedience to it was to be rendered. The life and organization of the Church are visible only after the Resurrection and the Pentecostal gift of the Spirit. They are in fact the free products of these great events.

2. Earliest Apostolic Church Life.

The earliest picture of church life is given in Ac 2 42: 'They waited assiduously on the teaching of the apostles and the fellowship, on the breaking of the bread, and the prayers.' In these four particulars Luke has given us the notes of the Church in its first days. The Apostles had a unique place in it by virtue of their unique relation to Jesus. They were the Church's teachers. In other respects "unlearned and ignorant men" (Ac 4 13), there was one thing they knew better than others: they knew Jesus, and could bear witness to Him (Ac 1 8). To this devotion to the teaching (doctrine AV) of the Apostles we indirectly owe the knowledge of Jesus preserved in the Synoptic Gospels. But the Church was devoted also to the fellowship, the κοινωνία. Its members had a profound sense of their unity. They were much together. None of them said any of the things he had was his own.

There was no compulsory communism (Ac 5 4), but an immense generosity which commanded esteem, as in the case of Barnabas. Out of common funds voluntarily given distribution was made to every one according as he had need (Ac 4 35). A spontaneous and genuine attempt was made to realize brotherhood, or the oneness of the children of God. Besides the apostolic teaching and the fellowship, a characteristic of the Church was the breaking of the bread. This was done daily? (Ac 2 46), and house by house, and is interpreted by the phrase μετελάμβανον τροφῆς, "they took their food." If it was sacramental, it was a sacramental meal, and not a sacrament in the modern sense, which excludes the idea of taking bodily nourishment. It is not "the daily ministration" of Ac 6 1 which is in view —this last is rather akin to a food dispensary for those distressed by poverty—but a sacred meal shared in by all Christians, like that described in I Co 11 18 ff., and under the title ἀγάπαι ('feasts of charity,' "love-feasts"), in Jude ver. 12. What we speak of as the Lord's Supper was always connected in the beginning with these love-feasts. It may have been identical with them, or have had a specific place at the beginning, or end, or even in the course of the meal; but it was only the emergence on heathen soil of such disorders as are referred to by Jude and Paul which led to its being decisively separated, and made, in short, in the strict sense, a sacrament (I Co 11 34). If the love-feasts express vividly the fraternal gladness of the Christian life, the prayers to which the Church was devoted bring out its sense of access to God. The definite article shows that stated prayers are meant, perhaps those in the temple at fixed hours (Ac 3 1). Prayer became a new thing when it became prayer in the name of Jesus, and in the primitive Church the life of prayer received a mighty impulse.

There is no trace at this stage of any organization in the Church. The Apostles were its natural and inevitable, rather than its official, leaders, and not only witnessed to Jesus but had the management of the common funds (Ac 4 35, 37, 5 1 ff.). The significance of the number twelve for the new Israel was recognized by the choice of Matthias to replace Judas (Ac 1 15 ff.). The members of the Church were all baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for remission of sins, and baptism coincided normally with receiving the Holy Spirit (Ac 2 38). All who were of the Church were in this sense inspired. They are spoken of as "those who believed" (Ac 2 44)—faith in Jesus Christ, or in God through Him, being the characteristic act and power of the new life (Ac 3 16). In relation to one another they are ἀδελφοί, brothers; in relation to Jesus they are μαθηταί, disciples. This last word (the fem. μαθήτρια, Ac 9 36) is found only in Ac and in the Gospels. Though it signifies not merely a pupil but an adherent, it seems to have been felt unequal to the truth; Jesus was more than a teacher, the Christian owed more to Him than a pupil to his master, and in the Epistles the word disappears.

3. Extent of Organization in the Jerusalem Church.

The first indication of officials and organization is given in Ac 6: the appointment of the Seven. There is no hint of a constitution Divinely fixed beforehand, and now put in effect. A new need emerges in the Church's life, and reasonable steps are taken to meet it. Neither is there any idea that all office in the Church is implicit in the apostolic position, and that the Apostles here delegate part of their authority to what may therefore be called an apostolic ministry. The very reverse is the case. The Apostles say: 'This daily ministration, this serving of tables, is not our business; it is not meet that we should leave the word of God to attend to it; look out qualified men whose business it is, and we will entrust it to them' (Ac 6 1-6). This was done. It is an irrelevant question to ask whether the Seven were deacons. To be a deacon is to have a certain office, but these men were not invested with an existing office, they were appointed to a function. It is equally irrelevant to ask whether the Seven were elders, though, when elders first appear in the Jerusalem Church (Ac 11 30), it is in connection with the same work, the relief of the poor. The task may have been merely a temporary one, and some of the Seven at least ceased to be local officials—as deacons in the technical sense must be—and like Philip the Evangelist did distinguished service for the Church in other ways, and in places far from Jerusalem (Ac 8 5, 26, 40, 21 8). If it is an anachronism to call the Seven deacons, it is an additional anachronism to speak of the prayer and imposition of hands as their ordination (see § 8, below). To lay on hands in prayer was a spontaneous gesture which needed no interpretation; here, it signified, is the point on which all our desires are concentrated; here we desire God's gifts to descend. The key to it is to be found in Mk 10 16 where Jesus blessed the children, "laying his hands upon them"; it is a movement of affection, impressive no doubt and significant, but not in any dogmatic sense. For the rest, we learn little about the organization of the Church in Jerusalem or in Palestine.

We come across elders without warning in Ac 11 30. It was so natural for any Jewish society to rule itself by זְקֵנִים that the historian takes their existence for granted. It is clear from Ac 15 2, 4, 6, 22, 16 4, where they are mentioned in connection with the Apostles, that they had an important place in the administration of the Church (see § 8, below). "The whole Church" indeed is associated with both in Ac 15 22, but the Apostles and elders took the lead in guiding its deliberations, and formulating and carrying into effect its decisions. In all these passages the Apostles are no doubt the Twelve. According to the representation in Ac they exercised a general supervision over the spread of Christianity, and maintained in this way the sense of unity in the Church. Thus when Philip preached in Samaria, they sent Peter and John down from Jerusalem to keep the work in contact with the center. The prayers of the two Apostles, accompanied with the laying on of their hands, procured for the Samaritans who had been baptized the gift of the Holy Spirit (Ac 8 14). As the gift here spoken of is a sensible one—it fell upon them; i.e., there was an ecstatic burst of glossolalia or prophecy—it is not what is either asked or expected in the modern sacrament of confirmation, when a bishop lays his hands on the baptized; and to speak of what happened here as analogous to confirmation is one anachronism more. The extent to which the life of the Church was consciously under Divine guidance is shown especially in the stories of Philip and Peter in Ac 8 26, 29, 39, 10 3, 10, 19. Every step in its expansion is supernaturally guarded and sanctioned, and it is by the ministry of its inspired men—"by the exhortation of the Holy Spirit," Ac 9 31—that it is multiplied. Prayer and the ministry of the word are the main duties of the Twelve (Ac 6 4), but there is no trace of official preachers.

Prophets are mentioned, several by name (Agabus, Ac 11 27, 15 32). Any one might speak the word who had the spiritual gift to do so (8 4, 11 19). It was in point of fact unofficial preachers to whom the Gospel owed its diffusion, and in the most important cases, like Samaria (Ac 8 5ff.) and Antioch (Ac 11 22), the Apostles and the mother-Church supervised and approved as they could. Life was abundant, free, inspired, but though conscious of its unity and with an instinct for its preservation it neither was nor could be organized in legal forms. At the same time, the most singular phenomenon in the life of the Church at this period is the kind of ascendency which came to belong to James, the Lord's brother.

We have the first hint of this in Ac 12 17; it is conspicuous in Ac 15, 21, and Gal 2. It rested no doubt in part on the special appearance of the risen Savior to him (I Co 15 7), in part on his natural relation to Jesus (cf. the later case of his kinsman Symeon as given by Euseb. HE. III, 11), and in part on the congeniality of his ideas of religion to the mass of Jewish believers. But even if he was counted an apostle (Gal 1 19), his ascendency was personal, not official, and however it may suggest what was later known as episcopal, James is never in the NT spoken of as a bishop.

A more varied scene meets us when we pass to the Church in the Gentile world. The casual indications of Ac are lost in the abundant information of the Pauline Epistles. Some are more occasional, dealing with things as they are in existing communities, e.g., I Co; others more doctrinal, dealing with the ideal of the Church and its life and ministries, e.g., Eph. Only we must remember that in Paul the real and the ideal do not so much contrast as interpret and interpenetrate each other.

4. Paul's Ideas of the Church.

The actual community of believers in Corinth is the Church of God in that city; the apostle describes it as σῶμα Χριστοῦ, Christ's body (I Co 12 27); and the ideal and eternal Church of Eph 1 23, "his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all," is actually represented in the local churches to which Paul sends this circular letter.

The life of the Church is one, because it is the life of one Spirit in it, and this vital unity, or unity of the Spirit (Eph 4 3), is the only unity in which Paul is concerned. When he says there is one body, he uses the word body in the organic or physiological sense; the Church is one body because one life pervades it and unites its members; it is not one corporation, in the sense of the law; or one organization, with a legal constitution to depart from which is schism or death. True Christians are one in Christ, or in the one spirit which all have drunk (I Co 12 13), or in the common life of love by which they are all animated; they have one Lord, one faith, one baptism; but it is another matter to say that they form one visible organization or corporation throughout the world. This was not the case.

To get a fairly proportioned look at the life, organization, and ministries of the apostolic Churches, we must start with the Pauline conception of the σῶμα Χριστοῦ, "the body of Christ"—which, as has been pointed out, is applied both to the local (I Co 12 27) and to the universal Church (Eph 1 23; Col 1 24). Every Christian is a member of the body of Christ, and every member has its function in the body. That function is the διακονία or ministry which it can render to the whole; and the primary truth about Christian ministries is that ministry is not official, but a function of membership in the body. Every member ministers, in virtue of its membership, and at bottom there is no other ministry possible. The peculiar mode in which, or the particular extent to which, the life of the whole—or if we prefer to say so, the Spirit—functions in the individual, determines his ministry, and nothing else can determine it (cf. Eph 4 7-16).

5. The Church a Living Body.

No office can bring or impart a gift for ministry; it is the divinely given spiritual gift which marks a man for this or that office. This is why the ministries which exist in the apostolic Church are traced to God as their source (I Co 12 28), specifically to Christ as the head of the body (Eph 4 11). The most elaborate passage upon them is I Co 12–14, and it is a striking fact that neither there nor throughout the Epistle do we meet the idea of official ministry at all. "God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondly prophets, thirdly teachers, then miracles, then gifts of healing, helps, governments, divers kinds of tongues" (I Co 12 28). Both earlier (ver. 10) and later (ver. 30) Paul mentions in the same way "discernings of spirits" and interpretations of tongues. A close parallel to this is found in Ro 12 3-8. There also ministry is conceived as the exercise of a spiritual gift (χάρισμα). Every member of the Church has such a gift; the gifts differ according to the grace that has been given to each. Different men are spiritually qualified — that is, qualified by a special grace and gift of God—to prophesy, to teach, to rule, to give, to show mercy, or in a special sense (ver. 7) "to minister"—i.e., in all probability, to do some lowly practical service for the Church. God gives to each as He will, but also, as Jesus says in the parable (Mt 25 15), to each according to his several ability. Every member is a minister to the Church, and the laws of the ministry (as explained in Ro 12; I Co 12–13) are the same for all. The first is humility; it is only with what we have received that we can minister, and therefore gifts are never to be used for vainglory. The second is love; nothing that we have received is for ourselves alone; the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man πρὸς τὸ συμφέρον in the interest of the whole.

In the list in I Co 12 28 God's gifts first take the form of gifted men—apostles, prophets, teachers.

6. The More Important Ministries.

These gifted or inspired men were ministers of the Church universal. They were not elected by local churches, they filled no office in them, they did not necessarily remain in one place; indeed the apostle of necessity did not. Their gift had to be self-attesting; the spiritual power which accompanied the exercise of it was the only guaranty it had. Besides the stricter sense of the word apostle, according to which it includes only Paul and the Twelve, there was a larger sense in which it presumably included all who had seen the Lord and exercised the vocation of bearing witness to His resurrection without restriction to one place (see I Co 15 5, with ver. 7; Ro 16 7). The apostle, in the sense in which Paul vindicates the title for himself, was the main witness to Jesus and the supreme authority for the Gospel. See also APOSTLE. The prophet was a man who had more than the common Christian inspiration, whose χάρισμα, "gift," is highly estimated by Paul, and who spoke edification, exhortation, and consolation in the Church (I Co 14 3). The Divine impulse in him was not such as to carry him irresistibly away; "the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets" (ver. 32). Though inspired, however, the prophet was not infallible, and when two or three had spoken in the Church, the time for discernment came. It is clear from Paul that discrimination was needed, but not very clear how it was achieved. We read of a dogmatic test of inspired utterances—inspiration is genuine, if it goes to exalt Jesus (I Co 12 3); we read of discernments of spirits as a separate χάρισμα (I Co 12 10)—that is, there were men who had, so to speak, a Divine instinct in this region, and could tell in a way passing analysis whether a fervent utterance really was of God; we read again of appeals to the whole Church (I Co 14 29 οἱ ἄλλοι ?) not to despise prophecies, or pour cold water on the heart which was spiritually aglow, but to prove all such fervid words, and hold fast what was good (I Th 5 19 ff.)—as though the common sense of the Christian community had more of God in it than the most fervent single heart. Prophets no doubt spoke often of things to come, especially of the glory to be revealed (I Co 2 9 ff.; Eph 1 17 f.; Rev passim), and may sometimes have let imagination run wild; sometimes, as in the case of Agabus (Ac 11 27, 21 10), and the others through whom the Holy Spirit bore witness to Paul in every city that bonds and affliction awaited him in Jerusalem, they concerned themselves with a nearer future.

Here also they had to be subject to criticism. At all events Paul could appeal from the spirit speaking without through the prophet to the same spirit speaking with a higher authority within, and, in spite of prophetic warnings, go on to Jerusalem to die, if need should be, for the name of the Lord Jesus. About the teachers it is not easy to say much. In Ac 13 1 they are combined, as in I Co 12 28, with the prophets; in Eph 4 11 they are more closely connected, perhaps to some extent identified, with the pastors. Probably teachers had the special χαρίσματα called in I Co 12 8 "the word of wisdom" and "the word of knowledge"; and, though the gift of teaching, or the right to teach, was not at first connected with any office (see I Co 14 26, "When ye come together, every one hath a διδαχή"—a lesson to teach), it would be an advantage in many ways, when once offices did come into being, to have them filled, other things being equal, with men who could also render the Church this service. "Wisdom" is always teleological; if the teacher had "the word of wisdom," he could exhibit the chief end of the Christian life, be an expounder of Christian ethics. "Knowledge" is more abstract; if he had "the word of knowledge," he could interpret Christianity as a system of truth, be an expounder of Christian theology. There are indications in the N T that this ministry tempted the fluent and the vain (Ja 3 1). One other inspired minister is mentioned in Eph 4 11, the evangelist, and two representatives of this class are named in the N T, Philip (Ac 21 8) and Timothy (II Ti 4 5). The name implies that the man preached the Gospel, and so does all we know of Philip's career. Perhaps the disappearance of the name in later times is due to the fact that all wandering preachers, after the death of the Twelve, were counted "apostles" in the wider sense (see HDB. s.v. Evangelist).

The other inspired ministries are of minor importance. Paul describes them by abstract nouns in the plural number — δυνάμεις, χαρίσματα ἰαμάτων, ἀντιλήμψεις, κυβερνήσεις, γένη γλωσσῶν. It is as though the person here were of less significance compared with the function. What δυνάμεις, "miracles," were as distinct from gifts of healing, we can not tell. Perhaps the particular kind of healings distinguished as exorcisms is meant. The word ἀντιλήμψεις, helps, suggests the practical "ministry" of Ro 12 7—such work as came later to be assigned to the official deacon; and κυβερνήσεις, governments, "wise counsels" mg. suggests such a function of guidance or administration as came later to be assigned to the official elder. But neither in Ro nor in I Co is there any trace of officials. Such gifts are freely given by God, and spontaneously exercised by those who have them; the house of Stephanas (I Co 16 15) were not in office, but set themselves to minister unto the saints. All Christians were called to put their χαρίσματα into the common stock, and no official organization canceled freedom or, as Paul says, "quenched the spirit."

The last gift specified in I Co 12 is kinds of tongues (ver. 28), or "speaking with tongues" (ver. 30), or "with a tongue" (14 2). It is frequently combined with prophecy, from the day of Pentecost onward, as one of the most characteristic of spiritual gifts (Ac 2 4-11, 10 46; I Co 13 1, 14 2). Paul himself possessed it in a conspicuous degree (I Co 14 18), and thanked God for it, but he ranked it as the lowest of spiritual gifts. It is his account of it in I Co 14, and not the idealized or transfigured one in Ac 2, on which we must base our conception of it. It had nothing to do with foreign languages. It was an emotional, not a linguistic, gift; the man who spoke with a tongue spoke out of an emotional rapture; he was carried out of himself by the intensity of his feeling—a feeling stimulated, we must assume, by the great realities with which he was brought into contact in the Gospel—and in this rapt condition he gave vent to inarticulate, unintelligible sounds. His "spirit" was active in this—as we might say now, his religious nature was engaged in it; but his νοῦς, his understanding, was not. There might be some one present in the assemblies who could interpret this overwhelming emotion better than the man who was subject to it: if so, to speak in a tongue might be allowed in church; otherwise, the gift must be exercised (we should rather say indulged) in private. It is clear from Ac 2 11, 10 46; I Co 14 16, that, in its general character, speaking with tongues was an ecstasy of praise, a thanksgiving to which Amen was the natural sequel, a magnifying of God and His mighty works of redemption. But as a sort of spiritual intoxication its dangers were evident, and Paul warns against them. Partly they lay in the temptation to indulge what is only valuable when controlled; partly in the tendency to vanity, making a display of one's spiritual ecstasies; partly also in the inevitableness of reaction, and the mysterious connection of sensual with spiritual susceptibilities. On all grounds Paul discouraged speaking with tongues in favor of the intelligible and self-controlling gift of prophecy by which one could build up not only himself but also the Church (I Co 14 3), and in course of time it died out.

8. Organization of Local Churches.

The ministry which is a function of membership and which depends on the free exercise of spiritual gifts, though it is the vital and fundamental one on which the being of the Church depends, is not the only one. No society can live and act without some kind of organization, some kind of official ministers who act as its representatives, and the beginnings of such a ministry can be traced in the N T. We have seen that there were elders in the church at Jerusalem, and in Ac 14 23 we read that Paul and Barnabas appointed elders in every church founded during their first journey. On the mode of appointment, Luke is not quite explicit (see Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveler, pp. 120 ff.). No doubt the Apostles described the kind of men wanted, the Church would choose them, and they were introduced to their work with fasting and prayer. Laying on of hands is not mentioned, but is probably to be taken for granted. The duties of elders are not defined, and can only be inferred indirectly. It is clear from Ac 20 28, compared with 20 17, that they were mainly pastoral—that is, duties of moral supervision. The elders of Ephesus are exhorted to take heed to the flock of God in which the Holy Spirit has made them bishops (ἐπίσκοποι, overseers mg.), and to shepherd the Church of God. So in I P 5 1, Peter exhorts the elders among his readers, as himself an elder, to shepherd the flock of God, exercising the oversight (ἐπισκοποῦντες; some authorities omit this word). Cf. also I P 2 25, "the shepherd and bishop" of your souls. It is hardly possible to say that the antecedents of the name πρεσβύτερος, "elder," were Hebrew, and those of ἐπίσκοπος, "bishop," Greek. There are Jewish antecedents for the latter also (see Concordance to LXX. s.v.). The facts justify us in saying that elder is a title of dignity, and bishop is a corresponding title of function. The persons were the same. In every church there were several men who had the rank of elders and the duty of bishops—that is, "oversight" (cf. Tit 1 5-7). Pastor is a more pictorial name for the same persons at the same task. Moral supervision and discipline were their preeminent concern.

The edifying of the Church by teaching, prophesying, praise, and public worship generally, belonged to the apostles, prophets, and teachers who might visit it, or to the free exercise of their spiritual gifts by the members generally. No doubt, however, men would often be chosen as elders or bishops on the ground of their possessing other gifts useful to the Church, and, as the enthusiastic inspiration waned, the conduct of the public worship and especially the administration of the sacraments (in which the Church must act through authorized representatives, if all is to be done decorously and in order) would fall into their hands. Thus we see pastors bracketed with teachers, and contrasted with the non-local ministry of apostles, prophets, and evangelists in Eph 4 11. Elders who labor in the word and in teaching (as well as in their more proper function of moral oversight) are to be reckoned worthy of double honor (I Ti 5 17); when the Pastoral Epistles were written it was even one of the qualifications of a bishop that he should be διδακτικός, "apt to teach" (I Ti 2 2). The whole body of elders in a church was called the πρεσβυτέριον, "the presbytery" (I Ti 4 14). At Lystra it joined with Paul in laying hands on Timothy, when he was set apart as an evangelist. The gift of God given in this ordination (I Ti 4 16; II Ti 1 6) can not be interpreted rationally apart from Timothy's experience at the time. It must be a greater degree of humility, of conscientiousness, or courage, or love, fitting him better for his task, and coming to him naturally, by the grace of God, in that solemn hour. Probably in many cases, as well as that of Timothy, there were "prophecies leading the way to" the men to be chosen; that is, inspired voices naming fit persons for any particular task (I Ti 1 18; Ac 13 2); but, though they were appointed because they were fit, such persons got a new degrce of fitness through the experiences connected with their appointment and institution to office. In the later N T books (Ph 1 1; I Ti 3 1-13), we find side by side with bishops a subordinate set of officers called technically διάκονοι, deacons. This word is applicable to every minister of the Church from the apostle down, but in its special sense, in which it is used of women as well as men (Ro 16 1; I Ti 3 11), it indicates a class of officers who seem to have had duties connected with the Church's charities, its care of the poor, strangers, etc. Their qualifications are all those of character and common sense; nothing is said of teaching. Men like Timothy at Ephesus or Titus in Crete were not church officers, but apostolic delegates; they do not represent the organization of the Church, but help us to see how the organizing was attended to. The development of the monarchical episcopate, as distinctive from the collective oversight just explained, lies beyond the limits of the N T.

9. Essential Unity of Church.

The variety of gifts, functions, and offices in the N T church is only the foil to its essential unity. It is expounded in Ro 12; I Co 12; and Eph 4 in relation to that unity. The great conception of the body of Christ underlies it everywhere. The sense of this comes out in numberless ways: in the fact that early Christian literature is mainly epistolary, in the salutations of the churches to each other through the Apostles (Ro 16 16; I P 5 13; He 13 24), in the holy kiss, or kiss of love, which became a regular part of the church service (Ro 16 16; I Co 16 20; II Co 13 12; I Th 5 26; I P 5 14), in the collections which they made for each other's help in times of distress (for Paul's great collection in all Gentile churches for the poor saints at Jerusalem cf. Ac 24 17; I Co 16 1-4; II Co 8, 9; Gal 2 10; Ro 15 25-31), and even linguistically in the multiplication of compounds with σύν. Of these the commonest are συνεργός, variously rendered in AV fellow helper, -laborer, -worker, and work-fellow; συνστρατιώτης, fellow soldier, the Christian ministry being conceived as a campaign (Ph 2 25; Phm 2); συναιχμάλωτος, fellow prisoner in war, the same figure continued (Col 4 10; Phm 23; Ro 16 7); σύνδουλος, fellow slave (Col 1 7, 4 7). Yoke-fellow (σύνζυγος) and fellow elder (συνπρεσβύτερος) each occurs once (Ph 4 3; I P 5 1). More significant still are σύνσωμα, συνκληρονόμα, and συνμέτοχα (Eph 3 6). J. D.

CHUZAS, chū'zas (Χουζᾶς, Chuza AV): The steward (ἐπίτροπος) of Herod (probably H. Antipas) (Lk 8 3). As general manager of Herod's estates and household (cf. Plummer, Int. Crit. Com., ad loc.) he was probably a man of rank and means. E. E. N.

CIRCUMCISION: The cutting off of the foreskin (præputium). Among the Hebrews, the Law required the submission to the rite by all the male members of the community on the eighth day after birth (Lv 12 3; Gn 21 4 [P]). In later Judaism, the Law was so strictly interpreted that even the Sabbath might be disregarded for the sake of conforming to the time limit prescribed by it (Shabb. 19 2 ff.; Jn 7 22). The person whose duty it was to perform the rite was primitively the father of the child (Gn 17 23); but in exceptional cases in earlier days women were known to have administered it (Ex 4 25), and in later times it became more and more common either to call in a physician (Jos. Ant. XX, 2 4) or to relegate the duty altogether to a special official (the Mēhōl), as at the present day. Besides the male children of the household, it appears from Gn 17 22 ff. that slaves also were circumcised; and according to the law of Ex 12 48 (P) also strangers who wished to participate in the Passover. The practise was not peculiar to the Hebrews. Among the Egyptians there is no doubt that some (Ebers Aegypt u. d. Büch. d. Mos., I, 278, 283), and if Herodotus was correctly informed, all persons were circumcised (Herod. II, 36; cf. also Philo 2. 210, ed. Mangey; Erman Egypt, p. 32 f., 539). The Semitic peoples generally do not seem to have practised the rite. The Assyrians, Babylonians, Edomites, and Moabites were uncircumcised. The reproach of uncircumcision, however, is especially held up against the Philistines; from which it has been inferred that the Canaanites practised the rite. Among extra-biblical peoples the primary and original aim of the rite was that of a sacrifice designed to secure fertility; but among the Hebrews from the earliest days the idea of purification appears to have supplanted this conception. The ceremony indicated the casting off of uncleanness as a preparation for entrance into the privileges of membership in Israel. In the N T, with its transfer of emphasis from the external and formal to the inner and spiritual side of things, it was first declared unnecessary for Gentile converts to the Gospel to be circumcised (Ac 15 28), and afterward the rite was set aside even by Jewish Christians. In the Pauline Epistles it serves as the basis of a figure signifying the casting off of the uncleanness of sin (Gal 2 7 f.; Eph 2 11). A. C. Z.

CISTERN: The character of the land-surface of most of Palestine is such that the rain penetrates but a little way and is soon drained off from the steep hillsides through the numerous ravines and watercourses. Recourse must be had, therefore, to artificial means for collecting and holding the water, and cisterns have been numerous and much used in Palestine ever since it has been inhabited. Every well-ordered house had a cistern in its court (see HOUSE, § 6 (f); FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 12). The RV uses "cistern" for "well" AV in Dt 6 11 (mg.); I S 19 22 (mg.); II Ch 26 10; Neh 9 25, and for "pit" AV in Is 30 14 and Jer 14 3. See PALESTINE, §§ 19, 20, and also Libbey and Hoskins, The Jordan Valley and Petra, Vol. I, p. 245 f. E. E. N.

CITIZENSHIP: The civic side of community life is almost never referred to in the O T. This was partly because the basis of Israel's social organization was the clan or tribe rather than the city, partly because of the emphasis laid on the religious organization of Israel, rendering city and state secondary features in social life and the congregation or theocratic kingdom primary, and partly because of the life of the people which was mainly agricultural during the greatest part of its history. The good citizen was the faithful Israelite and the lawless a "son [man] of Belial" (Jg 19 22; I K 21 10 AV). With the admission of Greek ideas secular relations were distinctly recognized (II Mac 5 8, 14 8). In the N T the figure of the state is so prominent that even the religious community is at times symbolized by it ("commonwealth of Israel," Eph 2 12). Likewise the privileges of the spiritual community are figured under the conception of citizenship (πολίτευμα, Phil 3 20; but AV conversation, and RVmg. "commonwealth"). In fact, citizenship is the type of the whole sphere of conduct both social and moral (cf. II Co 1 12, "behave ourselves" RV, "conversation" AV, and Eph 2 3, "live" RV). For this figure the conception of the kingdom of heaven furnished proper foundation ("fellow citizen," Eph 2 19). Of citizenship in the literal sense mention is made but once (Ac 22 25, 28, freedom AV). See also ROMAN. A. C. Z.

CITY: The beginnings of city building are referred by Israelitic legend to the earliest period of human history, and are associated not with nomadic (Abel), but with agricultural (Cain) life. As a matter of fact, most of the cities of the Israelites were originally Canaanite, and came into the hands of the Israelites only as the result of a rather long development. For as the Israelites reached Palestinian territory, they succeeded in establishing themselves first in the open places and especially in the mountain districts; but as nomads they could not at first secure possession of the fortified cities. In course of time, however, these Canaanite cities were subdued and to them were added also others distinctively Israelite.

1. Age of Israelitic Cities.

Many of the names of cities are characteristic, and give us the points of view which were determinative in the selection of localities. (1) Names like Ramah, Mizpah, Geba, etc. (all from roots signifying elevation) indicate that a mountain or a hill site was preferred, evidently because it could be easily defended against assault. (2) En-gedi, En-gannin (En = 'spring'), Beer-sheeba (Beer = 'well'), etc., indicate the importance of the nearness of a spring, a stream, etc. (3) Designations such as Jearim ('forest'), Kerem ('vineyard'), Abel ('meadow'), etc., show that the location of these cities was marked by such natural features. Cities in valleys, such as Hebron, constituted an exception, since cities usually were built on the slope of a hill—the citadel, or castle, perched on the summit always offering a sure refuge and one difficult to capture.

2. Significance of City Names.

Villages and hamlets (ḥātsēr, perāzōth, kāphār, kōpher) on one side, and cities ('īr, poet. kiryath) on the other, are clearly distinguished in the O T. The ḥātsērīm are open localities without walls (Lv 25 31); also the 'ārē perāzōth (Est 9 19) are designated as places without walls, without gates and enclosures (Ezk 38 11), for which latter kōpher is the characteristic name. The city ('īr), on the contrary, was surrounded by a wall, sometimes also by a moat (Dn 9 25, "wall" AV), and even by a second smaller wall in the nature of a rampart (II S 20 15, trench AV; I K 21 23) ('īr ḥōmāh), and had a citadel (migdal), the gates of which were closed during the night (Jos 2 5, 7), and in later times on the Sabbath (Neh 13 19). Such cities were called fortified (II Ch 11 10, etc., fenced AV). The gates were provided with bronze or iron bars and bolts (Dt 3 5; Jg 16 3; Neh 3 6, lock, AV), and were built with chambers overhead (II S 18 24 ff.). From the roof of the structure (II S 18 24), or from a tower by the gate (II K 9 17), a watchman looked out in order to announce approaching danger (Jer 6 17). Near the gates within the city were to be found open places (broad places, broad ways, rᵉḥōbōth, streets, AV Jer 5, Am 5 16), the centers of communal life. Here contracts were entered into (Dt 25 7; Ru 4 1 f., 11; Gn 23 10, 18), assemblies for judicial or deliberative purposes were held (Am 5 12, 15; Is 29 21), buying and selling took place (II K 7 1; cf. market-place, Mt 20 3), and public announcements were made (Jer 17 19). Here was the center of social intercourse in general (Gn 19 1; Ps 69 12). Here strangers who had no friend in the city passed the night (Gn 19 2 ff.; Jg 19 15).

3. Distinction Between "City" and "Village."

The plan and construction of cities were not in ancient times essentially different from those of the Orient of to-day. As walled cities were used more or less as strongholds, it was of advantage not to extend the walls too far from the center. In consequence, there was a tendency to contract cities into as small a space as possible. The streets (ḥūtsōth) were as narrow as they are to-day (cf. Jos. Ant. XX, 5 3; BJ. II, 14 9, 15 5; VI, 8 5). For the most part they ran through the city in circuitous courses, so that a straight one was quite the exception (Ac 9 11). In cities which were built on steep hillsides, the roofs of the lower houses served as the street for the higher ones, as at the present day. The streets were not paved. It is in the days of Herod Agrippa II that we first hear of the paving of the streets of Jerusalem with white stones (Jos. Ant. XX, 9 7). This was, however, after the principal street of Antioch had been paved with stone slabs at the expense of Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. XVI, 5 3; BJ I, 21 11). Street-cleaning was as unusual in ancient times as it is to-day. Garbage was thrown out of the houses and left to be disposed of by the dogs that roamed at will about the city (Ex 22 31; Ps 59 6, 14 f.). There was also no such thing as the lighting of the streets. The only care of them that is referred to is that by night-watchmen (Song 3 3, 5 7; Is 21 11; Ps 127 1, 130 6). The custom practised even to-day of establishing bazaar-streets (shūq; cf. shᵉwāqīm, I K 20 34; Ec 12 4; Song 3 2)— i.e., streets in which artisans or merchants of the same class ply their trades—is traceable to ancient times. We read of a bakers' street in Jer 37 21, of a goldsmiths' quarter and a quarter of spice-merchants in Neh 3 31 f., of a fish-gate in I Ch 4 14, Neh 3 3, and of a valley of craftsmen in Neh 11 35. Josephus mentions the quarters of wool-merchants, of smiths, and of cloth-dealers (BJ. V, 8 1). To provide an adequate supply of water was frequently a matter of great difficulty. It was necessary at times to construct cisterns or aqueducts. Jerusalem, for example, had quite early in its history a conduit, which was later improved (Is 7 3, 22 9, 11). See JERUSALEM, §§ 13, 34.

5. City Government.

As to the administration of the affairs of cities, we know but little. In the days of the Deuteronomist there is evidence of elders and along with them judges (Dt 16 18 ff., 19 12, etc.). Probably the former were the heads of the most influential families. Over Samaria we find a governor (I K 22 26). In fact, Jerusalem must have had several high officials (II K 23 8, etc.). This ancient Jewish administration of cities by elders and others was preserved in the specifically Jewish territory down to the days of the Herods, while other cities adopted a Hellenistic policy (cf. also TOWN CLERK, and TREASURER, and CITY, RULERS OF).

W. N.

CITY, FENCED. See CITY, § 3.

CITY, ROYAL. See RABBAH.

CITY, RULERS OF (πολιτάρχα, 'politarchs,' Ac 17 6): Civil magistrates of a Greek city as contradistinguished from Roman officials. The term politarch is self-explanatory, but it was confined to Macedonia and the sphere of Macedonian influence. Luke's use of the unusual title is confirmed by an inscription on an arch in Thessalonica mentioning magistrates as politarchs. They are mentioned also in seventeen other inscriptions. In Ac 16 19 "rulers" are 'archons,' the ordinary title of the magistrates in a Greek city. J. R. S. S.

CITY OF DAVID. See JERUSALEM, § 15.

CITY OF DESTRUCTION: The similarity of heres (חֶרֶס), 'destruction,' to heres (חֶרֶס), 'sun,' apparently caused confusion in Is 19 18. Many MSS. and several versions read "City of the Sun," which, as indicating Heliopolis, may well have been the original reading. The LXX. reads "city of righteousness." E. E. N.

CITY OF PALM-TREES. See JERICHO.

CITY OF SALT (עִיר הַמֶּלַח, 'ir ham-melaḥ): A town of Judah in the wilderness (Jos 15 62). The identification with the ruin Tell el Milh (Map II, E 4) is unsatisfactory. E. E. N.

CITY OF WATERS. See RABBAH.

CLASPS. See TABERNACLE, § 3.

CLAUDA (Κλαῦδα), more correctly Gaudos, now Gavdho: A small treeless island S. of Crete, with no safe anchorage on its E. side (Ac 27 16). Its present population numbers but 70 families. J. R. S. S.

CLAUDIA (Κλαυδία): Probably a Roman Christian (II Ti 4 21), perhaps a freedwoman of the Claudian gens. She figures in later tradition as the mother or wife of Linus mentioned in the same passage (Ap. Const. VII, 46). J. M. T.

CLAUDIUS (Κλαύδιος Ac 11 28, 18 2): The fourth Roman emperor (41–54), son of Drusus (son of Livia) and Antonia. He was nephew of Tiberius and grandson of Mark Antony. Being feeble-minded, he was not educated for the throne. He was proclaimed emperor by the Pretorian guards in 41. C. was a harmless, well-intentioned man, but was induced to bloodshed by his favorites Narcissus, Pallas, and his wife Messalina. Messalina was executed in 49 and C. married Agrippina (his niece), disinheriting his own son Britannicus and adopting Nero (Agrippina's son). He was poisoned by Agrippina in 54.

The relations of Claudius to Agrippa, to whose political energies he largely owed his advancement to the throne (cf. Jos. Ant. XIX, 4 5), were most friendly throughout his reign and led him not only to bestow upon this Jewish prince peculiar honors and an extension of his Palestinian domain (cf. Dio Cassius, LX, 8; Jos. Ant. XX, 7 1, 1 3), but to grant to the Jews in general throughout the Empire the right of religious worship, warning them at the same time to use it peacefully (cf. Jos. Ant. XIX, 5 2 f.). This grant naturally did not imply a love of the Jewish people as such; so that, if the warning attached to it was not heeded, restrictive measures against them on the Emperor's part can easily be understood. In the line of such restriction is to be interpreted the statement of their expulsion from Rome referred to in Ac 18 2 (cf. Suet. Claud. 25)—whether the expulsion of the entire Jewish community actually occurred, which seems doubtful (note the silence of Tacitus and Josephus regarding it), or was merely attempted and found impracticable (cf. Suet. Tiber. 36), or was not an expulsion at all but only a prohibition of tumultuous assemblages of the general Jewish populace, apart from their ordinary religious services, the right to which they still possessed (cf. Dio Cassius, LX, 6 6). In any case the action of the Emperor would cause many of them to leave the city and account for the presence of Aquila and Priscilla in Corinth when Paul arrived there; since the date of the 'edict,' while not possible of accurate determination, is quite likely to have been between 50 and 52 (cf. Schürer, HJP. II, ii. § 31, n. 69; Zahn, Introd., part XI, Chron. Survey; Ramsay, Paul, p. 254; Knowling on Acts in Expos. Greek Testament).

J. R. S. S. and M. W. J.

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS: The military tribune (χιλίαρχος, "chief captain") holding the chief command in Jerusalem, who rescued Paul from the mob and sent him to Cæsarea to Felix (Ac 21 31–23). He had under him a cohort of Roman auxiliaries, about 1,000 strong, which upon the occasion of the Jewish festivals was always held in readiness in their headquarters in the castle of Antonia, which was connected by stairs with the Temple court. Lysias had bought his Roman citizenship at a high price, and had probably taken the cognomen Claudius from the Emperor, whose wife and court drove a flourishing trade in such sales. Paul's inherited citizenship greatly impressed Lysias. R. A. F.

CLAY: This term renders (1) ḥōmer, from a root meaning 'red' (Is 45 9, etc.); (2) ṭīṭ, 'mud,' 'slime,' etc. (Ps 40 2; Is 41 25); (3) ḥăṣaph, 'pottery' (i.e., made of potters' clay) (Dn 2 33-45); (4) πηλός, either 'mud' made of soil and spittle (Jn 9 6 ff.) or clay proper (Ro 9 21). The rendering "clay ground" (I K 7 46; II Ch 4 17) is uncertain, and the AV "clay" of Hab 2 6 is corrected into "pledge" by the RV. In the low lands of Palestine clay is abundant and its use for brick, mortar, and pottery was common in O T times. In Job 4 19, etc., the word is used figuratively for the flesh (as made from earth) and in Is 64 8, etc., it represents human subjection to the divine sovereignty. E. E. N.

CLEAN, CLEANNESS, CLEANSE. See PURIFICATION, §§ 1, 2.

CLEMENT (Κλήμης): A fellow worker with Paul at Philippi (Ph 4 3). There is nothing to justify his traditional identification with Clement of Rome. E. E. N.

CLEOPAS (Κλεόπας): One of the early disciples, mentioned only in Lk 24 18. Not to be confused with Cleophas. E. E. N.

CLEOPHAS. See CLOPAS.

CLOAK, CLOKE. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 3.

CLOPAS (Κλωπᾶς, Cleophas AV): Mentioned only in Jn 19 25 as the husband of a certain Mary, thought by many to be the sister of Jesus' mother. See MARY. E. E. N.

CLOSET. See HOUSE, § 6 (h).

CLOTH, CLOTHES, CLOTHING. See BURIAL, § 1, and DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 5.

CLOUD: The cloud is of frequent occurrence in figurative speech. (1) Its darkness serves as the image of mystery (Ps 97 2; Job 3 5), especially the profound mystery of the creation (Job 38 9). (2) Its distance from the earth is made to represent the unattainable (Is 14 14; Ps 108 4; Job 20 6). (3) Its changeableness is the image of the transitory, especially of short life (Job 7 9, 30 15; Hos 6 4). (4) But the most suggestive use of the figure is in connection with the divine presence. Not only is Jehovah said to ride upon the cloud (Is 19 1; Nah 1 3), but He makes a special cloud the sign of His presence (Ex 13 21, etc.), both in the guiding of the Israelites toward Canaan and in the dedication of the Temple (I K 8 10 f.; II Ch 5 13 f.). A. C. Z.

CLOUT: In Jer 38 11 f. "clouts" means 'rags,' or 'ragged cast-off clothes.' In Jos 9 5 it means 'patched' and has been so translated by the RV. Here the references is to patched shoes. E. E. N.

CLUB. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 5.

CNIDUS, nī'dŭs (Κνίδος Ac 27 7): The capital of the Dorian Hexapolis in Caria. It lay on a small island (Triopium), connected by a causeway with the mainland. It had two harbors and contained a temple of the Cnidian Aphrodite (by Praxiteles). Games in honor of the Triopian Apollo were celebrated conjointly with Rhodes and Cos. J. R. S. S.

COAL: The following words, wrongly translated "coal" in AV, are correctly rendered in ARV or ARVmg.: resheph (Song 8 6; Hab 3 5), a poetic word for 'flame'; retseph (I K 19 6) or ritspāh (Is 6 6), a heated stone; shᵉḥōr (La 4 8), 'blackness.'

Mineral coal is not found in Palestine, and the deposits in Lebanon have been little mined. The words properly rendered "coal" in EV refer either to charcoal (peḥam, 'black'; Is 44 12, 54 16, and especially Pr 26 21), or, more broadly, to live embers of any kind (gaḥeleth), including glowing charcoal. The latter is the common Heb. term (Ps 120 4; Is 44 19; Ezk 24 11). It is written more fully "coals of fire" (e.g., Pr 25 22 = Ro 12 20 ἄνθρακες πυρός), and is frequently used metaphorically (II S 14 7; Ps 18 8). The N T ἀνθρακιά (Jn 18 18, 21 9) was, of course, a fire of charcoal. See also BRASIER, HEARTH, CHIMNEY. L. G. L.

COAST: A term frequently used in the AV, but largely displaced by other more correct terms in the RV. (1) In the many cases where the Heb. is gᵉbhūl, the RV reads "border(s)" instead of "coast(s)." (2) In the other instances "coast(s)" AV is displaced in RV by "regions" (Jl 3 4), "shore" (Jos 9 1), "side" (Nu 13 29, 34 3; Jg 11 26), "height" (Jos 12 33), "whole number" (Jg 18 2), "among them" (Ezk 33 2), "end" (Nu 34 3), "parts" (Mt 15 21, 16 13), "borders" (Mk 5 17, 7 31, 10 1; Ac 13 50), "places on the coast" (Ac 27 2), and "country" (Ac 26 20). E. E. N.

COAT. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 2.

COAT OF MAIL. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 9.

COCK. See PALESTINE, § 25.

COCKATRICE. See PALESTINE, § 26.

COCK CROWING. See TIME, § 1.

COCKLE. See PALESTINE, § 23.

CŒLE-SYRIA, sĭ''lę-sir'i-ą (Κοίλη Συρία), 'hollow Syria': A term of frequent occurrence in the O T Apocrypha. Strictly considered, it was the designation of that part of Syria that lay between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon ranges, but it was often used to cover all the Syrian possessions from the Lebanons S. as far as Egypt. E. E. N.

COFFIN: Used only in Gn 50 26. The Heb. word 'ārōn means literally a 'chest' or 'box,' but is used here evidently in the sense of 'mummy-case.' See also BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 4. E. E. N.

COIN. See MONEY.

COL-HOZEH, ĕol-hō'ze (כֹּל־חֹזֶה, kol-ḥōzeh), 'he sees all' (?): A Jew of Nehemiah's day (Neh 3 15, 11 5). E. E. N.

COLLAR, COLLARS (Jg 8 26). See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 11.

COLLECTION. See TAX, and CHURCH, § 9.

COLLEGE. See JERUSALEM, § 36.

COLLOP: An old English word meaning 'slices of meat' made tender by beating (see Skeat's Dict.). It is used only in Job 15 27, where RV reads "fat," which is the meaning of the Heb. E. E. N.

COLONY (from the Latin colonus, 'farmer'): Settlers sent to foreign parts to establish trading-stations generally retained their native institutions and their allegiance to the mother country. The Greeks were very successful colonists (Asia Minor, Black Sea, lower Italy [Magna Græcia], southern France, Spain, northern Africa), and Alexander colonized many cities from Egypt to Bactria. Rome established military colonies (of invalid soldiers) everywhere, of which Philippi (Ac 16 12) was an instance. Roman colonists as such enjoyed certain well-defined privileges which were not granted to ordinary provincials. J. R. S. S.

COLORS: Both the O T and the N T illustrate the general fact that ancient literature knows little of the modern sensitiveness to color-effects and their subtle gradations. Most of the references are casual and involve merely primary distinctions. The only passages where colors are emphasized are the account of the materials and vestments of the Tabernacle and Temple (Ex 25–28, 35–39; Nu 4, 15; II Ch 2–3), the diagnosis of leprosy (Lv 13–14), and the apocalyptic visions of 'horses' (Zec 1, 6; Rev 6, 19).

1. White and Black. White is the symbol of purity, as shown in comparisons with snow (Ps 51 7; Is 1 18), in the vesture of angelic beings and of the redeemed (Dn 7 9, 12 10; Mt 17 2; Mk 9 3; Lk 9 29; Mt 28 3; Mk 16 5; Jn 20 12; Ac 1 10; Rev 3 4, 5, 18, 4 4, 6 11, 7 9, 13, 14, 19 8, 14), in the mystic "stone" with the "new name" and the heavenly "throne" (Rev 2 17, 20 11). It was also the color of nobility and elegance (Est 8 15; Ec 9 8; La 4 7; Jg 5 10; cf. Rev 19 11, 14). From it came the name "Lebanon"—the 'white' mountain. Reference is made to the whiteness of the skin, the teeth, and the hair (Song 5 10; Gn 49 12; Mt 5 36), of wool (Ezk 27 18; Rev 1 14), of milk (La 4 7), of alabaster or marble (Est 1 6; Song 5 15), of ripe wheat-fields (Jn 4 35), of bread (Gn 40 16), of walls (Mt 23 27; Ac 23 3), and of blinding heat (Is 18 4). Whiteness of the skin and hair was a symptom of leprosy (Ex 4 6; Lv 13–14; Nu 12 10; II K 5 27, etc.), as paleness was of fear (Is 29 22). Doubtless 'white' often means 'gray' or 'light brown,' as in the description of garments of linen or byssus.

Black, or some dark hue, is the symbol of disaster or mourning, as in the visage of the overwhelmed (Job 30 30; Jer 8 21; La 4 8, 5 10; Jl 2 6; Nah 2 10) or the garb of the sorrowing (Job 30 28; Ps 42 9; Jer 14 2, etc.). But swarthy skin or hair was a sign of race (Song 1 5 f., 5 11), as of Ethiopians and other Africans. The blackness of night or tempest is noted (I K 18 45; Job 3 5; Is 50 3; Jer 4 28; He 12 18; Jude 13, etc.), of the raven (Song 5 11), of ice on the streams (Job 6 16), and of porphyry or dark marble (Est 1 6). Black hairs are mentioned in testing the leper (Lv 13), and the visions include black horses (Zec 6: Rev 6). Brown (Gn 30 32-40 AV) is properly black as in RV. The "black marble" referred to in Est 1 6 (cf. margin "stone of blue color") was probably a drab slate or marble.

2. Scarlet, Purple, and Other Reds. Bright red, "scarlet," or "crimson," a color obtained from the kermes-worm or cochineal, and a richer "purple" from a mollusk, were the badges of royalty, or at least of wealth. The two often occur together (Ex 25–28, 35–36, 38–39; Nu 4 8, 13; II Ch 2 7, 14, 3 14; Pr 31 21 f.; Rev 17 3 f., 18 12, 16), but also the former alone (Gn 38 28, 30; Lv 14; Nu 19 6; Jos 2 18, 21; II S 1 24; Song 4 3; Is 1 18; Jer 4 30; La 4 5; Nah 2 3; Mt 27 28; He 9 19), and the latter alone (Jg 8 26; Est 1 6, 8 15; Song 3 10, 7 5; Jer 10 9; Ezk 27 7, 16; Dn 5 7, 16, 29; Mk 15 17, 20; Jn 19 2, 5; Lk 16 19). Lydia was a dealer in purple (Ac 16 14).

It is likely that the term rendered 'blue' was some variety of purple. It occurs only with dyed stuffs (Ex 25–28, 35–36, 38–39; Nu 4, 15 38; II Ch 2 7, 14, 3 14; Est 1 6, 8 15; Jer 10 9; Ezk 23 6, 27 7, 24).

Ruddiness, such as that of a clayey soil, is often indicated, as of the flesh (Gn 25 25; I S 16 12, 17 42; Song 5 10; La 4 7), a sore (Lv 13), the lips (Song 4 3), animals (Nu 19 2; Zec 1, 6; Rev 6, 12 3), wine (Ps 75 8; Pr 23 31; Is 27 2), pottage (Gn 25 30), dyed leather or cloth (Ex 25 5, 26 14, 35 7, 23, 36 19, 39 34; Is 63 2), painted wood (Jer 22 14; Ezk 23 14; Nah 2 3), a kind of stone (Est 1 6, sardius and ruby?), and the fiery twilight sky (Mt 16 2-3). The word for the 'red' eyes of the drunkard (Gn 49 12; Pr 23 29) probably means 'unclear' or 'darkened.' The term bay—a bright red—(Zec 6 3, 7 AV) is properly rendered "strong" in RV.

3. Green and Yellow. Green is naturally often indicated as the attribute of vegetation in all its forms (as Ps 52 8; Jer 17 8; Hos 14 8; Rev 9 4, etc.). In one description of dyed stuffs (Est 1 6) the word rendered "green" may mean simply a special kind of linen. A greenish color occurs in the test for leprosy (Lv 13 49, 14 37), and also a glistening yellow (Lv 13 30-36); the former of these two words is also used with gold (Ps 68 13).

In the disposition of the precious stones in the high priest's breastplate (Ex 28 17-20, 39 10-13; Ezk 28 13) and in the foundations of the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev 21 19-20) there was probably an intentional color-scheme. W. S. P.

COLOSSÆ, co-los'ę (Κολοσσαί): A city of Phrygia Pacatiana, situated on the S. bank of the Lycus, on rising ground in the open plain (10 m. from Laodicea, 13 m. from Hierapolis). See Map of the Pauline World. The acropolis was on the N. bank. Though now quite deserted, Colossæ was the great city of Phrygia when visited by Xerxes (481) and Cyrus the Younger (401). It lay on the main trade-route from the seaboard to the East. It was ruined by the change of the road-system and the establishment of Laodicea. C. was famous for its wool of violet hue (colossinus). Philemon, Onesimus, Archippus, and Epaphras, the probable founder of the Church at C., all lived here (see COLOSSIANS and PHILEMON). The "worship of angels," against which Paul preached (Col 2 18), was perpetuated in the great and pretentious church of Michael the Archistrategus, which was destroyed by the Turks (12th cent.). J. R. S. S.

1. Introductory. From the beginning of a critical study of this Epistle (Mayerhoff, 1838) it has been recognized that it presents a troublesome problem and that this problem gathers about the errors which it discusses and seeks to counteract. The Tübingen School (1845) held these errors to be characterized by the Gnosticism of the 2d cent. and consequently denied the authorship of the Epistle to Paul. This was modified later (Holtzmann, 1872) to the effect that there was an element of asceticism in the errors which might well have belonged to the Apostolic Age, so that a portion of the letter may have come from Paul. At present the almost universal acceptance of the Epistle as Paul's is due to the conviction that whatever these errors may be they lack the developed philosophical character that would place them later than his day and consequently offer no hindrance to assigning the letter in its entirety to him.

2. Contents. In view of these facts there is a peculiar interest attaching to the thought of the Epistle. After the usual epistolary greeting (1 1 f.) and the customary Pauline thanksgiving for the readers' spiritual condition (1 3-8), the main message of the letter (1 9–4 6) begins. It is based upon what the Apostle has heard of their Christian life, his personal interest in which keeps him constantly in prayer that it may be divinely nourished in the direction of an increasing spiritual intelligence and a consequent fruitful activity and faithful endurance on the readers' part (1 9-11), recognizing the fact that the life they have is due to God's work of salvation through Christ (1 12-14), who is supreme in His place over the Church and the World (1 15-20); so that if their salvation is fully to realize itself in their lives, it will be dependent simply upon the stability of their faith in Him and the firmness of their hold upon the hope which He has assured to them in the Gospel (1 21-23).

After a word as to his ministrant relations to this Gospel and its bearings upon his service to the Church at large and the circle of individual churches to which his readers belong (1 24–2 2), the Apostle returns to this theme of Christ, whose supreme sufficiency for all their living makes it needless that they should subject themselves to the delusive persuasiveness of teachers who would substitute human philosophy for the teaching which He has given them (2 3-15), and impose an unnecessary ceremonial and a false worship and an arbitrary asceticism upon their living (2 16-23). On the contrary, his plea is that they give themselves to a spirituality of living based on their life with Christ, the reality of which should be a compelling force to a new character and conduct on their part (3 5-11).

After a consequent general exhortation in the direction of positive graces (3 12-17) and some specific exhortations within their household relations (3 18–4 1), and their relations among the unconverted (4 5 f.), the message ends, and with a short personal conclusion (4 7-18) the letter is brought to its close.

3. Character of the Errors. A survey of these contents makes clear that the Apostle is dealing in only a general way with the errors which have invaded the Colossian Church. He has not defined them either to his readers or to himself, and has not opposed them with anything more than general truths.

On a more specific study of the Epistle, however, there are discernible certain characteristics of the situation with which the Apostle had to deal. (1) The errors were evidently not so developed as to have caused separation from the Church (2 18 f.), though they appear to have had with their teachers a constructive form and to have been propagated in a dogmatic way (2 3 f., 8, 16, 18 f.). (2) They came from teachers who were Jews and Jews of a Judaistic type (2 8, 11, 14, 16, 20-22; cf. Gal 4 3 9 f.). (3) At the same time the insistence upon a regulation of drink, as well as of food, and on the other hand the absence of any antithesis between faith and works, or any insistence of their legalism as necessary to salvation, mark them as of an essentially different type from those which we find in the neighboring province of Galatia. (4) As to what this type could be it is most difficult, if not impossible, to determine. (a) Such passages as 2 20-23, which characterize their regulations as an ascetic severity toward the body, and 2 18, which shows them as given to angel-worship, suggest the influence of Essenism, and yet their asceticism is evidently not practised as an end in itself, as it was with the Essenes, while their angel-worship was accompanied by visions which were foreign to the Essenic cult. Certainly, many things which characterized Essenism are absent here. (b) The presence in such passages as 2 2 f., 9 f., 18 f., of characteristic Gnostic terms and the opposition which such passages as 1 15-20, 2 6, 9-11, 15, 19 furnish to the known Gnostic subordination of Christ and the removal of union with Him suggest the influence of Gnosticism, though some of these terms are present in other of the Apostle's letters, where Gnosticism can not possibly have come into consideration.

4. Historical Location of the Errors. From all this it is clear that an exact identifying of these errors with any known system of teaching in the Apostolic or post-apostolic time is out of the question. At the same time, the fact that Gnosticism had no definite origin in any specific school, but grew up in an eclectic way through the mingling of Jewish, Oriental, Greek, and Evangelic elements within the Church, makes it specially significant that this letter is addressed to a region of Asia Minor which had been colonized under Antiochus Epiphanes with Jews from Babylonia, a great center of theosophical mysticism, who would be peculiarly liable to such speculative vagaries as we find embodied in these errors. At all events, it is evident that the vague and indeterminate character of the Epistle's errors show them to belong to an early rather than to a late time; while their distinctively Jewish elements place them quite naturally within the missionary horizon of Paul.

This letter shows the development of Paul's ministry conditioned by the region of country in which it was carried on. In this region of Western Asia Minor, missionized largely under his leadership during his three years' stay in Ephesus, he had been brought face to face with speculative difficulties such as had not come before him in any other of his fields of work. His approach to them consequently is not that of an experienced disputant, but that of a man of practical spiritual ministry, hesitant through his ignorance of the technical elements involved and yet insistent because of his instinctive appreciation of their relations to and their influence upon the fundamental truths of the Gospel which he preached. Colossians thus stands apart from the four main Epistles of Paul and from his letters to the Thessalonians as born of the speculative necessities of his work.

COMING OF THE LORD. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 34–36, 41, 48.

COMMANDMENT: All but three of the O T words rendered "commandment" (and these three derived from the same root) signify primarily 'that which is uttered or spoken.' The idea of authority is read into these terms from the character or office of the person who makes the utterance. A commandment is, therefore, in the Biblical sense of the term, the word of one who has a right to be obeyed. In the N T the conception of authority has crystallized in the terms used.

COMMENTARY (מִדְרָשׁ, midhrāsh, from dārash, 'to inquire,' 'investigate'): In II Ch 13 22 a reference is made to the "commentary" ("story" AV) of the prophet Iddo and in 24 27 to the "commentary" ("story" AV) of the "book of the Kings." The Heb. term means "didactic or homiletic exposition," or "an edifying religious story" (Driver). Some such works are referred to by the Chronicler as among his sources. See CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF.

COMMERCE. See TRADE AND COMMERCE.

COMMON: The Biblical conception of what is common included: (1) The broad and general idea of the ordinary as distinguished from the exceptional (Jer 26 23; Lv 4 27; Ezk 23 42; Ac 5 18 AV; I Co 10 13 AV, etc.); (2) the conception of that which belongs to all as a general characteristic (Tit 1 4; Jude ver. 3) or that in which all participate (Ac 2 44); and (3) the notion of ceremonial uncleanness, in which sense the word is used in I S 21 4 f.; Jer 31 5 RVmg.; Ac 10 14, 28).

COMMONWEALTH. See CITIZENSHIP.

COMMUNICATE, COMMUNICATION: These words are employed: (1) In their original though now rather obsolete English meaning of 'making common,' i.e., of sharing, dividing, taking another as one's partner, having fellowship with—in temporal goods (Gal 6 6), afflictions (Ph 4 14 AV), necessities (Ro 12 13), giving and receiving (Ph 4 15 AV), or of Christian fellowship generally (I Ti 6 18; Phm 6 AV; He 13 16). (2) In the usual modern sense of sharing or imparting information, knowledge, etc., by speech, hence meaning 'word,' 'speech,' 'discourse' (II S 3 17; II K 9 11 AV; Mt 5 37 AV; Lk 24 17; Gal 2 2 AV; Eph 4 29 AV). In I Co 15 33 the Gr. ὁμιλία probably means 'conversations,' 'disputings' rather than "companionship" (ARV). In Col 3 8 by αἰσχρολογία abusive as well as obscene speech is intended.

COMMUNION. See LORD'S SUPPER and HOLY SPIRIT, § 2, b.

COMPANION: This word is the rendering of nine Hebrew terms and one (four AV) Greek. Five of the Hebrew originals indicate general community of interest and enterprise (cf. Ezr 4 7 ff.; Is 1 23; Mal 2 14), whereas the other four convey the idea of delight in personal association (cf. Ex 32 27; Jg 14 11 ff.; Pr 13 20). In the N T the Greek terms signify simple association or partnership in a common work or cause (cf. Ac 19 29; also in AV Ph 2 25; He 10 33; Rev 1 9).

CONCISION: A term which occurs but once in the Bible, Ph 3 2, where it renders the Gr. κατατομή ('incision')—a word not found at all in the LXX. nor in prechristian Gr. in this connection. It is a paronomasia evidently used here by Paul to characterize as nothing less than the flesh-cutting forbidden in the Law (Lv 21 5; cf. I K 18 28), the circumcision which was wholly ceremonial and lacked all regard for its spiritual significance. The term is to be distinguished from the yet stronger expression ἀποκόπτειν ('to cut off') in Gal 5 12, where the reference is to the prohibition of Dt 23 1. See CIRCUMCISION.

CONCUBINE. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, and FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, §§ 4, 5.

CONDEMN, CONDEMNATION: The rendering of a group of N T Gr. words, the chief element in which is made up of κρίνειν, with its compound (κατακρίνειν) and its derivatives ([κρίσις AV], κατάκρισις, κρίμα, κατάκριμα, αὐτοκατακριτός). In some passages the meaning is confined to human action and refers (1) to one's judgment against another ([κατακρίνειν] Jn 8 10 f.; Ro 8 34; [κατάκρισις] II Co 7 3; [κρίμα] I Ti 3 6). In Ro 2 1, 14 23 ("damned" AV), where κρίνειν is the original, there seems to be included also the element of one's judgment against himself (cf. ver. 22 AV); or (2) to the judgment into which another's conduct is brought by one's own good life ([κατακρίνειν] Mt 12 41 and ‖; He 11 7). In the great majority of passages, however, the meaning is distinctively that of the Divine judgment against sin ([κρίνειν] Ja 5 7 AV; Jn 3 17 f. AV; [κατακρίνειν] Ro 8 3; [κατάκρισις] II P 2 6; I Co 11 32; II Co 3 9; [κρίμα] Mk 12 40 and ‖; Ja 3 AV; I Co 11 34 AV; Ro 3 8; [κατάκριμα] Ro 5 16, 18, 8 1). In Jn 3 17-19, 5 24 (where only the AV renders κρίνειν and κρίσις by "condemn" and "condemnation") there is meant the judgment brought by men upon themselves because of their rejection of Christ. Parallel with this is Tit 3 11 (αὐτοκατακριτός), where the reference is to the judgment brought upon oneself by persistency in evil. In Ac 13 27 (κρίνειν); Lk 24 20 (κρίμα); Mt 27 3; Mk 10 33 and ‖s, 14 64 (κατακρίνειν), the reference is to the sentence of a court, expressing the general judgment of the people; in Lk 23 40 (κρίμα) to the sentence of a court, resulting in condemnation to death.

The rest of the group consists of the compounds καταδικάζειν, καταγιγνώσκειν, and ἀκαταγνωστός. In all but one of the passages where these words occur the meaning is confined to human judgment. Twice it is the censorious judgment against one's fellow man ([καταδικάζειν] Mt 12 7; Lk 6 37); twice it is the self-judgment which comes from the condemning character of one's own conduct ([καταγιγνώσκειν] Gal 2 11; I Jn 3 20 f.); once it is the sentence of a secular court—as an instrument of oppression ([καταδικάζειν] Ja 5 6). Once only is the meaning that of Divine judgment against evil ([καταδικάζειν] Mt 12 37).

There are two passages (I Ti 5 12 [κρίμα]; Tit 2 8 [ἀκαταγνωστός]) where the reference seems to be to a judgment implying more or less of ecclesiastical oversight and review. See also JUSTIFICATION.

CONFESS, CONFESSION (ὁμολογεῖν [ἐξομολογεῖν], ὁμολογία): A term which in the N T has several varieties of meaning. (1) 'To concede,' 'allow' (Jn 1 20; Ac 24 14; He 11 13). (2) 'To acknowledge one's sins'—'confess' in the narrower sense (Mt 3 6; Mk 1 5; Ac 19 18; Ja 5 16; I Jn 1 9). (3) 'To openly acknowledge' or profess one's faith in anything (Ac 23 8 [cf. Gr. of Tit 1 16]), especially in Jesus as the Messiah, Son of God, etc. (Mt 10 32a; Lk 12 8a; Jn 9 22, 12 42; Ro 10 9; II Co 9 13; Ph 2 11; I Ti 6 12 f.; He 3 1, 4 14, 10 23; I Jn 2 23, 4 2 f., 15; II Jn 7). Also of Jesus' acknowledging His own in the judgment (Mt 10 32b; Lk 12 8b; Rev 3 5 [cf. Gr. of Mt 7 23]). In the papyri ὁμολογεῖν is the official formula for publicly acknowledging a contract, sale, receipt, etc.; cf. also Mt 14 7; Ac 7 17, where it is used in the sense of a public assurance or promise. (4) Of thankfully and worshipfully acknowledging God, so 'to praise' Him (Ro 14 11, 15 9 [both cited from LXX.]; He 13 15). See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, §§ 8, 16.

CONFISCATE, CONFISCATION. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (c).

CONFORM, CONFORMED: The translation of the Gr. σύμμορφος (Ro 8 29; Ph 3 21 RV); of the ptcpl. συμμορφιζόμενος (Ph 3 10); and of συνσχηματίζεσθαι (Ro 12 2, "fashioned" RV; cf. Gr. of I P 1 14). It is evident that in the N T the compounds σύμμορφος and συμμορφίζειν place the emphasis on the internal (moral and intellectual) aspects, while συνσχηματίζειν refers primarily to the external (physical and formal) relations.

E. E. N.

CONGREGATION: Predominantly an O T word. In the N T found only in Ac 13 43 AV ("synagogue" RV). The AV uses the term as the translation of a variety of Hebrew words in all of which the notion of meeting is primary. The RV has properly substituted in all cases which designate the place of the meeting of God with the people in the person of their representative Moses (Ex 27 21, etc.) the more accurate form Tent of Meeting. Another change introduced in RV. in the interest of greater clearness and uniformity, is the substitution of assembly for "congregation" wherever the theocratical convocation of the people is meant, as when the original Heb. is qāhāl (Lv 4 14). The term "congregation" (in the RV) is thus almost limited to the designation of the stated meetings of the people for the transaction of political or legislative business. The distinction can not be pressed too closely, but in general it will hold true. The word is preeminently a 'priestly' one, confined almost entirely to the priestly elements of the Hexateuch and to Chronicles–Ezra–Nehemiah. See also ASSEMBLY (5) and (7).

CONSCIENCE: This word is not used in the O T, (but cf. Ec 10 20 [LXX.] and, in the Apoc., Wis 17 11). In the N T it is used mainly in the Pauline Epistles; twice in Paul's speeches in Acts (23 1, 24 16). Elsewhere it appears only in Hebrews, and in I Peter. Outside its Biblical usages the Greek word (συνείδησις) had not yet obtained the fuller meaning given to it in the N T. It was used somewhat vaguely for the consciousness with which a man views his completed act, especially for the feeling aroused as he recalls and contemplates a wrong deed (Cremer's Lexicon and P. Ewald). In the N T a distinct development is found.

In Ro 2 14 f., Paul finds a double proof that the law of God is real for the heathen world, first in the very character of their works which imply the power of making moral distinctions; and, second, in a twofold inner movement described in two independent clauses in the passage.

1. Pauline Usage. The second clause is not explanatory of the first. Their "thoughts" in mutual intercourse (λογισμοί) are not identical with their "conscience." The latter is private conscience and individual; the former are social. The occurrence of συνείδησις here presupposes a well-known meaning which may be found elsewhere. It appears clearly in the two passages in Acts, where Paul, reviewing his past, expresses his consciousness of having always tried to preserve his sense of integrity before God. At this point the NT agrees with extrabiblical usage, except that the religious reference is present. But that is the new element which makes a great change ultimately in the idea of "conscience." In the remaining passages of Romans (9 1, 13 5) the meaning is the same. In fact, it will be found that, as its fundamental meaning, Paul uses the word for that sense of integrity, or of righteous standing before God (or Christ), which accompanies the moral and religious conduct of the believer. All other new meanings of the word grow out of consideration of that function of human Christian consciousness.

The passage where "conscience" occurs most often (I Co 8–10) illustrates the manner in which the conception grew as soon as the fact began to live in the Christian environment. In the presence of a difficult practical problem conscience appears as a complex fact. (1) The Christian man who recognizes God's relation to all things and the nothingness of idols knows that the consecration of food to idols means nothing. He is, therefore, free to eat whatever is set before him. His knowledge of the facts becomes the ground of his integrity before God when he partakes. His conscience is clear and sound. (2) But he recognizes also that his action affects other consciences, of which in this regard there are two classes. (a) The weak conscience of a brother "used until now to the idol" (8 7). This man can not rid himself of the feeling that in eating meat he continues a former heathen practise. He eats "as of a thing sacrificed to an idol." He therefore eats with a "weak conscience," because of an unclear judgment of the facts, and therefore with a "defiled" (8 7) or "wounded" (8 12) conscience—that is, with a lack of conscious integrity before God. Now Paul will not despise his ignorance nor merely pity his confused judgment; he will reverence his conscience. For while the conscience is ignorant, lacking knowledge (8 7a), yet it is conscience, which if it be forced by example instead of being set free by insight is wounded, and he perishes (8 10f.). (b) The ignorant conscience of the heathen man (10 27a). If the Christian man purchase his food in the open market he must do so in his own freedom—ignoring the ceremonial connection between meat and idol-worship (10 25f.). But as soon as the relation becomes personal, the problem is changed. If a heathen host (10 27) sets meat before you without remark, your own conscience is free. But as soon as any one (τις 10 28) calls attention to the connection of the meat with idol-worship, the feast becomes a sacred meal, a heathen sacrament. That makes abstinence a duty, but only for the sake of the other's conscience. To him your partaking now would be a denial of the very thing which you know, that this consecration of the meat is nothing. From this it is clear that the oft-quoted verse (I Co 8 13) does not mean that Paul practised or enjoined permanent abstinence from meat. The abstaining conscience must keep its own dignity and rights by making abstinence wholly relative to the good of others, and must not erect its act into a new law of permanent and universal authority. There is a dangerous tendency in the 'weak' conscience to become censorious (Ro 14 3b, 10a) and in the strong and free conscience to become contemptuous (Ro 14 3a, 10b), and against both the Apostle utters urgent warnings. The guiding principle in this passage (I Co 8–10) is the same as in Ro 14, although in the latter for "knowledge" the Apostle substitutes the word "faith" (14 12). In both passages the awful significance of conscience appears in this that, if a man eat who feels or thinks that it may be against the honor of Christ to do so, he thereby abdicates his own judgment and acts outside of faith. And whoso does this is 'destroyed' (Ro 14 15b) and 'perishes' (I Co 8 11). And in both passages the man who by his example deliberately exerts that compulsion on him is held responsible for the disaster. In II Co "conscience" is applied not to his own approval of his conduct, but to its approval by others (4 2, 5 11). This is a new and most important step in the growth of the general conception. And yet it comes naturally through the intensely social Christian spirit. For it is the same inner power in virtue of which I appraise my own conduct and that of others, and I must do both "in Christ."

In the Pastoral Epistles conscience is named six times; in three cases (I Ti 1 5, 19, 3 9) with "faith" or "heart," as if it had begun to define itself before Christian eyes as a fundamental element or faculty of human nature. In Tit 1 15 it can be, along with the "mind," defiled. And in I Ti 4 2 it is said that certain who fall away from the faith are "branded in their own conscience as with a hot iron." This does not mean that they lose the power of making moral distinctions, a quite un-Pauline idea; but that they suffer the intolerable shame of their defection. It is the intense pain of ineradicable guilt which is theirs.

The three passages in I Peter in which "conscience" occurs yield the same meaning as the Pauline. In the first two (2 19, 3 16) the general context is similar. The believer is amid hostile critics and even persecutors. His strength and peace must be found in the possession of "a good conscience" which must be the inner sense of "a good manner of life in Christ" (3 16). The word is used in a startling way, however, when (2 19) the author speaks of the συνείδησις Θεοῦ, which is variously translated. Is it "conscience toward God," or, as Canon Bigg prefers, "consciousness of God"? The phrase was apparently so constructed because the writer saw that there is no consciousness of God, in the Christian sense, without a good conscience toward God. It marks the dawn of the great idea that conscience is the voice of God in us. But here it means that in the sense of uprightness before Him a man already possesses Him. The very difficult passage which almost immediately follows (3 20 f.) repeats the word in a sentence that is grammatically dark. The baptized man is saved 'into God,' as the eight souls into the ark. But this baptism is not concerned with the outward man, "the flesh," but with the inner man. In the baptismal rite "the good conscience" is the matter of inquiry, the decisive fact.

3. Usage in the Epistle to the Hebrews. In four out of the five places where "conscience" is named in the Epistle to the Hebrews the general topic is the subjective effect of the atonement of Christ. Whatever effect the gifts and sacrifices, the blood-shedding, under the old covenant produced, they did not reach the conscience. The worshiper remained in that regard unperfect (9 9); he still had the conscience of sins (10 2) or dead works (9 14). But the blood of Christ does "cleanse conscience from dead works to serve the living God," and men may have their "hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience," so that they can "draw near with a true heart in fulness of faith" (10 22). It is evident that in all these passages the good conscience is regarded as the sense of righteousness before God (cf. 13 18). Our sense of guilt prevents all approach to God; and that is removed only by the blood of Christ. His work of sacrifice has made it possible for men to enter the holy presence of God with bold hearts and confident prayer—that is, with clear consciences. The conscience is that in us on which forgiveness through atonement operates.

4. The Philosophy of Conscience. It is evident that in the N T we have no clearly defined doctrine or theory of conscience, nor even a description of it. Like other Greek words συνείδησις was passing into a new world, to describe great facts which were now more clearly perceived than was possible for prechristian eyes. Some of these may be stated here. (1) The feeling of guilt or of joyous confidence before God, as in Hebrews, is the deepest fact in human religious experience. The work of Christ deals with that, and it is called "conscience." (2) The believer's feeling of personal integrity and sincerity in conduct before God and man, as in Acts, Romans, Corinthians, is traced to the same inner seat of authority. (3) But this feeling is so closely allied with and dependent upon 'knowledge' or intelligent 'faith' (I Co, I Ti) that the conscience is seen to be a moral scrutinizer of all human conduct. (4) As thus conceived conscience is the supreme, the most sacred fact in human nature, to preserve which is essential and to destroy which can only be the doom of the individual. There can be little doubt that N T writers, by their emphasis upon this phase of human nature, by making it so concrete, and by attaching to it the very highest and most solemn significance in relation to the final destiny of man, presented fresh material and a new stimulus to ethical inquiry. It may be added with some confidence that no theory of conscience can hold its own which takes no account of those aspects of it which are set before us in these brief but momentous N T discussions.

CONSECRATE: This term is the correct rendering of the Heb. קָדַשׁ, qādhēsh (and cognate words), signifying 'to be holy,' i.e., 'separate' from that which is common or profane (see HOLY). But there are a number of passages where the Heb. or Gr. terms are not adequately represented by the Eng. word "consecrate." In Mic 4 13, "devote," in Nu 6 7, 9, 12, "separate," "separation," in He 10 20, "dedicate," and in He 7 28, "perfected," all RV, are more correct renderings. In the majority of instances, however, where "consecrate" (and consecration) occur, they render a peculiar Heb. expression meaning literally 'to fill the hand,' or 'filling' with 'hand' understood (cf. Ex 32 29; Jg 17 5, 12 for passages where the force of the literal expression can still be discerned). The expression goes back probably to a remote antiquity when the priests' hands were "filled" with the offerings, etc., from which he derived his income. See PRIESTHOOD, § 2a. E. E. N.

CONSOLATION (παράκλησις): The "consolation of Israel" (Lk 2 25) was an expression derived probably from Is 40 1 (LXX.). The comfort or consolation there predicted was popularly understood in later times as referring to the Messianic age rather than to the return from the Exile. The "consolation of Israel" was consequently the time when the promises of the prophets would be fulfilled and all—especially the lowly—would rejoice in the rule of righteousness and peace. E. E. N.

CONSPIRE, CONSPIRACY: The only instance where the term "conspiracy" calls for comment is Is 8 12, where AV reads confederacy. Here the term qesher refers probably to the coalition of N. Israel and Damascus against Judah which was filling all minds with apprehension (cf. 7 1-2). E. E. N.

CONTROVERSY: The Heb. word רִיב, rībh, often translated "controversy," means 'a case or suit at law' (Dt 17 8; II S 15 2). In the prophets the term is frequently used for Jehovah's 'case' against Israel. Once (Is 34 8) for the 'case' of Zion against Edom. E. E. N.

CONVERSATION: This word is frequently used in the AV to render various terms signifying 'behavior' or 'manner of life.' These or equivalent expressions have, therefore, been substituted in the RV. In Ph 3 20 the Gr. is πολίτευμα, 'citizenship' (q.v.). E. E. N.

CONVERSION, CONVERT: The RV retains "convert" only in Ps 51 13 and Ja 5 19 f. The Hebrew and Greek originals are almost uniformly translated 'to turn.' They are applied to inanimate objects or to the movements of living things (cf. Jos 19 12; II S 23 10; Ru 1 16; Mk 5 30, 8 33; Lk 2 39; Jn 21 20; II P 2 22). They are most significantly applied both in the O T and the N T to that act in which the soul turns from unbelief or sin to God. Paul uses ἐπιστρέφειν indeed of turning away from the true Gospel (Gal 4 9), and there are two other natural uses (Lk 22 32; cf. 17 4; Ja 5 19 f.). But the N T generally uses it, sometimes in close union with 'repentance,' quasi-technically for the great crises when men respond to God's work of redemption in Christ (I Th 1 9 f.), and His call through the preaching of the Gospel (Ac 11 20 f., 26 17-20). COOL: As a noun in Gn 3 8 (Heb. ruaḥ, 'wind,' 'breeze') it is evidently used to indicate the time of day when a breeze is apt to arise as the heat declines to its lowest degree before sunset. It was in the cool of the early evening that the Orientals usually roused themselves from their midday rest. A. C. Z.

CORAL: The rendering, which is not entirely certain, of the Heb. rā'mōth (Job 28 18; Ezk 27 16). In Pr 24 7 the same word is rendered "too high." Coral abounds in the Mediterranean Sea, and the variety thought to be referred to is the red coral. E. E. N.

CORBAN. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 17.

CORD: The only instance of the occurrence of this word in the Bible that calls for special comment is in Job 30 10, where, however, the sense is obscure, and the text uncertain. See Davidson, ad loc., in Camb. Bible. E. E. N.

CORINTH (Κόρινθος): The capital of Corinthia. Its location was incomparable strategically and commercially, as it commanded the sole land route by the natural bridge between the continent and Peloponnesus, and was supplied with deep-water harbors (Lechæum, Cenchreæ) on both sides of the Isthmus (3½ m. wide). Thessalian Minyans settled here c. 1350 B.C. and founded Ἔφυρα (later Κόρινθος) on a plateau at the northern foot of the lofty (1,750 ft.) and impregnable Acro-Corinthus, which served as a stronghold and as the site of the temple of Poseidon (the natural patron-god of a seafaring people). The purple-fish of Greek waters early attracted Phœnicians to Corinth. These brought with them their traditions and gods (especially Astarte-Aphrodite, whose worship was impure (cf. the hierodouli of Cappadocia, q.v.). The Phœnician sun-god Melkarth supplanted Poseidon on Acro-Corinthus, which became sacred to Melkarth (as Helius) conjointly with Astarte (Aphrodite), while the worship of Poseidon was relegated to the Isthmus. They introduced also many manufactures, which made Corinth the center of industrial art at an early period (purple dye, artistic weaving, cloths, rugs, bronze objects, tables, coffers, armor, and pottery). Later, emigrants from Attica became supreme. These probably changed the name to Corinth. They glorified the games in honor of Poseidon at the Isthmus, and opened them to other states.

The Dorian conquest, which occurred under Aletes (c. 1074 B.C.), brought a Dorian element to Corinth. C. was now ruled by Heraclid kings (Bacchiadæ) till 748, when kings were superseded by prytanes chosen annually from 200 Bacchiad families. The Dorian conquest did not make Corinth really Dorian; she detested Dorian exclusiveness and remained luxurious, immoral, and commercial. A new era of prosperity was introduced by Cypselus (of Eolian stock), who expelled the Bacchiadæ and reintroduced the monarchy 657–629 B.C. Under Periander (629–585) and Psammetichus (585–582) triremes were invented, and a series of trading-stations (colonies) were established in the W. and N., and relations with Miletus, Mitylene, Lydia, and Egypt were cultivated. The Cypselids were succeeded by the old Dorian conservative aristocracy, under which Corinth became famous for her wealth, luxury, extravagance, and licentiousness (abounding in hetæræ, and religious prostitutes). Hence the proverb, "I do not advise every man to visit Corinth." Not only Corinth's position between two seas, but the difficulty of circumnavigating Peloponnesus, and the easy transfer of wares and even ships by a wooden railway (δίολκος) across the Isthmus made C. the meeting-place of Occident and Orient, and a commercial and banking center. Being a commercial city, C. was lukewarm in the Persian wars. Later, because of her jealousy of the growing commerce of Athens, C. sided with Sparta, and incited that city to the Peloponnesian War (431), but in 395–387 she joined Athens, Thebes, and Argos in the Corinthian War against Sparta. Philip and Alexander were proclaimed leaders of the Greeks at the Isthmian Games (in 338 and 336). A Macedonian garrison held the Acro-Corinthus (335–243), and though expelled during the existence of the Achean League (243–222) (headed by Aratus) it was later restored (222–199). Corinth and Greece were declared free by Rome at the Games of 196. But it later became the head of a new Achean League, and at the command of the Roman Senate was totally destroyed by Mummius in 146. The inhabitants were slaughtered or enslaved and the statues, pictures, and furniture sent to Rome. The place was uninhabited for 100 years, and the site was cursed and given to Sicyon for the maintenance of the Isthmian Games. Cæsar in 44 B.C. removed the curse and refounded the city as a Roman colony (Colonia Laus Julia Corinthus). The new city was confined to the northern plateau; temples and public buildings were reconstructed. As the political capital of Achaia and residence of the proconsul during the following 100 years C. regained her former magnificence, luxury, and immorality. It is this Græco-Roman city which Pausanias describes, and it was in this city that Paul lived and wrought, and it was this atmosphere that made possible the excesses reproved by him (cf. Ac 18 5-17, 20 2 f.; I and II Co; see also CORINTHIANS, EP. TO). C. maintained its existence until 1858, when it was annihilated by an earthquake. Since 1896 the site has been gradually bought and excavated by the American School at Athens.

In earliest times Corinth patronized literature, but materialism gained the day and consequently Corinth has no place in literature, though she produced many statesmen. In art she is famous for her early school of painting and for the Corinthian order of architecture. The colonics of C. were Syracuse, Solium, Ambracia, Anactorium, Leucas, Corcyra, Epidamnus, Apollonia, and Potidæa. The results of American excavations have been disappointing, as nothing of prime importance has been found.

These letters belong to a group of Paul's Epistles (Corinthians, Galatians, and Romans), whose authorship, apart from certain sporadic attacks, conspicuous by their failure (Evanson, 1792; Bruno Bauer, 1852; Dutch Critical School, 1882), has never been questioned. In fact, this group has been made by such radical critics as the Tübingen School (1845) the standard of Pauline literature, over against which the remainder of the canonical Epistles bearing his name were shown, to their satisfaction, to be pious forgeries.

1. Criticism of the Epistles.

As a consequence, the chief matters of interest in these letters center, not in their authorship, but in the conditions of church life in the Apostolic Age and in the relations to that life borne by the work and the personality of Paul.

It is evident from 16 8 f. that I Corinthians was written from Ephesus shortly before Pentecost. As to what year, it is plain that it could not have been that of Paul's first visit to the city, on his return from his second mission tour (Ac 18 19, 52 A.D.), since the Epistle was written after Apollos had been preaching in Corinth (1 12, 16 12), which was subsequent to this time (Ac 18 24–19 1).

2. Date of I Corinthians.

It must have been some year during the longer stay in Ephesus on his third mission tour (53–56 A.D.)—most likely at the end of the period; since it was after Timothy had been sent to Corinth as the representative of the Apostle (4 17, 16 10) and after the Apostle himself had planned a journey soon to follow to the same place (4 19, 16 5, 7) which from Ac 19 10, 21 f. was after he had been two years engaged in his Ephesian work. The probable date may, therefore, be given as late in the winter or early in the spring of 56.

The situation disclosed by I Corinthians is one of marked unspirituality among the members of the Christian community and of distinct pastoral anxiety for their condition on the part of Paul. The people were returning, in a measure, to their old pagan habit of living, as shown particularly in the party spirit which seemed to possess them all (1 10-21, 3 3 f.), the sensuality which existed unrebuked among them (5 1 f.), the skeptical questionings to which they were giving themselves (15 12, 35), and the general attitude of independency in life and worship (8 9-13, 10 27-33, 11 1-6, 20-22, 12–14) which was threatening their respect and reverence for Paul himself (4 3-19, 5 9-11, 9 1-3).

3. Condition of Corinthian Church.

Indeed before I Corinthians the Apostle had been moved by their lack of sensitiveness to moral conditions to write the people bidding them not to keep company with fornicators (5 9). To this they had replied that the command was impracticable, indicating either an indifferent or a designed misunderstanding of it as involving the general population of the city (5 10)—a misunderstanding which Paul corrects by showing them that his reference was to immoral members of the church (5 11).

4. Early Correspondence.

In this reply they also lay before the Apostle other troublesome problems in their church life, such as marriage and divorce (ch. 7), meat offered to idols (chs. 8 and 10), the exercise of spiritual gifts (chs. 12–14), the collection for the Jerusalem poor (16 1-4), and the possible return to them of Apollos (16 12).

In addition to this, oral information had come to him through members of the household of Chloe concerning the wide prevalence in the community of a partizan spirit (1 11)—not that there existed among them clearly defined parties or distinct religious sects, but that the habit of factionalism gathering around claimed excellencies in certain of their ministers and boasted superiority in certain of their members had generally possessed the church.

5. Oral Information as to Partizan Spirit and Other Matters.

Doubtless through the same informants Paul had learned of the aggravated case of immorality in the community (ch. 5) and possibly also of the litigious spirit among them (ch. 6), as well as of their skeptical attitude of mind toward the fact of a general resurrection of the dead (ch. 15).

It was to rebuke this factionalism in its various forms of manifestation, to denounce this skepticism as to the truth, and to discuss the questions laid before him that I Corinthians was written.

6. Motive and Contents of I Corinthians.

I. The Apostle takes up, first of all, the reported factionalism. After telling them how he had come by the news of it, he visits upon it a plain and outspoken reproof, which extends practically through the first three chapters of the Epistle. He shows them that this spirit is contrary to the divine purpose behind the ministry which he had accomplished among them (1 12-17)—in fact, against the spirit of the Gospel itself and God's calling of them to its privileges (1 18-31), that it was opposed to the principle which had controlled his preaching of this Gospel, not only among them (2 1-5) but in general (2 6-16), that it was against the spirit which had actuated himself and Apollos in their ministry to them (3 1-15) and against the true spirituality of the life implanted in them by God (3 16-23).

II. Such plainness of speech, however, calls for apology, which he gives (4 1-5), stating that the reason for his reproof had been his desire for a humbleness of life in them such as was seen in Apollos and himself (4 6-16), to bring which desire to realization he had sent to them Timothy (4 17-21).

III. With his mind relieved on this first point of difficulty between them, he takes up the reported immorality (ch. 5), accusing them not of being themselves immoral, but of not being sensitive to those of their number who were, and that too although the particular case which had been cited to him as condoned by them was one of infamous nature (5 1 f.). He prescribes the punishment in the case, which apparently involved exposing the offender to the infliction of a miraculous death (cf. case of Ananias and Sapphira, Ac 5 1-11), though with the purpose of the saving of his soul in the day of judgment (5 3-5). He then renews his reproof of their lack of moral judgment, taking occasion to remind them of his commands to them on this matter in his former (unpreserved) letter (5 6-13).

IV. In ch. 6 he comes to their irritating habit of going to law in cases of dispute among themselves. He shows them that such a spirit is out of all harmony with the high dignity of their relationship to the world and the true fellowship of their relations to one another (6 1-11), which leads him to a statement of the principle of Christian liberty, though the especial application he makes of the principle is to the matter of immoral relationships (6 12-20).

V. 1. This application presents to him the first of the specific questions laid before him in the letter from the Church—the question concerning marriage. On this he takes high ground. He holds marriage to be wise and honorable (7 1-7)—a bond not to be loosened even where it involves an unbelieving companion (7 8-17). In general, he holds that existing relationships both in and out of wedlock should best remain as they are, though his personal preference is for the unmarried state (7 18-40).

2. The second question concerns the eating of meats offered to idols, in reply to which he urges the principle of a self-denying regard for others' opinion (ch. 8), as illustrative of which principle he refers to his own action in the matter of receiving support from churches, answering objections to his course (9 1-27), and exhorting against a spirit of self-confidence (10 1-13), and against idolatry (10 14-22). To this he adds a fuller statement of the principles of Christian liberty (10 23–11 1).

3. There then follows a rather prolonged discussion of the complicated question of public worship (11 2–14 40). He considers first the matter of appropriate head apparel in their assemblies (11 2-16), from which he proceeds to the vital situation involved in their conduct of the Lord's Supper, which had grown so disorderly as not only to become a scandal but to bring a deadening influence on their spiritual life (11 17-34). Finally he takes up the confusion which had fallen upon their exercise of spiritual gifts, disclosing the spirit of order and mutual service that should actuate it (ch. 12), while he leads them up to a consideration of love as the greatest gift of all (ch. 13) and shows them the practical worth and value of the gift of speaking with tongues (ch. 14).

4. With ch. 15 he apparently digresses to the orally reported difficulties in the Church, and takes up one of the most important and significant of their troubles—their skeptical attitude of mind toward the resurrection. With great earnestness and apologetic skill he meets the objections raised against the doctrine, showing how it is necessitated by the historical fact of the resurrection of Christ (15 1-19) and by principles involved in Christ's relationship to them (15 20-28) and fundamental to their spiritual life (15 29-58).

5. In ch. 16 he returns to the stated questions from the Church—first that concerning the collection ordered among them for the Jerusalem poor, which was evidently languishing for lack of proper method (16 1-4), and finally, after a discussion of his own and Timothy's plans of travel (16 5-11), that concerning their request for the return of Apollos to them—a request which the Apostle himself had favored, but Apollos for the present had declined (16 12).

This ends the Epistle's message, and a few verses bring it to its conclusion (16 13-24).

The Second Epistle was written after Paul had left Ephesus and had come by way of Troas into Macedonia (2 12 f.). He had been despondent about the Corinthian church before leaving Ephesus and had consequently sent Titus (by the short sea route) to Corinth for a betterment of its affairs. Titus had met him in Macedonia, coming north from Corinth (7 5-7; cf. 2 12 f.). If Paul left Ephesus in the spring or the summer of 56, II Corinthians was written in the summer or the autumn of the same year.

7. Date of II Corinthians.

The situation in Corinth at the time II Corinthians was written is a development of that disclosed by the First Epistle. The moral sensitiveness of the community seems to have improved, but the factionalism appears to have concentrated itself in an actual movement of hostility against Paul (1 15-17, 2 5-10, 10 10 f., 11 5-12, 16, 12 11, 15-18, 13 1 f., 5-7), emanating seemingly from the Christ party (10 7, 11 13, 22 f., 13 3) and in all likelihood possessing the spirit, if not actuated by the claims, of the Judaizers (11 4 f. [cf. Gal 1 6, 2 6-8], 11 13-15 [cf. Gal 1 8 f.], 11 18-20 [cf. Gal 2 4, 4 3, 9, 5 1]).

8. Condition of the Church.

That this development endangered the relationship of Paul to the Corinthian Church of course needs no proof. Its seriousness, however, gives significance to several indications in II Corinthians that the Apostle had been personally involved in the process by which it had come to its strength.

9. Sorrowful Visit.

There are, for example, certain passages which seem to show that the visit to Corinth Paul has in mind when writing is to be his third visit to that city (12 14, 13 1-3), while it has promise of being a second visit of sorrow (2 1, 12 21). The explanation formerly given, by which these passages were referred to the Apostle's third plan to go to them, rather than to his third actual visit, is now generally abandoned, and a visit, unrecorded in Acts, is admitted to have been made from Ephesus after I Corinthians. Its occasion was the development of this personal hostility which Timothy, who had been sent to Corinth in connection with the First Epistle, had apparently been unable to hold in check. Its result was unsuccessful (10 10 f.), and the Apostle returned to Ephesus in great despondency of mind, from which he had not recovered when he left the city (2 12 f., 7 5).

10. Painful Letter.

All this is borne out by certain other passages which seem to hint at another letter sent by the Apostle to Corinth—a letter of "many tears," written out of "much affliction and anguish of heart" (2 4, 7 8-12)—a description that can not suit I Corinthians, which, though a letter of censure and shame, was written rather in a balance between anger and meekness (I Co 4 21) than in the abandonment of grief. Added significance to the foregoing description is afforded by the fact that it is found in the passages which refer to events evidently connected with this unrecorded visit (2 1 f. [3 f.], 5-8 [9], 10 f.) and with Titus' mission in the emergency (7 5-7 [8 f.], 10 f. [12], 13-16).

11. II Corinthians a Composite Epistle.

Apart, however, from all such admissions regarding a special letter of tears, though gaining significant interest through them, there has been a growing conviction among scholars that the peculiar difference in tone and contents of chs. 1–9 from chs. 10–13 points to the composite character of II Corinthians. The cheerful and satisfied character of the earlier chapters discloses a situation in the Church of general loyalty to the Apostle; the dissatisfied and anxious character of the latter chapters betrays one of general disloyalty to him. In fact, when we note the peculiar cross-references between 2 3 and 13 10, 1 23 and 13 2, 2 9, and 10 6, it would seem that the states of feeling on the Apostle's part, which in the later passages are considered as threatening the Corinthians, in the earlier passages are regarded as laid aside and removed—as though between the situation referred to in chs. 10–13 and that referred to in chs. 1–9 there had come a change for the better.

In view of these peculiarities it would appear not only that these last four chapters were written before the first nine, but that they contain at least a portion of the painful letter, written after Paul's return to Ephesus from the unsuccessful visit—a position which gains significance from the fact that in the foregoing cross-references those in the earlier chapters (1 23, 2 3, 9) are all taken from the passages which expressly refer to this visit and the letter connected with it.

This theory is strongly confirmed when the contents of these chapters are considered in the order in which this arrangement places them.

In chs. 8 and 9 Paul is urging upon them the collection for the Judæan saints, citing the generous spirit of the Macedonian churches as a stimulus to their own benevolence and disclosing the spiritual rewards that follow upon a liberal giving. Throughout his appeal he leaves no doubt as to his confidence in what they will do in the matter—the chapter ending with a thanksgiving that suggests the hope he has of them.

In contrast to this, ch. 10 begins abruptly with an assertion of his apostolic authority, over against a state of criticism and open hostility toward him such as is not hinted at in any of the preceding chapters (10 1-11). In proof of the fact of his authority he cites three things: (a) The independence of his ministry (10 12-18), which united with it a jealousy of affection for them (11 1-15)—an affection which was all the more marked in comparison with the selfishness of his opponents' conduct (11 16-21a), which lacked the background of the labors and sufferings that belonged to all his missionary life (11 21b–33); (b) the visions granted him by God (12 1-4), together with the infirmities laid upon him by the same divine hand and the contact with God's strength into which these weaknesses brought him (12 5-10); (c) the manifestation of his apostolic power in the working of miracles among them (12 11-13). This assertion of his challenged authority is then followed by a passage which, for the heaviness of heart and bitterness of spirit that it discloses, is unique among Paul's writings (12 14–13 10). It is burdened with anxious fear for the stability of his relations to them (12 14-21), while it is sharp with threatened action against them at his coming (13 1-10). With this his message closes.

When we turn to the first nine chapters this stress and strain would seem to be all over. The opening chapter, to be sure, takes up a criticism which is being urged against him by the people; but the charge is a mild one, concerning simply his delay in coming to them as he had promised, which seemed to them to be a show of fickleness (1 15-17). This charge he meets in a spirit of abounding confidence in his own sincerity and in their loyalty toward him (1 12-14), showing that his delay had been due to his desire to spare them in giving himself time to recover from his sorrow over their condition and themselves time for a change of their condition, indicating that the case of hostility toward him, which they had furnished, should now be forgiven by them, as it practically had already been by himself (1 18–2 10). Then, after showing how his anxiety to hear from them through Titus had left him no peace of mind on his journey (2 12 f.), he comes, by a short transition (2 14-17), to a review of his ministry among them, confirming their renewed approval of it over against such unfriendly element as still remained in the Church. He shows the fruit of service to be the proof of a true ministry (3 1-11), while he displays before them the plainness and honesty of his preaching (3 12–4 6) and at the same time the hardship of his ministry and the secret of his endurance (4 7–5 10), closing with an assertion of the absence from his mind of all spirit of self-glory (5 11-21) and an exhortation to them to make their lives effective in the service to which they were called (6 1-10). This is evidently the end of his message; for there follows upon this simply the practical warning against fellowship with unbelievers (6 11–7 1—unless 6 14–7 1 be a remnant of his first letter to them, referred to in I Co 5 9 f.), a plea for yet closer fellowship with them, with an acknowledgment of the comfort their loyalty toward him had already produced (7 2-16) and the urging on them of the Jerusalem collection (chs. 8 and 9; see above).

It is seen from this that, while in both sections in our II Corinthians there is a personal element in the motive for the writing, there is between them a marked difference of direction in which this motive proceeds. In chs. 10–13 it is straight toward a determination to meet and master the hostility which had manifested itself against the Apostle since I Corinthians, but in chs. 1–9 it is all toward a desire to lay hold of and safeguard the loyalty which had finally shown itself in the church.

With such an understanding of the contents of these two parts of our Epistle and of the purpose which lay behind them, it would seem that the only arrangement of them possible is that of the theory that chs. 10–13 belong to the painful letter written at Ephesus and chs. 1–9 to the letter which followed it on the journey from Ephesus to Corinth.

There would thus be four letters of Paul to the Corinthians: (1) The initial letter of prohibition, referred to in I Co 5 9 f., and possibly preserved in fragment in II Co 6 14–7 1. (2) The letter in answer to the Corinthian communication and preserved in our I Corinthians. (3) The painful letter, preserved in part in II Co 10–13. (4) The final letter, preserved practically entire in II Co 1–9.

It is a fact that there was a correspondence between Paul and the Corinthian church which had not been preserved that led in the latter half of the 2d cent. to the forging of two apocryphal Corinthian letters—one from the church to Paul and the other a reply of Paul to the church. They formed originally a part of the old Acts of Paul and were admitted by the ancient Syrian and Armenian churches into the N T which they accepted and read.

12. What the Epistles Show of Paul's Work.

When Paul went into Europe on his second mission tour his work was carried on much more among the Gentiles and was consequently different in its character from what it had been previously. The cities of his first tour, though in Asia Minor, were much nearer Syria and, therefore, more likely to have in them a distinctive Jewish element. In fact, Ac 16 1-4 shows us that, while still having this near-by region in mind as his immediate field of labor, Paul felt the Jewish situation must be especially respected in the way his work was done.

In Europe, however, not only was the Jewish element in the communities less in number and in influence (cf. Ac 16 13, 18 12-17), but in view of the agreement reached at the Jerusalem Council (Gal 2 9) the Gentiles were now much more specifically and admittedly the object of Paul's work. The Corinthian Epistles disclose the character of that European work as it developed in a large city center among people uninstructed in religious principles, whose difficulties and shortcomings were not so much in the direction of doctrinal preconceptions as of sheer ignorance of doctrinal truth and crude conceptions of ethical obligation.

In other words, the Corinthian Christians being predominantly gentile, these Epistles show us that, in spite of the Apostle's long residence among them, they still tended toward a liberalism of Christian living, which seriously threatened their moral character, while they retained enough of the partizan spirit of the old Greek paganism to endanger vitally that Christian brotherhood which was the heart of their religion. It is evident, therefore, that the Corinthian stage of Christianity was not so developed in its knowledge and in its disputes as the stage of the more Jewish churches in Galatia—though it was clearly more developed than that of the gentile church in Thessalonica. Consequently whatever Judaizing element may have entered into the opposition which developed against the Apostle between I and II Corinthians, it must have been of a less advanced kind than that which animated the great controversy in Galatia. For though it is clear that another Gospel was being preached among the people (II Co 11 4, 12 f.; cf. Gal 1 6), there is no evidence that the propaganda of circumcision as necessary to salvation was being carried on. If this was the same movement as the Galatian—as would seem generally to be the fact—it was concerning itself rather with the preliminary personal opposition to Paul's apostleship than with the central debate and controversy over doctrinal truth (cf. II Co 10 1-3, 11 5, 12 11; Gal 1 1, 15, 17, 2 6).

CORMORANT. See PALESTINE, § 25.

CORN. See AGRICULTURE, §§ 4–7, and FOOD, § 1.

CORNELIUS, cōr-nī'li-ŭs (Κορνήλιος): A Roman official referred to in Ac 10 as a centurion of the "Italian band" (q.v.) and resident in Cæsarea, either in connection with his troops stationed there or on detached duty from his command, or even possibly retired altogether from active service, his Roman name probably indicating that he himself was an Italian.

At the same time the terms in which he is religiously described (ver. 2, "a devout man and one that feared God," εὐσεβής [differing from "devout," εὐλαβής, of Jews, Ac 2 5, 8 2, 22 12] καὶ φοβούμενος τὸν Θεόν; ver. 22, "a righteous man and one that feareth God," δίκαιος καὶ φοβούμενος τὸν Θεόν) show him to have belonged to those half-way followers of Judaism who, though not circumcized (cf. ver. 28 with 11 3) and consequently not members of the congregation of Israel, had in their feeling after the true God adopted certain Jewish practises (cf. vs. 2, 30), in virtue of which they not only came into good favor with the Jews (cf. ver. 22; also Lk 7 4), but were permitted to take part in the worship of the Synagogue (cf. Ac 13 16, 26, 43, 17 17). He was thus of a class who were neither 'proselytes of the gate,' nor 'proselytes of righteousness'; in fact, from the evident conflate reading, Ac 13 43 (τῶν σεβομένων προσηλύτων), not proselytes at all. Under these circumstances the baptized admission of himself and his household into the Christian brotherhood (ver. 47 f.) was such a breach of the Jewish principles which then ruled in the Church that upon his return to Jerusalem Peter was called to account for his connection with the incident (11 2 f.). His justification of his action on the basis of the visions received by himself and Cornelius and the outpouring upon the convert of the gifts of the Holy Spirit was accepted and the case was doubtless treated as exceptional, its significant relation to the ideal racial unity within the Church not being comprehended.

CORNER-STONE: In Is 28 16 the "precious corner-stone" that J″ is to lay in Zion is the great principle of genuine faith in Him, in contrast to the false confidence exhibited by the prophet's contemporaries. In the N T both of these ideas are subordinated to the application of the passages to Christ as fulfilling them in the widest sense possible (Mk 12 10 and ‖s; Ac 4 12; Eph 2 20; I P 2 6 f.).

Cos belonged to the Dorian Hexapolis and the Athenian Confederacy. It was declared free by Claudius. The island was often devastated by earthquakes. Cos was much favored by Herod. It was the birthplace of Apelles, Hippocrates, Aristo, and Ptolemy Philadelphus. It contained a temple of Asklepios and a medical school and was also a banking center.

1. The Biblical Accounts of Creation.

Besides a number of references in the poetical books (e.g., Job 26, 38; Ps. 24 2, 104), the O T contains two chief accounts of the Creation. (a) Gn 1–2 4a belongs to the Priestly narrative (see Hexateuch), whose regard for system is seen in the arrangement of the entire book under ten generations or 'begettings' (2 4a, 5 1, 11 10, etc.). In the case of "the heavens and the earth," the term "generation" is, of course, employed figuratively; and 2 4a probably stood originally before 1 1—i.e., at the beginning of its section, as in the other occurrences of the expression. The characteristic formal arrangement of the Priestly writer is also seen in the recurrence of stereotyped formulas in Gn 1–2 4a: "And God said," "and it was so," "and God saw that it was good," "and there was evening and there was morning, a day." (b) Gn 2 4b ff. is from the earlier Jehovistic narrative, and differs from 1–2 4a not only in being more simple, concrete, and anthropomorphic, but also in its content. It is concerned almost entirely with the creation of man, and the cosmogonic features are secondary.

Turning now to Gn 1–2 4a, we notice that there are eight creative works, distinguished by characteristic formulas; and of these one falls on each day, excepting the third and sixth days, which have two works each. Again, the six days are divided into two groups of three each, whose relation of preparation and accomplishment will at once be seen from the following summary:

2. Gn 1¹–2 4a.

1. Light.	4. Lights: sun, moon, and stars.
2. The waters divided by the firmament.	5. Living creatures in the waters, and birds that fly in front of (Heb. 'on the face of') the firmament.
3. (a) Dry land separated from the seas. (b) Vegetation.	6. (a) Land animals. (b) Man.
7. Sabbath of Rest.

Without attempting a detailed exegesis of Gn 1–2 4a, the following points should be mentioned for their bearing upon the general subject under discussion: The Hebrew word bārā ('create,' Gn 1 1), while it here denotes the production by Divine power of something fundamentally new, does not necessarily mean 'to create' ex nihilo. An original creation out of nothing is not denied by Gn 1, but the narrative begins no farther back than the picturing of a vast, dark, chaotic, watery mass (cf. II P 3 5), upon the face (i.e., surface) of which the spirit (literally 'breath') of God was brooding as a bird over her nest.[1] The syntax of ver. 1 is obscure; it should be translated probably as follows: 'In the beginning of God's creating the heavens and the earth—now the earth was without form and void and darkness was upon the face of the deep—then God said, Let there be light.' The primeval light is here represented as something in itself, independent of the luminaries (cf. ver. 14 ff.). Furthermore, darkness seems to be thought of as having a distinct existence and abode, and not as the mere absence of light (cf. Gn 1 5, 18 with Job 26 10, 38 19 f.).

It already appears that the conceptions of Gn 1–2 4a are not exactly those of modern astronomy, geology, or paleontology. Other discrepancies might be noted, of which the following are perhaps the most obvious: (1) There is no reason for supposing that the Hebrew word yōm in Gn 1 is used in any but its ordinary sense of a day of twenty-four hours; but even if the writer used this word figuratively, the periods there mentioned could not possibly be identified with the geological ages. (2) The sun and stars are said to have been created after the earth. (3) According to Gn 1 there is light, and evening and morning, before there is a sun. (4) Plant life precedes sunlight. (5) Birds precede all land animals, and vegetation is complete in its highest forms before any animal life appears.

3. Gn 1¹–2 4a and Modern Science.

[1] See Oxford Helps, 'Genesis,' § 5.

Attempts to reconcile these statements with the teachings of modern science have been marked either by a dogmatic denial of scientific truths[1] or by a distortion of the plain meaning of Hebrew and English words. The efforts of the most eminent harmonists[2] are remarkable only for their uniform failure.[3] "Read without prejudice or bias, the narrative of Gn 1 creates an impression at variance with the facts revealed by science: the efforts at reconciliation are but different modes of reading into it a view which it does not express" (the italics are Canon Driver's). The preeminence of the religious conceptions of the narrative will be dealt with later; but we can not, and need not, escape from the conclusion that here, as elsewhere in the Bible, the inspired writer shares the 'scientific' beliefs of his contemporaries.

The Hebrew conception of the universe or world may be briefly stated as follows: The earth is the center of all; apparently a circular disk (cf. Is 40 22) resting upon unseen foundations (Job 38 6; Zec 12 1). The firmament (sky or heaven), like a thin, solid dome (cf. Job 22 14, "vault" [circuit AV]; Pr 8 27, circle [compass AV]; Ps 104 9, "bounds"), restrains the waters above it (Gn 1 6), except when its windows are opened to let down rain (Gn 7 11). The firmament also rests upon mysterious foundations (II S 22 8; Job 26 11). In it are fastened the luminaries (Gn 1 14-17), which move in their fixed courses. Sometimes a plurality of heavens (? seven; cf. II Co 12 2; Eph 4 10) are spoken of (Dt 10 14; Ps 148 4), in the highest of which God dwells (Dt 26 15; II Ch 6 21; Am 9 6, upper chambers, rather than "stories" [i.e., 'successive heights'] of AV). Within the mass of the earth is the dark abode of the departed, called Sheol, Abaddon, Hades, or the Pit (Nu 16 33; Ps 15 11; Is 38 18; cf. Rev 6 8, 9 11). Beneath the earth is the great deep (Is 51 10), whose storehouses and fountains (Gn 7 11) feed the seas.

Such a rapid generalization, however, is apt to give the impression that the O T portrays a very rigid, mechanical universe; and the outlines of the picture need to be softened by a consideration of the following important facts: There is no single connected passage which describes the cosmos as a consistent whole, or even brings together all the fundamental conceptions just mentioned. A very large proportion of the cosmological references are found in formal poetry, and ought not to be interpreted as literal prose; while many others are in highly figurative prophecy or apocalypse. The inspired writers showed no more hesitancy in employing metaphors that were shifting and contradictory than do we in using these very same crystallized figures of speech in our modern poetry and colloquial prose.[4] Along the horizon everything is vague and mysterious; concerning some things all that the Bible tells is that man knows nothing about them; indeed, the whole question of the original creation and present structure of the universe is frequently stated to be beyond the comprehension of the human reason (e.g., Jer 31 37; Is 40; Job 26 14, 36 29, 37 16 f., 38). In other words, the O T does not draw the universe in plan and elevation, but paints it in perspective, seen from man's point of view; the instruments used are not the theodolite and telescope, but the brush and palette of poetic imagery. In the light of such an understanding of the Hebrew cosmology, one class of apologetic problems simply vanishes.

Marduk's Fight with Tiâmat.

The narrative of Gn 1–2 4a has points in common with several ancient cosmogonies;[1] but archeologists are now agreed that its immediate source is to be found in the beliefs concerning the beginning of the universe which were held by the Assyrians and Babylonians.[2] These beliefs have long been known in an incomplete form through Greek-Christian references to the writings of Berossus, a Babylonian priest (c. 300 B.C.); but it was not until 1875 that fragments of a cuneiform account of the Creation were discovered at Nineveh by George Smith. Since then other tablets have been brought to light, until we now have more than enough to indicate the general plan of the Babylonian cosmogony.[3]

4. The Babylonian Creation Epic.

The cuneiform text just mentioned dates from the 7th cent. B.C., but the poem was originally composed probably at least as early as 2000 B.C. This great epic, entitled "When in the Height," from its opening words, consists of 994 lines, divided into seven sections of approximately equal length, each inscribed upon a separate tablet. "The poem embodies the beliefs of the Babylonians and Assyrians concerning the origin of the universe; it describes the coming forth of the gods from chaos, and tells the story of how the forces of disorder, represented by the primeval water-gods, Apsū and Tiâmat, were overthrown by Ea and Marduk respectively, and how Marduk, after completing the triumph of the gods over chaos, proceeded to create the world and man" (King). Its central theme is the glorification of Marduk, the supreme god of Babylon, and the actual account of the creation of the world does not begin till near the end of the Fourth Tablet. The Seventh Tablet gives the fifty titles of Marduk, and ends the poem with a fine hymn of praise. A few lines from the opening and closing are given to illustrate the style of the epic (King's translation):

"WHEN IN THE HEIGHT heaven was not named,
And the earth beneath did not yet bear a name,
And the primeval Apsū, who begat them,
And chaos, Tiâmat, the mother of them both,—
Their waters were mingled together,
And no field was formed, no marsh was to be seen;
When of all the gods none had been called into being,
And none bore a name, and no destinies [were ordained];
Then were created the gods in the midst of [heaven],
Lahmu and Lahamu were called into being [. .].
Ages increased [. .],
Then Ansar and Kisar were created. ,"

EPILOGUE.

'Let them [i.e., the names of Marduk] be held in remembrance, and let the first man proclaim them;
Let the wise and the understanding consider them together!
Let the father repeat them and teach them to his son;
Let them be in the ears of the pastor and the shepherd!
Let a man rejoice in Marduk, the Lord of the gods,
That he may cause his land to be fruitful, and that he himself may have prosperity!" etc.

A study of the entire epic reveals many remarkable parallels between the Hebrew and Babylonian narratives. The general course of the two accounts is the same, and the following specific agreements (among others) are striking: (1) Both narratives begin with a description of primeval chaos. (2) The early creation of light (Gn 1 3) is paralleled in the original form of the Babylonian myth, according to which Marduk was a solar deity. In both accounts there is light before the creation of the luminaries. (3) The deep (t'hōm) of Gn 1 2 shows even a verbal similarity to the Babylonian chaos-monster, Tiâmat; and the occasional personification of the deep as a sullen, couching monster (Dt 33 13; see also SERPENT, DRAGON, RAHAB, LEVIATHAN) is undoubtedly a survival of the Babylonian dragon myth. (4) The creation of a firmament to divide the waters (Gn 1 6) is parallel to the act of Marduk, who used half of the cleft body of Tiâmat for a similar purpose. (5) The Biblical account of the creation of the heavenly bodies (Gn 1 14-19) finds an exceedingly close parallel in the beginning of the Fifth Tablet. (6) In each narrative the culminating act is the creation of man. According to the Babylonian epic, he was made from the blood of Marduk, who spoke thus:

"My blood will I take, and bone will I [fashion],
I will make man, that man may . . .
I will create man who shall inhabit [the earth?],
That the service of the gods may be established, and that [their] shrines [may be built]."

Finally, though it is not mentioned in what has been recovered of the creation epic, the Sabbath (q.v.) (Gn 2 2 f.) was probably of Babylonian origin.[1]

5. Superiority of the Biblical Account.

To the thoughtful and reverent student, however, these resemblances in the framework of the Hebrew and Babylonian cosmogonies will only serve to emphasize the infinite superiority of the content of the Biblical narrative. The Babylonian epic is verbose in language and grotesque in its polytheism; chaos is anterior to deity, and Marduk gains the supremacy only after a fearful struggle. In Gn 1–2 4a the language is simple yet majestic, God is from the beginning supreme, and the processes of creation are but the orderly working out of His unimpeded plan.[2]

The foregoing considerations lead to two conclusions: (1) Historically: there must have been a long period of naturalization in Palestine to allow the Babylonian cosmogony to be so refined and stripped of all its mythological features. The Babylonian creation legends were probably already current in Canaan when the Israelites entered the Promised Land. (2) While Gn 1–2 4a does not attempt to teach scientific facts which we could find out for ourselves, its revelation of transcendent religious truths evidences the guidance of the Holy Spirit. The general outline of the Babylonian epic survived, together with the common Semitic conception of the universe; but the grossness and polytheism of the earlier cosmogony were divinely transmuted into monotheism and spirituality. By a series of representative pictures we are taught that the universe was not self-originated, but dependent for its existence and present form upon the decrees of the one omnipotent God, whose plan penetrated every detail of creation; while man is shown in his ideal state as head and center of creation and the image of his Maker.

To sum up what has been said: The O T writers certainly shared the ideas of their contemporaries concerning the material universe; and, in particular, the outlines of the Biblical cosmogony were derived from the Babylonian beliefs embodied in the creation epic. Therefore it is impossible to 'reconcile' Genesis with modern science. To insist upon such a reconciliation shows a misconception of the character of divine revelation; and has put a stumbling-block in the path of many an earnest, intelligent inquirer after spiritual truth. The methods of Genesis and geology have nothing in common. The Bible is silent concerning the operation of secondary causes which can be investigated by the human reason. While the more speculative minds of Egypt, Babylonia, and Greece put foundation under foundation and creator behind creator in a vain attempt to provide a firm basis for their cosmogony and ontology, the inspired writers disregarded all intermediate processes in order to press home the supreme truth that "God said and it was so"! Thus the human and temporary framework of the creation story is so subordinate to its permanent religious message that no advance in our scientific knowledge weakens our confidence in the great elemental truths concerning God, man, and the universe, which are so simply and inimitably told in this fitting prelude to the history of redemption.

LITERATURE: The best popular presentation is in Driver's Genesis (3d ed., 1905), pp. 19–33 (with a large bibliography). George T. Ladd's Doctrine of Sacred Scripture (1883), part II, ch. ii, is scholarly and exhaustive, yet very readable. See also the works mentioned in the foot-notes to this article.

PRIMITIVE BABYLONIAN REPRESENTATIONS OF THE COSMOS (THE SIGNS OF THE ZODIAC).

The serpent of cuts Nos. 1, 3, 4 probably represents the great dragon Tiâmat, i.e., the primeval watery chaos (the "deep" of Gn 1_2, etc.).

COUNCIL: The chief court of the Jews. Under the Romans a measure of self-government was conceded the Jewish nation, both as a religious community and as a race. The recognized headship of the community was accordingly vested in the council of leaders known in the Jewish writings as Beth-din hag-gādhōl, or by the Greek name Συνέδριον, synedrium, reduced into the Aramaic Sanhedrin (erroneously Sanhedrim). The original of this body lies probably in the Persian period, although it can not be traced clearly farther back than the time of the Greek dominion. In this early stage of its existence, however, it was known only under the name Senate, γερουσία (Ac 5 21; Jos. Ant. XII, 3 3). The name Sanhedrin appears first under Herod.

1. Origin of Council.

The membership of this court was according to the Mishna (Sanh. 1 6) fixed at 71 in imitation of the ancient court of elders (Nu 11 16). Those qualified to be members were in general of the priestly house and especially of the Sadducean nobility. But from the days of Queen Alexandra (69–68 B.C.) onward there were with these chief priests also many Pharisees in it under the name of scribes and elders. These three classes are found combined in Mt 27 41; Mk 11 27, 14 43, 53, 15 1. How such members were appointed is not entirely clear. The aristocratic character of the body and the history of its origin forbid the belief that it was by election. Its nucleus probably consisted of the members of certain ancient families, to which, however, from time to time others were added by the secular rulers.

2. Constitution and Membership.

The presiding officer was the high priest, who at first exercised in it more than the authority of a member, claiming a voice equal to that of the rest of the body. But after the reduction of the high priesthood from a hereditary office to one bestowed by the political ruler according to his pleasure, and the frequent changes in the office introduced by the new system, the high priest naturally lost his prestige. Instead of holding in his hands "the government of the nation," he came to be but one of many to share this power; those who had served as high priest, being still in esteem among their nation and having lost their office not for any reason that could be considered valid by the religious sense of the community, exerted a large influence over the decisions of the assembly. In the NT they are regarded as the rulers (Mt 26 59, 27 41; Ac 4 5, 8; Lk 23 13, 35; Jn 7 26), and Josephus' testimony supports this view.

3. High Priest's Place in It.

The functions of the Sanhedrin were religious and moral, and also political. In the latter capacity they further exercised administrative as well as judicial functions. As a religious tribunal, the Sanhedrin wielded a potent influence over the whole of the Jewish world (Ac 9 2), but as a court of justice, after the division of the country upon the death of Herod, its jurisdiction was limited to Judæa. Here, however, its power was absolute even to the passing of the sentence of death (Jos. Ant. XIV, 9 3, 4; Mt 26 3 f.; Ac 4 5, 6 12, 22 30), although it had no authority to carry the sentence into execution, except as approved and ordered by the representative of the Roman government.

4. Functions.

The law by which the Sanhedrin governed was naturally the Jewish, and in the execution of it this tribunal had a police of its own, and made arrests at its discretion (Mt 26 47). Accordingly, to the extent that the provisions of this law were respected in the trial of Jesus, that trial and execution were legal (but cf. Taylor Innes, The Trial of Jesus, 1899; Rosadi, The Trial of Jesus, 1905). The trial and stoning of Stephen, however (Ac 6 12 ff.), appear to have been too summary and out of harmony with the procedure prescribed by the law, and therefore illegal.

5. The Law It Observed.

Among the administrative duties of the Sanhedrin was the collection of taxes. Under the procurators, the custom had been established throughout the empire of committing the levying of taxes to the local authorities of the subject countries, for the most part to the senates of the towns. In accordance with this practise the Sanhedrin became responsible for the collection in Judæa (Jos. BJ. II, 17 1). In carrying out this provision it sold the revenue to tax-purchasers or speculators (publicans).

6. Taxation.

The foregoing holds true of the period between 6–66 A.D., i.e., the period of the Roman procurators. Before the opening of this period restrictions and restorations of the jurisdictions took place alternately. Gambinius, the proconsul of Syria, for instance (57–55 B.C.), subdivided Judæa into five districts, assigning each to a separate council (συνέδριον, σύνοδος, Jos. Ant. XIV, 5 4; BJ I, 8 5). Thus he limited the jurisdiction of the Jerusalem council very materially. This was, however, done away with by Julius Cæsar in 47 (Ant. XIV, 9 3-5; BJ. I, 10 7), and the Sanhedrin was restored to its former supremacy. With the destruction of Jerusalem the council was abolished.

7. Temporary Limitations of Power.

While the general authority of the Sanhedrin extended over the whole of Judæa, the towns in the country had local councils of their own (συνέδρια, Mt 5 22, 10 17; Mk 13 9; βουλαί, Jos. BJ II, 14 1) for the administration of local affairs. These were constituted of elders (Lk 7 3), at least 7 in number (Jos. Ant. IV, 8 14; BJ. II, 20 5), and in some of the largest towns as many as 23. What the relation of these to the central council in Jerusalem was does not appear clearly. They were probably not inferior courts in a uniform system with the right of appeal from the lower to the higher, but rather independent judicatories with a definite recognized work. And yet their independence did not amount to absolute unrelatedness to one another. Some sort of mutual recognition existed among them; for whenever the judges of the local court could not agree it seems that they were in the habit of referring their cases to the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. IV, 8 14; Mishna, Sanh. 11 2). A. C. Z.

8. Extent of Jurisdiction.

COUNCIL, also COUNSEL: A conference more or less informally held (sōdh, Ps 55 14; Pr 15 22), but not necessarily of those who bore no office or responsibility. The council of leaders in Jerusalem (συμβούλιον, Mt 12 14; Ac 25 12) included probably members of the Sanhedrin, as well as leading laymen. The act of holding such councils (counsels) is called "consulting" (Ps 83 3) and its finding 'counsels' (βουλή, Lk 23 51). A. C. Z.

COUNT: Besides being the usual rendering of mānāh, ṣāphar, ψηφίζειν, and συμψηφίζειν, all meaning in general 'to calculate,' the word renders (1) the Heb. ḥāshabh = Gr. λογίζεσθαι, 'to think' or 'impute' (Gn 15 6; Ro 2 26; Ph 3 13). (2) pāqadh, 'to inspect' (I Ch 21 6). (3) ἔχειν, 'to hold' (Mt 14 5; Phm 17), and (4) ἡγεῖσθαι, 'to account' or 'estimate' (Ph 3 7, 8; He 10 29). A. C. Z.

COUNTENANCE: In most instances this is the rendering of words meaning 'face' or 'appearance.' In Dn 5 6, 9, the original zīw means the 'brightness' or 'color' of the face. In I S 16 12 'eye,' in I S 25 3 'form' is the literal meaning of the Heb. E. E. N.

COUNTRY: In most instances the suitable rendering of terms meaning 'land,' 'field,' or 'place.' The following cases call for remark: In Dt 3 14 the original word means a 'district marked off'; in Mk 6 1, 4 and ‖s; Jn 4 44; He 11 14, it means 'fatherland'; in Lv 16 29, 17 15, 24 22; Nu 15 13; Ezk 47 22, the one Heb. word means 'native'; in Mk 12 1 and ‖s and Mt 25 14, "went into a far country" is simply 'went away from home.' In Jos 17 11, Jer 47 4, and Ac 4 36 RV gives the more correct rendering. E. E. N.

COUNTRYMAN: The translation of γένος, 'race' (II Co 11 26), and of συμφυλέτης, 'of the same tribe' (I Th 2 14). In the first instance Paul is referring to the Jews, in the second to the fellow citizens of the Thessalonian Christians. E. E. N.

COURSE: This term signifies one's way or habit of life (Jer 8 6, 23 10). In Eph 2 2 it renders the Gr. αἰών, 'age.' In Acts 13 25, 20 24; II Ti 4 7 the Gr. is δρόμος, 'running course,' i.e., the task or mission of life. In Ja 3 6 the Gr. τροχός, 'a running thing,' 'a wheel,' refers to one's natural disposition, temperament, tendencies, etc.; in other words, to the entire compass of one's life. Other occurrences need no explanation. (See also COSMOGONY, § 3, and PRIESTHOOD, § 10.) E. E. N.

COUSIN: In AV of Lk 1 36, 58, in the sense of 'kinswoman' or 'relative' (cf. 'cousin' RV); as used to-day, is too definite. In Col 4 10 "cousin," RV, is preferable to "sister's son," AV. E. E. N.

COVENANT (בְּרִית, bᵉrith, Assyr. biritu; cf. Zimmern, Bab. Bussps., 59, 82, from a root bārāh, 'to determine,' Assyr. baru, Gr. διαθήκη, 'disposal'):

1. General Idea. Broadly, a compact or agreement. In this sense covenant is used frequently of contracts among men. Abimelech at Gerar entered into covenant with Abraham (Gn 21 27), and afterward under similar conditions with Isaac (Gn 26 28). Abraham entered into covenant with the Amorites (Gn 14 13), Laban with Jacob (Gn 31 44), Jonathan with David (I S 18 3, 23 18), Solomon with Hiram (I K 5 26), Ahab with Ben-hadad (I K 20 34), etc.

But in Biblical usage, this general conception of covenant developed into a much more specific one.

2. The Biblical Covenant. For (1) as a contract includes a binding element, or creates an obligation, a covenant becomes a bond, imposed by two covenanting parties upon each other, or by one upon himself and the other. Hence in passages such as Gn 15 18 f. the covenant is made by J″ (cf. also Jos 24, by Joshua in behalf of J″; Jos 9 7, Joshua with the Gibeonites; II K 11 4 by Jehoiada, and II K 23 3 by Josiah, in behalf of J″). The part of Abram (or those who may be called the second party in the affair) is passive. It is quite proper to speak of it as voluntary; but the covenant is not in these instances entered into by God and man upon absolutely the same terms. (2) The second limitation of the general idea is introduced with the religious element in it. A covenant is not merely a contract as between men and before men. God is invoked in it as a third party. He has a share in its terms and results. Even when the agreement aims at outward material ends, it is not complete until by a religious service J″ has been brought into the transaction. To this end an oath, curse, or sacrifice is an indispensable ceremonial accompaniment. When Abimelech (Gn 26 26 ff.), acting for himself, Ahuzzah, and Phicol, proposed to Isaac that they should enter into covenant, he used the formula "Let there now be an oath betwixt us, even betwixt us and thee," and "let us make a covenant" (ver. 28). The word used here for "oath" may also be rendered "curse" (cf. also Gn 31 44 ff., the covenant between Laban and Jacob). (3) A third limitation is the creation of a new relation between the covenanting parties. In the later development of the idea and in some extrabiblical expressions of it, this is symbolized by some act or acts denoting the possession of a common life. The partaking of a sacrificial meal, of salt (which is in such cases the substitute of blood), or of blood itself, either poured out in the form of a libation or used in other emblematic ways (W. Robertson Smith, Rel. of Sem., p. 451), was made to serve as the sign of the new and irrevocable relationship, the object of which was mutual benefit and helpfulness. So far as the covenant was concerned, those who entered upon it were bound to regard each other as members of a new organic entity. So sacred and intimate was the new relation that nothing could surpass the enormity of the sin of covenant-breaking. The sin is loathed and denounced by the prophets in unmeasured terms (cf. Hos 6 7, 8 1, 10 4; Is 24 5; Jer 11 10). On the other hand, it is a sure manifestation of God's perfection that He can not and does not forget His covenants, but remains constant to the rights and obligations created by them (cf. Ro 3 1-4).

Accordingly, the covenant of God with His people is an expression of His love for them. It may be called the divine constitution or ordinance, which is designed to govern human relations with Himself. As such it appears in the record of His dealings with Noah (the Noachian covenant, Gn 9 11 ff.). Even the story of Eden has been read by some in the terms of the covenant idea. But it is more particularly the Divine mode of defining the relation with the Chosen People. Abraham was taken into covenant at the very beginning (Gn 15 18) with a symbolical and impressive ceremony. With Moses and the new stage of development in the life of the people, Israel as a nation is pictured as entering into covenant with J″ in an even grander and more impressive transaction (the Sinaitic covenant, Ex 34 10, 27, 28). By a covenant with Phinehas an everlasting priesthood was established (Nu 25 12 f.). Other covenants with the same ruling idea are those with Joshua and Israel (Jos 24 25), David (Ps 89 4, 132 12; Jer 33 21), Jehoiada (II K 11 17), Hezekiah (II Ch 29 10), Josiah (II K 23 3), and Ezra (Ezr 10 3).

3. God's Covenant an Expression of His Grace.

It was charaeteristic of the covenant idea that when entered into it bound not only the individual but his family and posterity, and as a counterpoint the benefits and privileges secured by it were transferred to the offspring of the parties to it. The covenant with Abraham was made with him and with his seed forever (Gn 17 10). Moses was not an individual but a representative of the whole people before J″ The covenant with David was the means of blessing to the whole lineage of the great king (II S 23 5; II Ch 13 5, 21 7; Jer 33 21). The national poetry embodied in glowing terms the conviction that the covenant with David was the ground for the unfailing care on the part of J″ over the royal dynasty as well as over the people ruled by it.

4. Covenant with Collective Bodies.

Israel's experiencces with the covenant led the prophets to despair of its continuance, but its lapse would not be final (Hos 1 9 f., 2 2, 23, 3 3). They predict its renovation and reestablishment under better conditions. In this form they called it the New Covenant differing from the old (1) in spirituality. It should be a covenant written on the hearts of God's people (Jer 31 31), and God's people should be not a tribe or nation but a society of individuals who should know Him and keep His covenant. (2) In universality. Through Israel the new religion of God should extend to other nations and the covenant should embraee these too (Is 49 6). (3) Its results would be forgiveness of sin and a new righteousness (Jer 31 34).

5. The Prophetic New Covenant.

The covenant conception having served its purpose in the O T, it disappears from the N T, yielding to the expression of God's relation to man in the terms of an individual fellowship and indwelling. In the Epistle to the Hebrews, however, it is still made to serve the basis of the difference and contrast between the better order of things introduced through Jesus Christ and the old order either under the Abrahamic or the Sinaitic covenants (7 22, 8 6 ff., etc.). COVERING. See Tabernacle, § 3 b. For usage in Ex 22 27; Job 31 19, ef. Dress and Ornaments, § 3.

COVERT: (1) In I S 25 20 the meaning is that Abigail was concealed from view as she drew near to David and that the meeting between them was sudden. (2) In II K 16 18 RV reads "covered way." The sense of the entire verse is obscure, and what is meant is not known. E. E. N.

COVET, COVETOUSNESS: This term expresses various ideas: (1) Desire to have. As such it is not only innocent, but when its object is worthy, commendable (I Co 12 31, 14 39, "desire" RV). Also, however, (2) desire inordinate and without any ulterior purpose, in which case it is folly (Lk 12 15 ff.) and idolatry (Eph 5 5; Col 3 5). (3) Desire to possess that which belongs to another. Such desire is contrary to the moral law (Ex 20 17, "lust" AV; Ro 7 7). Possibly (4) the effort to secure what one has no right to possess (I Ti 6 10, "to reach after" RV). A. C. Z.

The fact that Titus was sent at the same time to Dalmatia suggests that both journeys may have been undertaken for the purpose of preaching the Gospel in new regions. According to later tradition (see Tillemont, Mem. I, 585) C. was the founder of the Church in Vienne and Mainz. J. M. T.

CRESCENTS. See Dress and Ornaments, § 11.

CRETE (Κρήτη): Modern Candia, a rich and beautiful island, one of the chief seats of the worship of Zeus, whose birthplace was Mt. Ida or Dicte. Long before the Phœnician traders came, and even before the Mycenæan Age, the island had a highly developed civilization, which seems to have been buried by invasions from the N. (For excavations now proceeding at Knossos and elsewhere see Ch. Quar. Rev., Jan., 1906.) "The pottery found in southern Palestine is Cretan, confirming the Hebrew tradition that the Philistines were strangers who wandered in from Crete" (Caphtor [Jer 47 4; Am 9 7]. See Breasted, Hist. of Egypt, p. 512). The island possessed a large number of independent cities, in some of which, notably Gortyna, many Jews were settled before the middle of the 2d cent. B.C. The Romans occupied Crete in 67 B.C., during the great war with the pirates, and under the Empire it was made a senatorial province along with Cyrene. By universal testimony the Cretans were avaricious, fraudulent, and sensual, as their poet Epimenides (600 B.C.), called by Plato a "divine man" and quoted in Tit 1 12, also affirms. Even in the rich coinage of their cities, which were in a state of constant feud among themselves, "there is always present a substratum of barbarism." If the Gospel was first carried there after Pentecost (Ac 2 11), it did not apparently make headway until the visit of Paul and Titus (Tit 1 5). Fair Havens was touched at by Paul on his way to Rome, and Phœnix was a good harbor to the W. (Ac 27 8, 12). R. A. F.

CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS: The fundamental principle of Hebrew penology is strict retribution. The lex talionis, including property as well as the person, is enunciated in all three sections of the Mosaic codes (Ex 21 23-25; Lv 24 17, 19 f.; Dt 19 21). This was an ancient Semitic penal custom, and we find it expressed in the CH [Code of Hammurabi (c. 2250 B.C.)] in phraseology almost identical with Biblical language: son for son, §§ 116, 230, daughter for daughter, § 210, eye for eye, § 196, limb for limb, § 197, tooth for tooth, § 200, life for life, § 229, slave for slave, §§ 219, 231. The punishment of crime had two great purposes: (1) deterring others from similar offenses (Dt 17 13), (2) the extirpation of the evil from Israel (Dt 13 5). In reviewing this subject the historical development of the Hebrews must be kept in mind. In the nomadic state crime was revenged rather than punished, and it was looked upon as an injury done to a tribal brother (see BLOOD, AVENGER OF). When the nation passed into the agricultural and later to the commercial state of society, the object of punishment was to protect life and property. Under the ethical influence of the religion of Jehovah, crime came to be regarded as a violation of the righteousness and holiness of God, and was punished in order to vindicate these Divine attributes. The N T reflects Roman as well as Hebrew ideas in regard to both crimes and punishments.

1. Hebrew Penology.

The more serious infringements of the Law may be grouped into three classes: (a) Injuries to property. Under this group falls theft, which is absolutely prohibited in the Decalogue (Ex 20 15). The CH is more severe than the Biblical codes in its treatment of this evil. In the former, stealing is a capital crime—the receiving, purchasing, and selling of stolen goods, the theft of a child, the detention of a slave, brigandage, looting at a fire, appropriating state levies—all being punishable with death (cf. Ex 22 2; Jos 7 25; Ex 21 16). The owner of a vicious bull was liable for any injury inflicted on the slave of another by the goring of the animal (Ex 21 28 ff.). The CH, §§ 250–252, inflicts a fine for a similar case. The practise of extortion was no doubt common enough in O T times (Ps 109 11, "extortioner" = 'usurer'), but in the N T (Mt 23 25; Lk 19 8) it refers to a form of blackmail levied by the publicans (q.v.).

2. Crimes.

(b) Injuries to person or life. Bribery, also termed a gift, not only might prevent justice, but place the person of the accused in jeopardy. The Biblical codes have the former evil in mind (Ex 23 8; Dt 16 19), while the CH contemplates the latter: "If a man in a case bear witness for gain or money, he shall himself bear the penalty imposed in that case" (§ 4). Lying, forswearing, and bearing false witness also resulted in the miscarriage of justice and were fraught with danger to the accused person. They were prohibited (Ex 20 16; Lv 19 12; cf. Mt 5 33), and the guilty party was to be punished according to the lex talionis. In the CH the false charge of a capital crime makes the accuser liable to the death penalty (§ 1), and the slanderer of a priestess or of a married woman was to be branded on the forehead (§ 127). The breaking of a vow that had been strengthened by an oath was not permissible (Nu 30 2; cf. Lv 5 1-6; Jg 17 2 ff.). The oath of purgation is required in seven instances by the CH (§§ 131, 227 et al.). The O T regards human life as sacred, because it was created in the Divine image (Gn 9 6). Manslaughter is carefully distinguished from murder, the latter being the result of premeditation and malice, the former of accident (Ex 21 13; Dt 19 4). In the case of manslaughter the offender could find an asylum (Nu 35 11, 15; Dt 19 5), but murder was always a capital crime and the penalty could not be commuted by a ransom (Nu 35 31 ff.). Parricide and infanticide are not mentioned in the Mosaic codes, but there are many instances of assassination and suicide in the O T (Jg 3 20 ff.; I S 31 4 ff.). The tribal custom of blood revenge (see BLOOD, AVENGER OF) which is entirely unknown to the CH, prevailed among the Hebrews in the earlier periods of history, but the attempt was made later to regulate it (Dt 24 16; Nu 35 12-34).

(c) Offenses against the moral order and the fundamental laws of the theocracy: Every improper use of the Divine name (Lv 24 11), speech derogatory to the majesty of God (Mt 26 65), and sins with a high hand—i.e., premeditated transgressions of the basal principles of the theocracy (Nu 9 13, 15 30; Ex 31 14)—were regarded as blasphemy; the penalty was death by stoning (Lv 24 16). The Mosaic codes dealt with the improper relation of the sexes in detail. To lie carnally, and fornication are general terms for illicit sexual intercourse (Lv 18 20). The prevalence of prostitution, at a later date in Israel as well as in the Græco-Roman world, was appalling (Pr 4 6-19; Ro 1 26), but it was strictly prohibited (Lv 19 29; Dt 23 17 f.). See also HARLOT. The abominable Canaanitic practise of having temple prostitutes (qedhēshōth) was forbidden (Dt 23 17). The devotee, or sacred prostitute, enjoyed the privileges of special legislation in the CH (§§ 110, 178, 181, 182). The Mosaic codes, however, debarred a son of harlotry or of fornication from the congregation (Dt 23 2). Adultery is a capital crime in the CH (§ 129). Incest in its various forms is prohibited in Lv 18 6-18. The CH, §§ 154–158, deals severely with this crime, in one case—a man with his son's wife—drowning being the penalty, in another—a man with his mother—death at the stake. Sodomy, common enough among the Canaanites, is looked upon as an abomination and absolutely prohibited (Lv 18 22; Dt 23 17).

3. Punishments.

The purpose of punishment has been noted above. Torture and barbarous methods of inflicting penalties—e.g., blinding, maiming, tearing out the tongue, and suffocating, which were common in antiquity—are foreign to the spirit of the O T. Torture was first introduced by the Herods. (a) Capital punishment was administered in various ways. Stoning was the ordinary method of inflicting the death penalty among the Hebrews (Ex 19 13 ff.; Lv 20 27, 24 10-23; Dt 13 5, 10, 21 21; Ac 7 59). The stoning took place outside of the camp and in the name of the congregation (Lv 24 14), the witnesses casting the first stones. Beheading was not known as a judicial penalty in the Mosaic codes, and when death by the sword is mentioned in the O T we are to think of thrusting rather than decapitation. The latter was first introduced among the Jews in the Roman period (Mt 14 10 ff.). The hanging of the living was introduced by the Romans; the Hebrews sometimes impaled or hung the lifeless body on a tree (Dt 21 23 ff.; Gal 3 13), the exposure of the body being intended as an added indignity. The Heb. yāqa' (translated "hang") is uncertain in meaning (Nu 25 4; II S 21 6). Gallows are mentioned as a Persian institution in the story of Haman (Est 2 23, 7 9). According to the CH, § 153, a woman who murders her husband is to be impaled. The Babylonian code imposes burning as a penalty for incest (§ 157; cf. Lv 20 14, 21 9), for theft at a fire (§ 25), and upon a priestess for entering or conducting a wine-shop (§ 110). The oft-recurring phrase cut off is not a designation for the death penalty, but signifies excommunication (Ex 12 15, 19; Lv 7 20 ff., 23 29; Nu 9 13). Crucifixion was a terrible method of punishment adopted by the Romans from the Orient, and used by them only on slaves and the vilest criminals (Cicero: extremum summumque supplicium). Roman citizens were always exempt. The shape of the cross upon which our Savior suffered was probably †, the crux immissa or Latin cross (T—crux commissa). The upright was 7½ ft. to 9 ft. high and remained permanently in the ground; the crosspiece (patibulum) was carried by the criminal. A piece of wood (sedile) was used as a saddle to support the sufferer. The crime was either proclaimed by a crier or inscribed on a board (titulus; see SUPERSCRIPTION) which was nailed to the cross. In the history of the passion of Jesus, we have a detailed account of the procedure at a crucifixion. (See CROSS, I.)

(b) Physical punishments other than capital: From its frequent mention in the O T (Ex 21 20; Pr 10 13, 17 26, 26 3; Jer 20 2, 37 15; Is 50 6), we infer that beating was a very common punishment among the Hebrews. According to Dt 25 3 the penalty was inflicted before the judge, with the culprit in a recumbent position. The phrase "cause him to lie down" (Dt 25 2) suggests the bastinado. The humane spirit of the Deuteronomic legislation mitigated the severity of this penalty by restricting the number of strokes to forty. The words chasten and chastise sometimes refer to corporal punishment (Dt 22 18; I K 12 14). The scorpion is mentioned as a terrible instrument of castigation; it consisted probably of thongs armed with pieces of lead (I K 12 14; II Ch 10 14). In the N T the terms stripe and scourge have a twofold signification. In some passages the writer had in mind the Jewish form of punishment which was administered with a whip of three lashes (II Cor 11 24; cf. Jos. Ant. IV, 8 21). Again the reference may be to the Roman custom of beating slaves and criminals (Ac 16 22, 22 25; II Co 11 25). At Philippi Paul alludes to the Porcian law, which exempted Roman citizens from this penalty (Ac 16 37). This is not to be confused with the scourging of Jesus, which was flagellation with thongs. The branding of slaves was a common custom (Is 44 5; CH, §§ 226, 227), and, according to Babylonian law, the slanderer of a woman was to be branded on the forehead (§ 127). Imprisonment is a penalty unknown to both the CH and the Mosaic codes, but it is mentioned toward the close of the monarchy (Jer 32 2, 37 16), and implied in the mention of prison garb (II K 25 29), and use of chains, fetters, and stocks (II S 3 34; Jer 20 2, 29 26; Ac 16 24). The so-called law of jealousy was really an ordeal for a woman suspected of adultery (Nu 5 11-31). In the CH the ordeal by water was employed as a test for a sorcerer and a suspected wife (§§ 2, 132).

(c) Penalties in means or money: Fines in our modern sense were unknown, but the injured party received an indemnity for loss or injury from the guilty person. Three instances are given in the O T (Ex 21 32; Dt 22 19, 29), while the CH punishes twenty-one offenses in this way. The restoration of things lost, stolen, or injured is a fundamental principle in the Mosaic codes, and is quite prominent in the CH, which contains forty-eight enactments exacting restitution in some form. The restitution of a stolen ox must be fivefold, of a sheep fourfold (Ex 22 1; cf. Lk 19 8); in the CH, § 112, goods lost by carrier in transportation must be restored fivefold. For other O T instances see Ex 22 1-9; Lv 6 4 f., 24 21. A Roman jailer or guard allowing a prisoner to escape made himself liable to the penalty imposed on the criminal (Ac 12 19, 16 27). The CH, in fifteen enactments, punishes with forfeiture, which is twice mentioned in the O T (Dt 22 9; Ezr 10 8). Confiscation was not practised by the Hebrews, but is referred to as a Persian custom (Ezr 7 26).

CROOK-BACKED. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (5).

CROSS (σταυρός, probably a 'stake' or 'pole,' radically cognate with ἵ-στη-μι): The N T word for the instrument on which Jesus was put to death.

I. Physical: The early usage of the term σταυρός corresponded to its primary meaning (cf. Odyssey, 14 11, 'poles for fencing'; Xen. Anab. V, 2 21, 'stakes for fortification'; Hdt. 5 6, 'foundation piles'). As a means of execution it was first used in its form of a stake (crux simplex) for impaling the victim—the custom being practised by the Assyrians, Persians, Phœnicians (Carthaginians), and Egyptians, and passing from the Persians and Carthaginians to the Greeks and Romans. This form was later elaborated into the crux compacta, of which there were, in the times of Christ, two varieties—the crux commissa ('St. Anthony's cross') shaped like a T, and the crux immissa (the 'Latin cross') shaped, as we generally know it, like a †. The 'St. Andrew's cross' (crux decussata), shaped like an X, was of much later origin and of a usage much disputed. The cross used at Jesus' death was almost certainly the crux immissa, not only because this is the testimony of the oldest tradition, but because it is impossible otherwise to understand the setting "up over his head" of His "accusation" (Mt 27 37; cf. also ‖s).

The upright (staticulum) was of some strong wood and, after implanting in the ground, did not stand more than 9 ft. high. This was left permanently erected outside the walls of the city, only the crossbar (patibulum) being carried by the criminal to the place of execution, where it was affixed, with him fastened on it, to the upright. On this upright there was placed a short piece of wood (sedile or cornu) on which the body rested as on a saddle. Whether there was also a support for the feet (suppedaneum lignum; cf. Greg. of Tours, De Glor. Martyr, vi) is still in question.

II. Religious: The infamy of such a punishment, together with the primary significance of Jesus' death in His redemptive work, quickly brought the crucifixion into prominence in the thought and preaching of the Apostolic Church (cf. Peter's early references to it, Ac 2 23, 36, 4 10). The Cross thus became not only in its suffering and shame a mark of the self-sacrificing love of Jesus (Ph 2 8; He 12 2), but also in its infamous indignity an assertive symbol of the disciples' faith, in which they gloried (Gal 5 14), for which they were willing to be persecuted (Gal 6 12; cf. He 13 13), to which those of unchristian living were counted enemies (Ph 3 18; cf. He 6 6), and in which, because of its infamous character as a penalty, the unbelieving were scandalized (Gal 5 11) and found nothing but ridicule and contempt (I Co 1 18) —as in fact the disciples themselves were confused and mystified by Jesus' references to His coming death before they realized its necessity (Mk 8 31 f. and ‖s). From this it easily grew to be the term in which Christian work was most strikingly presented in its triumph over the condemnation of the Law (Col 2 14) and its consequent reconciliation of sinners to God (Col 1 20) and to each other (Eph 2 16). In fact, with Paul it came to stand as the sympathetic term for the Gospel of God in Jesus Christ, the proclaiming of which was his consecrated life-work (I Co 1 17; cf. ver. 23, 2 2; Gal 3 1; also vs. 10-13); as a consequence his union with Christ through faith was summed up in his claim to have been crucified with Christ (Gal 2 20) and in this experience to be crucified to the world (Gal 6 14; Ro 6 6; cf. Gal 5 24).

Though Jesus' allusion to the manner of His coming death was unintelligible to the Jews (Jn 12 32 ff.), His warning to His disciples of the necessary cross-bearing which their following of Him would involve (Mk 8 34 and ‖s; Mt 10 38; Lk 14 27) was perfectly clear, in view of the crucifixions inflicted by Antiochus Epiphanes, Alexander Jannæus, Varus, and Titus. There is therefore no anachronism in the statement; while to Jesus Himself it was part of His prophetic consciousness of His death. See CRUCIFIXION.

CROSSWAY. See WAY.

CROW. See TIME, § 1.

CROWN: An ornamental head-dress symbolic of unusual honor or prerogative. Crown, diadem, and fillet are used in the Bible without very strict regard to different shades of meaning. In general, the first of these terms takes the most conspicuous place among them. It is applied (1) in a literal sense: (a) to the round border or edge of objects like the ark or the altar (Ex 25 11, 30 3, zēr, "rim or molding" RVmg.) and (b) to the headgear of persons distinguished from the ordinary as kings and queens (nēzer, II K 11 12; kether, Est 1 11, etc.; 'ăṭārāh, II S 12 30; διάδημα, AV Rev 19 12; στέφανος, Mt 27 29, etc.); also to the emblem of priestly office worn upon the miter (Ex 29 6; cf. also Zec 6 11. Wellhausen and Nowack, however, think Zerubbabel and not Joshua must be meant). Brides and bridegrooms also wore crowns as they do at the present day in Asia Minor (Ezk 16 12; Is 61 10, "garland," RV, but cf. mg.). Victors in athletic contests were crowned (I Co 9 25; cf. PRIZE). (2) Metaphorically, "crown" is the head as that member of the body on which the literal crown is worn (qodhqōdh, Job 2 7) and also any cause of justifiable pride (Pr 12 4, 16 31, 17 6; Is 28 5; Ph 4 1; Ja 1 12).

1. Linguistic Usage.

The Egyptian and Assyrian kings wore crowns of definite shape, the former combining the two emblematic head-dresses of the upper and the lower country, and the latter using a truncated cone with a low projecting point on its summit. That the Hebrews had something of a similar nature distinguishing their kings is probable, but no data have survived as to its form. The material of crowns was generally some precious metal (Zec 6 9-15). The date of the introduction of crowns is fixed by Nowack (Hebr. Arch., 1894, I, p. 307) as the reign of Solomon. But if so, II S 1 10 must be regarded as due to a later working over of the narrative.

CRUCIFIXION. See JESUS CHRIST, § 16.

CRUCIFY: 1. As a mode of punishment see CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (a). 2. The term is used figuratively by Paul (Gal 2 20, 5 24, 6 14) to denote his own moral unity with Christ's death as a death unto sin, and by the author of He (6 6) to show the terrible nature of the sin of apostasy. (See CROSS, II.) E. E. N.

CRUSE: The rendering of three different Heb. terms: (1) baqbūq (I K 14 3) means a small earthenware flask. (2) tsᵉlōḥīth (II K 2 20), an earthenware dish. (3) tsappaḥath (I S 26 11 ff.; I K 17 12 ff., 19 6), a bottle-shaped vessel, probably of metal, used on journeys for carrying drinking-water, or for oil, etc. In the N T, RV substitutes "cruse" for AV "box" in Mt 26 7; Mk 14 3; Lk 7 37. A small jar or flask of alabaster is meant. E. E. N.

CRYSTAL. See GLASS.

CUB (כּוּב, kūbh, Chub AV): Probably a mistake in the Heb. text of Ezk 30 5 for Lud (so LXX.), i.e., Lydia. E. E. N.

CUBIT. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

CUCKOO, CUCKOW See PALESTINE, § 25.

CUCUMBER. See FOOD, § 3, and PALESTINE, § 23.

CUMI. See TALITHA-CUMI.

CUMMIN. See PALESTINE, § 23, and FOOD, § 4.

CUN (כֻּן, kūn, Chun AV): An Aramean city belonging to Hadadezer, taken by David (I Ch 18 8). In the ‖ II S 8 8 Berothai is given as the name of the city. The identification is uncertain, but Kuma (Cummæ), between Laodicea and Heliopolis, may be the place. E. E. N.

CUNNING: The various words rendering "cunning" in the AV all have the general meaning 'skilful' or 'able to plan and execute' and are accordingly rendered usually in the RV by "skilful." In Is 3 3 the Heb. means 'wise' ("expert" RV). In Dn 1 4 RV renders yōdhē, 'knowing,' by "endued with." In Job 5 13 the Heb. niphtālīm has in it the idea of fraud or deceit ("cunning" RV, "froward" AV). E. E. N.

CUPBEARER (literally 'drink-giver'; in Gn 40 1–41 9 translated butler; cf. "butlership," Gn 40 21): On account of frequent intrigues and attempts at poisoning, the office of cupbearer to an Oriental monarch was one of considerable responsibility and honor. The loyalty of the persons who served the king's wine had to be above suspicion, and they often, like Nehemiah, enjoyed the esteem and confidence of their royal masters. The O T mentions the cupbearers of Pharaoh (Gn 40 1), Solomon (I K 10 5 = II Ch 9 4), and Artaxerxes (Neh 1 11). L. G. L.

CUPS: The exact form and size of some of the vessels called "cups" in EV are uncertain. The ordinary drinking-cup was the kōs (Gn 40 11; II S 12 3) or ποτήριον (Mt 10 42; Mk 14 23). The qaswāh (I Ch 28 17; Nu 4 7) seems to have been a jug (cf. Ex 25 29 "flagons"). The gābhīa' in Benjamin's sack (Gn 44 2) was probably a large goblet (cf. Jer 35 5 "bowls"). The 'aggān (Is 22 24) and ṣaph (Zec 12 2) are both elsewhere translated "basin" (q.v.). L. G. L.

CURE. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 7 f.

CURIOUS: To devise "curious" ("skilful" RV) works (Ex 35 32) means to plan works requiring thought. In Ps 139 15 "curiously" means 'woven together'; the "lowest parts of the earth" being the womb. For Curious Arts see MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 9. E. E. N.

CURSE: In the Bible "curse" means in general an expressed wish or prayer for evil, i.e., an imprecation. It may be pronounced with reference to all sorts of beings, such as the day (Job 3 8). When its object is God it is tantamount to blasphemy (bārak [in Piel] Job 1 5, 11, 2 5, 9, AV ["renounce" RV]). More frequently, however, it is a prayer addressed to God for some evil toward another person or thing. As such it may be as vague as a mere oath or invocation of the Divine name, and is properly translated by the English oath (Jg 17 2; Is 65 15 ["oath" RVmg.]).

1. In General.

More specifically a curse is an act of dedication. Anything (primarily objects taken in war) may be devoted to God. Such an act carried with it the prohibition of appropriating things thus devoted to private uses (ḥerem Lv 27 28, etc.). According to a primitive Semitic custom, the inhabitants and goods of a city or territory in time of war were vowed to God as the Lord of Battles and when conquered devoted to Him, each according to its nature. Men and animals were slaughtered in sacrifice (Dt 20 12-14; Jos 6 25 ff.). But virgins and children were redeemed (Nu 31 7 ff.; Dt 21 11 ff.). Things capable of being burned were consigned to the flames (Dt 7 25), and incombustible objects such as metals were taken into the Temple (Jos 6 24). Whoever violated the law of the curse ("devoted thing") was himself made a curse (cf. Achan, Jos 6 18, 7 1 ff.).

2. Devoted Thing.

From the destruction which followed the curse in the narrower sense the accursed thing (Jos 6 17, 7 12) was viewed simply as that which was consigned to destruction. The Canaanites were thus put under the ban of extermination (Jos 2 10, 6 17, "devoted," RVmg.). The conception in this form is transferred to the N T as anathema (Gal 1 8 f.; Ro 9 3). When Christ is said to have become a curse (Gal 3 13) it is because according to the Law (Dt 21 23) the mode of death which He suffered rendered its subject accursed (devoted his body to destruction). "Curse" and "accursed" seem to be used here as exact synonyms. A. C. Z.

3. Destruction of the Accursed.

CURTAIN: The curtain was a much more necessary and familiar piece of household furniture in Oriental life than elsewhere, especially in the transition from the tent of the nomad to the house of a more settled condition of society. Accordingly it is of frequent occurrence in poetic composition as the symbol of that which either hides or adorns. Of the latter use Is 40 22; Ps 104 2, and of the former Jer 4 20, 10 20, are illustrations. See also TABERNACLE, § 3. A. C. Z.

CUSH, cŭsh (כּוּשׁ, kūsh): I. 1. A descendant of Noah, the eldest son of Ham (Gn 10 6, etc.; I Ch 1 8). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 10. 2. The name of a Benjamite (Ps 7, title) supposed to be the enemy (of David) referred to in the Psalm. A. C. Z.

II. The name of a country. Until recently it was thought that all the occurrences of this word in the Heb. O T (except possibly in Gn 2 13) referred to the same country, viz., Ethiopia, consequently it is often so translated (e.g., Is 11 11, 18 1, etc.). But recent researches (especially by Winckler; cf. KAT.[3] p. 144 ff.) have made it probable that two districts were known both to the Assyrians and to the Hebrews under the same name, "Cush." One of them was Ethiopia (q.v.). The other was in the W. and S. of Arabia, not always exactly defined. Winckler considers that the Arabian Cush is meant in the following passages: Gn 2 13, 10 6 ff.; Nu 12 1; II S 18 21; II Ch 14 8 ff., 21 16; Is 20 3, 43 3, 45 14; Hab 3 7; Ps 87 4. E. E. N.

CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM, cū″shan-rish″a-thê′im (כּוּשַׁן רִשְׁעָתָיִם, kūshan rish'āthayīm): King of Mesopotamia, Aram-Naharaim (AVmg. and RVmg.), who oppressed the children of Israel for 8 years when a rebellion under Othniel, the son of Kenaz and younger brother of Caleb, of the tribe of Judah, put an end to his rule (Jg 3 8-10). It has been questioned whether there is a foundation in tradition for the story as thus given. The reasons for this doubt are (1) the improbability of the subjugation of Canaan at this time by an enemy from such a distance, and (2) the equal improbability that Othniel, a Kenizzite clan in the extreme S., should be the liberator (cf. Moore on Judges, in Int. Crit. Com. 1895). But the improbability of an Aramean conquest of Canaan is not conceded in view of the inactivity of Assyria just before the reign of Tiglath-pileser I (1120 B.C.). (Cf. McCurdy, HP and M. I, p. 230.) As to the Kenizzite clan of Othniel, it is not certain that it was so insignificant. If there be no corroboration from without of the substantial correctness of the story, there is, on the other hand, nothing to compel its being set aside as untrustworthy. But see JUDGES. A. C. Z.

CUSHI (כּוּשִׁי, kūshī): 1. "The Cushite" is the designation of the woman whom Moses married (Nu 12 1); also of the messenger sent by Joab to report to David the death of Absalom (II S 18 21). Probably both persons were of Ethiopian origin (see CUSH, II). 2. The great-grandfather of Jehudi (Jer 36 14). 3. The father of Zephaniah (Zeph 1 1). A. C. Z.

CUSHION: This term does not occur in the AV. It has been introduced into the RV (Mk 4 38) as the rendering of προσκεφάλαιον, 'a rest for the head.' A. C. Z.

CUTH, CUTHAH, cŭth, cūthā (כּוּת, kūth; כּוּתָה, kūthāh): A place whence the Assyrians deported colonists to plant them in Samaria (II K 17 24, 30). The same place is mentioned on the Assyr. inscriptions as Kutū. It was near Babylon and was the chief center of the worship of Nergal, a god of war, hunting, pestilence, and of the realm of the dead. (Cf. KAT.[3] p. 412 ff.) E. E. N.

CYPRUS (Κύπρος, 'copper'): An island of 3,584 sq. m., 45 m. from the coast of Asia Minor and 60 m. from that of Syria. A very fertile plain running E. and W. is bounded on the N. and S. by two mountain ranges in which there were formerly rich copper-mines that gave the island its name. There was also a valuable export of timber, which, together with other productions, made a large trade. In the O T its inhabitants were called Kittim (Gn 10 4; Is 23 1, 12; Ezk 27 6) from Kitti (Kition = modern Larnaka) on the S. coast. In very early days there were Mycenæan settlements on the island, but afterward the Phœnicians took possession, though side by side with them Greeks were found, who, isolated by the Persian rule, organized themselves, in dependence upon Egypt, in autonomous cities according to Greek polity (Mommsen), their coinage being very well known. Paphos, at the W. end of the island, was the home of the wide-spread cult of the Phœnician Astarte, the Greek Aphrodite. After the time of Alexander the Great, Cyprus became one of the most valuable possessions of Egypt. Taken by Rome in 58 B.C. it first came under imperial administration, but was transferred a few years later to the control of the Senate (see PROVINCE) and was in the time of Paul governed by the proconsul Sergius Paulus (Ac 13 7, 12), whose name has been with probability identified on an inscription. Jews had settled in Cyprus in early times and were there in large numbers at the beginning of the Christian era; in the reign of Trajan they massacred thousands of the native Cypriotes and were thereafter forbidden to live on the island. Soon after the persecution that arose on the death of Stephen, Christianity secured a foothold in Cyprus. This island was the first place visited by Saul and Barnabas, a native of Cyprus (Ac 4 36), on their first missionary journey. They landed at Salamis on the E., the largest city of the island, and traversed its entire length to Paphos, the capital, about 100 m. to the W (Ac 13 4-12). Later, Barnabas, with Mark, returned to the island, evidently to carry on the work already begun (Ac 15 39). It was men of Cyprus and Cyrene who first preached the Gospel to Greeks in Antioch (Ac 11 19 f.), and the early disciple Mnason, with whom Paul lodged in Jerusalem, was a Cypriote (Ac 21 16). Nothing further is known regarding the history of Christianity in Cyprus in the Apostolic Age. But see HEBREWS, EP TO, § 6. R. A. F.

CYRENE, sai-rî'nî (Κυρήνη): The rich and powerful capital city of Cyrenaica (North Africa). It was founded 631 B.C. by people from the island of Thera under Battus. C. was situated on a lofty hill 10 m. from the sea and was a center of Greek learning and culture. It was the birthplace of Aristippus, Carneades, and Callimachus. Its kings took part in the games of Greece (cf. the Charioteer of the group at Delphi). While C. fought successfully against the Libyans and Egyptians, it was worsted by Carthage and became tributary to Cambyses 524 B.C. The Cyrenaic Pentapolis under the protectorate of the Ptolemies was founded in 321 B.C. Under the Ptolemies C. became the home of large numbers of Jews (cf. Ac 6 9). It became an independent kingdom in 117. It was bequeathed to Rome in 96 and with Crete was made a Roman province in 67 B.C. Its ruins are vast in extent, but hostile natives prevent excavations. Simon of Cyrene was not a negro, but a Jew of Cyrene (Lk 23 26, AV "Cyrenian").

CYRENIUS, sai-rî'ni-us. See QUIRINIUS.

CYRUS, sai'rus (כּוֹרֶשׁ, kōresh), the Latinized form of Gr. Κῦρος, for the old Persian Kurush: The founder of the Persian Empire and the greatest of the kings of W. Asia. He was hereditary prince of Anshan or S. Elam, a dependency of Media at the time of his birth, c. 590 B.C. He was, however, of the Persian royal race, a great-grandson of Achæmenes the founder of the line, Anshan having first come under the control of the petty Persian rulers and then with them under the suzerainty of the Median kings. In 550 he threw off the yoke of Media, the troops of whose king Astyages came over to him without giving battle. He thus became ruler of the great Median Empire, which reached westward to the river Halys. In 546 he took Sardis, the capital of Crœsus, the king of Lydia, and thereby secured the sovereignty of Asia Minor, including its Greek colonies. In 539 war arose between him and Nabonidus, the last native king of Babylonia. After a campaign of two weeks the city of Babylon surrendered to the Persians without resistance. All the lowlands of W. Asia were thus added to his possessions, including Syria and Palestine to the border of Egypt, Babylon being made one of his capitals. He died in 529, probably on some eastern journey or expedition, for his later years were devoted to the organization of his own Iranian peoples. His tomb remains at the oldest Persian capital, Pasargedæ (modern Murghab; see Jackson, Persia Past and Present, 1906, p. 278 ff.).

Cyrus has a twofold importance in the Bible, being an imposing figure in both prophecy and history. In the former he presents himself to the great prophet of the close of the Exile as the servant and friend of Jehovah Himself, under whose protection and guidance he should destroy the power of Israel's oppressors, restore the captives to their own land, and rebuild the Temple in Jerusalem (Is 41 2 f., 44 28–45 6). In the latter he, in the first year of his reign, actually gives the exiles permission to return, also encouragement and support in their migration (Ezr 1 1 ff.). The fact that the glowing anticipations of the seer were not fulfilled under Cyrus himself does not diminish his significance as a grand prophetic ideal any more than the collapse of his empire under his unworthy son and successor detracts from his greatness as a statesman and consummate ruler of men.

Babylonian inscriptions of Nabonidus and of Cyrus himself materially supplement and correct the traditions and legends of the classical writers. These inscriptions state also that Cyrus, after the capture of Babylon, restored many exiled peoples to their homes.

Augustus made it a Roman province. It now belongs to Austria. It is mentioned once by Paul (II Ti 4 10), but nothing is known of the nature of Titus' mission thither.

view of the fact that a respectable woman of Athens would not have been present in such a public gathering. Her association with Dionysius may be intended to imply that she was a woman of rank.

DAMASCUS, da-mas'cus (דַּמֶּשֶׂק, dammeseq, but also darmeseq, I Ch 18 5, II Ch 28 5, and dummeseq, II K 16 10.

1. Name and Location. In the Egyptian lists of the 16th cent. called timasqu and of the 13th cent. ti-ramaski [W. Max Müller, Asien u. Eur., 1893, pp. 162, 234]. Assyrian, dimaski. Etymology obscure): A well-known city located in the NW. end of a fertile plain which the rivers Abana (the modern Barada) and Pharpar convert into a beautiful garden spot. The whole plain is exceptionally rich in natural features, and must from the first have offered attractions to travelers between the Mediterranean seaboard and the Mesopotamian valley as a convenient place for rest, and also to the merchants as a suitable site for a center of distribution. It is no wonder that a populous and prosperous town grew up at this point, almost as early as the country on either side was fairly settled.

Plan of Modern City of Damascus.

The origin of the city is not traceable to any definite date or agency, although the belief prevailed among the later Jews that it was founded by Uz, grandson of Shem (Jos. Ant. I, 6 4).

2. Early History. It is mentioned as existing in the days of Abraham (Gn 14 15). Eliezer, Abraham's steward (Gn 15 2), is called a Damascene. It is very probable that between the 15th cent. B.C. and the 13th Damascus was a subject of warfare between the Egyptians and the Hittites; but it was about the year 1200 that the Syrians (Arameans) secured possession of it and made it the capital of their kingdom. In the days of David the city as well as the kingdom of which it was the capital was made subject to Israel (II S 8 5). But this relationship could not have lasted very long, for soon afterward (c. 950) Rezon (Hezion), son of Eljada, established a strong dynastic rule at Damascus (I K 11 23-25), which lasted until the complete collapse of Syria under the irresistible blows of the Assyrian power in 732.

Rezon was succeeded by Tabrimmon (I K 15 18), of whom, however, nothing more is known than that he was the father of Ben-hadad I (c. 900). Ben-hadad helped Asa against Baasha and later made war against and defeated Omri of Israel (I K 20 34). Ben-hadad II (870–844, Hadadezer in the inscriptions of Shalmanezer II) came into conflict with Ahab and was by him defeated at the battle of Aphek and compelled to yield the king of Israel the right to "make streets" (i.e., bazaars) for himself in D. Shortly after this, Ben-hadad put himself at the head of a confederacy including Israel and other neighboring states, which was designed to stem the growing power of Assyria in Western Asia. But in this plan the confederacy completely failed, being defeated at the decisive battle of Karkar (854). These reverses undoubtedly rendered Ben-hadad unpopular in his own realm. He was finally slain by Hazael, who assumed his place on the throne (II K 8 15).

3. Later History. Under Hazael (844–813) the prestige of Damascus revived in spite of two defeats sustained at the hands of Shalmanezer II (843 and 840). In his wars with Jehu, this king succeeded in wresting from Israel the territory E. of the Jordan and S. as far as the river Arnon (II K 10 32 f.; Am 1 3) and threatened Judah into paying him a large tribute (II K 12 17 f.). Hazael's son and successor (Ben-hadad III, or Mari, 812–770) was obliged to abandon the war against Israel and defend himself against Assyria. In the twenty years between 773 and 753, Damascus suffered five separate attacks, all of which resulted in the exhaustion of its resources. The immediate successor of Mari is not certainly known. The names of Tabeel and Tabrimmon II both occur (770–740). It was under Rezon (740–732) that Damascus finally succumbed to the attacks of Tiglath-pileser III. Its beautiful territory was devastated, its people taken into captivity, and its king put to death (Schrader, COT. I, 252).

4. Damascus from 732 Onward. For the next five centuries Damascus was simply the residence of Assyrian, Babylonian, or Persian governors. Biblical allusions to it are scarce and doubtful (Jer 49 23-27; Ezk 47 16 ff., 48 1). In the Greek period it even ceased to be the capital of Syria and was supplanted in that capacity by Antioch, though the Seleucids kept possession of it throughout. In 85 B.C. it was captured by the Nabatæan king, Aretas (Jos. Ant. XIII, 15 2), and in 65 acknowledged the sovereignty of Rome. When the Apostle Paul fled from it, it was under command of an ethnarch. In N T times, there were evidently many Jews in Damascus (Ac 9 2; II Co 11 32; Jos. BJ. II, 20 2, VII, 8 7). That one of its streets which has acquired fame as the "street which is called straight" (Ac 9 11) was probably flanked by pillars. The houses of Judas and Ananias (Ac 9 10 f.) and the window in the wall through which Paul was let down (II Co 11 33; Ac 9 25) are still shown in the modern city, which has been under Mohammedan rule since 624 A.D. DAN (דָּן, dān), 'judge': I. A son of Jacob and Bilhah, Rachel's maid, and the ancestor of one of the tribes of Israel. See TRIBES, §§ 2 and 4. II. A city in the extreme N. of Israel's territory, once called Laish (Jg 18 29, "Leshem" by mistake in Jos 19 47), but changed to Dan after its capture by a large section of the tribe of Dan that emigrated thence in the early days of the occupation of Canaan by Israel (Jg 17 f.). The exact site is a matter of dispute, opinions being divided between Tell el-Ḳādi, a mound from which flow two of the streams that unite to form the Nahr Leddan, or "Little Jordan," and Banias, the ancient Paneas, also called Cæsarea Philippi. See Map IV, E 4, F 4. The fact that the Arabic Ḳādi is the equivalent of the Hebrew dān is strongly in favor of the site of Tell el-Ḳādi, and with this agree express statements in Jos. Ant. I, 10 1, V, 3 1, VIII, 8 4; BJ. IV, 1 1 and in the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome perfectly which locate Dan at the source of the 'lesser' Jordan and about 4 m. from Paneas. For the argument for the site of Paneas see G. A. Smith, HGHL. p. 472 f. Dan was counted the northern limit of Israel's territory, "from Dan to Beersheba," meaning the whole extent of Israel N. to S. (I S 3 20, etc.). At Dan was one of the most ancient sanctuaries in Israel, over which Jonathan, a grandson of Moses, was said to have first presided (Jg 18 30). As situated near a large spring (the mound being that of an extinct volcano), it was probably always considered a sacred spot. Here, at a later time, was placed one of the two golden calves made by Jeroboam I (I K 12 29). E. E. N.

DAN, DANITE. See TRIBES, § 4.

DANCE: Throughout the O T period down to the Greek era, the dancing in vogue among the Hebrews was predominantly a religious exercise. In very ancient times it was customary for worshipers to engage in a joyous religious procession around the sacred tree or other sacred symbol. (See accompanying cuts.) The common word for dance, nāḥōl (from ḥōl, 'to move in a circle,' 'to twist') refers to such circular rhythmic movement (Ex 15 20, 32 19; Jg 11 34, 21 21; I S 21 11, 29 5). This dancing was generally accompanied by music and song. It was engaged in by men, or more often women, or both together (cf. Ps 68 25), frequently in two antiphonal companies (cf. Song 6 13 RVmg.). Other words for dancing as kārar, 'to turn' (II S 6 14, 16), rāqadh, 'to leap' (I Ch 15 29; Job 21 11; cf. Is 13 21), and pāzaz, 'to spring,' reveal the fact that the motion was violent rather than graceful. The verb ḥāgag (I S 30 16, from which ḥāg, the ordinary word for a religious "feast" [cf. Ex 5 1], is derived) is evidence for the original religious character of dancing. During the Greek period the Jews became acquainted with professional dancing women, and sometimes did not hesitate to imitate them (cf. Mt 14 6). But the dances most loved by the people retained their primitive character of pure and joyous simplicity. Social dancing, as practised to-day in the Occident, was unknown to the Hebrews.

DANIEL (דָּנִיֵּאל, dāniyyēl), 'God is my judge': 1. Son of David and Abigail, the Carmelitess (I Ch 3 1). 2. Son of Ithamar, one of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Ezr 8 2; Neh 10 6). 3. A sage whose reputation entitled him to be classed with Noah and Job (Ezk 14 14, 20). In addition to his exemplary piety, he had also acquired a great name for his exceptional wisdom (Ezk 28 3). There is no valid reason for distrusting the traditional identification of this Daniel with the Daniel of the book bearing that name. Neither is there any evidence of the existence of another Daniel at an earlier date. Outside the book, however, the three references in Ezekiel are the only ones made to him until a very much later time (I Mac 2 59 f.; Mt 24 15 [Mt 13 14]; Jos. Ant. X, 2 7). But the name of Daniel became the rallying-point of apocryphal and pseudepigraphical writings (Bel and the Dragon; History of Susannah; Prayer of Azariah; Song of the Three Children; cf. also Fabric., Cod. V T., i, 1124).

This book consists of two parts easily distinguishable. The first part (chs. 1–6) is narrative in form and has for its theme Daniel as a sage and interpreter of dreams; the subject of the second (chs. 7–12) is a series of visions seen by him. The narrative element in it is at a minimum.

1. Content. Part I.

The book opens with a portraiture of Daniel and the three young Jewish nobles, who because of ceremonial scruples refused at Babylon to eat the king's food and were prospered for their fidelity to the national law (ch. 1). This incident is followed by an account of Daniel's successful interpretation of Nebuchadrezzar's dream of the composite image (ch. 2). Next comes the story of the refusal of Daniel and his three associates to worship the image set up by the king and their subjection to the ordeal of the fiery furnace (ch. 3). Daniel is then pictured as interpreting the king's dream of a tree (ch. 4). He also plainly explains the meaning of the handwriting on the wall at Belshazzar's banquet (ch. 5), and is promoted by Darius the Mede, but on account of envy is subjected to the ordeal of the lion's den (ch. 6).

The second part of the book contains an account of four great visions seen by Daniel. The first is an apocalyptic representation of the four great world powers (Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Persian, and Macedonian or Greco-Syrian) in the form of four beasts, followed by the establishment of the "people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom" (ch. 7). The second vision is also an apocalyptic representation, but of the Macedonian power with its fourfold development. Here Alexander the Great appears in the form of a he-goat who overcame the ram (the Persian Empire). From one of the four divisions of the Greek Empire a king arises who proceeds to desecrate the sanctuary (ch. 8). The third vision is given in answer to a prayer of penitence and is cast in the form of a Divine communication through the angel Gabriel, which concerns the Messianic Kingdom to come in 70 weeks (ch. 9). The fourth vision is given by direct angelic visitation assuring Daniel of God's love for His faithful people and detailing the course of events under the tyrannical and sacrilegious king of the N., Antiochus Epiphanes (c. 175–165 B.C., chs. 10–12).

2. Part II.

One striking feature of the book is its bilingual character. The portion of it which is included between 2 4 and 7 28 is in Aramaic, all the rest in Hebrew. To account for this fact, it has been assumed (by Meinhold, Kom. z. B. Dn, in Strack-Zöckler, pp. 261, 262) that Dn is drawn from sources of which the first, an Aramaic document of c. 300 B.C., furnishes the basis of chs. 1–6, and the second, a Hebrew work of the Maccabean Age, makes up chs. 7–12. But as ch. 1, outside of these natural divisions, is in Hebrew and ch. 7 in Aramaic, Preiswerk (Der Sprachwechsel im B. Dn, 1903, pp. 88, 112) alleges that ch. 1 has been translated from Aramaic into Hebrew and ch. 7 from Hebrew into Aramaic. But aside from the support which such an allegation is intended to furnish to the theory of two underlying documents, there is no evidence for it. Moreover, why should the translation of Hebrew and Aramaic respectively stop precisely where it does? Another attempted explanation of the facts is in the theory that the speech of the Chaldean magicians in 2 4 is given in their own language. But as the conversation with the Chaldeans is so brief, the continuation of the narrative in the Aramaic dialect is on this theory unaccounted for. As against these grounds a more satisfying explanation may be found in a comparative use of the two languages at the time of the composition of the book. If this be fixed in a period when Hebrew was being largely supplanted by Aramaic in popular usage, the author may be imagined as resorting to the more intelligible dialect in portraying affairs in Babylonia and turning to the less familiar Hebrew when desirous of limiting the circle of those who could understand his meaning; i.e., in the more purely apocalyptic sections of his book. As this dealt with current affairs, the risk of incurring the displeasure of the Syrian authorities would be thus lessened. At the same time the encouragement and confidence in a speedy relief would be imparted to the narrower circle of the faithful.

3. Language.

Strictly speaking Dn is anonymous. In this it differs from Is, Jer, and Ezk. So far as it contains any traces of the date of its origin and its authorship, the proper use of these data will depend upon a correct conception of its literary form. If this proves to be that of a purely historical prophetical book, these facts can only be read as a claim on the part of the book that it was written in the Exilic period and by the illustrious sage (prophet) who is its chief character. Upon this understanding of it the prophet Daniel would bear the same relation to the book which Ezekiel does to the book bearing his name, etc. But if Dn be an apocalypse, written according to the current methods of composition governing the writing of apocalyptic productions, it is plain that the author lays no claim to giving precise history or accurate minute prediction, but, wishing to convey a message of hope, and to infuse fortitude under trial into the hearts of a persecuted generation, he transfers himself back to the time of a great God-fearing man, and through his figure conveys his message. In so doing he embodies such knowledge as he possesses of the age and environment of his hero. In no case, however, does he, on this supposition, aim to produce the impression that his work is that of the sage himself.

4. Date and Authorship; the Rival Views.

Of these two alternatives, the first prevailed in ancient times, as may be gathered from the treatment of Porphyry's attack on the genuineness of the book and the defense by Christian writers (Jerome.

Præf. in Dan.). In modern times the criticism of Dn begins with doubts regarding the authorship of chs. 1–7 (Spinoza, Newton), which were followed by the view that the Aramaic section (2 4–7 28) was an interpolation (J. D. Michaelis), and were finally supplanted by the theory that the whole book is the work of a Jewish patriot of the time of Antiochus Epiphanes (Corrodi, 1783, followed by Eichhorn, etc.). The argument for the Exilic date of the book is chiefly based on the alleged traditional acceptance of it as such from the earliest days. It is, however, also supported by such features of it as come into view in the effort to defend this traditional theory against attacks from the critical view-points. The weakness of the argument is that the tradition, when traced to its earliest date, becomes quite uncertain. The Baba-Bathra (146) ascribes the writing of Dn not to Daniel but, along with that of some other books, to "the men of the great synagogue." The first portion of the book, at least, bears out the assertion that Daniel is rather the hero and subject of it than the author. Of the latest advocates of this position the ablest are C. H. H. Wright, Daniel and His Prophecies (1906); Kennedy, Daniel from the Christian Point of View (1898).

5. The Exilic Date.

The Maccabean date of Dn is supported by considerations both external and internal. Of the former (1) the place of the book in the Hebrew canon between Esther and Ezra in the group of Hagiographa, and not with the prophets, shows that it was composed after the second group of the canon (the Nebhi'īm) had been closed. The effort to break the force of this fact by pointing to the Psalter, which is also put among the Hagiographa, although completed before the second division of the canon had been closed, is unavailing, because from the nature of the case the Book of Psalms could not have been put either in the first division (Pentateuch) or in the second (Prophets). A better analogy is furnished by the Book of Jonah, which, though in every respect exactly like Dn, found a place among the prophets simply because it was composed before the collection of the Nebhi'īm had been completed. (2) The silence of Ben Sira regarding the prophet indicates that Daniel was not prominently before the mind of the faithful Hebrew, as would have been the case had such an account of him as Dn presents been published (Sir 49). According to Ben Sira no man has arisen like Joseph since Joseph's day, but as Koenig points out (Einl., p. 386) Daniel is such a perfect analogue to Joseph, especially in the matter of rising to a first place in a foreign realm because of the successful interpretation of dreams, that the failure to recognize him is unaccountable upon the Exilic dating of the book. (3) The total absence of any trace of the influence of Dn upon subsequent affairs is also a fact not accounted for by the theory of its Exilic date.

6. The Maccabean Date: External Evidence.

The internal grounds for the Maccabean date may be grouped as (1) those which are drawn from the nature of the historical details included in the book. These show that to the author the conditions of the Exile were not the familiar environment of his own day but an atmosphere and surrounding into which he had mentally transferred himself. On the other hand, the history of the Maccabean Age as reflected in the book is minute and accurate (cf. Farrar on Dn in Expositor's Bible, pp. 38–62). (2) The fact that the author touches upon the conditions of the Exile, passes over the entire period between Cyrus and Alexander, and, glancing at that conqueror as a landmark, proceeds at once into a minute description of events during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes is accounted for best by the Maccabean dating of the book. The historical conditions of the Exile were necessary as the literary framework for his great hero. The intermediate period was irrelevant and therefore omitted. The details of the Maccabean Age were introduced because they were of all-absorbing interest. Upon the theory of an Exilic date such a selection of historical material is unexplainable.

7. Internal Evidence: Historical Aspects.

The linguistic aspects of Dn point to the Maccabean Age. The language of the Hebrew section affiliates it with that of Esther and Chronicles, the latest books of the O T (Driver, LOT[6], p. 504 ff.). Its Aramaic is not the Babylonian but the Palestinian variety of that language (cf. Koenig, Einl., p. 387; Driver, op. cit., p. 502). Certain Persian words (about 10 to 15) fix the earliest limit for the composition of the book as c. 500 B.C., while the Greek terms for musical instruments used in 3 4 f. point to a date subsequent to 331 B.C. The explanation sometimes offered for the intrusion of these words in a book of the 6th cent. B.C. which assumes that they might be stray names introduced through occasional intercourse between Babylonia and the Greeks of Asia Minor is inadequate, inasmuch as two of them at least belong to a much later age. Sūmpōnyāh ("dulcimer," συμφωνία) is first found in Plato, and psantērīn ("psaltery," ψαλτήριον) by its change of l into n betrays the influence of the Macedonian dialect and must therefore be later than the conquest of Alexander.

8. Internal Evidence: Linguistic Aspects.

The type of religious thought which prevails in the book confirms the conclusion pointed to by the considerations already adduced. The theology of the book is akin to that of the Books of the Maccabees and quite different from that of the Exilic productions or even from that of the writings of Haggai, Zechariah, Ezra, and Nehemiah.

9. Internal Evidence: Type of Religious Thought.

If Dn was not intended to be taken as the work of the man whose name it bears but as an apocalypse in which the prophet's figure was used as the vehicle of a Divine message to the persecuted generation of Jews who lived in the middle of the 2d cent., there can be no question of its authenticity. For the question of authenticity can arise only when facts are discovered that point to a conclusion contradicting the claim of authorship made by a book for itself. As a book cast into the apocalyptic form, Dn could not but be put, in accordance with the legitimate literary principles governing such forms, into the mold in which it is found. Even such a statement as 12 4 belongs to the literary framework, and does not constitute a claim of Danielic authorship.

11. Canonicity. Whether Dn deserves a place in the canon of Scripture does not depend either upon the personality of the author or the species of literature he may have chosen for his message, but upon the recognition of the book by the spiritual consciousness of God's people as containing a real message of permanent value. This recognition was accorded to the book in the days of Jesus and by Jesus Himself. It has been concurred in by almost the unanimous body of believers. No investigation of a literary historical character can shake its place in the rule of faith.

12. Interpretation. Much of the difficulty experienced with the meaning of Dn is lost when it is recognized as a product of the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. Ch. 11 especially, with its four world kingdoms, is wonderfully cleared when viewed from this standpoint. The third of these kingdoms is explicitly named as the Persian (11 2); the fourth to follow is evidently the Greek (Macedonian). Of this the Syrian (Seleucid) kingdom is considered the northern branch. The same fourfold division of history appears in the earlier part of the book (cf. ch. 2, the image of Nebuchadrezzar's dream) and in both cases the fourfold world-power is succeeded by the kingdom of the Messiah, specifically represented in 7 9 ff. as the reign of the Son of Man.

DANIEL, APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS TO: In the Greek text of the Book of Daniel are found the following additions: (1) The Prayer of Azariah and the Thanksgiving of the Three Children in the Fiery Furnace. (2) The History of Susannah. (3) The Story of Bel and the Dragon. The first of these has a much closer relation to the Book of Daniel than the other two.

1. The Song of the Three Children. This is an apocryphal addition of 67 verses to the Book of Daniel inserted after 3 23. The title does not fully express all the contents of the section, for it contains also the Prayer of Azariah (1-22), and a brief narrative (23-27) of the heating of the furnace, and of the coming of the Angel of the Lord to the rescue. Codex B has the headings "The Prayer of Azariah" and "The Hymn of the Three." It has been often noted that the prayer, which is really as if a nation was speaking, confessing its past sins and seeking mercy, is singularly inappropriate to the circumstances. So too the Hymn is quite as unlikely in such a situation. It is more like a litany, and seems to be modeled after Ps 136. Both are unauthentic amplifications of the story in the canonical Dn, that are meant to fill out the account of the miraculous deliverance of the three Hebrews by giving the prayer which one of them offered, beseeching God for deliverance, and the hymn of praise which they sang when they saw that this prayer was answered. It is entirely unknown who composed them. Their date also is unknown. They have been preserved for us in the Greek Bible and in the versions made from it. It has been much discussed whether the original of this section was Hebrew or Greek. The question is not easy of settlement, since every extant version is based on the LXX. As yet there is no unanimity in the matter.

2. The History of Susannah. This apocryphal addition to the Book of Daniel is entitled in some MSS. "The Judgment of Daniel." In Greek MSS. and in the Old Latin version it is placed before Dn ch. 1; in the Vulgate it stands at the end as Dn ch. 13. The Greek text is extant in two recensions, the LXX. and that of Theodotion, which differ from each other in some details. There are several Syriac versions of the book. The story is as follows: Susannah, the wife of a wealthy Babylonian Jew, was accustomed to walk daily in her garden. Two elders, who had been recently appointed judges, becoming enamored of her beauty, concealed themselves one day in the garden and when Susannah was taking her bath suddenly appeared and made shameless proposals to her. Her outcry discovered them, and to save themselves they publicly accused Susannah of adultery with a young man whom they had found in the garden. The innocent woman was condemned to death, but was saved by Daniel, who by sharp cross-questioning exposed the falsity of the elders and secured their punishment.

This narrative can not be regarded as historical. It is full of improbabilities. Ball (Speaker's Bible, Apoc. II: 325) following Brühl finds the origin and motive of the Susannah story in a tradition of two elders of the time of the Captivity, who by promising women that they would become the mothers of great prophets led them astray, and he suggests that in the time of Ben Shetach (100 B.C.) we can find reasons for the presentation of the story in the form in which it here appears with the trial attached. If this theory be correct, several important teachings are exemplified in the story. Julius Africanus was the first to dispute its canonicity. It is still regarded by the Roman Catholic Church as canonical.

3. Bel and the Dragon. These are two distinct stories which have been added to the Book of Daniel in the Greek and other versions. They both have as their aim, along with the glorification of Daniel, the exhibition of the emptiness and deception of idolatry. In the story of Bel, Cyrus the Persian king discovers that Daniel does not worship the Babylonian idol Bel, and calls him to account for his conduct. Daniel denies that Bel is a living god, and offers to prove it. The test is to be made in reference to the daily offerings of meat and drink which Bel was supposed to consume. If it should be found that these were made away with by other means than by the god himself, then Daniel was to be honored. Upon the floor of the temple Daniel had spread a thin coating of fine ashes and after the food had been deposited before the god, the king himself shut and sealed the door. The next morning when the door was opened the food was gone, but the marks of human feet were upon the pavement. This led to the discovery of a secret door, through which the priests with their wives and children had entered the room. The proof was irrefutable, the false priests were slain, and Daniel was honored.

In the Story of the Dragon the same question was at issue as to whether it was a living god. Daniel denied it and offered to slay him. The king gave him permission to try, and Daniel making lumps "of pitch, and fat, and hair" gave them to the dragon to eat, whereupon he burst asunder. Babylon was indignant at the death of their god and compelling the king to give up Daniel cast him into the lions' den, where he was miraculously kept unharmed. The king's wonder at this led him to honor the prophet and to acknowledge the prophet's God.

Neither of these stories, of course, is authentic, but each is framed from material taken from current legends and ideas. The dragon myth had wide circulation. As in the case of the History of Susannah, the two Greek recensions, that of the LXX. and that of Theodotion, differ in details. The original language of these stories has generally been considered to be Greek. Gaster's discovery of an Aramaic text of the Story of the Dragon in the Chronicles of Jerahmeel gives strong support to the few who have stood for an Aramaic original and has started again the question of Aramaic originals for them both, but as yet a clear decision is not possible.

The Roman and Greek Churches accept these stories as canonical; the Protestant Church holds them to be apocryphal. J. S. R.

DANJAAN, dan"jê'an (דָּנָה יַעַן, dānāh ya'an) (II S 24 6): The text here seems to be corrupt. The LXX. is unintelligible, but indicates that 'Dan' occurred twice. Some would amend: "And from Dan they went round to Sidon." Others would read "and to Ijon" for "Jaan." E. E. N.

DANNAH, dan'ā (דַּנָּה, dannāh): A city in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15 49). Map II, D 2. E. E. N.

DARDA, dār'da (דַּרְדַּע, darda'): A person famous for his wisdom (I K 4 31). He is called a son of Mahol, but in I Ch 2 6, where the same set of names occurs, he is called Dara and counted as a son of Zerah, son of Judah. Mahol may have been the name of a family of the clan of Zerah, a subdivision of the tribe of Judah. E. E. N.

DARIC. A Persian coin. See MONEY, § 8.

DARIUS, da-rai'us (דָּרְיָוֶשׁ, dāryāwesh): 1. D. Hystaspes, King of Persia (521–485 B.C.), the restorer of the empire of Cyrus, who followed the policy of the founder in his treatment of the subject states, and acted generously toward the Jewish settlement in Palestine which had been made under Cyrus. He commanded by a special decree, in his second year, that all those who had hindered the rebuilding of the Temple of Jerusalem should cease their obstruction, and that money and material for sacrifices should be granted from the revenue of the province (Ezr 6 6-12; cf. Hag. 1 1, 15, 2 10; Zech 1 1, 7). "Darius the Persian," whose reign is mentioned in Neh 12 22 as the date of registration of certain priests, was probably also the great Darius. 2. "Darius the Mede" is named in Dn 5 31 as succeeding Belshazzar, at the age of sixty-two, on the throne of Babylon. In 9 1 he is said, in addition, to have been "the son of Ahasuerus of the seed of the Medes" (cf. 11 1). Both of these alleged personages are unhistorical; and, judging from the character of the other references to matters of history in the Book of Daniel, it is perhaps not necessary to assume that the author, writing nearly four centuries after the fall of Babylon, had any definite individuals in mind. Fortunately, the cuneiform inscriptions have given us the history of the Babylonian succession after the fall of the native dynasty. The last Chaldean ruler was Nabonidus, not Belshazzar, who was the crown prince. After the surrender of Babylon, and the formal entry of Cyrus three months later, his son Cambyses, as it would appear, was made king, but only for less than a year; thereafter Cyrus himself assuming the title and function. It is barely possible that some tradition of Gobryas, the Median general of Cyrus who occupied the city till his sovereign came to take possession, may have lain at the foundation of the references in Daniel. But this hypothesis would at best be only another illustration of the author's notion of the relative unimportance of the minute details of history. J. F. McC.

DARKNESS: In figurative language darkness often appears as the symbol of mystery (Ps 139 12; I Co 4 5), of ignorance (Is 42 7; Ps 82 5), and oftener of moral evil or sin (Is 5 20; Mt 4 16; Jn 3 19). Cases of physical darkness are alluded to in connection with the creation, the plagues in Egypt, the crucifixion of Jesus (Mt 27 45), and the last day (cf. ESCHATOLOGY, § 39). A. C. Z.

DARKON, dār'kon (דַּרְקוֹן, darqōn): The ancestral head of a subdivision of "Solomon's servants" in post-exilic days (Ezr 2 56; Neh 7 58). E. E. N.

DAVID

ANALYSIS OF CONTENTS

1. Name
2. Sources for the History of David
3. David's Life
4. Estimate of David's Reign and Work

The name David (דָּוִיד, דָּוִד, dāwīdh) is probably related to דּוֹד, dōdh, 'beloved one.' Some take it to mean 'paternal uncle' (cf. Gray, Heb. Pr. Names, p. 83). Others refer it to Dodo, the name of a deity.

1. Name.

In the Biblical material relating to David later and earlier narratives have been fused together in the accounts in the Books of Samuel and in I K 1-2. The account in I Chronicles is based for its main facts on the earlier account in Samuel and Kings. While the Chronicler may have had access in a few instances to other ancient sources of information, most of the remarkable differences between his narrative and that in the earlier books must be laid to his unhistorical imagination. He projected back into David's time the fully developed liturgical and other arrangements of the Temple service in his own day. Compare, e.g., the account of the bringing of the Ark to Jerusalem in I Ch 15 with the earlier account in II S 6, and the difference in point of view will at once be apparent. See CHRONICLES.

2. Sources for the History of David.

We are thus practically limited to the accounts in I and II S and I K 1–2 for our knowledge of David. This material will be found, on examination, to consist of excerpts from older and originally independent narratives in addition to editorial notes of various kinds. See SAMUEL, BOOKS OF.

David is introduced, for example, in I S 16. The account in 16 1-13 is a natural sequence to ch. 15. But at 16 14 a new strand of narrative appears. Saul is persuaded to send for David, already famous as "skilful in playing, a mighty man of valor, and a man of war," etc., as one who by his playing on the harp might soothe the troubled spirit of the king. David comes to Saul, who likes him, makes him his armor-bearer and provides for his permanent stay at court. The sequence to this narrative is certainly to be found in such a passage as 18 6 ff. (note that in ver. 6 the correct reading is "Philistines" [plural] and the reference originally may not have been to the Goliath story). But instead of this we have next the account of David and Goliath, ch. 17–18 5, in which David is introduced, as if for the first time (cf. vs. 12-16, in which ver. 15 is evidently a harmonizing insertion). Here David is very young (vs. 14, 33), knows practically nothing about war (33 ff.), is unknown to Saul (33 ff., 55 ff.), and his place at court is due to his great deed of valor in slaying Goliath (18 1-5). Similarly the statement in 20 2 is irreconcilable with that in 19 1 ff., and the account in ch. 24 is practically a duplicate of that in ch. 26. Such clear indications of different strands of narrative will be found, on close examination, to be supported by so many others that little difficulty is experienced in making out separate accounts of David's early career.

(1) One of these (which we will call A), the one beginning (so far as David is concerned) with 16 14, is a sober, straightforward narrative, a fine example of Hebrew prose, in which the facts are left largely to speak for themselves. No attempt is made to idealize David, and the religious coloring is not conspicuous. Its outline is as follows: David's introduction to Saul (16 14-23). Saul, jealous because of David's success and popularity (18 6-8), attempts to kill him, first privately (18 9-11), then through the offer of Michal to David as wife, provided David (at the risk of his life) furnishes the stipulated dowry (18 20-29). David now flees (19 11-17) after revealing Saul's murderous intent to Jonathan, who is surprised, but finds that it is so and takes an affectionate farewell of David (20 1b-42). David goes to Nob, where he secures bread (21 1-7) and then becomes the head of a band of relatives and malcontents (22 1-2). Saul slays all the priests at Nob but Abiathar (22 6-23) and hunts for David from place to place (23 1-14, 24-29, 24 1-22). During these experiences David marries Abigail, the rich widow of Nabal of Carmel, SE. of Hebron (25 2-42), also Ahinoam (25 43 f.). David finally seeks the protection of Achish of Gath and is given Ziklag, on the SW border of Palestine (27 1-12). Summoned by Achish to march against Saul (28 1-2), he is sent back because of the opposition of the Philistine nobles (29 1-11). Returning to Ziklag he finds it plundered and burned by Amalekites. He overtakes and routs the robbers, and makes a shrewd use of part of the spoil by sending presents to leading men in Judah and elsewhere (30 1-31). An account of Saul's defeat and death follows (31 1-13) and of David's grief at the news (II S 1 1-16), also the beautiful elegy he composed on the occasion (1 17-27). David now moves to Hebron and is chosen king of Judah (2 1-4). A message to Jabesh-gilead has no immediate effect (2 5-7). Abner gradually regains control of N. Israel for the house of Saul (2 8-10). War breaking out between David and the house of Saul, David is victorious and Abner capitulates (2 11–3 21). The murder of Abner by Joab (3 22-39) and of Ishbosheth, Saul's son (4 1-12), does not prevent the crowning of David as king of all Israel at Hebron (5 1-2). The Philistines now attempt to crush David, but are defeated (5 17-25). A brief account of David's other wars follows (8 1-14) and the narrative closes with a summary statement regarding David's government (8 15-18).

(2) Interwoven with A is another account (which we will call B), in which David, a mere lad, is anointed by Samuel (I S 16 1-13) after Saul has forfeited all rights to the throne. David comes into public view, still a mere youth and unknown to the king, by his triumph over Goliath (17 1-58). At the court he and Jonathan become fast friends (18 1-5), but Saul becomes jealous and tries in various ways to kill David (18 12-19, 30). Jonathan brings about a reconciliation (19 1-7), but when Saul again attempts to kill him (19 8-10) David flees to Samuel (19 18–20 1a), then goes to Nob and gets the sword of Goliath (21 8 f.) and thence flees to Achish (21 10-15). Taking his parents to Moab, David next finds refuge in the forest of Hereth (22 3-5). Samuel dies (25 1), after which David spares Saul's life in the wilderness of Ziph (26 1-25). Saul in despair and hard pressed by the Philistines has recourse to the witch of Endor, in order to get a message from Samuel, from whom he hears his doom (28 3-25). These passages are marked by the tendency to idealize David and to show how it was the Divine will to take the kingdom from Saul and give it to his successor. See SAMUEL, BOOKS OF.

(3) The most of II Samuel is from an ancient history of David as king in Jerusalem (symbol Da^J), perhaps the oldest piece of consecutive historical narrative in the O T. This began, apparently, with 5 3, telling of the union of the tribes under David. The capture of Jerusalem follows (5 6-10), then the building of David's palace and a note regarding his family (5 11-16). The basis of ch. 6 (the Ark brought to Jerusalem) and of ch. 7 (the Divine promise regarding David's dynasty) belonged to this source. Chs. 9–20, practically entire, constituted a large section of this ancient history, concerned mainly with internal affairs. Only in ch. 10 (the parallel to 8 3-12) and 12 26-31 is any notice given to foreign affairs. Here 10 6-19 awaken suspicion as perhaps being a later insertion. After relating David's kindness to Jonathan's son Mephibosheth (ch. 9), the trouble with the Ammonites is recounted (10 1-5, 11 1) mainly as a setting for the story of David's sin with Bathsheba (11 2-27), followed by the rebuke of David by Nathan (12 1-15), the death of Bathsheba's child (12 15-23), the birth of Solomon (12 24 f.), and the successful issue of the war with Ammon (12 26-31). The story of Absalom's rebellion is traced from its beginnings in the trouble between Absalom and Amnon to its conclusion in the death of Absalom and David's restoration to his throne (13–19). As a sequel we have the story of Sheba's unsuccessful rebellion (20 1-22). The notice (20 23-26) concerning David's cabinet seems to have closed the account of David's active reign, while I K 1–2 (in the main) probably formed the closing section of this history.

(4) Finally we have a little collection of material in II S 21–24 of various dates and inserted by the compilers of II S in their present position. It contains (a) an old notice of a famine and the execution of the sons of Saul to satisfy the Gibeonites (21 1-14). (b) A group of stories of heroic deeds by David and his men in the Philistine wars, in which Goliath's death is accredited to Elhanan, not David (21 15-22). (c) A late psalm of praise attributed to David (ch. 22 = Ps 18). (d) An ancient poem, "the last words of David" (23 1-7). (e) An old list of David's heroes (23 8-39). (f) The story of the census, with its disastrous result, and its incidental but important sequel, the purchase of the threshing-floor of Araunah as a place of sacrifice, the site of the later Temple-altar (24).

Of these sources Da^J is probably the oldest. It was written out of full information, in a spirit of remarkable impartiality, David's faults and limitations being set forth with no apologies. It was compiled not long after David's death and before the dominance of the tendency to idealize him, so marked in later Hebrew literature. Narrative A is of almost equal antiquity and impartial objectivity. Most of the material in II S 21–24 is also old and historically trustworthy. On the other hand, narrative B is late and belongs to the time when David was looked back to as the ideal man and king. See the discussion of this narrative in SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. We possess, therefore, an abundance of good material wherewith to construct a history of the life and work of David.

3. David's Life.

David was born c. 1040 (see CHRONOLOGY OF O T), the son of Jesse, a farmer of Bethlehem. His early life, that of a shepherd lad, gave him opportunity to develop his musical talents. The border warfare with the Philistines early attracted his daring spirit, and he had already gained some renown when he was called to quiet the spirit of the afflicted king by his skill on the harp. At the court (such as it was) David soon became very popular. Between him and Jonathan, Saul's eldest son, a warm friendship grew up. In war David performed such deeds of valor that in popular song his name was placed above Saul's. These things at last aroused Saul to a violent jealousy, and he determined to kill David. Saul saw in David an enemy to his house and felt that his death was a public necessity. David acted with forbearance and magnanimity in this trying situation. His marriage to Michal, Saul's daughter, only made his position more dangerous. At last David saw that he must leave court and, after an affectionate farewell to Jonathan, he resorted to the life of a freebooter. Gradually a band of like-minded spirits gathered about him, some of them wild, lawless men, a condition of affairs made possible only through Saul's inefficient government. These years were years of valuable discipline for David, giving him lessons in war and strategy, in command of others, and in self-reliance that proved valuable in later years. At the end of this period David had won for himself a strong hold on the affections of the clans of Judah, had materially increased his personal possessions, and was head of a band of about 600 trusty followers who placed allegiance to him above that to any other person or cause.

David's recourse to Achish of Gath was the only solution of a difficulty. He had become too strong to live any longer in Judah without becoming involved in civil war with Saul. By taking a position in the S. at Ziklag, under a nominal vassalage to Achish, David was free from entanglements and could patiently await the issue of circumstances.

With the defeat of Israel by the Philistines and the death of Saul and his sons on Mt. Gilboa came David's opportunity. But he moved cautiously. He was still the vassal of Achish. The move from Ziklag to Hebron, there to be recognized by the tribe of Judah as king, was not significant enough in the eyes of the Philistines to provoke hostilities. The Philistines were concerned with controlling Central Israel rather than Judah. The court at Hebron was not a magnificent establishment, nor did the power of David at first appear formidable. David's polite message to Jabesh-gilead met with no response. N. Israel was not yet ready to accept David as king. But when Abner, after five years of patient effort, had succeeded in putting N. Israel on an independent basis (against the Philistines) and had placed Ishbosheth, Saul's youngest son, on the throne, a civil conflict was inevitable. Two kingdoms in Israel, with such a man as David at the head of one, were impossible. The conflict lasted about two years. Joab's treacherous murder of Abner, and the murder of Ishbosheth by two traitors threatened to interfere with the plans for consolidation, but David succeeded in proving his innocence, and the inevitable goal of the whole course of events in Israel for ten or more years was reached when the elders or representatives of the tribes met at Hebron and there constituted David king of all Israel. This was done on the basis of a covenant or agreement, the particulars of which are not given. Of this we may be sure, that N. Israel accepted David as king over them not because he was king of Judah, but for what he was in himself. There was no recognition of a suzerainty of Judah over the other tribes in this transaction. The Philistines were quick to see the significance of what had taken place at Hebron and attempted to crush David before he had fully organized his kingdom. Two signal defeats (II S 5 17-25; cf. 23 13-17), followed by others (II S 8 1, 21 15-18, 23 9-12), taught them that Israel under David was supreme in Palestine.

Unlike Saul, David saw the need of a strongly centralized government. To this end a capital, centrally located and capable of being strongly fortified, was a necessity. Such a location was at hand in the old Canaanite fortress of Jerusalem (q.v.), still unconquered and occupied by the Jebusites. One of David's first acts was the capture of this strong position and the establishment here of his seat of government. Here he built a palace, otherwise improved and more strongly fortified the city, and, as adding both dignity and sanctity to his capital as well as doing honor to the national religion, to this place he brought the Ark, the most ancient symbol of the national faith.

David's wars with neighboring nations all occurred probably in the first decade of his reign. The occasion of the war with Ammon is explicitly given (II S 10 1-5). The Syrian wars were an outgrowth of the Ammonite war (10 6-19; cf. 8 3-12). The reasons for the conflicts with Moab and Edom are not stated. The outcome of these campaigns was to give Israel the foremost place among the small nationalities between the Euphrates and Egypt. The overlordship of Israel, involving the payment of annual tribute, was recognized by Edom, Moab, Ammon, and a number of the petty Syrian kingdoms to the NE.

Following these wars was a period, probably of ten to fifteen years' duration, of peace and prosperity. The central government was strong and efficient. The king was a supreme court of appeal, open to every Israelite, where impartial justice was sure to be decreed. The spoils of war and the tribute of conquered nations brought in a revenue more than sufficient to meet all demands without heavy internal taxation. The king was popular, the people happy and contented. Seeds of future trouble indeed were being sown, but that harvest was not all to be reaped in David's day. It was in this period that Nathan the prophet declared the unique significance of David's dynasty, laying the foundation of the prophetic view of the Messianic significance of that dynasty (II S 7).

Absalom's rebellion, though prompted mainly by his own ambition, was made possible only through the presence of certain elements of disaffection in Judah, David's own tribe. That Absalom won over to his cause Ahithophel of Giloh in Judah and that he organized his rebellion in Hebron, David's old capital, shows that it was in Judah that the opposition to David was strongest, though at no time was the majority of the population on Absalom's side. David's strict adherence to the terms of the covenant arrangement, in not favoring Judah unduly at the expense of Israel, may have caused resentment in Judah. Into the details of the story so fully told in II S 13–20 we do not need to enter. Nowhere else do David's greater qualities appear so conspicuously. The story of the quarrel between N. Israel and Judah after the defeat of Absalom's forces, while it reveals the jealousy between these two parts of Israel, also shows the strong affection felt for David in the nation as a whole.

Absalom's rebellion occurred probably in the last decade of David's life. It was a severe ordeal and after his restoration David entrusted most of the duties of government to others. This gave Adonijah his opportunity for his unsuccessful attempt to prevent the succession of Solomon, whom David had already designated his successor. With the installation of Solomon, son of Bathsheba, as his successor, David's public life closed. Not long after he died, 70 years of age.

4. Estimate of David's Reign and Work.

David's work for Israel was of greatest importance. In a sense he but completed what had been partially accomplished by Samuel and Saul. But even with this reservation his fame will endure as Israel's greatest ruler after Moses. He not only reunited Israel and gave it for the first time a strong, well-organized, and well-administered government, but he gave it a new national consciousness. Under him Israel attained to a true sense of her national significance among the small nationalities of SW. Asia. It was due to David that Israel emerged from the condition of a body of loosely confederated tribes to that of a nation acting as a unit along well-defined lines of national policy. The Davidic Age was an age of awakening for Israel, and David was its incarnation. Under him for the first time Israel had a capital city, a central government, a standing army, a court, and a supreme court of justice.

That all this was without influence upon Israel's religion is unthinkable. David himself was sincerely loyal to Jehovah, Israel's God. His battles were fought and his victories won in the name of J″ None of his public acts was marked by any disloyalty or unfaithfulness to J″, as such things were understood at the time. In his royal sanctuary at Jerusalem the most ancient and revered symbol of the national faith was highly honored and carefully guarded. It is probable that the worship at this sanctuary was somewhat elaborate and dignified, and that the later view of David as the founder of the Temple liturgy was not entirely without foundation. Through David the popular conception of the power of J″ must have been greatly strengthened.

Of the personal character of David an estimate founded mainly on the objective account of Da^J and of the old elements in A and in II S 21–24 can not be far from correct. He was a child of his age, and his faults, as they appear to us, were mainly the faults of his age. This is the only just way to judge of his readiness to accept Saul's stipulations regarding his marriage to Michal (I S 18 25 ff.); of his harsh treatment of conquered enemies (II S 12 31, mild in comparison with those of Assyria at a later date); of his yielding to the demands of the Gibeonites for blood revenge on Saul's house (II S 21), since by refusing he would bring the same nemesis upon his own house; or of his charge to Solomon to see that Joab paid the just penalty for his murders of innocent men (I K 2 5 f.). For his criminal connection with Bathsheba there is no excuse. David sinned grievously and knew that he was doing wrong. But the real nature of the man is best seen in his sincere repentance at the rebuke of Nathan. That David was a man of strong natural passions the narrative makes clear. But he was not a man of unbridled lust. His large harem was altogether in harmony with an age when all rulers had many wives, mainly from motives of state policy.

David was a man of strong feelings. He was a musician and a poet. His lament over Saul and Jonathan (II S 1 19-27) is one of the gems of the world's literature and perhaps more truly reveals the real David than anything else we know of him. One who could thus write of the man who had sought his life was a rare spirit indeed. Though none of the Psalms was certainly written by him, he was capable of writing some of those attributed to him.

David was brave, generous, and magnanimous. He was a master-spirit who drew others to him and for whom they would gladly lay down their lives (cf. II S 23 13-18). He was a discerner of men and knew how to use each in the place for which he was best fitted. As a king he showed a kingly dignity and bearing, but was withal affable and approachable. Politically he was shrewd and far-seeing, and his military skill gave him victory in all his wars. His people trusted and loved him as a just ruler. In his family life his affection for his children often got the better of his judgment, and yet his bitter cry, "Would I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" must touch every parent's heart.

It was then not without reason that later Israel looked back to David as the ideal man and king, and made him the type of the ideal Head of the Messianic Age.

DAVID, CITY OF. See JERUSALEM, § 15.

DAY. The uses other than literal of the term day are: (1) A period of time (Dt 16 3), and in the plural (I K 10 21). (2) Some outstanding single day, such as the birthday of an individual (Job 3 1; Hos 7 5) or the day of death (Ps 37 13; Jer 50 31) or of a great battle (Is 9 4; Ps 137 7). (3) An apocalyptic measure of time (Dn 12 11, etc.; Rev 2 10, etc.), and (4) figuratively (Jn 9 4; I Th 5 5, 8). A. C. Z.

DAY OF ATONEMENT. See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 9.

DAY OF JUDGMENT. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 5, 36, 49.

DAY OF THE LORD. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 4-7.

DAY'S JOURNEY. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

DAY'S MAN (Job 9 33), Umpire RV: The Heb. term (מוֹכִיחַ) means 'one who judges' or 'decides.' Job longs for some one to come between him and God and decide the case impartially (cf. the same expression in Gn 31 37). E. E. N.

DAY SPRING (שַׁחַר, shaḥar): Literally, 'the dawn,' in Job 38 12. The Gr. ἀνατολή (i.e., the 'rising' of the sun or a star) is applied in Lk 1 78 figuratively to the new light of the Messianic Era, full of spiritual comfort. E. E. N.

DAY-STAR: This term is applied to (1) the king of Babylon, because he had exalted himself to the highest heights (Is 14 12 hēlēl, Lucifer AV); and (2) to Christ, as the light-giver (II P 1 19, φωσφόρος). The heavenly body underlying the figure of speech may be either Venus or the sun. A. C. Z.

DEAD SEA (יָם, yām, 'sea' [Am 8 12; Mic 7 12]; יָם הַמֶּלַח, yām hammelaḥ, Salt Sea [Gn 14 3; Nu 34 12]; יָם הָעֲרָבָה, yām ha-'ărābhāh,

1. Name. "the sea of the Arabah," "sea of the plain," AV [Dt 3 17, 4 49]; יָם הַקַּדְמֹנִי, yām haqqadhmōnī, east sea, former sea AV [Ezk 47 18; Jl 2 20; Zec 14 8]): In extrabiblical sources Ἀσφαλτῖτις, 'Sea of Asphalt' (Pliny, HN V, 15 15; Diod Sic. 2 48, 19 98; Josephus often; also Σοδομῖτις, 'Sea of Sodom' Ant. V, 1 22). In Arab. Bahr-Lut, Sea of Lot (?). The name "Dead Sea" is not Biblical; and in the N T there is no reference to it whatever.

2. Physical Features. The Dead Sea is the most striking of the geographical features of Palestine, or at any rate the most remarkable of its inland bodies of water. It is 40 m. in length and 9 to 10 m. in width. It is divided into two unequal parts by a small peninsula projecting from the E. shore in its southern part. This peninsula is called lisān ('tongue'), but offers no specially interesting features. The lake is surrounded by high cliffs on the W. side, rising sometimes to the elevation of 1,500 ft., and by mountains on the E. side, the highest of which reach up to 2,500 ft. above the water. It has no outlet to the S., and receives the waters of the Jordan from the N. The constant evaporation caused by the intense heat and the great depth of the valley below the surrounding country is so rapid as to counterbalance the accession of water from the Jordan and the other affluents and to maintain the level exactly. The basin of the Dead Sea is made up by the junction of two valleys running respectively from N. to S. and from S. to N., and becoming deeper as they approach each other. The soil of these valleys abounds in certain saline substances (chlorides of sodium, calcium, and magnesium, to which must be added certain compounds of bromium). These give the water its bitter and its salt taste and its oily consistency, as well as its great density. Owing to this last feature, eggs will float on the surface of the sea, and the human body is borne up, only the head showing a tendency to sink, which makes swimming difficult.

It is an error to imagine that the shores of the Dead Sea derive their barrenness from the quality of its waters. The truth is rather that the characteristics of the water are due to the nature of the soil. As this furnishes so much mineral material for solution in the water, it is impossible for any form of life to flourish within the sea or on the shores about it. Even salt-water fish are unable to live in these waters. For the same reason, the mineral ingredients of the soil around the Dead Sea basin make it impossible for vegetation to flourish. The idea, however, that aside from the quality of these mineral elements there is anything pestiferous either in the atmosphere or in the water of the Dead Sea is an unfounded superstition. DEBIR, dī'bẹr (דְּבִיר, dᵉbhīr): I. An Amorite, king of Eglon, one of the five who formed a confederation against Israel, and were defeated and put to death by Joshua (Jos 10 3).

II. 1. A city in the S. of Judah (Jos 10 38), also called Kiriath-sepher (Jos 15 15; Jg 1 11), supposed to be in the neighborhood of Hebron, but its exact identification with any modern site seems impossible (cf. Map II, D 3). In history it figures as first captured by Joshua (Jos 10 38) and afterward by Othniel, perhaps with a temporarily successful effort at independence during the interval (Jg 1 11-15). 2. Another city of the name appears in Jos 15 7, located in the NE. section of Judah, but the text seems confused and the LXX. translates as if from an original רבעית instead of דביר. 3. DEBORAH, deb'o-rā (דְּבוֹרָה, dᵉbhōrāh), 'bee': 1. The associate and inspirer of Barak in the conflict with the Canaanites under Jabin and Sisera (Jg 4). She is described as the prophetess who judged Israel during the period, holding her court at a place named after herself between Ramah and Bethel in the hill-country of Ephraim. When the oppression became intolerable, Deborah sent for Barak and together they planned the campaign which culminated in the overthrow of the Canaanites at the battle of Kishon. The victory won by Israel in this battle is the subject of a poem of great fervor and vivid imagery entitled "The Song of Deborah" (Jg 5). (Cf. G. A. DECALOGUE (Δέκα Λόγοι, the Ten Words, EVmg. Ex 34 28; Dt 4 13, 10 4, more commonly the Ten Commandments): The moral code prefixed to the Book of the Covenant (Ex 21–23). The account of the giving of the Decalogue is recorded in Ex 19, and need not be recounted. The text as given in Ex 20 3-17 has been called the Classic Decalogue and has always been regarded as the summary of O T ethical teaching. Another version of it appears in Dt 5 6-21.

1. Two Versions.

The arrangement of the moral precepts in the form of ten commandments was neither demanded by the nature of the subject nor suggested by logical or philosophical considerations. It is the result of deference to the popular regard and conventional value of the number ten, recognized at the time. There are traces of the use of this number in the construction of similar decalogues, e.g. Ex 34 10-26, the decalogue pointed out by Goethe and further defined by Wellhausen (Comp. d. Hex., p. 331; Smend, A Tlche. Religionsgeschichte, p. 47, and Stade, GVI. I, p. 457, and called the Jahvistic Decalogue. Ten such decalogues are pointed out by Paton, JBLE. 1893, pp. 79–93). The ten words were inscribed upon two tables of stone, but just how many upon each table does not appear. It has been customary since the days of Philo and the Christian Fathers to make one pentad of the first five commandments under the head of "Precepts of Piety" and another of the last five under that of "Laws of Probity." There has been further a difference of practise as to the numbering of the commandments. The Roman Catholic Church, following Augustine, includes the one prohibiting the making of images with the first and preserves the original number by subdividing the last commandment. Among the Jews, whom the Greek Church and Protestants (except Luther) generally follow, the arrangement naturally suggested in the EVV is held to be correct.

2. Arrangement.

The Classical and Deuteronomic versions of the Decalogue are substantially the same; they differ mainly in the reasons annexed to the fourth and fifth, and in the arrangement of the tenth commandment. Upon the ground of this difference and the historical situation reflected, which shows not a ritualistic but an ethical setting, some have judged that the Classical Decalogue was not a product of the Mosaic, but of the early Prophetic Age. The pre-Prophetic Age could produce only a ritualistic decalogue such as that of Ex 34 16-26 (so Wellh., etc.). As a middle ground between this view and the traditional, it has been held that a decalogue was given in a simple and rudimentary form in the Mosaic Age as follows:

3. Original Form.

1. Thou shalt have no other gods besides me.
2. Thou shalt not make unto thee any (graven) image.
3. Thou shalt not take the name of J" thy God for a vain end.
4. Remember the Sabbath-day to hallow it.
5. Honor thy father and thy mother.
6. Thou shalt not kill.
7. Thou shalt not commit adultery.

8. Thou shalt not steal.
9. Thou shalt not bear false witness.
10. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's home.

This simple decalogue was then enlarged to its present form between 800 and 625 B.C. This view is supported by the considerations (1) that an original of this compass would best account for the textual variations of the Classical and Deuteronomic Decalogues, (2) that it may best be divided into two nearly equal pentads as inscribed on two tables, and (3) that it was best calculated to be remembered as a fundamental law.

4. The Decalogue in the N T. In the N T the Decalogue is recognized as of Divine authority. But from the first Jesus called attention to the vital element in it by recasting its substance into the new form of two positive commandments of love (Mt 22 36-40; cf. Ro 13 8, 10; Ja 2 8).

DECAPOLIS, dę-cap'o-lis (Δεκάπολις): The name applied in Roman times to a region E. of the Jordan including parts of Gilead, Gôlân, and Ammonitis, with Scythopolis (W. of the Jordan). The boundaries of D. were never defined geographically, as it was not a geographical unit with connected territory, but consisted of city districts, most of which were, indeed, contiguous. In the wake of Alexander's conquest many Greek colonies were planted E. of the Jordan on those high plateaux which Israel had used for pasturage. These Hellenistic colonies had a common history: that of independent civic communities under the Seleucids and Ptolemies, to whom they merely owed allegiance, and paid taxes and contributions.

Most of them were annexed to Judæa by Alexander Jannæus (king of the Jews, 104–78 B.C.). When Pompey conquered and reorganized Palestine in 62 B.C. he restored their freedom to these cities, which about this time formed a league consisting originally of ten cities (δέκα, 'ten,' πόλις, 'city'). The exact date of this event is uncertain, but as the term Decapolis appears only in Roman times, and as the era of most of these cities began in 62 B.C., the League dates probably from the reorganization by Pompey. The cities were subject to the Roman Senate, but administered their own affairs, had the right of coinage, their own courts, financial budgets, and era. The number and names of the cities composing the Decapolis are given variously and the title was preserved even after other cities were added to the list. Pliny gives (as perhaps the original ten): Damascus, Philadelphia, Raphana, Scythopolis, Gadara, Hippus, Dium, Pella, Gerasa, Canatha. Ptolemy's list omits Raphana and adds Abila, Abila Lysaniæ, Capitolias (perhaps Raphana), Saana, Ina, Samulis, Heliopolis, Adra, and Gadora. From other sources we know of Canata and Bosra (Bostra). Scythopolis commanded the trade-route and was the outlet to the sea for the Decapolis. Hippus and Gadara were given to Herod by Augustus, Abila to Agrippa II by Nero, but the League was not dissolved until the third century, when Philadelphia, Gerasa, Canatha, Canata were incorporated into the Provincia Arabia. Gadara was the birthplace of Philodemus (Epicurean), Meleager (epigrammatist), Menippus (satirist), and Theodorus (rhetorician). In the time of Christ the Decapolis was a great intellectual and commercial center, Greek being everywhere spoken.

DECISION, VALLEY OF: See JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF.

DECREE: (1) In Dn 6 7-15, 'ĕṣār, "decree" AV, is rightly changed in RV to "interdict." (2) In Dn 4 17-24 gᵉzērāh means 'decision.' (3) In Dn 2 9, 13, 15, and in Est, chs. 2, 3, 4, 8, 9, dāth means 'law.' (4) In Ezr 5 13, etc., and in Dn 3 10, 29, 4 6, 6 26, tᵉ'ēm; in Est 1 20 pithgām; in Jon 3 7 ta'am; in Lk 2 1; Ac 17 7, δόγμα mean 'edict.' (5) In all other instances but two the term rendered "decree" has the sense of 'statute,' i.e., something fixed by authority. In II Ch 30 5 dābhār means no more than 'agreement,' and in Est 9 32 ma'ămār refers to Esther's letter ("commandment" RV).

DEDAN, dī'dan (דְּדָן, dᵉdhān [pl. DEDANIM, ded'a-nim, DEDANITES]): A Cushite or N. Arabian people (Gn 10 7, 25 3; Is 21 3, etc.). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

DEED: In the account of the transference of a piece of property to Jeremiah by his cousin (Jer 32 6 ff.), there is a reference to the "deed" (vs. 10 ff., Heb. ṣēpher, 'writing,' "evidence" AV) which was signed by Jeremiah and witnessed by competent witnesses. As there is no statement as to an official record or register of the deed, it is probable that no such custom was in vogue, the deed alone properly witnessed being sufficient evidence of ownership. For additional security a copy was made, which was not sealed but left "open," and in this case deposited with the sealed deed in an earthen jar for safe-keeping. The "open" deed would be the one ordinarily consulted; only in case of serious dispute would the seals of the other one be broken.

This is the only instance in the O T where such details are mentioned, but it may be taken as a fair illustration of common procedure.

DEMAS, dî'mas (Δημᾶς): A companion and fellow worker of Paul, mentioned in the salutations of the Epistles to the Colossians (4 14), and to Philemon (ver. 24) and, consequently, known in Christian circles in Asia. At the writing of these Epistles he was with Paul in Rome. Later, at the time of Paul's second imprisonment, he forsook him and apparently gave up his faith (II Ti 4 10). Nothing more is known of him. E. E. N.

DEMETRIUS, dę-mî'tri-ŭs (Δημήτριος, i.e., 'belonging to Demeter'): 1. The name of a number of Seleucid kings of Antioch (cf. I Mac 7 1-4, 10 67 ff.; Jos. Ant. XIII, 13 4). 2. A silversmith in Ephesus, one of the chief instigators of the movement against Paul, on the ground that his preaching interfered with the sale of miniature silver models of the great temple of Artemis in Ephesus (see DIANA), Ac 19 24 f. 3. A Christian mentioned in III Jn (ver. 12), where it is said that he is "commended by all and by the truth itself." He may have been the bearer of the Epistle. J. M. T.

DEMON, DEMONOLOGY: Belief in the existence of superhuman good and malevolent spirits is probably as old as any form of religious belief, and is the survival of primitive religion. This is doubtless true in the case of the earlier Hebrews. The oldest form of such belief seems to have included "hairy sᵉ'īrīm" (rendered "wild goats"), which correspond in a way to the satyrs of the Greeks and the jinns of the Arabs (cf. Lv 17 7; Is 13 21). These demons were believed to inhabit the deserts. Another class was composed of the storm-demons, the shēdhīm (Dt 32 17), who were supposed to bring destruction to the people. Most of these demons were malevolent and were supposed to have come from the underworld rather than from heaven. Belief in such was evidently inherited by the Hebrews from their Semitic ancestors, if not from the ancient Sumerian religion. There was early a further tendency among the Hebrews to identify various diseases with demons, as in the case of the evil spirit that troubled Saul in I S 16 14-16. Generally, however, in the O T diseases are conceived of as sent from J" and are not attributed to demons.

1. Early Hebrew Belief.

A new period of belief in demons began when Israel came into contact with the Babylonians and the Persians. All such survivals of primitive religion among the Hebrews were evolved under the influence of the highly developed demonology of Babylonia of this period. Through this influence the supernatural beings came to be sharply separated into two classes, the good, or angels, and the bad, or devils. There was, in fact, a tendency to associate with each the mythology of Babylonia. (See DRAGON.)

2. Influence of Babylonian and Persian Beliefs.

In the Grecian period, particularly in the two centuries immediately preceding the Christian Era, demonology developed very rapidly because of the general polytheistic spirit of the day. The Jews of this period, though consistent monotheists, saw no inconsistency in a highly developed belief in an unseen world peopled with angels and demons. They came to believe also more distinctly in the influence of these superhuman beings upon men. Angels watched over the birth and subsequently cared for the welfare of individuals (cf. Mt 18 10 and see ANGELS). The popular belief that demons (devils AV) caused sickness of various sorts, both physical and psychical, is well illustrated in the story of young Tobias (To 3 7 ff., 6 7, etc.), and in the statements in the Gospels of their entering into men and "possessing" them (cf. Mt 8 28 ff.). Diseases attributed to such possession were to be cured by exorcism (cf. Ac 19 13-16; Mt 12 27). This was particularly the case in nervous affections. The rabbinical method of healing was in accordance with the general processes of magic and involved the use of various noxious materials and magical names and formulas (cf. Jos. Ant. VIII, 2 5). While it is not true that all diseases were regarded by the Jews of Jesus' day as caused by evil spirits, there can be no doubt that such a belief formed a very large, if not a controlling, element in therapeutics. Similar beliefs are still common among primitive peoples and among those nations like the Chinese which have not come under the influence of modern scientific conceptions.

3. Development in the Greek Period.

These evil spirits came to be regarded as forming a kingdom by itself with a supreme ruler, Satan. To cast evil spirits out from those whom they possessed was therefore an attack upon the kingdom of Satan (Mk 3 23 ff.). It was believed that when the Messiah finally came to judge the world and to save his people, he would be involved in a final struggle with this kingdom of Satan and would destroy it and the demons who with Satan would be cast into the lake of fire (cf. Mt 25 41; Eth. Enoch, 55 4; Test. Levi, 18).

4. Satan.

The Christianity of the N T does not materially modify the belief in demonology of the people of its time. Jesus is represented as struggling with Satan in His casting out of demons (cf. Mk 3 27), and the power to perform the latter act was made coordinate in His instruction to the Apostles with the injunction to preach the coming of the kingdom of God (Mk 6 7). The demonology of the N T is not concerned with the moral character of an unfortunate man or woman. The demoniac was not necessarily a bad man. He was rather a diseased man, one to be cured rather than to be converted, although in many cases the moral recovery followed the physical. The early Church believed that a man could come under the possession of an evil spirit as well as under that of the Holy Spirit. Sometimes so similar were the phenomena of the two possessions that it was impossible to tell just which spirit was in control of the personality until it was tested by the question as to the lordship of Jesus (I Jn 4 1; I Co 12 3, 10).

5. N T Conceptions.

In all this there is no evidence that Jesus and His disciples consciously accommodated themselves to current beliefs they knew to be erroneous. They seem rather to have shared in the popular demonology, although they never committed themselves to the absurdities which marked some of the rabbinical teachers. In this fact may be seen another illustration of the survival of elements of Judaism in early Christianity. S. M.

DEN: Palestine was hilly and abounded in caves and rocky fastnesses where wild beasts and robbers could make their hiding-places. References to such places abound in the O T. The den of lions, in Dn ch. 6, was a pit or cave fenced in where the royal lions were kept. E. E. N.

DENOUNCE: In Dt 30 18 this word is used in the sense of 'declaring fully or plainly' the real meaning of the Lat. denuntiare. E. E. N.

DEPUTY: An officer of lower rank than the governor of a province (satrap), whose exact functions are, however, not clearly to be defined from the data available. The word renders nātsābh (I K 22 47) and peḥāh (Est 8 9, 9 3 AV; Ezk 23 6 RVmg.). See also PROCONSUL for N T references. A. C. Z.

DERBE, dẽr'bẽ (Δέρβη): A city of Lycaonia on the frontiers of Isauria. It is first known as the residence of the robber-prince Antipater (friend of Cicero, about 54 B.C.), who was killed by Amyntas (King of Galatia, etc.), who annexed Derbe to Galatia (36 B.C.). After the death of Amyntas, Derbe (in 25 B.C.) passed to Rome. It received the title Claudio-Derbe in 41 A.D. The early site is to be sought in the mountains of Hadji Baba Dagh, the later site at Güdelissin. D. was a center of early Christian activity, being visited by Paul, c. 46 A.D. (Ac 14 6, 20) and later (Ac 16 1). It was the birthplace of Timothy (Ac 16 1) and also, probably, of Gaius (Ac 20 4). J. R. S. S.

DESCRY: A term that means 'to catch sight of,' especially from a distance, as does a scout or spy: used in Jg 1 23 AV in the sense of 'to investigate,' 'spy out,' or 'explore.' E. E. N.

DESERT. See WILDERNESS.

DESIRE (noun): On Ec 12 5, see DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 7 (2), and also PALESTINE, § 21.

DESOLATE, DESOLATION: In the O T, especially in the Prophets, these terms occur frequently. In the great majority of cases they stand for Heb. words signifying literally 'terror' or 'astonishment,' i.e., at the awful waste and deserted condition. Only in two instances does the original term mean literally 'desolate,' i.e., 'solitary' or 'forsaken' (Job 15 28; Is 27 10). In a number of cases the Heb. means 'dry' or 'waste.' For all these 'desolate,' 'desolation' are satisfactory renderings.

The following instances need explanation: In Is 7 19 the meaning is 'cut off,' i.e., 'steep' valleys. In Job 15 34, Is 49 21, the Heb. means 'unfruitful,' 'barren.' In Ps 34 21 f., Is 24 6, Hos 13 16, and Jl 1 18, the AV is wrong, for the Heb. means 'guilty,' cf. RV. In Is 13 22 and Ezk 19 7 'palaces' is the correct rendering.

In the N T passages the idea is that of a 'waste,' 'desert' condition, except in I Ti 5 5, where the Gr. means 'to be alone.' See also ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION. E. E. N.

DESTINY: As used in Is 65 11 (RV) the word refers possibly to a Semitic deity (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 22). E. E. N.

DESTRUCTION. See ABADDON.

DETESTABLE THINGS: The rendering of shiqqūts, often translated "abomination," in Jer 16 18; Ezk 5 11, 7 20, 11 18, 21, 37 23. The term is always applied to idol-worship as something utterly abhorrent to the true Israelite. E. E. N.

DEUEL, diū'el (דְּעוּאֵל, d'ū'ēl): A Gadite, the father of Eliasaph, a prince of Israel (Nu 1 14, 7 42, 47, 10 20, called Reuel in 2 14). E. E. N.

The fifth book of the Bible, called by the Jews 'ēle dibhrīm or dibhrīm (from its first words). The name Deuteronomy is from the Greek

1. Name. δευτερονόμιον, found in 17 18 in the sense of a duplicate copy of the law there referred to. It was applied to the whole Book of Deuteronomy by the Alexandrian Jews, probably because they considered it to be a restatement of the whole preceding legislation (in Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers).

2. Synopsis of Contents. The questions of the authorship, date, etc., of Deuteronomy can be discussed only on the basis of a clear view of the contents of the book. These can be exhibited as follows:

I. Introductory, chs. 1–4 43
  1. Narrative—a résumé of Israel's experiences from Horeb to the Plains of Moab (chs. 1–3)
  2. A hortatory section, somewhat reminiscent, urging whole-hearted loyalty to Jehovah (4 1-40)
  3. A minor notice as to cities of refuge (4 41-43)
II. The Law given to Israel by Moses, 4 44–26 (also 28 1–29 1)
  Introductory statement as to the place and time (4 44-49)

1. The Ten Commandments, with an exposition and application, especially of the first two (chs. 5–11)
   (1) The Commandments stated, the circumstances of their promulgation recalled, with an urgent plea that they be obeyed (ch. 5)
   (2) The fundamental principle that Jehovah is one God to be supremely loved and honored and obeyed (ch. 6)
   (3) No compromise whatever with the Canaanite worship (ch. 7)
   (4) Promises, warnings, reminiscences, and appeal (chs. 8–11)
2. The Code, chs. 12–26
   The arrangement of the Code is unsystematic. There are a number of long sections dealing with important subjects, and on the other hand there are many brief sentences, each dealing with a specific subject. The following analysis is based upon that given by Carpenter-Harford (Comp. of the Hex., p. 474 ff.):

A. Laws Governing the Main Theocratic Institutions (chs. 12–18 and ch. 26)
   (1) Centralization of worship (12 1-27)
   (2) Apostasy (12 29–13 18)
   (3) Ceremonial Purity (14 1-21)
   (4) Tithes (14 22-29)
   (5) Debtors and Slaves (15 1-18)
   (6) Firstlings (15 19-23)
   (7) A Sacred Calendar (16 1-17)
   (8) Administration of Justice (16 18-20)
   (9) Offenses against Religion (16 21–17 7; cf. (2) above)
   (10) Judgment and Rule (17 8-20)
   (11) Priests and Prophets (18)
   (12) The Offering of First-fruits and the Tithe (26; cf. (4) above)

B. A Miscellaneous Collection of Laws (chs. 19–25)
   (1) Administration of Justice (19 1-21. 21 1-9. 22f.)
   (2) Warfare (20 1-20, 21 10-14)
   (3) The Family and Purity (21 15-21, 22 13-30, 23 17f.)
   (4) Kindness and Humanity (22 1-8. 23 19f., 24 10.21)
   (5) A large number of other laws difficult to classify (cf. the passages not included above)

3. Concluding peroration, with solemn warnings against disobedience (28 1–29 1)

III. Additional Material, not Closely Connected with the Foregoing (27 and 29 2–34 12)
   1. The directions by Moses and the elders (ver. 1) or the priests (ver. 9) regarding the blessing and the curse (ch. 27)
   2. A supplementary discourse, reminiscent and hortatory, with warning and promise (29 2–30 20)
   3. The last words and work of Moses (31 1–34 12)
      (1) Encouragement (31 1-8)
      (2) Direction to teach the Law (31 9-13)
      (3) Moses and Joshua at the Tent to receive a charge (31 14f., 23)
      (4) The Song of Moses, with directions concerning it (31 16-22, 24-30, 32 1-47)
      (5) Moses commanded to ascend Mount Nebo to die (32 48-52)
      (6) The Blessing of Moses (ch. 33)
      (7) Moses' Death (34 1-12)

3. The Unity of Deuteronomy.

With the exception of the two long poems in chs. 32 and 33 Deuteronomy is marked by a generally uniform style throughout. But this fact is not in itself sufficient to establish the unity of the book as altogether the work of one hand. The analysis given above reveals a number of facts that tell strongly against this. (1) In the first place there are evidently two introductions to the Code. One (4 44–11 32) is very closely linked to the Code, while the other (1 1–4 43) is not. (2) Ch. 27 breaks the connection between chs. 26 and 28. (3) The whole section from 29 2 to the end of the book is marked by many abrupt transitions and changes and by much confusion as to the order of thought and events. (4) If small sections, such as 2 10-12, 20-23, 3 9, 11, 10 6 f., are evidently later insertions, it is a priori probable that other material in the book is also due to editorial work on it subsequent to its original publication.

There is a quite general agreement among scholars that chs. 5–26 and 28 contain the kernel of the original book; that is, that Deuteronomy in its original form purported to give the fundamental law of Israel together with a hortatory address of Moses urging loyal obedience to this law with warnings as to the danger of apostasy.

To this nucleus there were added from time to time (all, however, within a comparatively short period and from the same literary and religious circle or 'school') the second introduction (chs. 1–4), the supplementary address and notices, and the Song at the end (chs. 29–32 and 34 11 f.). When this book in this form was combined with JE (see HEXATEUCH, § 20), excerpts from JE (27 5-7a, 31 14 f., 23, 33, 34 1b-5a, 6, 10) were inserted in its text. When JED were finally combined with P (see HEXATEUCH, § 30) a few additional statements from P were added (1 3, 32 48-52, 34 1a, 5b, 7b-9).

4. The Relation of Deuteronomy to the Preceding Books of the Pentateuch.

The Book of Deuteronomy, whether we think only of the original kernel or of its final enlarged form, is a distinct, separate work only loosely connected with the preceding Book of Numbers or the following Book of Joshua. At Nu 27 12 ff. Moses is ready to ascend the mountain to die just as in the case at Dt 31 14 ff., 32 48 ff. It is in only the few extracts from JE and P (see the preceding section) that the connection is made between the history in Numbers and that in Joshua.

The book, as a whole, makes no claim to Mosaic authorship, but the addresses and the law are referred directly to him. The nature of this reference must be estimated in the light of the following facts: (1) The lack of unity in the book, which limits the question to the portions assigned directly to Moses. (2) The peculiar literary style of these portions, which is very marked and such as to strongly distinguish Deuteronomy from the other books of the Pentateuch. This is apparent, even in a translation such as we have in the English Bible, and is more apparent in the Hebrew. The hypothesis of the actual Mosaic authorship of both the material in Genesis-Numbers and that in Deuteronomy involves an insoluble literary puzzle. A satisfactory solution is possible only when actual Mosaic authorship is posited in neither case. (3) There are discrepancies between the narrative of Exodus-Numbers and that in Deuteronomy. Compare, e.g., Dt 1 9-13 with Ex 18 13-26; Dt 1 22-23 with Nu 13 1-3; or Dt 10 1-4 with Ex 25 10 f., 36 2, 37 1 (as to the time of the making of the Ark). These are only a few of a number of such discrepancies (see the list in Driver, Int. Crit. Com., pp. xxxv ff.). (4) The narrative in Deuteronomy presupposes the JE but not the P portions of the Pentateuch. This is true notwithstanding the discrepancies just alluded to, which only tell against identity of authorship. The general view of the Exodus-wilderness history and the events noted are just such as would be expected from one who knew JE, but felt at liberty both to quote it verbatim and to handle its contents somewhat freely. But in no case is any dependence on P evident, and the general view of Deuteronomy is decidedly not that of P. (5) The kernel of Deuteronomy is an expansion of the code of JE (Ex 20–23 and 34 12-26). The whole of this code (with the exception of the long section on penalties, Ex 21 15, 17-22, and 20 25 f., 22 29b) is taken up, enlarged, commented on, and added to in Deuteronomy, in such a way as to create the impression that in Deuteronomy we have a revision of ancient law in order to adapt it more perfectly to changed conditions, i.e., to a more advanced social and economic stage of national life. The relation of Deuteronomy to the code of P is very different. Deuteronomy, indeed, touches many points which are also included in P. But in many of these cases the legislation of Deuteronomy is different, both in letter and spirit, from that of P. Cf., e.g., the law as to the place of sacrifice, Dt 12 1-28 with Lv 17 1-9 (in this same connection note the different views as to ordinary slaughter and sacrifice) or the law concerning the eating of the firstlings, Dt 15 19-23 (where the worshipers eat them) with Nu 18 17 ff. (where the priests have the flesh as a part of their revenue). In Deuteronomy all Levites are priests and there is no reference (except in the insertion in 10 6) to the Aaronic priesthood, while in P only the sons of Aaron are priests and the Levites are their assistants. The elaborate cultus-system of P with its emphasis on the Tabernacle (only mentioned once in Deuteronomy in the JE passage 31 14 f.), the priesthood, the sacrificial system, finds no emphasis in Deuteronomy. In its sacred calendar (ch. 16) the Day of Atonement (cf. Lev 16 and 23) is not mentioned. These and many other similar facts lead to the inference that Deuteronomy has no knowledge of the fully developed code of P and stands midway between the ancient legislation in JE and the later code in P, in which, naturally, much of the previous legislation would be embodied.

5. Date of Deuteronomy.

Indications serving to give us a general date for Deuteronomy (in its original form) may be found, in addition to the inference just noted, (1) in the relation of Deuteronomy to the other literature of the O T. There is no definite trace of the presence or influence of Deuteronomy in the literature of the O T before Jeremiah. The early writing prophets, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah, show no acquaintance with the book, nor do the early narratives embodied in Judges-II Kings, or the J and E elements of the Pentateuch. On the other hand, Jeremiah and the editorial material of Joshua-II Kings are full of traces of the influence of Deuteronomy both in phraseology and in ideas. (2) In connection with the narrative in II K 22 8 ff., where we read of "the book of the law" being found in the Temple and of the reform of Josiah (621 B.C.) based on that book. It has long been recognized that the reforms of Josiah were of just that character that Deuteronomy might have inspired and that the warnings and exhortations of Deuteronomy were just such as might have aroused the king to action. No other part of the Pentateuch answers to the demands of the situation in II K 22 8–23 25 as Deuteronomy does. (3) In the religious conditions of Manasseh's reign (c. 690–640 B.C.), a period of religious decline, which must have caused much anxious thought on the part of many who were loyal to the religion of Jehovah. Such conditions would naturally lead to an attempt to restate and reenforce the fundamental principles of Israel's religion. It is likely, therefore, that Deuteronomy was written in the reign of Manasseh, some time near 650 B.C.

6. Purpose and Sources of Deuteronomy.

The purpose of Deuteronomy was to set forth the true nature of Israel's religious foundation, and thus counteract the disintegrating and corrupting influences then so powerful. The prophetic teachings of Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah had both broadened and deepened the views concerning the religion of Jehovah and Israel's true character. Deuteronomy sought to combine the teachings of prophecy with the traditional practises of religious and social life. It was an earnest, serious, worthy purpose. Since Moses was traditionally considered the source of all Israel's law, and as there was probably a tradition of a farewell address by Moses, it was natural that the whole presentation was not only made in the name of Moses but that he was represented as actually speaking it. In antiquity the standards of literary usage were not the same as they are to-day.

The sources at the disposal of the author (or authors) of Deuteronomy were: the JE history (probably already combined into one work), the traditional law, especially as it had been developed at the great sanctuary at Jerusalem; and the teachings of prophecy. All these sources were handled with freedom in consonance with the fundamental purpose to produce a comprehensive national constitution rather than a priestly manual or law-book.

7. Author.

Naturally the author of Deuteronomy is no longer known. It may have been the joint product of several writers, although the uniformity of style is more favorable to single authorship. It is also impossible to say to what class the author belonged. He was well acquainted with priestly law, but may not have been himself a priest. Some person or persons connected with the Temple must have made some use of the book, otherwise its being found there is inexplicable.

8. Ruling Ideas.

The religious value and significance of Deuteronomy are very great. Its ruling ideas can perhaps be summed up as follows: (1) The absolute unity and supremacy of Jehovah. (2) The centralization of all formal worship at one sanctuary (i.e., Jerusalem). (3) The heinousness and dangers of all Canaanite forms of worship and of all familiar intercourse with Canaanites (under these terms the pressing religious dangers of the times were indicated). (4) The definite regulation of the whole moral and religious life of the people by the principle of loyalty to Jehovah. These ideas are urged upon the conscience of the people with a fervor and earnestness that are truly remarkable.

After its discovery and sanction by Josiah, the Book of Deuteronomy at once seems to have become very influential. It was read and studied by Jeremiah, though he was not in agreement with all its ideas. It profoundly influenced also the historians who worked up the ancient records into the historical books now known as Judges, Samuel, and Kings (see above, § 5 (1)). It seems to have been soon issued in a second enlarged edition. In the course of time it was combined with the JE history, and in this form was the most influential book of exilic and post-exilic Judaism, until the 'priestly' school supplanted it with a new and more comprehensive presentation of Israel's law, now known as the 'Priest's Code' (P).

9. The Influence of Deuteronomy.

LITERATURE: A full and adequate discussion of Deuteronomy will be found in Driver, Int. Crit. Com. on Deuteronomy, and in Carpenter-Harford's The Composition of the Hexateuch (1899, 1904). E. E. N.

DEVIL. See DEMON, DEMONOLOGY, § 3, and SATAN.

DEVOTED THINGS. See CURSE, § 2.

DEVOTIONS (τὰ σεβάσματα, Ac 17 23): A term that does not designate 'religious services,' but "objects of your worship"; therefore, the AVmg. "gods that ye worship," though a paraphrase, conveys the meaning exactly. J. R. S. S.

DEW. See PALESTINE, §§ 19, 20.

DIADEM, dai'a-dem (from δια-δεῖν, 'to bind around'): A band or fillet worn around the headgear by the kings of Persia; hence a badge of royalty. The term is used in the O T (AV) to render (1) tsānpēh, 'turban,' in general (Job 29 14 [cf. RVmg.]; Is 62 3). (2) Mitsnepheth, the high priestly turban, in particular (Ezk 21 26, "mitre" RV), and tsᵉphīrāh, "chaplet" (Is 28 5). In the N T the Gr. διάδημα, "diadem" ("crown" AV), occurs in Rev 12 3, 13 1, 19 12. A. C. Z.

DIAL (מַעֲלוֹת, ma'ălōth), 'steps': The word several times rendered degrees (AV) and steps (RV) is exactly the same as that rendered "dial" in II K 20 8-11 and Is 38 8 (sundial, Is 38 8 AV). The shadow is spoken of as 'going up' or 'down' the 'steps,' which were at least ten in number. Some have thought that a pillar on a pedestal graduated into a number of successive steps was meant. E. E. N.

DIAMOND. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 3.

DIANA, dai-an'a (Gr. Ἄρτεμις, Artemis): A goddess of Ephesus, worshiped under the form of a meteoric stone (which "fell down from Jupiter," Ac 19 23-40). She was the great Asiatic nursing mother, the patroness of the sexual instinct, and the mother and nurse of gods, men, animals, and plants. She was worshiped under various names: Ishtar, Ma, Cybele, Anaïtis, Artemis Ephesia. Her identification with the Greek Artemis was appropriate only in that Artemis was protectress of men and animals. But as the Artemis of historical times was always a virgin, never a mother, the identification proves that in prehistoric times the Greek Artemis was a mother-goddess, not a virgin, and that the virginity dogma arose with the worship of Apollo. The representations of the Ephesian Artemis in art and her entire cult were in no sense Greek, but persistently Asiatic. The famous statue of the Ephesian Artemis, with its many breasts and symbols, is an Asiatic idol, not conceivable by a Greek brain, for Greeks detested the ugly. Her cult was equally un-Greek, equally Oriental, wild, orgiastic, and impure. Girls gained dowries by religious prostitution in her temple, in which there was an army of eunuch priests, also priestesses of three grades (who gave rise to the Amazon myth), and hierodouli (male and female). The priests' titles were also Asiatic (Μεγάβυζος, Ἐσσήν). Associated with the chief of eunuchs, or archpriest, was an archpriestess. This Artemis was never really Hellenized, though her priests tried hard to effect it, by associating the pure Greek Apollo with their impure goddess, by claiming that Apollo and Artemis were born and nurtured on the outskirts of Ephesus, by building a succession of Greek temples in her honor, by decorating them with works of Greek art, and by introducing Greek games; but the goddess and her worship remained Asiatic. (See EPHESUS.) J. R. S. S.

DIBLAH, dib'lā (דִּבְלָה, dibhlāh, Diblath, dib'lath, AV) (Ezk 6 14): No such place is known and the true reading may be 'to Riblah' in the extreme N. of the Lebanon region, making the whole expression mean: 'from S. to N.,' i.e., from one end of the land to the other. E. E. N.

DIBLAIM, dib-lê'im (דִּבְלָיִם, dibhlayim): Father of Hosea's wife, Gomer (Hos 1 3). E. E. N.

DIBON, dai'bon (דִּיבֹן, dībhōn): 1. A city of Moab, Map II, J 3, situated on two knolls covered to-day by ruins of no small extent and significance. D. was in the territory wrested from Moab by Sihon, which, when Israel conquered Sihon, became the possession of the tribes of Reuben and Gad (Nu 32 3, 31-34; Jos 13 8 f., 17). The presence of the Gadites in Dibon is witnessed to not only by the name Dibon-Gad (Nu 33 45 f.), but also by the Moabite stone (see MESHA). It again came into the possession of Moab in the days of Mesha (q.v.) and was one of the prominent cities of his kingdom, as its extensive ruins still testify (cf. Is 15 2, 9; Jer 48 18, 22). It was here that the famous stone of Mesha was discovered. In Is 15 9 Dimon is evidently a mistake for Dibon. 2. A city of Judah (Neh 11 25), probably the same as Dimonah (Jos 15 22). Site unknown. E. E. N.

DIBRI, dib'rai (דִּבְרִי, dibhrī): The father of Shelomith (Lv 24 11). E. E. N.

DIDYMUS, did'i-mus. See THOMAS.

DIKLAH, dik'lā (דִּקְלָה, diqlāh), 'date-palm': A region of Arabia (Gn 10 27). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11. E. E. N.

DILEAN, dil'ę-an, (דִּלְעָן, dil'ān, Dilan ERV): A town of Judah in the Shephelah (Jos 15 38). Site unknown. E. E. N.

DIMNAH, dim'nā (דִּמְנָה, dimnāh): A Levitical city in Zebulon (Jos 21 35), perhaps the same as Rimmono (I Ch 6 77). See RIMMON. E. E. N.

DIMNESS (Is 8 22, 9 1 AV, but "gloom" RV): The idea of dimness is in the original quite secondary and incidental. A. C. Z.

DIMON, dai'mən, DIMONAH, di-mō'nā. See DIBON.

DINAH, dai'nā (דִּינָה, dīnāh): According to the text of Gn (30 21) as it now stands, D. was a daughter of Jacob by Leah, and after Jacob moved from Aram into Canaan she was violated by Shechem, son of Hamor (ch. 34). On hearing of this the sons of Jacob, but more particularly Simeon and Levi, avenged the deed by slaying the inhabitants of Shechem and rescuing their sister. Nothing further is said of her.

The narrative in ch. 34 is composite, the oldest elements, in which the personal rather than tribal or political features are prominent, being from J (see HEXATEUCH and Comm. on Genesis). The majority of modern scholars are inclined to view the Dinah incident as a piece of tribal rather than personal history, told in personal form. According to this view Simeon and Levi—tribes—had trouble in early days with the Shechemites because of some wrong done to 'Dinah'—a small Israelite clan. In the attempt to avenge this wrong, Simeon and Levi were not supported by the rest of Israel (34 30 f.; cf. 49 5 ff.). Some scholars are inclined to rule out all the references to Dinah as unhistorical (see Driver, Genesis, pp. 302–308, and EB. s.v. Dinah).

J. A. K.

DINAITES, dai'nə-aits: The older commentators regarded the Dinaites as colonists who were transported by Osnappar (Assurbanipal) to Samaria from Dîn-Sarru, a city near Susa. Recent writers, both historians and exegetes, are generally agreed that the word is an official title. The Aramaic term, which should be pronounced dayyānayā', means 'judges,' and consequently the Dinaites were Persian officials who attempted to hinder the rebuilding of the Temple by writing to Artaxerxes (Ezr 4 9). J. A. K.

DINE, DINNER. See MEALS, § 1.

DINHABAH, din'hə-bā (דִּנְהָבָה, dinhābhāh): Capital city of Bela, King of Edom (Gn 36 32). No such place has yet been identified in Edom. E. E. N.

DIONYSIUS, THE AREOPAGITE, ar"ę-əp'ə-gait (Διονύσιος ὁ Ἀρεοπαγίτης): One of Paul's converts in Athens mentioned in Ac 17 34 with Damaris (q.v.). Nothing further is said of him in the N T. The writer of Ac is fond of magnifying the influence of Christianity among men of rank (cf. Ac 13 12, 26 28, 29, 28 8), which may account for the mention of D. here. According to Eusebius (HE. III, 4, IV 23), quoting Dionysius of Corinth (about 170 A.D.), D. was the first bishop of Athens. In the later tradition he is confused with St. Denis, the patron saint of France. In this way, perhaps, his name came to be associated with the Neo-Platonic Pseudo-Dionysian writings, which exerted such wide influence in the early Middle Ages.

J. M. T.

DIOTREPHES, dai-ət'rę-fîz (Διοτρέφης): Described in III Jn 9 as one "who loveth to have the preeminence among them." He had evidently refused to heed the Elder's written instructions and to "receive" the brethren. From the fact that he 'forbids' and 'casts out' of the Church, it is evident that he occupied some position of authority which might bring him into conflict with his brethren and the Elder. J. M. T.

DIP. See MEALS, § 2, and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 16.

DIPHATH, dai'fath. See RIPHATH.

DISCERNING OF SPIRITS. See CHURCH, § 6.

DISCIPLE (μαθητής, 'learner'): Predominantly a N T word (but cf. 'learner,' limmūdh, Is 8 16 and Is 50 4, 54 13, RVmg.). In the N T the conception of learner is maintained, but broadened so that it expresses the relation of learner to teacher as one of companionship and dependence; hence the accessory meaning of 'follower,' 'partizan' (Mt 10 24; Jn 9 28, "disciples of Moses"; Mt 9 14, of John; Mt 22 16, of the Pharisees). A. C. Z.

DISCIPLINE (παιδεία): This word, especially in Pr, LXX., Sir, and Wis, is used of moral education by God, leading to true wisdom (cf. Wis 1 5, 6 17). See CHASTEN, and EDUCATION, § 8. R. A. F.

DISEASE AND MEDICINE: In the E. disease is generally attributed to influences from the unseen world, often directly from God. The common name for an insane person is majnûn, which means 'possessed by a jinn or evil spirit.' Such a person is also sometimes said to be mamsûs, which signifies 'touched' (by an evil spirit). Many deformities and defects are attributed to the 'evil eye.' By it is intended the eye of envy.

1. Oriental Ideas Regarding Disease.

If one looks on a beautiful child, and wishes it were his, it is believed that the child will be smitten by some disease or die. If some object of value is looked upon by another with covetousness, its value to its owner is believed to be lost. To avert this he who speaks of an object of desire, first utters the name of God, to signify that His protection is invoked against envy and covetousness. Thus, instead of saying to a mother, "What a pretty child!" one should say, "The name of God upon him, how beautiful he is!" Rupture is known as 'a wind.' Rheumatism bears the same name. Epilepsy is known by the name 'wrestling,' as if one had been overcome in a struggle. Certain catarrhal and inflammatory troubles are called nizĕl, which signifies a 'descent' from somewhere in the regions above. If you see a man eating, you should say "two healths!" meaning "may God give you two healths!" If you see him working, you say "rest," that is, "may God give you rest!" It is generally believed that God strikes men blind for their sins. One of the most common curses is the word "blindness!" that is, "may God strike you blind!" Also it is believed that God punishes by sudden death. So there is the curse, "may he cut off your age!" In a general way Orientals are disposed to look for occult causes for disease. When none can be found, they say that the affection is "from God." And when disease is supposed to be incurable, or is very intractable, one says "may God cure you!" If a person is asked how he recovered from a disease, he is apt to reply "God," that is, "God cured me." It is therefore in strict accordance with the current and ancient Semitic belief that God sends specific diseases and general pestilences as punishment for individual and national sins. The scathing denunciations of Dt 28 59-66 are such as would appeal to the Oriental mind with the vividness of conviction. It is noteworthy that besides the specific diseases (Dt 28 22), and the general pestilences (ver. 59), and the diseases of Egypt (ver. 60), God threatened them with "every sickness and every plague which is not written in the book of this law" (ver. 61). Here He no doubt alludes to the great variety of diseases arising from the diversity of climate and the physical features of the country to which they were going, and of those lands in which they should thereafter be scattered.

2. Relation of Climate and Habits of Life to Disease.

In no part of the world is there so great a variety of physical features and climate as in Palestine and Syria. The seacoast plain has a subtropical climate, and is the home of the palm, the orange, and the banana. The sunny hills of Palestine and the lower slopes of Lebanon have a temperate climate, and produce peaches, plums, apples, grapes, wheat, and barley. On the alpine ranges of Lebanon flourish the cedar and the juniper, and above them on the bleak mountaintops are the eternal snowdrifts. Beyond Lebanon are the plateaux of the interior, breezy tablelands, stretching away to Mesopotamia and Persia, with a climate hot and dry in summer, cold in winter. Deep in a cleft between the hills of Palestine on the one side, and those of Bashan, Gilead, and Moab on the other, is the Jordan Valley, which at its southern end is 1,300 feet below the Mediterranean. In this chasm the climate is tropical. Around the borders of Palestine and Syria are the deserts, generally dry and hot, but swept in winter by bleak, cold winds.

It must be plain that in a country, small though it be, with such a variety of soil, climate, and exposure, there must be many types of disease. Thus, in the irrigated plains fevers and dysenteries prevail; in the damp, ill-ventilated, and ill-drained cities rheumatism, and contagious and infectious diseases, and tuberculosis in all its forms; in the dry, dusty, sunny regions ophthalmia; while in the pure air of the plateaux and deserts where germs are few, those diseases prevail which are due to exposure and fatigue under the blazing sun, and in the keen, biting winds.

The filthy habits of Asiatic peoples produce skin-diseases and ophthalmia. The free use of raw meat causes worms. Raw pork often begets trichinosis. From this Hebrews and Mohammedans are, of course, free. The large amount of fruit, often hard and unripe, of vegetables fried in fat, butter, or oil, and of salads, engenders dyspepsia, diarrhea, and dysentery. Violent temper produces cerebral congestion and many nervous diseases. Unbridled passion produces nervous prostration. Intensity of grief often wrecks the health or brings about insanity.

3. Medical Knowledge in the East.

It is useless to expect to find a system of medicine in the Bible. During the fifteen hundred years occupied in the preparation of the sixty-six books of the O T and N T the nation which furnished all the sacred writers was successively under the influence of Egypt, Syria, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome, most of which were renowned for their learning and their cultivation of the healing art. It is presumable that the Hebrews borrowed from their conquerors many of their ideas of disease and methods of treatment, and that Hebrew medicine, at any particular epoch, reflected the views of the prevailing systems of that day. We have no reason to suppose that the Hebrews made any advances on the learning and skill of their masters. Of one thing we are certain: There was from the earliest period of the Hebrew state a medical profession. In Egypt medicine had made great advances before the Israelites left that country, and they doubtless carried some of the wisdom of the Egyptian physicians with them. Their theories of physiology and pathology were crude. Their knowledge of anatomy was imperfect. Their materia medica had in it many remedies long since disused. They employed bleeding, blisters, setons, moxas, cauteries, and many other painful processes. There were physicians in Gilead (Jer 8 22). Oriental tradition makes Solomon a master of the healing art. There are several allusions to medical matters in Pr (17 22, 20 30). Luke was a physician (Col 4 14). It was said that "they that are whole have no need of a physician" (Mt 9 12). The woman "had suffered many things of many physicians" (Mk 5 26). "Asa sought not to Jehovah but to the physicians" (II Ch 16 12). Job said of his comforters, "Ye are all physicians of no value" (Job 13 4). The proverb said, "Physician, heal thyself" (Lk 4 23).

The allusions to medical topics in Scripture are not numerous, and few of them shed clear light on the opinions and practise of physicians or of the public. Such information as is given is presented below under the following heads:

I. Physical Abnormalities; II. Diseases and Infirmities; III. Injuries; IV. Remedies; V. Hygiene.

I. Physical Abnormalities.

4. Physical Abnormalities.

(1) Baldness. It occurs naturally from advancing age or skin-disease, or is produced by shaving, as is common among Moslems, or by use of medicines which cause the hair to fall out. This disqualified from the priesthood (Lv 21 5). (2) Blemishes (Lv 21 17). Among them are mother's marks, freckles, party-colored hair, albinism, squint, white spots on the cornea, staphyloma, red nose, harelip, moles. None of these is mentioned in Scripture.

(3) Broken Feet and Broken Hands (Lv 21 19). This doubtless refers to ill-united or non-united fractures, or to unreduced dislocations, which deform the members and thus rendered their victims ineligible to the priesthood.

(4) Crippling Deformities (Cripple Ac 14 8) are such as incapacitate a person from walking (Lame Ac 3 2), or such as embarrass his movements by imperfect development of limbs, by clubfeet, clubhand, rickety limbs, knock-knees, bow-legs, bandy-legs, congenital dislocations of the hips. All these would doubtless have disqualified from the priesthood.

(5) Crooked Back (Lv 21 20). This is of two kinds, lateral curvature, a sort of screw formation of the spine, and angular curvature, arising from tubercular disease of the vertebræ or from injury. These disqualified from the priesthood.

(6) Dwarfishness (Dwarf Lv 21 20). Of this there are two varieties, one in which the whole body is reduced in size, the other in which the trunk and head are of normal size, but the legs, and usually the arms, are shorter than natural. No person suffering therefrom could enter the sacred office.

(7) Flat Nose (Lv 21 18) results from injury or disease, causing a sinking or loss of all or a part of the bones and cartilages of the nose.

(8) Lameness (Lv 21 18) is caused by wounds, paralysis, ununited or badly united fracture, stiffness of joints or muscles, or some of the deformities mentioned above. The victim is said to be halt.

(9) Maiming (Maimed Mt 18 8) is mutilation by loss of a limb or a part of one, or of any part of the body, as the eye, or the loss of any function (Lv 21 20) by injury or disease. Adoni-bezek had seventy kings whose thumbs and great toes he caused to be cut off. By the irony of fate he suffered the same mutilation (Jg 1 6 f.).

(10) Superfluous Parts (Lv 21 18). Such are a sixth finger on a hand, or a sixth toe on a foot (II S 21 20). The writer has seen eight somewhat rudimentary fingers webbed together on each hand, and six toes on each foot of the same individual. Sometimes the nails become hypertrophied and deformed, resembling bird's claws (Dn 4 33). Horns are sometimes produced on various parts of the body.

(11) Withered Limbs (Mt 12 10) are those in which the muscles are wasting, owing to spinal disease, to injury to the nerve supplying the part, to congenital deficiency in the number of fingers and toes, or to anything which stiffens joints and leads to their disuse.

II. Diseases and Infirmities.

5. Diseases and Infirmities.

(1) Diseases of the Bones. Many of the diseases of the bones have been alluded to under Physical Abnormalities. Besides these the Bible mentions dislocations (Ps 22 14), atrophy (Ps 31 10), fracture (Is 38 13), caries (Hab 3 16), inflammation (Jer 20 9).

(2) Diseases of the Bowels. Bloody Flux is Dysentery, a disease caused by parasites in the intestine, and producing colic and mucous discharges, with great straining and distress, and prolapse of the bowel (II Ch 21 19), and often resulting in abscess of the liver. It is one of the dangerous diseases of warm climates.

(3) Constitutional Diseases. Burning Ague (Fever Lv 26 16 RV) is a malarial affection, very injurious to the system, and destructive to life. It may have a paroxysm each day, or every other day, or every third, or seventh, or fourteenth day. In some of the more malignant forms of it the brain, lungs, liver, spleen, kidneys, or other organs may be congested, and the patient dies speedily from the severity of the infection. In most he is sick for a long while, and may either recover or die worn out by the induced disease of one or more of the vital organs. Consumption (Lv 26 16) may refer to tubercular disease in its protean forms, or to wasting from any chronic disorder. Tubercular disease is exceedingly common, especially among Moslems and Jews, owing to close intermarriage, to the seclusion of women, to the filth of the narrow lanes and high walls by which all houses in the quarters inhabited by these people are shut in from sun and air. It was probably as common in Biblical times, as cities were then very compactly built, and hygienic laws disregarded. Dropsy is rather a symptom than a disease. It is the accumulation of watery fluid in the limbs or cavities of the body, from weakness or disease of the heart, kidneys, or other organs, or pressure on veins, or injuries, or diseases of nerves, or disorders of the lymphatics. It is curable when its cause is curable, otherwise it is usually a sign of approaching death. Extreme Burning (Fiery Heat Dt 28 22 RV) or Fever is a symptom of inflammation, or the result of microbial infection. Of the latter class are typhus, typhoid, and malarial fevers, all of which are common, especially the last. Inflammation (Dt 28 22) is too much blood in a part, usually caused by microbes, and causing fever. If not cured, it leads to permanent injury and destruction of the inflamed part, or to blood-poisoning. It often destroys life. Pining away (Lv 26 39) is a failure of nourishment and loss of vitality, sometimes due to organic disease and sometimes to mental despondency, as in the case of the imprisoned and banished, or the afflicted and bereaved. Scurvy (Lv 21 20, 22 22) results from too much salt meat, too little vegetable food, bad air, privation of light, and crowded, filthy quarters. It is characterized by tender, swollen, bleeding gums, falling of the teeth, purplish or livid spots on the skin, ulcers, swelling of joints, fever, and often death. It is probable, however, that the Hebrew word here used, which is also used in Dt 28 27 and translated Scab AV, "scurvy" RV, refers to a skin-disease [see below under (9)].

(4) Diseases of the Ears. Deafness is spoken of without specification of form or cause. Stopping of the ears (Zec 7 11) refers to plugging them with the fingers or any other stopper. Unstopping of the ears of the deaf (Is 35 5) refers probably to the removal of ear-wax, which causes partial deafness.

(5) Diseases of the Eyes. Diseases of the eyes are numerous and common in the East. Few are mentioned in Scripture in such a way as to indicate their nature. Blindness is often alluded to, but few hints of its form and causes are given. Some are born blind. Others have had their eyes put out. Others, as Paul, have lost their sight temporarily, or, as Jacob, permanently. Jacob had Dimness of eyes (Gn 48 10; cf. 27 1), perhaps from cataract, or from extreme presbyopia, for which in those days glasses had not been invented. Failing of Eyes (Dt 28 65) would refer to asthenopia from excessive weeping, and anemia from general debility. Redness of Eyes (Pr 23 29) is not ophthalmia, but the congestion of alcoholism. Scales falling from the eyes (Ac 9 18) may refer to crusts of dried discharge which had glued the lids together. Tender Eyes (Gn 29 17) refer probably to trachoma (granular lids), a disease very common in the East.

(6) Diseases of the Feet. Asa's disease (II Ch 16 12) may have been senile gangrene or elephantiasis.

(7) Diseases of the Heart and blood-vessels. Emerods, or piles, are dilated veins, due to congestion caused by constipation, which prevails very extensively in the indolent East. They lead to exhausting, sometimes fatal, hemorrhage. Faintness (Lv 26 36) may be due to mental causes, as fear or despair, or to physical, as hunger, thirst, overheating, fatigue, or pain, or to loss of blood (La 2 12), or to disease of the heart, in which case it is often fatal. Issue of Blood (Mt 9 20) refers to chronic and exhausting hemorrhage from the womb. Trembling Heart (Dt 28 65) may be palpitation, or arrhythmic beat.

(8) Diseases of the Nervous System. Epilepsy is the RV term for Lunacy AV (Mt 4 24), a disease in which the patient loses consciousness, and has convulsions similar to those in demoniacal possession. Madness (insanity) was feigned by David (I S 21 13). God threatened with madness those who should forsake Him (Dt 28 34). Festus charged Paul with it (Ac 26 24). Nebuchadrezzar was insane (Dn 4 33); also Saul. Palsy is a loss of nerve power, and, by consequence, of muscular power, resulting from injury or disease of the brain, spinal cord, or nerves. A variety of it is trembling palsy (Jer 23 9), in which the patient suffers from irregular movement, beyond the control of the will. Trance (Ac 10 10) or Deep Sleep (Gn 2 21; Mk 5 39) is a state of suspended consciousness in which the subject may do or experience certain things, which he afterward remembers. It differs little from dreams or visions (cf. II Co 12 1-4).

(9) Diseases of the Skin. Blains were a malignant form of ulceration, sent as a plague (Ex 9 9). Boils (Ex 9 9) are very common in warm climates. Hezekiah's boil (II K 20 7) was doubtless a carbuncle, which differs from a boil in its greater extent, and its numerous and large cores. For such an affection a lump of figs, not a single fig, would be required as a poultice. Botch (Boil RV) of Egypt (Dt 28 27) is probably the preliminary swelling of a boil or abscess, before suppuration or sloughing. (For Plague of Boils see under Murrain below.) Broken and loathsome skin (Job 7 5) may refer to the filthy state of the skin around and among boils from incrustation of dry matter or to eruptions as eczema, impetigo, and the like. Canker (II Ti 2 17 AV) is Gangrene RV, not cancer. There are several forms of gangrene. The one here alluded to is probably that of the aged, a disease which spreads usually from a toe to the rest of the foot, then to the leg, and sometimes to the thigh. It ultimately kills its victim by exhaustion or blood-poisoning. Few recover from it. Freckled Spot (Lv 13 39 AV) may refer to freckles or to Tetter RV; that is, vesicles like fever-blisters. Fretting Leprosy (Lv 13 51 f.) seems to refer to some fungus growth or mildew that rots garments. Itch (Dt 28 27) is a tormenting, pustular eruption, caused by a minute insect, which bores into the skin. Although it can be cured by assiduous treatment, it is exceedingly intractable to native methods. If gārābh, Lv 21 20, 22 22; Dt 28 27 be itch (see below), the word here translated "itch," ḥeres, may refer to pruritus, another tormenting skin-disease, exceedingly common in the East and characterized by intense, insupportable itching which leads the sufferer to tear his skin with his nails. Leprosy. The leprosy of the Bible is characterized by scabs, bright spots, and hairs changed in color, and spreading in the skin. A part affected by it has a whitish appearance, sometimes compared to snow. It did not disable its victim, and is never spoken of as a fatal disorder. Naaman was able to exercise the function of a general while a leper. Apparently the lepers went about as easily as others. When a man was covered with the eruptions he could enter the Tabernacle or the Temple. These symptoms and facts point to some disease such as psoriasis or simple lepra. The ceremonial uncleanness of the leper seems to have been connected with the idea of diversity of surface and dissimilarity of color, and when the patient, by a spread of the disease over the whole surface of his body, became homogeneous in his aspect, he was ceremonially clean. There were many such prescriptions in the Levitical law. Piebald cattle, patched garments, party-colored stuff or walls, mildewed tissues, and, in general, what lacked simplicity and equality, as shaven or clipped beards and hair, or bald spots, or freckles or pimples, were ceremonially unclean. The fact that a complete leper was permitted to mingle with the people, and enter the sanctuary, is proof positive that the disease was not regarded as contagious. This form of leprosy has no resemblance to the other affection known under the name of leprosy, the elephantiasis Græcorum of medicine. The latter is contagious, is characterized by nodes under and in the skin, by a dusky, lurid hue, by a leonine expression of the countenance, by deep ulcerations, caries of the bones, destruction of joints, dropping off of fingers and toes, deformities of the limbs, and fever. These grave symptoms cripple the patient, and ultimately destroy his life. The confusion between these widely diverse diseases is a signal instance of the persistence of an error founded on the existence of the same name for totally different things. Murrain of cattle, the fifth plague (Ex 9 1-7), may well have been anthrax, the splenic fever of our days. The plague immediately following it was one of boils on men. These may refer to malignant pustule, which is the result in men of the infection with the anthrax bacillus of splenic fever. Plague or Pestilence (Ps 91 6, 10) is probably general, referring to epidemics, as distinguished from sporadic diseases. While it is possible that the bubonic plague existed in Biblical times, we have no account in the Bible of symptoms which would enable us to be sure that this disease is intended in the many passages alluding to pestilence. Of the epidemic diseases common in the East we may mention cholera, which seems to have been endemic in India from remote times, typhus, typhoid, smallpox, and measles. Scab and Scall are patches of cuticle, separating from the skin, and are given among the characteristics of leprosy. There are innumerable scabby diseases prevailing in the East, as the various forms of lepra or dry tetter, dandruff, the scabby stages of impetigo, eczema, Boils, 'Aleppo Buttons,' etc. Scurvy (Dt 28 27 RV, "scab" AV) may perhaps be Favus (ψώρα LXX.). This is a disgusting disease of the scalp, very common among the poorer classes. The Hebrew word gārābh, which is also used (Lv 21 20, 22 22), is found in the cognate Arabic, in which it signifies 'itch.' Sores are ulcers, or tubercular, cancerous, or syphilitic lesions of the skin and the tissues beneath it. They are very common in the East, and often very disgusting and distressing, and frequently fatal. Putrefying sores (Is 1 6 AV) are gangrenous areas. Running Issue (Lv 15 2) may refer to a discharging sinus or fistula, or to gonorrhea. Wen is a sac containing fatty matter, situated in or under the skin.

(10) Diseases of the Tongue and Throat. Dumbness is usually associated with Deafness. But in Scripture this fact is seldom alluded to (Mk 7 32-35, 9 25). In some cases, as that of Zacharias (Lk 1 20), it is pointed out that the temporarily dumb could hear. In one place (Is 35 5 f.) the deaf and the dumb are separated. Stammering is referred to the tongue (Is 33 19). Mispronunciation (Jg 12 6), as saying "sibboleth" for "shibboleth," is a fault of habit rather than a disease, and can usually be corrected. Dry Throat (Ps 69 3). The vehemence of passion and its expression in the East often lead to serious disease. Thus, in the agony of grief women tear the skin of their faces and breasts with their nails, pull out their hair by handfuls, beat their heads against the wall, abstain from food. In wailing they often strain the vocal cords, or bring about inflammation of the throat, which results in permanent hoarseness. To such a state the Psalmist doubtless refers under the expression "my throat is dried."

(11) Worms, probably maggots, devoured Herod alive (Ac 12 23).

III. Injuries.

6. Injuries.

(1) Bruises are frequently alluded to. They are the result of blunt instruments, which crush the flesh. They are not infrequently followed by gangrene.

(2) Burns. David alludes to burning coals falling on his enemies (Ps 140 10). Figuratively, he who does good to an enemy heaps coals of fire upon his head (Ro 12 20). The Levitical law prescribed burning for burning (Ex 21 25).

(3) Dart in Liver (Pr 7 23) seems figurative. It does not refer to any disease due to debauchery. But wounds of the liver are generally fatal, and to such are compared the consequences of vice.

(4) Dislocations are mentioned, of the shoulder (Job 31 22), foot (Pr 25 19), thigh (Gn 32 25), and of all the bones (Ps 22 14).

(5) Fractures are mentioned, of the arm (Job 31 22), teeth (Ps 3 7; Pr 25 19), heart (Ps 34 18, figurative), skull (Jg 9 53). The object of breaking the legs of the two thieves on the cross (Jn 19 31-36) was to hasten, by the shock of a new injury, the death which threatened not to take place before the sunset of Friday.

(6) Miscarriage from injury (Ex 21 22) was punished by assessing the injurer, or by his execution, if the result were fatal.

(7) Moonstroke (Ps 121 6). Orientals often carry umbrellas to protect them from the moon. They do not seem to know what evil they thus seek to avert.

(8) Sunstroke (Ps 121 6; II K 4 19; Jon 4 8) is sometimes fatal, more generally evanescent.

(9) Wounds. They were produced by arrows, darts, javelins, spears, swords, knives, stones, clubs, and bones. Frequent allusion is made to the pain, bleeding, inflammation, putrefaction, and healing of wounds, and to death resulting from them. Among wounds were those from the teeth of beasts, and poisoned wounds from serpents (Dt 32 24).

IV. Remedies.

7. Remedies.

It is clear that medicines were largely used. "A cheerful heart is a good medicine" (Pr 17 22). "Thou hast no healing medicines" (Jer 30 13). "In vain dost thou use many medicines" (Jer 46 11). "The leaf thereof for healing" (Ezk 47 12; cf. Rev 22 2). Dioscorides gives 90 mineral, 700 vegetable, and 166 animal substances used as remedies. Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and among the other branches of this knowledge medicine was largely cultivated. Assyria and Babylon were learned in the medical science of that day. There was a legal provision for the surgical care of the wounded Hebrew (Ex 21 19). Asa had medical treatment for his feet (II Ch 16 12). King Joram went back to be healed of his wounds (II K 8 29). Of details of treatment and materia medica we have the following:

(1) Balm for the treatment of wounds (Jer 8 22).

(2) Caperberry (RVmg. for desire, Ec 12 5), a medicine in repute in ancient times as an aphrodisiac (love-philter).

(3) Eye Salve (Rev 3 18). The mention of this means of treating the eye implies the use of other remedies for the very numerous and wide-spread diseases of the eye.

(4) Food medicines. Mint, anise, cummin, as carminatives; honey, figs, and the like, as laxatives; nutrients, as meat (Lk 8 55).

(5) Mandrake (Gn 30 14) was in repute as an aphrodisiac.

(6) Midwifery (Ex 1 15) implies the use of such means as the women who practised it understood.

(7) Oil was used in the treatment of wounds (Lk 10 34), and for anointing the sick (Ja 5 14).

(8) Ointments were used in the treatment of ulcers and wounds (Is 1 6).

(9) Poultices of figs, and doubtless of other emollients, were used for boils and abscesses (II K 20 7).

(10) Stimulants, consisting of wine and strong drink, were given in cases of exhaustion (Pr 31 6), or of debility and gastric disturbance (I Ti 5 23). Wine was used as an antiseptic and stimulant in the treatment of wounds (Lk 10 34).

(11) Surgery was early recognized as an art. Joram went to be healed of his wounds (II K 8 29). The good Samaritan understood the principles of emergency treatment of recent injuries (Lk 10 34). The frequent allusions to God as the healer of wounds implies that the art of healing was widely recognized.

(12) Water of bitterness (bitter water AV) (Nu 5 18-27) was not a remedy for disease, but a ceremonial test for conjugal infidelity in a woman. It may be compared to the test for witchcraft, by use of the Calabar bean, still prevalent in some parts of Africa.

V. Hygiene.

Among the hygienic measures inaugurated by Moses were:

(1) Bathing (Lv 15 5 ff.; Nu 19 19) was frequent and ceremonially obligatory. The
8. Hygiene. habit thus acquired doubtless led to ablutions other than those enjoined.

(2) Circumcision is an ordinance of great hygienic benefit in warm climates, and contributes to the prevention of various diseases, and is to be recommended for general adoption.

(3) The Marriage laws of Moses prohibiting incest and close consanguinity were of the greatest wisdom and benefit to the physical development of the Chosen People; likewise the regulation of certain details of the marital relations.

(4) Paddles or Shovels (Dt 23 13) on the weapons were an excellent precaution in camp life, and argue an attention to sanitation highly distinctive in that age.

(5) The Sabbath Rest, and the frequent feasts, during which the people enjoyed a combination of bodily repose and spiritual edification, were perhaps the most distinctive and beneficial of all the Mosaic provisions for the physical and moral well-being of the Hebrew people. G. E. P.

DISH. See Food, § 11, and Meals, § 2.

DISHAN, DISHON, dai'shan, dai'shon (דִּישָׁן, dīshān, דִּישׁוֹן, dīshōn): A name (or names) occurring several times in the list of Horite clans (Gn 36 21 ff.; I Ch 1 38 ff.). In all cases probably the same clan (represented genealogically as an individual) is meant. E. E. N.

DISPENSATION. See Kingdom of God.

DISPERSION, DISPERSED: In the N T period the Gr. term διάσπορα (diaspora) had come to have a quite distinctive meaning. It stood for that vast multitude of Jews who lived outside of Palestine, scattered throughout the Gentile world, though still constituting one religiously united people, sharing the same hopes, and looking to Jerusalem as their spiritual capital and to the Temple as their one house of worship. (See Israel.) It is in this sense that the term is used in Jn 7 35. In Ja 1 1 it is evidently applied to Jewish Christians in Palestine and Syria as being apart from the mother-church in Jerusalem; but in the remaining passage, I P 1 1, it is apparently used in a spiritual sense of Gentile Christians as constituting the true Israel, who as pilgrims in this world (1 17, 2 11) are as yet removed from their heavenly home. E. E. N.

DISPOSITION (διαταγή) (only in Ac 7 53 AV ["as it was ordained by angels" RV "as the ordinance of angels" RVmg.]): The meaning is that the law given by God in its essence was put into orderly form by angelic mediation. A. C. Z.

DISTAFF. See Artisan Life, § 13.

DISTRIBUTION. See Church, § 2.

DIVIDE (ὀρθοτομεῖν, "handling" RV): Used in II Ti 2 15 of the skilful application of parts or aspects of the truth adapted to affect persons specially in need of such instruction. A. C. Z.

DIVINATION. See in general Magic and Divination.

DIVORCE, DIVORCEMENT. See Marriage and Divorce.

DIZAHAB, diz'a-hab (דִּי זָהָב, dīzāhābh), 'of gold': One of the five places that define the territory within which Israel is said to have rested when Moses delivered the discourses recorded in Dt (1 1). Some difficulty is experienced in identifying these places. The suggestion that Dizahab is the same as the modern Mina-edh-Dhahab (Burkhardt) has not found universal acceptance. A. C. Z.

DOCTOR. See Education, § 8, and Law and Legal Practise, § 2 (5).

DOCTRINE. See Church, § 2, and Education, § 10.

DODAI, DODO, dō'dai, dō'do (דּוֹדַי, דּוֹדוֹ, dōdhay, dōdhō): 1. The grandfather of Tola, one of the 'judges' (Jg 10 1). 2. One of David's heroes (II S 23 9; I Ch 11 12), in command of one of the divisions of the army, according to I Ch 27 4. 3. One of David's mighty men (see II S 23 24; I Ch 11 26).

Here there has been, possibly, some confusion with David in connection with the Goliath episode (cf. II S 21 19).

The name Dodo appears to be an old Canaanite name (of a deity?), being found on the Tel-el-Amarna tablets and on the Moabite stone, line 12. See MESHA, STONE OF. E. E. N.

DODANIM, dō'da-nim (דֹּדָנִים, dōdhānīm): A Japhetic people (Gn 10 4). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11. E. E. N.

DODAVAHU, dō"da-vā'ū (דֹּדָוָהוּ, dōdhāwāhū, Dodavah AV): Father of Eliezer (II Ch 20 37). E. E. N.

DOE. See PALESTINE, § 24, and FOOD, § 10.

DOEG, dō'eg (דֹּאֵג, dō'ēg): An Edomite, a servant of Saul, who executed Saul's command to slay the priests of Nob (I S 21 7, 22 9-18, 22). The account is obscure at two points: (1) As to the position held by D. The Heb. of I S 21 7 reads "the mightiest of Saul's shepherds"—a most unusual expression. The conjecture that 'runners' be read instead of "shepherds" has been widely accepted. The LXX. reads "tending the mules," i.e., in charge of Saul's mules or asses. (2) As to the reason why D. was at Nob "detained before Jehovah." The most natural supposition is that D. was ceremonially unclean and was at Nob for purposes of purification. Or he may have been awaiting an oracle.

The reference to D. in Ps 52 (title) has no historical value. E. E. N.

DOG. See PALESTINE, § 24; CITY, § 4; and FOOD, § 4.

DOK, dŏk (Δώκ): A small fortress 4 m. NW. of Jericho, built by Ptolemy, son-in-law of Simon the Maccabee. Here Simon and two of his sons were treacherously murdered by Ptolemy (I Mac 16 15 ff.). The modern 'Ain Dûk. Map III, G 5. E. E. N.

DOMINION. See KINGDOM OF GOD, § 3, and ANGEL, ANGELOLOGY, § 5.

DOOR. See HOUSE, § 6 (k).

DOORKEEPER: In Ps 84 10 "doorkeeper" is not a technical term. It means simply one who lies or waits in an humble attitude at the door of the sanctuary. See also PORTER. E. E. N.

DOOR-POST: Only in Ezk 41 16 AV, where "threshold," RV, is more correct. E. E. N.

DOPHKAH, dŏf'kā (דָּפְקָה, dophqāh): A station on the Exodus-route between the Red Sea and Sinai (Nu 33 12 f.). Not identified. E. E. N.

DOR, dōr (דֹּאר, dō'r): An ancient Canaanite town on the Mediterranean coast a little S. of Carmel. The first historical notice of Dor we find in the Papyrus Golenischeff (c. 1050 B.C.), which shows that it was then occupied by the Ta Kara, a subdivision of the Philistines who had taken possession of the coast land S. of Carmel a century or so earlier. The Israelites did not gain control of Dor until Solomon's day (Jg 1 27 [which shows the unhistorical character of the later notices, Jos 11 2, 12 23]; I K 4 11). It was counted as belonging to Manasseh (Jos 17 11). Dor retained its importance during the checkered history of the following centuries. It was closely allied with the Phœnician towns and was given to Eshmunazar, King of Sidon, by one of the early Ptolemies (c. 300 B.C.). Its prosperity declined after the first century A.D. The modern village Tanṭurah is small and insignificant. E. E. N.

DORCAS, dōr'cas (Δορκάς): The Greek name of a Christian disciple in Joppa whom Peter, according to Ac 9 36-43, raised from the dead. The Aramaic original, which is recorded in the same passage and doubtless is the name she bore, is Ṭ'bītha' (Eng. Tabitha) = 'a roe,' which is sometimes used in the O T as a term of endearment (cf. Song 2 9 ts'bhī). J. M. T.

DOTHAN, dō'than (דֹּתָן, dōthān): The name both of a plain and a town. See Map III, F 2. The former is a convenient pass from the coast plain to the Plain of Esdraelon, and is traversed by an ancient and still-used caravan route. Its pasturage is very fine (Gn 37 17; II K 6 13). E. E. N.

DOUGH. See FOOD, § 2.

DOVE: There is no positive evidence that the dove was regarded as a sacred bird among the Israelites; but from slight indications it may be inferred that some sort of distinction was given it in its class. It was offered in sacrifice (Lv 1 14). Jesus calls it harmless (Mt 10 16) and it is made the symbol of the Divine Spirit at His baptism (Lk 3 22). See also PALESTINE, § 25. A. C. Z.

DOVE'S DUNG (II K 6 26): This appears to be the meaning of the Heb. text. A slight change would permit the rendering 'carob-pods,' the "husks" of Lk 15 16. E. E. N.

DOWRY. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE and FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 3.

DOXOLOGY. See PRAISE, § 5.

DRAG. See NET.

DRAGON: The word "dragon" is used very frequently in the AV to render tannīm and tannīn, which are more correctly rendered in RV by "jackals" and "monster." The latter term, however, seems often to have a semimythological significance (cf. Ps 74 13; Is 27 1, 51 9). The dragon was a figure of frequent occurrence in the mythologies of all nations. Considering the relation of Jewish to Babylonian life, it was natural that such a figure should be adopted and used in the Biblical portraiture of non-material realities. The figure of the dragon or "monster" was, however, developed strictly within Biblical limits, first along the direction of symbolizing enmity against J" and His people (cf. Ezk 29 3, etc.), and then, with much greater definiteness of outline and color, in the formation of the apocalyptic conception of Antichrist (Rv 12 3 ff.). Here he is finally identified with the arch-enemy of God, "the old serpent" (20 2). See also PALESTINE, § 26, and COSMOGONY, § 4. A. C. Z.

DRAGON'S WELL. See JERUSALEM, § 10.

DRAM, dram (AV): A Persian coin, the same as the Daric (RV). See MONEY, § 8. E. E. N.

DRAUGHT-HOUSE: A place of refuse or garbage (II K 10 27). Baal's temple was converted into such a place to make it altogether unclean and contemptible. E. E. N.

DRAWER OF WATER. See WELL.

DREAM, DREAMER. See REVELATION, and MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 6.

I. DRESS. The clothing, l^ebhūsh, malbhūsh, begedh, of the Israelites could not have been essentially different from that of the Syrian peasantry of to-day. The earliest known piece of wearing-apparel was the "girdle," i.e., the hip or loin apron, ḥăgōrāh (cf. Jer 13 1 ff.), whose origin is ascribed to the awakened feeling of shame in primitive man (Gn 3 7). Frequently it was the only article of clothing worn while at work. Among the nomads it was made of the skin of an animal, 'ēzōr 'ōr (II K 1 8), and was often longer than the ordinary apron; consequently we have in Gn 25 25 the expression "hairy garment," 'addereth sē'ār. Such was the mantle worn by Elijah and Elisha (II K 1 8, 2 8), who wished thereby to symbolize a return to the ancient shepherd life approved by J" (Gn 4 2-4, 25 27).

1. Earliest Form.

From the apron was developed the ordinary peasant's garment, k^ethōneth, or kuttōneth, "coat" or "garment" (N T χιτών, "coat"; cf. Lk 6 29), which in some respects corresponds to the modern tōb. It was a sleeveless woolen or linen garment reaching down to the knees and worn next to the skin (Gn 9 21; II S 6 20). With the wealthier class it was made of fine white linen, badh, later būts (cf. Targ. and Syr.) or of Egyptian material, shēsh. In Is 3 23, Jg 14 12, mention is also made of garments of "fine linen," s^edhīnīm. A girdle, ḥăgōrāh, or 'ēzōr, of linen (Jer 13 1) or of leather (II K 1 8) held it together. Into this the garment was tucked in rapid walking or at work. At night it was taken off (Song 5 3). Inasmuch as in quick motion such as leaping and dancing, or in case of accident, one was liable to be exposed (Gn 9 21; II S 6 20), those who were well-to-do adopted a garment reaching down to the ankles and provided with sleeves, k^ethōneth passīm (Gn 37 3). One clothed only with this tunic was considered naked, 'ārōm (Is 20 2 f.; Jn 21 7).

2. The Tunic.

Ordinarily another garment, the simlāh ("clothes," "garment," "raiment"), was worn over this, corresponding substantially to the 'abāje of the present day. This consists of a rectangular, seamless piece of coarse woolen so folded and sewed together that the front is left open on either side and large holes provided for the free movement of the arms. This garment was used as it is to-day for a cover at night (Ex 22 25 f.; Dt 24 12 f.), or as a saddle in riding (Mt 21 7), or as a rug (II K 9 13), or as a general receptacle in which things may be bundled and carried (Ex 12 34; II K 4 39; Hag 2 12). Probably in ancient times amulets were hung on the hems, which in later days were adorned with fringes, g^edhīlīm, tsītsīth (Dt 22 12; Nu 15 38 f.). Upon the breast the garment formed a puffy fold, ḥēq (Ex 4 6), in which all kinds of articles were placed (II K 4 39; Hag 2 12). At work the simlāh was taken off (Ac 7 58, 22 23), or left at home (Mt 24 18). On account of the importance of this piece of apparel, common law prescribed that, if taken as a pledge, it should be returned to the owner before nightfall (Ex 22 25 f.; Dt 24 12 f.). It is this garment that is probably referred to in the word ἱμάτιον, "cloak" (Lk 6 29).

Men of means wore over the tunic a more dressy garment — the robe, m^e'īl (I S 18 4, 24 5), which is mentioned as worn also by women (II S 13 18, perhaps the same as the mantle, ma'ăṭāphāh, referred to in Is 3 22). Female slaves carried the train of such a dress (cf. Ad. Est. 15 3 f.). According to Ex 28 4, 31, the priests wore a robe of dark purple and, on account of the shortness of the tunic, also linen breeches (miknāsīm, Ex 28 42; Lv 16 4), which were peculiar to the priesthood.

The simlāh and the tunic were made of the same material, i.e., wool, tsemer, linen, pishtīm, and byssus, shēsh, or būts. After Ezekiel's time silk, meshī (Ezk 16 10), variegated materials, rīqmāh (Ezk 16 10), and purple cloth (also called crimson and scarlet), shānīm, also gold embroidered cloth, mishbe^etsōth (cf. Ps 45 13), were used.

The wealthy preferred pure white garments (cf. Est 8 15) and, therefore, had several changes, ḥălīphōth (Gn 45 22; Jg 14 12). Probably also expensive garments, rich in colors, such as are found portrayed on the Egyptian monuments as worn by the Syrians, were known. Inasmuch, however, as they were worn only on public and special occasions and taken off at home, they were called festival robes (maḥălātsōth, Is 3 22). Kings and princes kept them in a special room, meltāḥāh, robe-chamber, or "wardrobe" (II K 10 22) over which a special officer had charge (II K 22 14). At the same time it is not improbable that the custom of festal apparel had its primitive root in worship. It was felt that one should not appear before the Deity in ordinary garments.

The dress of the women corresponded essentially to that of the men, although, according to Dt 22 5, 6. Dress of Women.

there must have existed some difference. Probably the garments of women were longer (cf. the train or skirt, shōbhel, shūlīm, Nah 3 5; Jer 13 22; Is 47 2), provided with sleeves, also broader and, therefore, better designed to conceal the form. Furthermore the clothing of wealthy women was distinguished by a greater richness and ornamentation than that of men, and also scented with expensive perfumes (Ps 45 9; Song 4 11). In Is 3 16 ff. there is a long list of such costly female garments, an exact knowledge of some of which — particularly the robes, pᵉthīgīl, the sashes, qishshūrīm, and the shawls, miṭpāḥoth—can no longer be recovered. To the present day a similar luxury in the matter of clothing has been preserved among women of the Orient.

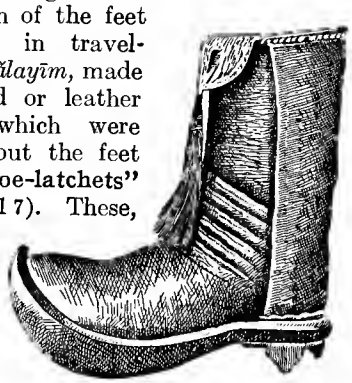
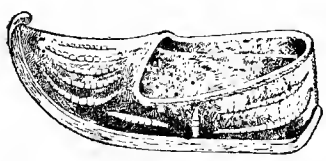
Various Forms of Sandals.

7. Footwear.

For the protection of the feet sandals were worn in traveling, naʿălayīm, made of wood or leather strips, which were tied about the feet with thongs or "shoe-latchets" (sᵉrōk, Gn 14 23; Mk 1 7). These, however, were not worn indoors (Lk 7 38) any more than in holy places (Ex 3 5; Jos 5 15). Accordingly priests were required to perform their work barefoot (yāḥēph). Ordinarily walking without sandals was a sign of great poverty (Dt 25 10), or of deep mourning (II S 15 30; Ezk 24 17, 23).



Modern Boot.



Modern Shoe.

8. Headdress.

As to the headgear of the Israelites there is almost no information in the earlier writings. Only in I K 20 31 is mention made of ropes upon the head in connection with sackcloth on the loins. This suggests the portraiture of Syrians on Egyptian monuments, who appear with a cord tied about their long flowing hair. Inasmuch, however, as this would afford no protection against the rays of the sun, to which the peasants were much exposed, this probably very old custom did not survive. It is likely that the Israelites used a head-covering similar to that of the modern Bedouin. It consisted of a rectangular piece of woolen keffîje, which is folded into triangular form diagonally and placed over the head in such a manner as to let the middle portion hang over the neck and thus protect it, while the two ends are drawn under the chin and thrown behind the head. A thick cord of wool, ʿokâl, holds the piece upon the head. In later times it was the custom of the Israelites, both men and women, to wear a head-covering more like the turban of the fellaheen of to-day. These wear a piece of cotton, folded twice or thrice and worked into the form of a small cap, ṭaḳîje, which protects the other parts of the headgear from perspiration.

Over this is laid one, sometimes two, felt caps (lobbade) and the Turkish national headwear of a red tarbush or fez. About this finally is wound a piece of unbleached cotton cloth with red stripes and fringes, or a colored flowered kerchief, or a yellow and red striped keffîje, or a black cashmere shawl, or a piece of white muslin, or a piece of green cloth. Such a piece of headwear not only protects the head from the rays of the sun, but serves as a pillow and is a hiding-place for all sorts of valuables. This sort of head-covering is referred to in the turban, tsānīph, hood, RV of Is 3 23 (cf. Job 29 14 "diadem"). For the act of putting on, the term "cover," ḥābhash (Ezk 16 10; Ex 29 9; Jon 2 6), is ordinarily used. But this properly signifies nothing more than 'to bind about,' while tsānaph means 'to roll up after the fashion of a coil' (cf. Is 22 18). How the winding of the miter, tsānīph (Zec 3 5), of the high priest differed from the common process is not known.

The bridegroom was distinguished by a decoration of the head called headtire, pᵉʾēr (Ezk 24 17, 23; Is 3 20, bonnet AV 61 3; garland RV), which consisted of kerchiefs wound together and was probably worn over the turban (Ex 39 28, "bonnet" AV). In ancient times the veil was used by women only in certain cases. In fact, the only mention of it is when the bride veiled herself before the bridegroom (Gn 24 65, 29 22 ff.). In later days, the veil and similar articles of apparel under foreign influences became more customary among the upper classes (Is 3 16 ff.). The veil, tsāʿīph, is properly nothing but a square piece of cloth (Gn 24 65). Mufflers, rᵉʿālōth (Is 3 19), are probably veils consisting of two pieces, of which the one began over the eyes and was carried backward over the head, thus falling on the neck, while the other began under the eyes and hung down over the breast.

Sackcloth, saq, was the distinctive apparel of mourners in all ages. It was a garment woven from either goat's or camel's hair and was worn next the skin (Job 16 15), either as the only piece of clothing (I K 20 31, 21 27; Is 3 24, 32 11) or as an undergarment (II K 6 30). It was held together by a girdle (Ezk 7 18; Is 20 2). See also MOURNING CUSTOMS.

9. Mourning Garments.

II. ORNAMENTS. From the earliest days, it was the habit of men for the purpose of display to carry a staff (maṭṭeh) and a signet-ring (ḥōtham). According to Herodotus (I, 195) and Strabo (XVI, i, 20) every Babylonian carried a seal-ring and a staff, the head of which was ornamented with a carved flower. From Gn 38 18 the same may be inferred regarding the ancient Israelite. The signet-ring, ḥōthām or ṭabbā'ōth, was important, because the imprint of the seal took the place of the personal signature. It was not worn, as among the Egyptians, on the finger, but in the earlier days hung by a cord from the neck (Gn 38 18). Only later was it put on the finger of the right hand (Jer 22 24).

Much more numerous were the articles of personal adornment among women, as to-day in the Orient. Specially

2. Worn by Women. common is the mention of ear- and nose-rings (nezem, Pr 25 12; Is 3 21). Earrings, on account of their round form, are called 'āgīl (Nu 31 50) and on account of their drop-like shape, nᵉṭīphōth (pendants Is 3 19, chains AV; Jg 8 26, collars AV). For these pearls were used.

Female Head with Nose-Ring.

According to Gn 35 4, Jg 8 24 f., men also wore such earrings, which served as amulets (lᵉḥāshīm, Is 3 20), as did also other articles of adornment. The nose-ring, or nose-jewel, was fastened to the nose as at present in the Orient, where either one of the nostrils or the partition between them is pierced for this purpose (cf. Gn 24 47; Is 3 21; Ezk 16 12; Pr 11 22).

Necklaces, ḥălī (Pr 25 12; Song 7 2, earrings RV), ḥelyāh (Hos 2 15, "earring" RV), and 'ănāq (Song 4 9; Pr 1 9, chains RV), were worn by women (Ezk 16 11; Song 4 9) and by men (Pr 1 9, 3 3). These were often not simply single silver or golden rings, but chains and cords, adapted to neckwear (cf. Song 4 9). More frequently pearls or corals, also disks of metal, were strung on a cord (cf. Song 1 10). On such neck-chains other articles of adornment were fastened, e.g., perfume-boxes or flasks, battē nephesh (Is 3 20), crescents, sahărōnīm (Is 3 18), and perhaps miniature suns, cauls RV, shᵉbhiṣīm. These are found also in the decoration of camels (Jg 8 21, 26). They evidently served the purpose of amulets. Probably the armlets, kūmāz, of Ex 35 22, Nu 31 50, were also neck-ornaments—possibly beads of gold strung together in a chain.

What was the appearance of the neck-chain, rebhīdh (Gn 41 42), we do not know.

Bracelets, tsāmīdh, are mentioned several times (Gn 24 22 ff.; Ezk 16 11, 23 42). How these differed from the 'ets'ādhāh (Nu 31 50; II S 1 10) is not known. Probably the latter encircled the upper arm and the former the wrist. The bracelets or "chains" of Is 3 19 (RVmg.) were in any case an adornment of the arms like the shērōth of the present day. Finger-rings, ṭabbā'ōth, were also worn by women (Is 3 21).

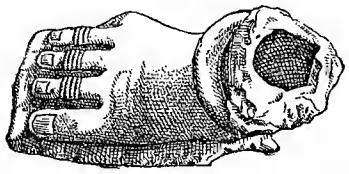
On the girdle were often carried all sorts of articles of adornment such as perfume-flasks and purses or satchels (Is 3 22, crisping-pins AV), ḥărīṭīm, which, however, more often served an ornamental rather than a useful purpose.



Foot with Anklet- and Toe-Rings.

On the feet were worn spangles, 'ăkhāṣīm (Is 3 18, anklets). These were fastened to the ankles and hung over the feet. The spangles of the two feet were linked together by a chain, in order to measure off the steps taken by the wearer. The tinkling of these chains is referred to in Is 3 16 (cf. I K 14 6).

DRUNKENNESS: This was not an uncommon vice in ancient Israel. Noah, Lot, and Nabal are mentioned as being drunken, and in Isaiah's day prophets and priests seem to have been addicted to too free a use of intoxicants (Is 28 7). That Eli should accuse Hannah of being drunk implies that women did not escape the allurements of this vice (I S 1 13). The many warnings of the Wise man (Pr 20 1, 23 31) and the figures of speech based upon the staggering of the drunken man (Ps 107 27; Job 12 25; Is 19 14) are evidences of the frequency of the evil and its power in Hebrew society. That the Savior was termed a wine-bibber, that the Apostles should be accused of being drunk with new wine on the Day of Pentecost, indicate that this vice prevailed also in N T times (Ac 2 13). Among the Hebrews the rich rather than the poor seem to have fallen easy victims to this evil (Is 5 11). The intoxicant is usually termed strong drink (Heb. shēkhār, Gr. σικέρα, Lk 1 15), although wine is also mentioned as an inebriating beverage. The shēkhār was usually made from fruits—grapes, pomegranates, apples, and dates; but also from grain and honey. A Nazirite was strictly forbidden to use any form of strong drink (Nu 6 3, 8), and the priests were not allowed to use it while on duty (Lv 10 9; cf. Ezk 44 21). Under certain circumstances it could be used as a libation (Nu 28 7; Dt 14 26). In a similar manner the Babylonians used šikaru (strong drink) in their ritual.

DUMAH, dū'mā (דּוּמָה, dūmāh), 'silence': I. A son of Ishmael (Gn 25 15; I Ch 1 30), regarded commonly, however, as a tribal or geographical designation. Mohammedan writers identify it with Dumat al-Jandal in N. Arabia, which Burckhardt discovered in the Jof (Travels in Syria, p. 662 f.).

II. 1. In Is 21 11, Dumah is rendered by LXX. as Ἰδουμαία, and may be either an undesigned corruption of Edom or more probably a mystic name for Idumæa. According to still another view, the word in this passage is not a proper noun but an appellative, Massā' dūmāh = 'Oracle of Silence' (Dillmann). 2. A city in the mountains of Judæa (Jos 15 52). According to Eusebius (Onomast., 250) a large village in the Daroma, 17 m. from Elcuthcropolis (Beit Jibrin), modern Daume, where important ruins, foundation-walls, rock tombs, and cisterns are to be found (Guérin, Judée, iii. 359 f.). DURA, dū'ra (דּוּרָא): The name of the plain where Nebuchadrezzar set up his golden image (Dn 3 1). The word dūrā' may be the same as the Assyr. dūru, 'wall.' Three places of this name are mentioned in the Assyr. inscriptions. There is also a small river Dura about 6 m. S. of Babylon, on the banks of which are some mounds called the Mounds of Dura. No closer identification of the place mentioned in Dn is as yet possible.

DUST: In a few passages (Ex 9 9; Dt 28 24 ["powder"]; Is 5 24, 29 5; Nah 1 3; Ezk 26 10) the Heb. means literally 'fine dust.' In most O T instances the Heb. word is 'āphār, the fine soil of the earth's surface, often used figuratively. To 'shake off the dust of one's feet' was symbolical of freedom from further responsibility or intercourse (Mt 10 14, etc.). See also Mourning Customs, § 2. E. E. N.

EAGLE: A bird noted for its swift flight and its untamable temper, and, therefore, made the figure of rapidity of motion (II S 1 23; La 4 19; Rev 12 14), of pride and indomitable spirit (Job 39 27; Pr 30 19), and of strength (Ps 103 5). It appears also in apocalyptic passages symbolically embodying the ideas of strength and keenness of vision (Ezk 10 14; Rev 4 7). See also Palestine, § 25. A. C. Z.

EAR: The ear was often made the symbol of willingness to obey God's law. In the ceremony of the consecration of the priest the tip of the ear was anointed with oil in token of readiness to listen to the voice of God (Lv 8 23 f.). The opposite of willingness to receive God's will and to do it is called the "uncircumcised ear" (Jer 6 10; Ac 7 51), or the "heavy ear" (Is 6 10). To "incline the ear" (Ps 17 6) or "bow down the ear" (Ps 31 2) is to show a favorable disposition toward a petitioner. See also Slavery. A. C. Z.

EAR OF GRAIN (Gn 41 5; Mk 2 23 and ||s, etc.): Since the grain of Bible lands was not corn, as this word is commonly used in America (i.e., maize), but barley, rye, or wheat, the "ears" spoken of are the heads containing the grains E. E. N.

EAR, TO, and EARING: Terms that are used several times in the AV (e.g., in I S 8 12; Dt 21 4; Is 30 24; Gn 45 6; Ex 34 21) in their old sense of 'to plow' or 'till'; cf. RV and see Agriculture, § 4, and also Time, § 4. E. E. N.

EARLY: To "rise up early" is a favorite phrase in Jer (7 13, 11 7, 25 4, etc.; cf. also Pr 27 14), and is used to express great eagerness and diligence in effort. A. C. Z.

EARNEST: This represents ἀρραβών, a Semitic word, עֵרָבוֹן (cf. Gn 38 17 f.), introduced into Greek and Latin, probably by the Phœnicians, as a term of trade, and meaning the portion of purchase money in commercial transactions which is given in advance as a pledge for the payment of the remainder, English 'caution-money,' 'arles penny.' In II Co 1 22, 5 5, Eph 1 14, it is used of the Holy Spirit as the "foretaste and pledge" of the Christian's heavenly inheritance. In ecclesiastical Greek it is sometimes used also of baptism and betrothal. S. D.

EAR-RING. See Dress and Ornaments, § 11.

EARTH, EARTHEN, EARTHY: The terms rendered are: (1) 'erets, which is the most comprehensive term, meaning 'the earth' as distinct from the heavens (Gn 1 1), but also used in a great variety of applications. (2) 'ădhāmāh, the earth as tillable, or habitable, often used in a more general sense, and also of the soil or ground. (3) 'āphār, 'soil' or 'dust' (in only a few passages). (4) γῆ (in the N T), which combines the usage of (1) and (2). (5) ḥeres, 'earthenware,' is sometimes rendered "of earth" or "earthen" in the O T, as is also the corresponding Greek term in the N T (II Co 4 7; II Ti 2 20). In Dn 2 10 the Aram. means 'dry land.' In RV tēbhēl, 'world,' is occasionally rendered "earth." In I Co 15 47 ff., χοϊκός, "earthy," means 'of the material of the earth.' E. E. N.

EARTHQUAKE* (ra'ash, σεισμός): Palestine and Syria have always been subject to frequent seismic disturbances, ranging from the grand convulsions of prehistoric ages to slight shocks during the present decade. The recorded earthquakes have sometimes been very destructive, but have usually been most violent in the N.; so that while Antioch, Aleppo, Baalbek, Beirût, and other cities of Syria have often been overthrown with fearful loss of life, Jerusalem has suffered comparatively little. The most terrible earthquake that Palestine has known during modern times occurred Jan. 1, 1837, when Safed was wholly destroyed with a loss of 4,000 lives, and the shocks traveled, with decreasing force, as far as Hebron.

According to Josephus (Ant. IX, 10 4) the famous earthquake during the reign of Uzziah (Am 1 1; Zec 14 5) was considered a result of the king's sacrilege (II Ch 26 16 f.). See also I S 14 15. There were miraculous earthquakes at the Crucifixion (Mt 27 54) and Resurrection (Mt 28 2), the former being accompanied by darkness (Mt 27 45) and fissures (Mt 27 51; cf. Nu 16 31 f.). A 'great earthquake' shook the prison-house at Philippi (Ac 16 26). Possibly the subsidence of the Vale of Siddim (q.v.) was due to seismic action. Most of the Biblical earthquakes, however, either accompany theophanies (Ex 19 18; cf. Jg 5 4 f.; Ps 68 8; I K 19 11), or else are employed in poetic or prophetic imagery as the most terrible symbols of Divine majesty and judgment (Ps 18 7; Is 29 6; Mt 24 7; Rev 8 5, etc.). Probably all earthquakes were thought to be directly caused by God (Job 9 6; Jer 10 10). L. G. L.

EAST (as the determinative point of the compass): With the Hebrews, as with other Orientals, the E. was the determining point of the compass, probably because it was the place of the sunrising. While the E. is often called mizrāḥ, 'the sunrising,' it is also called qedhem — i.e., 'before' or 'the front.' To look toward the place of the sunrising was to look 'before' one.

* The noun occurs much less frequently than the verbs 'quake,' 'tremble,' 'shake,' etc.

The West was 'behind one,' though, since the Mediterranean Sea lay W. of Palestine, the usual expression for W. was 'seaward' (cf. Ezk 47 20 with Dt. 11 24).

The South lay on the 'right hand' (cf. I S 23 24), though other terms for S. were used, as dārōm and negebh (the "South" in RV [e.g., Gn 12 9], lit. the dry, waste land S. of Judah).

The North was occasionally called 'the left,' as in Jos 19 27, etc., but the usual word for N. is tsāphōn, 'the hidden,' as the northern regions were the most unknown and full of mystery. In Job 23 8 f. will be found a complete illustration of the Heb. usage of the terms 'before,' 'behind,' 'left,' 'right' as equivalent to E., W., N., S. (cf. also Ezk 47 15-20). See also GEOGRAPHY, § 3. E. E. N.

EAST, EAST COUNTRY, CHILDREN OF THE EAST: These terms were often used in a somewhat loose sense, politically, to designate (1) the inhabitants of the country E. (and NE., cf. Gn 29 1) of Palestine, especially the nomadic tribes (Ezk 25 4; Jer 49 29) of the Syrian Desert, which correspond to the modern Bedouin. Some, if not all, of these peoples were regarded as descending from the concubines of Abraham (Gn 25 6), and therefore closely related to the Israelites. The B'nē-qedhem include Kedar (Jer 49 28), are coupled with Midian and Amalek (Jg 6 3 ff.), and were neighbors and conquerors of Ammon and Moab (Ezk 25 4, 10). They were famous for their wisdom (I K 4 30), and the scene of the Book of Job is therefore laid among them (Job 1 3).—L. G. L. (2) The farther East beyond the Euphrates, the seat of the Assyrian, Babylonian, and Persian monarchies (cf. Is 43 5; Zec 8 7; Dn 11 44; Mt 2 1). E. E. N.

EAST WIND: The hot, dry wind from the desert, that fills the air with dust and is exceedingly unpleasant for man and often fatal to young vegetation. It blows generally in the spring. It is frequently referred to in the OT. On Hab 1 9 (AV) cf. RV. E. E. N.

EASTER. See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 7.

EAT: The moral aspects of eating are taken account of in a series of prescriptions and prohibitions on the manner, time, and articles to be eaten (cf. PURIFICATION). "Eating together" was a sign of community of life, and symbolized either adoption into the household (II S 9 7; Jer 52 33), or entrance into irrevocable covenant (Jer 41 1). This conception underlies the sacrificial meal in which God is taken as a participant (Ex 24 11). It was the worst form of treason, therefore, to break a covenant entered into through the ceremony of eating together (Ps 41 9; Jn 13 18). Another moral bearing of eating was seen in the unsatisfying nature of it when not connected with a righteous life (Mic 6 14; Ezk 12 18). Figuratively, to "eat up" is to destroy (Ps 53 4). See also MEALS. A. C. Z.

EBED-MELECH, ī''bed-mī'lec (עֶבֶד־מֶלֶךְ, 'ebhedh melekh), 'servant of the king' or, possibly, 'servant of Melech' (a name for deity): An Ethiopian (Cushite) who was in the service of Zedekiah. He took compassion on the prophet Jeremiah, who had been thrown into a cistern to die of starvation, and obtained permission from the king to rescue him. EBENEZER, eb''ẹn-ī'zẹr (אֶבֶן הָעֵזֶר, 'ebhen hā 'āzer), 'stone of [the] help': A stone set up by Samuel to commemorate a victory over the Philistines upon the site of the battle where it was obtained (I S 7 12). It was situated a few miles N. of Jerusalem between Mizpah and Shen, and became a familiar landmark in local descriptions (I S 4 1, 5 1). A. C. Z.

ECCLESIASTES, ec-lī''zi-as'tîz: "Ecclesiastes, or the Preacher," is derived from the LXX. translation. The Hebrew title is "Qōhéleth," or, in full, "The words of Qōhéleth, son of David, king in Jerusalem." The LXX. translators regarded Q. as meaning 'one who is a member of, or who addresses an Ecclesia (ἐκκλησία),' an assembly of people of any kind, and therefore named the book Ecclesiastes (Ἐκκλησιαστής). The real meaning of Q. is unknown. Its root suggests the assembling of persons. It is used in the book as a masculine proper name, a nickname, for Solomon, and was certainly meant to be intelligible in that sense to the first readers. Probably it alludes to some story about Solomon now lost. The different renderings, "collector of sayings," "convener," "Wisdom" personified in Solomon, "great orator," have no real basis.

1. Title.

Ecclesiastes is unique in the extant literature of the Hebrews in that it is a self-communion on the part of the author, something between

2. Plan of Book. reflections jotted down as they arose and an ordered philosophy of life. Evidently it was written in the first place by the author for himself, or, perhaps, his friends, and came to the wider public only through some accident. Thus it falls in the class of the "Pensées" of Pascal, the "Religio Medici" of Sir Thomas Browne, and the "Meditations" of Marcus Aurelius. But it goes beyond these in that it has a dramatic element, and tries to reconstruct a historical character. The author takes the figure of Solomon, who had asked of God wisdom and had had added thereto riches, whom the unchanging tradition of the East describes as a preeminently successful man, whatever the religious might say of him, and he asks what such a man, in the end, got out of life. So he creates for us Solomon philosophizing, reciting what he had done, how much had been really worth while, and how the scheme of the universe struck him. But Solomon, speaking thus from the dead ("I was king," 1 11), is only a mask for the author himself, and after the first two chapters he takes off the mask and, except for an occasional "Qōhéleth," speaks of himself, his own times and vicissitudes. Apart from this, the book is planless; one idea suggests another, but there is no orderly development. Yet, toward the end, as often in Hebrew books, come a couple of chapters which hold fairly together with some continuity of thought, leading naturally to a finish in the same phrase as that at the opening.

One or two allusions seem historical (4 13 ff., 9 14 ff.), but have not been satisfactorily identified. The general atmosphere suggests a

3. Date. time of oppression and the overturning of old things when the wise man will find safety in quiet withdrawal; but also to be remembered are the aristocratic aloofness and philosophic disdain of the author. Finally, the language is unique in the O T, resembling its latest parts, and even post-biblical Hebrew of the time of the Mishna. Sometimes it is very clumsy, simply scribbled; at others it is handled with elaborate and loving literary skill. Here, too, the strongly subjective personality of the author must be considered; he may easily have been an antiquarian in language, or a lover of the phrases of the market-place. Possible dates range from the later Persian through the Greek period, perhaps even down to Herod the Great in the Roman period. It is certainly after Malachi (Mal 2 7; cf. Ec 5 6), and most probably before Ecclesiasticus (c. 200 B.C.); almost certainly before the Maccabæan revival (168–142 B.C.). There may be general Greek influence, but specific philosophical influence is still unproved. The bases of his thought are Semitic and Hebrew.

4. Fundamental Ideas. (a) Theoretical. (i) The author does not dream of questioning the existence of a personal Being, omnipotent, omniscient, who is absolute ruler of the universe. This, for him, is beyond question. This Being he calls God ('Elōhīm), not Yāhweh (Jehovah), and His relations are with the entire human race; there is no thought of an elect family or of any process of revelation. In one or two places the author gives advice expressly opposed to the Mosaic code (6 9, 9 9; cf. Nu 15 39; Dt 29 19). His references to public religious functions are general and suggest that men should rather refrain therefrom (5 1 ff.). (ii) Between Genesis and Paul he is the only Biblical writer to refer to the Fall. It and its consequences were, for him, of the first importance. Through the Fall man became an object of apprehension to God. The fear of God had to be impressed upon him lest he climb further. Thus it was not a Fall to the author but a step upward which brought loss of tranquillity. So God has arranged all the workings of the universe in circles, and appointed to each event its due season. The circles are too great for man to trace them, but they negate all real progress, and explain how good things and bad come each in their turn. Thus all life is transitory (vain), is recurrent, and is incalculable. Judgment is the turning of the wheel, with its opposites, and the coming of each thing in its turn (3 17, 11 9). But still further to confuse the scheme of the world for man and thus keep him down, God has put something in his heart (3 11). What this is is obscure. One rendering is 'eternity,' another is the 'world'; a probable conjecture is 'toil.' Man has become like God, knowing good and evil, and to prevent him going further he is put under the curse of toil. So man can not help toiling, although against his primary nature, and must puzzle himself over the problems of the world; such puzzling is in his blood. God made men simple, but they have made for themselves many reckonings of life (7 29; cf. 25, 27). (iii) The rule of God is non-moral. The circlings bring now good, now bad; each from God. Sin is a mistake in one's attitude toward God, by which He is angered; the good man is he who is good before God. Whence comes the absolute moral sense in man which revolts against this, the author does not state. (iv) With this world life is over. This, too, is based on the early stories in Genesis. Man is dust out of the ground; God breathed into him the breath of life; at death the dust returns to the dust and the breath sinks back into God; all is over (12 7). There is no difference in this between man and the beasts (3 18 ff.). Yet in his time there evidently existed a doctrine of spiritual existence after death which he did not accept.

(i) It is for man to accept the universe, including all this, as he finds it. He can not change it. Above all, he must fear God, who, if angered,

5. (b) Practical. may destroy him. His attitude should be that toward an absolute earthly monarch; compare 5 1 ff. and 8 1 ff. (ii) It is for man to make the best of this—that is, to enjoy in a temperate, decent manner the good things which life offers, and, above all, to work and find pleasure in working; he will never have any in the results of working. Work, and joy in the working is his gospel; also not to worry over the government of things, over good and evil. That way lies madness, and the wise man must shut his eyes and take what God sends him, happy if God grants him with it the power to enjoy. Thus he may overcome the curse in a fashion, but he can never escape from his prison-house. (iii) For all this wisdom is an advantage, if only that the wise man sees the path he treads and the end to which he goes. It teaches him to beware of excess and to meet each situation with the fitting action, good or evil. All life is of God, and the fearer of God will do his duty by all (7 13-18).

6. The Man and His Book.

He is intensely personal; the last product of the old Wisdom School; deeply impressed by the older wisdom writer who molded the stories of the Fall in Genesis. Only sympathetic reading will make him and his book intelligible. To some both will always be repellent. But probably no other book of the O T creates so friendly a relationship with those who care for it. We feel that this man is real; he is talking out himself. He has the gift, too, of charm in his style. He could not have written to publish. How that came about we can not tell. For all this Sir Thomas Browne is his nearest parallel. Very possibly 12 9-14 were added by his editor; they can not be by himself. Apart from this epilogue the text is generally sound. 8 12 f. is certainly a timid gloss. In 3 17 read, "for he hath appointed a time." In 5 20 read, "God busies him with." In 6 3 read, "even though he have a burial." In 11 1 read margin; the reference is to prudent business enterprise. In 12 1 read "remember thy well," compare Pr 5 15-18 and 9 9. Throughout understand 'vain,' 'vanity,' as 'transitory,' 'transitoriness.'

LITERATURE: For exegesis the English reader will find most trustworthy the translation of Delitzsch's commentary. For the book as a whole and for further bibliography he should use Davidson's article in EB. Most English commentaries are unsatisfactory. The best is by Barton, Int. Crit. Com. (1908).

ECCLESIASTICUS

1. Title.

The Book of Ecclesiasticus, in some respects the most important of the O T Apoc, has been known by various names. In the Greek MSS. (A and ℵ) it is entitled Wisdom of Jesus, Son of Sirach, in B Wisdom of Sirach. The Latin Church Fathers, beginning with Cyprian, referred to it as "Ecclesiasticus," i.e., the 'church book,' because of its frequent use in the churches for catechetical instruction. The Greek Church Fathers called it "The All-Virtuous Wisdom" (Πανάρετος Σοφία). In the Talmudic period, the Jews spoke of it as the "Book of Ben Sira."

2. The Author.

Near the close of the book (50 27) the author says of himself: "Jesus the son of Sirach of Jerusalem hath written in this book the instruction of understanding and knowledge." Very little is known of this "Ben Sira" as he is called in later Jewish writings. The opinions that he was a priest or that he was a physician have not been clearly established. Certainly he was a man of culture and wide experience. This we learn not only from the statements of the prologue, but from the book itself. From this latter source we know that he traveled quite extensively (34 11), and that he was exposed to danger (51 12). While faithful to the Law, he shows sympathy with some customs which he encountered in his travels, and reveals his contact with Hellenistic thought. He was a Jewish philosopher firmly convinced of the superiority and worth of his own faith, and yet liberal enough to recognize what was strong and worthy outside the bounds of Judaism (39 1-5).

3. Date.

The two data used in determining the date of Ecclesiasticus are: (a) the reference to Simon, the high priest, the son of Onias (50 1), and (b) the statement in the prologue that the translator of the book arrived in Egypt "in the eighth and thirtieth year when Euergetes was king." The first datum has been the subject of much discussion, owing to the fact that there were two high priests—each of them "Simon the son of Onias." The first was Simon "the Just," who flourished c. 310–291 B.C.; the second was Simon II, son of Onias II, 219–199 B.C. The balance of evidence brought out in this discussion seems to favor Simon II. The second datum is much more definite. The Euergetes referred to in the Prologue was Ptolemy VII, Physcon, called Euergetes II. Ptolemy III (247–222 B.C.), who also bore the title of Euergetes, reigned only 25 years, while Physcon reigned 54 years in all, being coregent with his brother for 25 years (170–145 B.C.). In the thirty-eighth year of Physcon's reign (this seems the more natural application of the reckoning) the grandson went to Egypt, and shortly after made the translation of his grandfather's work, perhaps in c. 131 B.C. Two generations carry us back to the early part of the 2d cent. B.C. as the probable date of the book. Schürer fixes the time as 190–170 B.C.

4. Contents.

The great theme of the book is Wisdom. It is therefore to be classified with the Wisdom literature, whose purpose was to give "a universal moral-religious criticism of life." The book may be divided into two great divisions. Part I, including chapters 1–43, is devoted to the consideration of Wisdom in both its doctrinal and practical aspects. Part II, including chapters 44–50, is given to the praise of famous men. There seems to be no special definite plan controlling the material. The writer seeks to set forth the bearing and value of Wisdom in every relation of life. The most convenient division of Part I is that suggested by Deane (Expos. 1883), in accordance with which chapters 1–22 form the first subdivision and the prayer in 23 1-6 brings it to a close. The second subdivision extends to 35 20 and also closes with a prayer, 36 1-17. The third ends with the hymn of praise on the works of creation, 42 15–43. The first verse of the book is virtually the text for the whole. "All wisdom cometh from the Lord and is with him forever." In the mind of the author Wisdom begins in the fear of the Lord and continues in the constant recognition of man's twofold relationship—to God and to man. No life can be wise that is not in accord with the Divine commandments. There is no earthly condition or relationship where Wisdom should not manifest itself, and so the author traverses in thought every human situation — sorrow, joy, fortune, misfortune, poverty, riches, sickness, health, the family, business, government — telling what Wisdom should be and accomplish in them all. It is in these particulars that we catch a view of the customs and culture of his time. He speaks as a man of his time who, with ripe culture and earnest spirit, seeks to lift the life about him. Nor is it alone on the human side that he considers this great reality, Wisdom. Wisdom is ever with God, the first-born of His creatures, the archetype for all the works of God. Wisdom is from the beginning and is immanent in God. Because God is Wisdom, man can not comprehend Him. Wisdom is the creative power of the world (24 3) and is eternal (1 1). As in the Book of Wisdom, so here Wisdom is personified and hypostatized. For man there could be no higher setting forth of this Wisdom than in the Law, hence man must be faithful to the Law. Thereby he can and will manifest the fruits of Wisdom. When it comes to the consideration of the problems made by the conception of Divine Wisdom, and the inequalities of life, little attempt is made at explanation. The writer is a predestinarian (16 26, 23 20, 33 10-13). He does not fail, however, to emphasize both the justice and mercy of God. He has nothing to say of the immortality of the soul nor of the resurrection of the body. While he accepts the facts of sin, he estimates its punishment as well as the rewards of righteousness chiefly in terms of this life (11 28, 21 4, 23 24-27). Forgiveness of sin is dependent chiefly on almsgiving and prayer (3 30, 17 25, 29 12). Despite what might be expected from the declaration that Wisdom begins in the fear of the Lord, there is in the book a certain external satisfaction of the demands of righteousness which does not accord with a truly wise life. Observances of rites, expectations of earthly gain, and personal comfort are considered at times apart from any real spiritual association. It may be justly said that with all its exalted teaching, the book lacks in spiritual tone. In this way it presents some striking contradictions. It extols purity, sympathy, truthfulness, and kindness, and yet note the author's aversion to women (9 2), his treatment of an enemy (12 10-11), and how he would punish a servant (42 5). These are but samples of the Wisdom which has not yet learned the deepest meaning of "fearing the Lord." Widely varying estimates have been made of the tone of the book, but it may with truth be said that the general tone "is worthy of the first contact between the two great civilizations of the ancient world (Jewish and Hellenistic), and it breathes a spirit which an Isaiah would not have condemned nor a Sophocles or a Theophrastus have despised."

5. The Text. Until a few years ago Ecclesiasticus was known only from the Greek and Syriac versions, and such translations as were made from them. The original was in Hebrew, as the translator in the Prologue declares. Jerome knew a Hebrew text and in rabbinic writings there are citations from the Hebrew. Until recently this original was lost. In 1896 came the good news that a fragment of it had been discovered among manuscripts brought by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson, two English ladies, from the East. This discovery was followed by another of nine leaves from the same volume to which the Lewis fragment belonged. As these came from Cairo, means were taken to make further search and as a result to-day the following portions of the Hebrew original are known: 3 6-16, 26; 4 23b, 30-31; 5 4-8, 9-13; 6 18-19, 28, 35; 7 1, 4, 6, 17, 20-21, 23-25; 18 30-31; 19 1-2; 20 4-6, 12; 25 7c, 8c, 8a, 12, 16-23; 26 1-2; 27 5-6, 16; 30 11–33 3; 35 9–38 27; 39 15–51 30. There are varied readings recorded in the margins, but the work in the main is the original of Ben Sira. The critical value of these fragments is well summed up by Toy (EB IV, 4651): "So far they have not contributed much to the restitution of the original text, in passages in which the versions are obscure. They often confirm one or more of the versions and sometimes correct or explain words or lines, but in general the text of Ben Sira remains nearly as it was before the discovery of the fragment." Much yet remains to be done to secure a satisfactory text.

6. Recognition of Ecclesiasticus. Although never regarded as canonical by the Jews, Ecclesiasticus was held by them in high esteem. It is often cited in the Talmud, and in one passage (Bab. Talmud, Berackhoth, 48a), with the formula "it is written" applied elsewhere to acknowledged books. There are no citations from it in the N T. Resemblances of thought are found between it and the Epistle of James, but direct quotation from it on the part of James can not be established. Direct quotations begin with Clement of Alexandria, who uses the formula ἡ γραφὴ λέγει. Origen uses the same. Augustine and Jerome both distinguish it from canonical books, but give it a high place for purposes of moral instruction.

From the end of the 2d cent. the book has been much used in the Church. By some its authorship was given to Solomon; by all it was cited with respect. The numerous versions of it testify to the honor in which it was held. In the MSS. of the Greek Bibles it was generally grouped with the other poetical works of the O T. So in the Western Church it was at an early date grouped with Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Wisdom, and attributed to Solomon. The Councils of Hippo (393) and Carthage (397) included in it the Hebrew canon. The Council of Trent (1546) declared it canonical. While in Protestantism it has been reckoned uncanonical, its worth has always had full recognition.

7. Its Real Value. Apart from the high moral instruction which it contains the book has an especial value for the following reasons: (a) It gives us a picture of manners, customs, and thinking in a time otherwise not much known. (b) It shows us how a broad-minded Jew looked upon the questions which a complex civilization brought. The book shows traces of Greek influence. Nestle speaks of the book as "the chief monument of primitive Sadduceeism" (HDB IV, 549). (c) It contributes testimony to the formation of the Hebrew canon, especially in the arrangement of the "Hymn of the Fathers." Chs. 44–50.

ECSTASY. See TRANCE.

ED (עֵד, 'ēdh), 'witness' (Jos 22 34): The Hebrew text here is not in order. It reads literally, "They called the altar 'it is a witness between us that J" is God.'" The Syriac reads, "and they made an altar of witness," using the Aramaic expression we find in Gn 31 47. E. E. N.

EDAR, ĭ'dār. See EDER.

EDEN (עֵדֶן, 'ēdhen), 'delight': I. 1. The original residence of the first human pair (Gn 2 8, 15, 3 23, 24); it is also called "the garden of God" (Ezk 28 13, 31 9), "the garden of Jehovah" (Is 51 3), and in non-Biblical usage, Paradise. According to Gn 2 8 ff. God Himself prepared it and it was abundantly irrigated, furnished with a luxuriance of vegetation, and made the home of all the animals created by God, which here recognized man as their lord. The location of E. has been the subject of many speculations, some of which have nothing but their grotesqueness to give them interest. Palestine, Syria, Armenia, Mongolia, Kashmir, Merv, Australia, Mesopotamia, and even the North Pole have all been suggested as the site. Of these Lower Mesopotamia and Armenia alone deserve consideration (cf. W. F. Warren, Paradise Found, 1886), and the former seems to correspond more nearly to the description in Gn 2 (cf. Delitzsch, Wo lag das Paradies? 1881). The description must, however, in any case be regarded as conceived more or less ideally. There is no spot on earth from which one vast river branches into four channels that encircle such tracts of land as are here named. The fact that the Gihon is said to compass the whole land of Cush may be taken as a reason for thinking that the Nile was meant, especially as the sources of the Nile were supposed by many to be located in Asia (cf. Pausanias, II, 5 2; and Strabo, XV, 1 25). The identity of the Pishon is involved with that of the land of Havilah, and as Havilah is said to yield the best quality of gold and precious stones, either India or Arabia could be taken for it. If it were the former, the Pishon must be the Indus; otherwise it is the sea around the Arabian peninsula, which was supposed to be a very wide river (cf. Worcester, Genesis in the Light of Modern Knowledge, 1901). 2. An Aramæan kingdom on the right bank of the Euphrates, SW. of Haran (II K 19 12; Is 37 12; Ezk 27 23; Am 1 5). It was conquered by Asshurbanipal, King of Assyria (668–626 B.C.). A. C. Z.

II. A Levite in the days of Hezekiah (II Ch 29 12, 31 15). E. E. N.

EDER, ĭ'dẹr (עֶדֶר, 'ēdher), 'flock': I. The head of a Levite family (I Ch 23 23).

II. 1. A town of Judah near the southwestern frontier (Jos 15 21), identified by Conder with Kh. el-'Addâr, near Gaza. 2. Tower of Eder, or 'flock-tower' (Gn 35 21), lying between Beth-lehem and Hebron, or possibly a village near Ephrath. Its name indicates that it was used as a watch-tower to protect the flocks against robbers. I. M. P.

EDOM, ĭ'dọm (אֱדֹם, 'ĕdhōm), 'red': The name given to the land SE. of Palestine (Jer 49 17; Ezk 25 12); also called Seir (Gn 32 3; Nu 24 18; Dt 1 44, etc.). The inhabitants were called Edomites (I S 21 7). Its boundaries are somewhat vaguely designated, but at the time of its greatest extension it reached from the Dead Sea S. to Elath and Ezion-geber, while on the E. the Arabian Desert and on the W. the River of Egypt furnished its natural limits. Its length from N. to S. was about 100 m. It is slightly higher at the central portion, sloping on one side toward the Dead Sea and on the other toward the Ælanitic branch of the Red Sea (Gulf of Akabah). At the highest point it rises to 600 ft. above sea-level. It derives its name from the color of the red sandstone of its precipitous hills.

The earliest contact of E. with Israel is that mentioned in Nu 20 14 ff.; Jg 11 17, when the kings of the country refused the Israelites permission to go through their land, thus compelling them to take the circuitous route to Palestine through Moab. David reduced E. to a tributary of Israel (II S 8 14; Ps 60, title). After the division of the kingdom, Judah maintained its supremacy over E.: for the most part, however, through vassal kings of Edomite stock (II K 3 9; but cf. I K 22 47). Under Joram (849) E. obtained independence (II K 8 20 f.), but lost it again fifty years later when Amaziah routed an army of Edomites and captured their city, Sela (II K 14 7). In 775 Uzziah extended his authority farther south, taking even the harbor city, Elath (II K 14 22). At this point the Biblical narrative fails us for a period. The cuneiform inscriptions, however, furnish data from which it appears that Tiglath-pileser III (734) subjugated its king, Kaushmalaka, and in 701 Sennacherib conquered Malikrammu and annexed E. to the Assyrian empire. Though making common cause with Judah against Nebuchadrezzar in 609 (Jer 27 3), the Edomites broke out in a new flame of hatred against their former allies, at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem (La 4 21; Ob ver. 8 ff.; Ezk 25 12 ff.; Is 34 5, 63 1 ff.). Nothing more is known of their history until 300 B.C., when the E. portion of the land was seized by the Nabatæans, with Petra as the capital. The W. portion, now known as Idumæa, was attacked by Judas Maccabæus (I Mac 5 3) in 164. In 109 John Hyrcanus conquered it, and compelled its inhabitants to be circumcised (Jos. Ant. XIII, 9 1; BJ I, 2 6). By this act the race of Esau was absorbed into that of Jacob. In the NT Idumæa is mentioned only in Mk 3 8; but it was noted as the native land of the Herodian dynasty. In Roman times it was accounted one of the eleven toparchies of Judæa (Jos. BJ III, 3 5). EDREI, ed'rẹ-ai (אֶדְרֶעִי, 'edhre'ī): 1. One of the residences of Og, King of Bashan (Jos 12 4; Nu 21 33), now the large town of ed-Der'ât, between el-Mezeirîb and Boṣrah. Map I, H 5. Numerous ruins and inscriptions have been found at Edrei, besides a remarkable series of ancient subterranean dwellings, apparently excavated to serve as a refuge in time of siege (Schumacher, Across the Jordan, pp. 121–148). 2. A city of Naphtali (Jos 19 37), perhaps Ya'ter, 12 m. In pre-Deuteronomic Israel, the training of the young appears to have been entirely in the hands of their parents, especially the fathers.

1. In the Earliest Times. No trace of any institution resembling the modern school is to be found; nor is there evidence of any help available to the parent in the form of a familiar method, model, or means of instruction. Both the subject and the method of education were absolutely at his discretion. It is safe to assume, however, that even from the earliest days the instruction of the young included the inculcation, first of religious ideas, and second, of the traditions of the nation (chiefly the story of the Exodus). The discipline of chastening inflicted by the parent is an image of that inflicted on Israel by J" (Dt 8 5).

2. From Deuteronomy to the Exile. With the promulgation of Deuteronomy, a crystallized body of precepts was put into the hands of the parent to communicate to his children, and a definite injunction placed upon him to be faithful in this task (Dt 4 9, 6 7). The method of instruction was naturally oral, and the times and conditions, as well as the effectiveness with which the task was performed, depended on the circumstances of each case. It was a great gain, however, to have a definite substance of teaching to impart.

This condition of things lasted with very little practical change until after the Exile.

3. Under Ezra. Reading and writing were during this period the accomplishment of the few (II K 5 7, 22 8 ff., 23 2). When Ezra undertook to render the Law (Torah) the organic principle of the national life, he gave the whole subject of education a new impulse. In order to accomplish his end, it was necessary very largely to extend the circle of those who could read the Law, and further to make provision for the circulation of copies of it among the people. Ezra himself was a "ready scribe" (Ezr 7 6). The number of accredited teachers was greatly increased (Ezr 8 16).

4. The Wise Men as Teachers. Meantime, in the pre-exilic period, a class of men had appeared who under the name of "the Wise" (Sages) cultivated a type of erudition with results that survive in the so-called Wisdom Literature of the O T. These, together with the copyists and expounders of the Torah (the Scribes), now became the teachers of Israel. While the substance of the teaching developed into three parts (i.e., the Law, the Traditions (History), and Wisdom), it was all generally under the direction of the same class of teachers. See WISDOM.

5. Proverbs and Its Light on the Subject. The Book of Proverbs, of which the Wisdom of the Son of Sirach is a later reflection, furnishes, under the name instruction, mūsār (1 2, etc.), a mass of details of the educational ideas of this period. First of all, the instructors of the children were still in the main their parents (Pr 1 8, 4 1-4, 6 20, 13 1, 30 17). The chief substance of the teaching concerned religious matters. The fear of J" is the beginning ("the chief part" RVmg.) of knowledge (Pr 1 7). Education is of the greatest importance. It means the expulsion of an innate folly (Pr 22 15, cf. 14 7, 18). It is, therefore, a source of great delight to have one's offspring come under its influence (Pr 10 1, 23 24). As a means of enforcing the lessons of life the rod may be used (13 24, 23 13), but with moderation (Pr 19 18 RV).

6. Post-exilic Period. It was during the post-exilic period that professional teachers made their appearance, and also that a place for the meeting of groups of children for instruction was found in the synagogue (to-day called Schule in Yiddish, and Scola by the Portuguese Jews). Details, however, as to the beginning of the system are scanty. It is probable that after the synagogue-school was organized the children in it were made to memorize the precepts of the Torah verbatim. To this end resort must have been had, as in all primitive countries and in the Orient to-day, to mnemonic helps, such as acrostics and numerical proverbs (cf. Pr 30 and 31).

7. School System Established. The fullest development of the educational system of Palestine, however, is to be found in the Roman period, i.e., from 75 B.C. to 70 A.D. It is a question as to whether Simon ben Shetaḥ or Joshua ben Gamla (Gamaliel) deserves the credit of inaugurating the new system (Schürer stands for the latter, Kennedy [in HDB] and Box [in EB] for the former). Whoever introduced it, it was based upon compulsory attendance of all children. It is certain that under Gamaliel the age for attendance was fixed at from six to seven.

8. The System at Work. The school was held either in the synagogue-room or in a separate building on the same premises (Berakh. 17a). The further expansion of the system involved the separation of the students of higher branches from high schools and colleges. Of the synagogues of Jerusalem it is said that each had a Beth Sepher and a Beth Talmud, i.e., a primary and a higher school for the more advanced scholars who might wish to become learned in the Law; a still higher institution (professional) was developed, known as the Beth hammidrash (Yalkut Jes. 257; Jos. Ant. XVIII, 10 5; BJ, I, 3 72). Similarly, teachers were classed in three groups, the highest grade being that of Sage (Ḥakima), the second that of Scribe (Saphir), and the third the Master (Ḥazzan). All together are evidently included in the N T terms doctor (Lk 2 46, teachers), or "doctors of the law" (Ac 5 34). These were found in every village (Lk 5 17) and were called Rabbis (Jn 3 2). The method of procedure in such schools could not have been different from what may be witnessed in the great Moslem universities at the present day (cf. Ac 22 3). Here scholars seated on the ground in a circle face the teacher, who occupies a seat raised slightly above the pupils. From this position he imparts instruction which the pupil is required to repeat accurately over and over again until he is thoroughly familiar with it. Repetition was so thoroughly identified with this process that both teaching and learning came to be called Mishna, 'repetition.' That the home, however, continued a means of religious training is evident from expressions such as II Ti 3 14.

9. "Schoolmaster."

The task of taking children to school primarily devolved on the parent (Kidd. 30a); but in certain communities the fear lest on account of lukewarmness the parents should neglect this duty led to the choice of special officials to perform it (maphtir kenessiōth [Cholin 51a]). Among the Greeks the same duty devolved on a special servant who, from the nature of it, was called the 'child-conductor' (Gal 3 24 tutor, schoolmaster AV).

10. Doctrine.

The substance of instruction was from the earliest days viewed as something to be seized hold of (leqaḥ, "doctrine," Dt 32 2; Job 11 4; Pr 4 2); also what is heard (shᵉmū'āh, Is 28 9, but "message" RV, "report" RVmg. But in the N T the Gr. διδαχή and διδασκαλία, probably 'teaching,' are rendered by "doctrine" in AV (also in RV in I Ti 5 17; Mt 7 28).

11. Non-Jewish Learning.

The question of instruction in other than the Hebrew language, or in other subjects than the wisdom of the Fathers is not a simple one. Officially, nothing but the traditional system was recognized; and yet there are traces of the introduction of Hellenic methods and even of the existence of an institution in Jerusalem which was designed to convey and disseminate Greek philosophy and Greek ideals. In one of these Herod the Great was a student (Jos. Ant. XV, 10 6). At any rate, many Jews did certainly acquire a considerable amount of Greek learning. Some familiarity with it was a necessary qualification for membership in the Sanhedrin, and the Apostle Paul seems to have been versed in it. The distinctive feature of Greek education, which involved the appearance of the pupils in public gymnasia in nude form, was distasteful and offensive to the Jewish sense of modesty (I Mac 1 14 ff.; II Mac 4 10).

12. Education of Women.

When education passed out of its household stage its development was almost exclusively with reference to the male members of society. The training of girls remained a task of the mother and had for its main object their preparation for ideal motherhood (Pr 31 27-29).

EGGS. See FOOD, § 10.

EGLAH, eg'lā (עֶגְלָה, 'eglāh), 'heifer': One of David's wives, mother of Ithream (II S 3 5; I Ch 3 3). The expression "David's wife" in these passages awakens the suspicion that originally the name of a former husband was read, as in the case of Abigail, "wife of Nabal" (II S 3 3). E. E. N.

EGLAIM, eg'la-im (אֶגְלַיִם, 'eglayim): A city of Moab (Is 15 8). It has not been identified, but probably is the Agallim mentioned by Eusebius, 8 Roman m. S. of Kir (see Map II, H 4), a region abounding in ruins. E. E. N.

EGLATH-SHELISHIYAH, eg"lath-shel"i-shai'yā (עֶגְלַת שְׁלִשִׁיָּה, 'eglath shᵉlishiyyāh): A term used in Is 15 5; Jer 48 34, apparently as a place-name as in RV, although 'the third Eglath' would be a very unusual form for a proper name. Many scholars suspect a corruption of the text. E. E. N.

EGLON, eg'lon (עֶגְלוֹן, 'eglōn), 'circle': I. A king of Moab who formed an alliance with Ammon and Amalek against Israel in the period of the Judges, and having overcome, held the Israelites in subjection for 18 years (Jg 3 12-14). When his tyranny became intolerable, Ehud, the left-handed Benjamite, upon the pretext of bringing him the annual tribute, secured a private interview and assassinated him (Jg 3 15-25). Cf. Moore in Int. Crit. Com.

II. A city of the Amorites in the Shephelah. Its king, Debir, joined the alliance of the five cities against Joshua (Jos 10 3). With the collapse of the allies, it fell into the hands of Joshua and was destroyed (Jos 10 16-27). See Map II, C 2.

I. INTRODUCTORY.—The word Egypt is from the Gr. ἡ Αἴγυπτος (whence the modern Copt, through the Arab. Ḳibt). In the O T it corresponds geographically to the Hebrew מִצְרַיִם (English, Mizraim as in Gn 10 6, etc.), which is the common Semitic word for Egypt with an old Hebrew locative ending.

1. The Territory.

Each of the above names designates the region stretching northward from the first Cataract of the Nile at Assouan (Syene) to the Mediterranean coast-line, a distance of over 600 miles by the river. The division into Lower and Upper Egypt (the former including the Delta and the region of Memphis), which is known to have existed even in prehistoric days, is marked in Hebrew literature by the use of the name Pathros to designate the latter (Is 11 11; Jer 44 1, 15; Ezk 29 14, 30 14), the inhabitants being called Pathrusim (Gn 10 14). This name is Egyptian, meaning the 'Land of the South.' The breadth of the Nile valley which forms the real Egyptian country as marked off from the desert, varies from 3 to 10 m. S. of the Delta, which near the sea attains a breadth of 120 m. The soil of the valley is of great fertility. The dark-colored mud brought down by the Nile suggested the native Egyptian name of the country, Kemt, the 'black land,' as distinguished from the bright-colored soil of the desert.

2. The Inhabitants.

It is now generally agreed that the ancient Egyptians had close Semitic affinities. The points of contact that are surest are the linguistic. The languages of both races have nearly the same set of pronominal suffixes, the same endings for genders, and also most of their numerals alike. They have besides in common the use of a construct state, as well as several analogies in verb-inflection. More fundamental still is the practical identity of the consonants, including the peculiar Semitic gutturals. The vocabularies, however, are disappointing, showing very few close resemblances. It is also very questionable whether the original ideographic systems of writing have a common origin. But grammatical analogies are the surest test of relationship, and they point here to a kinship radical even if very remote. But both the physiognomy of the monumental sculptures and the racial peculiarities betray the presence of an additional, non-Semitic element in the population, which is neither negro nor negroid. We are forced to the conclusion that the missing components are to be sought among some of the vanished races of Northern Africa, of which the Libyans NW. of Egypt, and the Cushites to the S., may be regarded as representative.

3. Chronology.

On the very difficult subject of chronology the chief sources of information are the ancient lists of kings with more or less definite notations of time attached to them. The current division of historical time is that of Manetho, an Egyptian priest who wrote in Greek about 270 B.C., and whose work has been fairly well preserved in summaries or references by Josephus, Africanus, and Eusebius. He made out 31 dynasties of kings, with the length of each dynasty in years. A supplement is afforded by monumental lists in temples, in tombs, or on papyri. These do not give the regnal years. Annals of kings inscribed in temples or in tombs give important data. In spite of these helps, there is no agreement among scholars as to the lengths of the earlier dynasties. Consequently also the total length of Egyptian history is still a matter of conjecture. A table of "minimal dates" compiled by Edouard Meyer makes the first dynasty to have begun in 3180 B.C. Petrie puts it at 4777 B.C. Perhaps the beginning of the history of Egypt as a unified state may be put a century or two after 4000 B.C. Back to the 16th cent. B.C. a reasonable degree of accuracy has been gained, and astronomical calculations have aided in fixing a few important epochs.

II. History.—Two stages may be inferentially traced in the antecedents of the history proper. At first there was the formation of numerous small communities, each with its own tutelary deities. Then the natural division of the country (§ 1) favored for a time the existence of two dominant kingdoms. Ancient authorities agree unanimously that the first historic dynasty of united Egypt was that of King Menes, whose tomb is thought to have been discovered just N. of Thebes in 1897. Already the political center was established at Memphis in Lower Egypt. In the fourth dynasty the civilization of Egypt comes before us as a finished product. This is the dynasty of the great pyramid-builders, the largest pyramid being that of Cheops (Chufu), the second of the line. The fifth dynasty was little distinguished. The sixth has left written and artistic memorials all through Egypt, with records of expeditions to Nubia and NW. Arabia. Of the dynasties from the seventh to the twelfth we know little directly. It is clear, however, that the rulers of Memphis were unable to hold that city as their capital, since they transferred their residence to Heracleopolis, S. of the Fayûm. Here they failed to maintain themselves against the princes of Thebes, to whom they at length gave their allegiance.

4. The Old Empire.

With the tenth dynasty the "Old Kingdom" came to an end. The "Middle Kingdom," which lasted from the eleventh dynasty to the fourteenth, showed great vigor and enterprise in its earlier stages. The period is signalized by the predominance of Thebes. Of the twelfth dynasty monuments are found everywhere as far up the Nile as the Second Cataract. A complete conquest of Nubia was now effected, with a great increase of wealth in gold, slaves, and fighting men.

5. The Middle Empire.

In the thirteenth dynasty began that steady influx of the Asiatics which resulted finally in the rule of the Hyksos, as Manetho terms them. Their origin is not yet fully made out. The invaders were, it is certain, largely Semites from Palestine and Syria; but they possibly may have been impelled by non-Semites from Asia Minor. It was in the eastern part of the Delta that the strangers had their headquarters, whence at length they made their authority felt throughout Egypt proper. A marked result of their sway was the introduction of Semitic words into the language of the Egyptians and of Semitic gods into their worship. Upper Egypt was naturally least contented under the foreign rule, and long resistance on its part gradually changed into aggression, so that finally at the close of the seventeenth dynasty the Hyksos were almost wholly expelled from the country.

6. The Hyksos.

With the eighteenth dynasty (c. 1587–1400 B.C.) begins the "New Kingdom," Thebes being again the capital. Egypt now attains to the summit of its power. It was found that the only sure means of excluding the troublesome Asiatics was to occupy their territory, and so campaigns in Western Asia became the order of the day. Two of the greatest conquerors of the time were Thothmes I, the third ruler of the dynasty, and Thothmes III, the sixth of the line. The latter extended his sway as far as the Euphrates. In the first 20 years of his rule he conducted fifteen campaigns in Asia; but the remainder of his long reign (1503–

7. New Empire. 18th Dynasty.

1449 B.C.) was mainly devoted to the arts of peace. He was the most powerful of all the Pharaohs. It was really a new Egypt that he ruled. Horses and chariots, imported from Asia, had changed the aspect of war and made it a new profession. Asiatic wives, customs, and gods became fashionable. The closest relations were maintained with all Western Asia. Wealth and luxury increased enormously. The official class grew at the expense of the tillers of the soil, and of that class the priesthood was the greatest gainer. At length, the fourth ruler after Thothmes III, Amenophis IV, "the heretic king," being tired of the priestly yoke, determined to found a new and more manageable religion—the sole worship of the sun's disk (Aten). To this end he chose a new capital on the site of the modern Tell-el-Amarna, halfway between Thebes and the old capital Memphis. The attempt was unsuccessful. A few years later the dynasty itself came to an end with Thebes once more the seat of government (c. 1380 B.C.). A great discovery has made known to us the Asiatic relations of this dynasty. At El-Amarna were found in 1887 over 300 letters, on tablets bearing cuneiform characters, from Babylonia, Assyria, N. Mesopotamia (Mitani), Syria, and Palestine. From the two countries last named native governors, appointed by the Egyptian court, describe the precarious condition of their garrisons during the reigns of Amenophis III and IV. Among the familiar localities from which letters were written were Tyre, Beirût, Accho, Gaza, Askalon, and Jerusalem.

8. Nineteenth Dynasty.

The no less famous nineteenth dynasty had not only to set Egypt right internally but also to reestablish its power in Asia. The Hittites, now a strong confederacy, completely occupied Syria and were threatening Palestine. Seti I, the third king of the line, after much fighting, was fain to treat with the Hittite king. They agreed that the Egyptians might rule as far as Lebanon and the Hittites thence northward. Seti's successor, Rameses II (c. 1340–1273), spent the first 21 of the 67 years of his reign in desperate conflicts with the Hittites, which left him very nearly where he began. A treaty with the Hittites, a very elaborate affair, was then made, which was long faithfully kept on both sides. Rameses spent the most of his reign in beautifying and strengthening his kingdom. To carry out his designs he made use of the populations of the conquered tribes. Among others were the Hebrew people who had settled and prospered on the E. of the Delta. During the Asiatic invasions their lot was naturally grievous. Rameses in particular pressed them hard with his rigorous system of forced labor. Pithom (q.v.) and Raamses (q.v.) were two of the military stations which they helped to construct in order to make sure the hold of Egypt upon N. Arabia and Palestine. But the most dangerous enemies did not come from the old roving tribes of the eastern desert and its oases. Meneptah, the son of Rameses II, found his reckoning with the western Libyans the most serious business of his reign. With them were allied pirates and land robbers from various parts of the eastern and northern shores and islands of the Mediterranean, who had already wrought much destruction on the Syrian and Phœnician coast. The combination was defeated, and Egypt was saved for a time. In Palestine Meneptah had no very secure dominion. Among the peoples whom he claims to have subdued in that region Israel is given a place—the only mention of the name, so far as is yet known, upon the Egyptian monuments. It is doubtful whether the Hebrew "Exodus" had then (c. 1260 B.C.) taken place. The closing years of the dynasty were marked by confusion and anarchy.

9. Loss of Palestine.

Something like order was effected by Rameses III (c. 1220–1190), the founder with his father of the twentieth dynasty. He had to repel renewed attacks from the Libyans; also a more formidable incursion of the maritime barbarians, who were defeated near the very border of Egypt. Their devastations broke up the remnants of the Hittite empire in Syria and made Palestine more insecure than ever for the Egyptians.

10. The Libyan Régime.

The New Kingdom now gave place to foreign domination, which lasted from the twenty-second to the twenty-fifth dynasty. The founder of the new order was Sheshonk (Shishak), a Libyan who had been commander of the army. It was he who gave shelter to Jeroboam as a fugitive from King Solomon. But in the reigns of Jeroboam and Rehoboam he made a raid upon the two kingdoms of Israel. Though Jerusalem was occupied and plundered, the Egyptians soon disappeared. Not long thereafter, the Ethiopians began the invasion which made them masters of the whole of Egypt. The end of the Libyan régime found 20 independent princes in the Delta. These were subdued by Pianchi, the Ethiopian king, who wisely left to them their petty realms on condition of vassalage. Hence the twenty-third and twenty-fourth dynasties are named after Egyptian kings. But the twenty-fifth under Sabako, grandson of Pianchi, is titularly Ethiopian (728–645 B.C.).

11. Ethiopian Dynasty.

The princes of the Delta accordingly followed the lead of the Ethiopians, though seeming often to act an independent part. Thus one of them, named Seve ("So," II K 17 4), allied himself with the Philistines of Gaza and Hoshea of Israel against Assyria. As a result, however, Egypt narrowly escaped invasion. When the Assyrian Sennacherib came against Palestine (701 B.C.), the Ethiopian Tirhaka (702–662 B.C.) marched to the relief of Hezekiah, King of Judah, and was defeated.

12. Assyrian Domination.

But Tirhaka remained a constant obstacle to Assyria until Esarhaddon, son of Sennacherib, carried the war into Africa, and in 670 annexed the country as far as Thebes. A rebellion against his successor, Asshurbanipal, was put down with great severity. Thebes was taken, and met with a cruel fate at the hands of the Assyrians (cf. Nah 3 8 ff.). A final defeat in Nubia itself made an end of the Ethiopian dynasty. The Assyrian triumph was promoted by Necho I, a powerful prince of the Delta, who after the flight and death of Tirhaka went over to the conquerors. But the son of Necho, Psammetichus I, with the help of troops sent by Gyges, King of Lydia, rebelled against Assyria, and by 645 B.C. Asshurbanipal had to relinquish Egypt, where his people had been in control a quarter of a century.

Thus Psammetichus became the founder of the twenty-sixth dynasty, under which the power of Egypt revived greatly. He and his successor, Necho II, favored the immigration of Greek settlers and developed a great maritime commerce. The decline of Assyria encouraged the hope that Egypt might found a new Asiatic empire. Just before the fall of Nineveh, Necho struck into Palestine and Syria (608 B.C.). Josiah of Judah, as a vassal of Assyria, intercepted his march and was slain at Megiddo. His kingdom came under Egyptian control. Syria was also soon subdued by Necho. But the whole country had to be given up after his defeat at Carchemish (604 B.C.) by Nebuchadrezzar, the Chaldean crown prince. Yet Egyptian intrigues in Asia were still continued. Jehoiakim of Judah, once an Egyptian vassal, and the last king, Zedekiah, were induced to revolt against Babylon. The promised help was precarious, and the two captivities of Judah were the result. Some time after the fall of Jerusalem, Egypt was overrun by Nebuchadrezzar (cf. Jer 46 13 f.), but was not long occupied by him. Generally Egypt prospered until after the rise of Persia under Cyrus the Great. In his time Amasis (Ahmes II) was on the throne. To check the progress of Cyrus he made a futile league with Crœsus, King of Lydia, and Nabonidus, the last native king of Babylon.

13. Revival of Native Rule.

Cambyses, son of Cyrus, subdued Egypt and Ethiopia in 525. The Persian dominion thus established lasted for more than 100 years. The great statesman Darius Hystaspes (521–486) tried with success to administer Egypt on its old religious and, locally, on its old political lines. A few revolts at intervals failed; but an outbreak against Darius II in 414 made the country once more independent. It maintained itself under three nominal dynasties (twenty-eighth to thirtieth) till the vigorous Artaxerxes III of Persia (Ochus) subdued it after a desperate struggle (about 349 B.C.). The brief reigns of Ochus and Darius Codomannus are reckoned as the thirty-first dynasty.

14. Persian Régime, Followed by Brief Native Rule.

Alexander of Macedon, after the final defeat of Darius (331), went over into Egypt. With the founding of Alexandria he established also that Hellenic culture which tolerated and at length superseded the old Egyptian civilization. Hence when Egypt again became independent under the Ptolemies (323–31 B.C.) its ancient form and spirit were changed forever.

15. Egypt Hellenized.

The religion of Egypt is in its early stages very obscure. It is also mysterious all through the dynastic ages. The basis of the popular religion was, as elsewhere, partly animistic and partly mythological. The former element is relatively much stronger than in the purely Semitic religions. That is to say, the worship of spirits—in men and animals—had practically more sway than had the personification of objects of nature, as in myths of the sun-god, darkness, clouds, and rain, or in the deification of the hidden powers residing in trees or rivers and fountains or in haunted or uncanny neighborhoods. Thus the doctrine of immortality early took hold of the people and gave character to their religion everywhere. The polytheism of Egypt—originally to a great extent a polydemonism—arose from the combination of many local cults. This in its turn was due to the political alliance and ultimate union of the "nomes" or the districts into which the country was very early divided (§ 4). Further back we see in each of the surviving divinities a tribal deity which was doubtless in many cases the totem of a family or clan. At the other extreme we see how Ptaḥ, the deity of Memphis, became, with the rise of that city, a great national god; and a like honor was conferred later upon Amon as the god of Thebes ("No-amon," Jer 46 25; cf. Nah 3 8). Again, the various leading deities are grouped about one or the other of the two imperial gods Ra and Osiris; the one giving and controlling life, the other ruling the world of the dead. Along with those four was Hapi, the god of the Nile. Other famous deities, not easily classified, were Horus, Hathor, Nest, Isis, and Set. The rampant animism of the religion is shown in the prevailing notions as to human existence. Besides the soul, the spirit, and the shadow of the man, there was the most important of all, his Ka, or 'double.' The counterpart of each individual was held to survive with him after death as long as the body remained incorrupt. Hence the need and practise of embalming the dead. The various divinities were worshiped, we may presume, partly as emblems, partly as survivals of primitive totem superstition, and partly because certain sacred objects, beneficent or maleficent, had to be propitiated. The religion of Egypt, like its language and political system, was too singular and unsympathetic to exercise any appreciable influence on the people of any other country or race.

16. Religion of Egypt.

LITERATURE: The most useful general works on Egypt are Erman, Aegypten u. aegyptisches Leben, 1885 (Eng. tr., Egyptian Life, 1894), and Baedeker's Handbook (ed. by Steindorff, 1902). These works contain historical sections, and excellent histories have been written by Ed. Meyer, 1887; Wiedemann, 1891 (valuable for O T study); Petrie, 1894, 1896; Breasted, 1905. The last-named has published Historical Records of Egypt, 5 vols., 1906–7.
There are also two good primers of Egypt, one by Wendel, 1887, and the other by Murison, in Bible Class Primers, 1902. The articles by Crum in DB and W. M. Müller in EB are very valuable summaries. All these have much to say about the religion and art of Egypt. The latter is dealt with in the special work of Perrot and Chipiez, Histoire de l'Art, vol. I, 1882.

EHI, ē'hī (אֵחִי, 'ēḥī): The ancestor of a Benjamite clan (Gn 46 21). But the text here is corrupt and should be changed according to Nu 26 38 f., so that for Ehi we should read Ahiram (q.v.). E. E. N.

EHUD, ē'hud (אֵהוּד, 'ēhūdh), 'strong': 1. A great-grandson of Benjamin (I Ch 7 10, 8 6). 2. A son of Gera, a left-handed Benjamite leader of Israel, one of the earlier judges. He delivered Israel from the oppression of Eglon, the Moabite tyrant (Jg 3 15–4 1), by assassinating him. A. C. Z.

EKER, ī'kẹr (עֵקֶר, 'ēqer): A grandson of Jerahmeel (I Ch 2 27). E. E. N.

EKRON, ek'rọn (עֶקְרוֹן, 'eqrōn), gentilic Ekronite (Jos 13 3): The northernmost of the five cities of the Philistines, Map III, C 5. In the division of the land under Joshua it was assigned to Judah (Jos 15 45), but also later to Dan (Jos 19 43). It is about 25 m. SW. of Jerusalem and 9 m. from the sea (mod. Akir). It had a shrine of Baalzebub (II K 1 2, 3, 6), where the Ark of J" was for a time held by the Philistines (I S 5 10, 6 16). The city is mentioned but once in the Egyptian records. In the Assyrian inscriptions, however, from Sennacherib and later (cf. Schrader, COT, II, 164), its kings are often named. A. C. Z.

EL: The Hebrew אֵל, 'ēl, means God, i.e., deity. It is frequently a part of compound proper names, in some instances prefixed, in others postfixed to the other element. It is often found in the form eli, e.g., Eliab (see also Abi, names with), which may mean 'my God is father' or simply 'God is father' — the i being merely connective. These names express a great variety of relations. See Gray, Hebrew Proper Names, and the article Names in EB, 24–39. E. E. N.

ELA, ī'la (אֵלָא, 'ēlā'; Elah AV): The father of Shimei, one of Solomon's prefects (I K 4 18). E. E. N.

ELADAH, el'a-dā. See Eleadah.

ELAH, ī'lā (אֵלָה, 'ēlāh): I. 1. The son and successor of Baasha, King of Israel (I K 16 6-14). After a reign of a little more than a year he was murdered while in a state of intoxication by Zimri, one of the officers of his army. 2. One of the chiefs ("dukes" AV) of Edom (Gn 36 41). 3. The father of Shimei (I K 4 18). 4. The father of Hoshea, last king of Israel (II K 15 30). 5. A son of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (I Ch 4 15). 6. A Benjamite (I Ch 9 8).

II. A valley where David slew Goliath (I S 17 2), near Shocoh, Map II, D 1. A. C. Z.

ELAM, ī'lam (עֵילָם, 'ēlām), Babyl. Elamtu, Gr. Ἐλυμαΐς, Elymais: I. The Hebrew name of a region lying to the E. of Babylonia and extending, in the days of its greatest prosperity, well up into the lower ranges of the mountains of Media to the NE., and along the Persian Gulf to the borders of the ancient Persis in the S. The chief divisions were Elam proper in the N., and Anzan or Anshan in the S., the latter at first being an independent kingdom, then long incorporated with Elam, and finally annexed by the rising power of Persia (about 600 B.C.; cf. Jer 49 34 ff.), Cyrus the Great being hereditary "Prince of Anshan." The capital of E. was Susa (Shushan, q.v.). The Elamites were a non-Semitic people, probably akin to the Cosseans on the N., and possibly also to the so-called Sumerians of early S. Babylonia. In Gn 10 22 they are called children of Shem, apparently on account of their close relations with the Babylonians (see Arpachshad, under Ethnography and Ethnology, §11).

1. The Country and People.

with the suzerainty of the western Semites (cf. Gn 14 1 ff.). This dominion was subverted by a subject prince, the great Hammurabi (Amraphel, Gn 14 1), about 2240 B.C., and the Elamites never again became lords of all Babylonia. After the Assyrians began to subdue Babylonia E. was drawn into sympathy with the latter for self-preservation, and became for a time its steadfast ally. With the complete subversion of Babylonian autonomy by the Assyrian Assurbanipal E. fell a prey to the conqueror (645 B.C.). Susa was taken, and many of the people deported to Samaria (Ezr 4 9 f.). Upon the breaking up of the Assyrian empire N. Elam fell to the Medes, and Anshan, as already mentioned, to the Persians. In Is 21 2 E. is made equivalent to the rising kingdom of Persia. J. F. McC.

II. 1. A son of Shem (Gn 10 22; I Ch 1 17), ancestor of the Elamites (see I, above). 2. A Benjamite (I Ch 8 24). 3. A Korahite doorkeeper of the time of David (I Ch 26 3). 4. The name of a family, of which 1,254 returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 7; Neh 7 12) and 71 with Ezra (Ezr 8 7). One of this family urged Ezra to put an end to mixed marriages (Ezr 10 2); as a result, six of the family put away their wives (Ezr 10 26). In Neh 10 14 a chief of the family, who sealed the covenant. 5. "The other Elam" (Ezr 2 31; Neh 7 34), probably the same as 4. 6. A priest who assisted in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12 42). C. S. T.

ELASAH, el'a-sā. See Eleasah.

ELATH, ī'lath (אֵילַת, 'ēlath), also ELOTH: A town on the NE. arm of the Red Sea (cf. I K 9 26). The name, meaning 'palms' or 'oaks' (i.e., large sacred trees), probably indicates that it was a very ancient seat of worship. By El Paran (Gn 14 6) and Elah (Gn 36 41) perhaps the same place is meant. Its commercial importance, which lasted through the Roman period, is attested by the notices in I K 9 26; II K 14 22, 16 6 (where read "Edomites" for "Syrians"). From the Greek names Αἰλών, Αἰλάν, etc., due to the Aram. 'ēlānā (= Heb. 'ēlath), comes the name of the Elanitic Gulf. The modern name is 'Akabah. See Guthe, PRE[3], vol. 5, pp. 285–287. E. EL-BETHEL, el-beth'el. See Bethel.

ELDAAH, el-dē'ā (אֶלְדָּעָה, 'eldā'āh): The ancestor of a Midianite tribe (Gn 25 4; I Ch 1 33). See also Ethnography and Ethnology, § 11. E. E. N.

ELDAD, el'dad (אֶלְדָּד, 'eldādh), 'God is a friend': One of the two elders who exercised the prophetic gifts thought to be the exclusive privilege of Moses (Nu 11 26 f.). While their doing so was an occasion of suspicion to others, Moses rejoiced in it. A. C. Z.

ELDAD AND MODAD, BOOK OF. See Apocalyptic Literature, § 3.

ELDER: The unit of primitive Semitic society was the clan, or large family, whose eldest representatives constituted the ruling element of the clan. In primitive Israel the elders of the clans represented the nation as a whole. When Israel conquered Canaan and adopted the agricultural mode of life, it was an easy transition for the clan-elders to become the elders of the city or town communities, which were composed (at first) mainly of members of the same clan. It was this fundamental element of the ancient Hebrew society that formed the basis of the later extension of the significance of the term to indicate the chief men of a community, the wise men, the leading men of the synagogue, or of the local church, the influential leaders of the Jewish nation, etc. See CHURCH, §§ 3, 8; CITY, § 5; FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, §§ 4, 8, and LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE, §§ 1 (1), 2 (1). ELEAD, el'ẹ-ad (אֶלְעָד, 'el'ādh), 'God has witnessed' or 'God is witness' (I Ch 7 20 ff.): The passage is very interesting—a specimen of the fragments of ancient folk-lore which occur here and there in the genealogical lists of the O T. Elead was evidently an Ephraimitic clan that was destroyed by the men of Gath—probably in the days of the Judges, its fate causing great sorrow in the tribe. E. E. N.

ELEADAH, el''ẹ-ê'dā (אֶלְעָדָה, 'el'ādhāh): The head of an Ephraimite family (I Ch 7 20; Eladah AV; cf. ELEAD). E. E. N.

ELEALEH, î''lẹ-ê'le or ê''le-ā'lê (אֶלְעָלֵה, 'el'ālēh): A town of Moab, near Heshbon. Map II, J 1. It became the possession of the Reubenites at the time of the Conquest (Nu 32 3, 37), but the Moabites afterward reoccupied it (Is 15 4, 16 9; Jer 48 34). E. E. N.

ELEASAH, el''ẹ-ê'sā (אֶלְעָשָׂה, 'el'āsāh). More correctly Elasah, 'God has made' or 'done': 1. An official under King Zedekiah, entrusted with a message to Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 29 3). 2. A descendant of Judah (I Ch 2 39). 3. A descendant of Jonathan (I Ch 8 37, 9 43). 4. One of the "sons of Pashhur" who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 22). E. E. N.

ELEAZAR, el''ẹ-ê'zar (אֶלְעָזָר, 'el'āzār), 'God has helped': 1. The third son and successor of Aaron in the high-priestly office (Nu 20 25 ff.) which he held under Moses and Joshua (Jos 24 33). 2. A son of Abinadab, appointed guardian of the Ark of the Covenant in the days of Samuel (I S 7 1 ff.). 3. A son of Dodai and one of David's three heroes (II S 23 9). 4. One of the sons of Merari of the tribe of Levi (I Ch 23 21). 5. A priest and musician in Nehemiah's time (Neh 12 42). 6. A priest in Ezra's time (Ezr 8 33). 7. One of the "sons of Parosh" who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 25). 8. One of the ancestors of Joseph, the husband of Mary (Mt 1 15). ELECT. See ELECTION; also PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF, §§ 2, 3.

ELECTION: The religion of revelation regards God as active from the beginning and throughout the whole course of history. The notion that man has been employed, on the religious side, in seeking out an otiose deity or that deity is a universal impersonal principle, to discover which is the acme of human effort, has no place in the whole course of history described by the Bible. There God is constantly presented as the One whose action is the cause of religious experiences, as truly as of the natural world itself. That human nature is active, too, goes without saying. But this human activity, the life of a free spiritual being, does not abolish, it merely determines the form of the Divine action. Hence the fully developed view of God in the later prophets of the O T looks upon Him as the actual Lord of all peoples. Egypt and Assyria no less than Israel and Judah, a Pharaoh (Gn 41 28-32; Ex 6 1, 7 3) and Cyrus (Is 44 28, 45 1) no less than Moses and David, are the servants of His will. But this universal authority and power of God are not characterized by mere sameness of interest and operation toward all. The Divine will defines its purpose with each race and with each man. This definiteness of God's will, this selective action, has appeared most clearly along one central line of history, viz., in His dealings with Israel and above all in the person and gospel of Jesus Christ. The will of God is set forth as the continuous working out of a purpose of grace, which at last is to include all nations within its sweep (Gn 12 3; Is 45 6, 49 1-7, 66 19; Mal 1 11; Acts 3 24 f.; Gal 3 8, etc.). But, as in the consummation God's grace must apprehend and perfect each man, so in its whole historical course it operates deliberately, selectively. It is God's will which directs all the steps toward that far-off goal.

These steps appear, as to the O T, (1) in the choice of a people through whom the end is to be achieved (Dt 4 37, 7 6-8, 10 15, 14 2; I K 3 8; Is 14 1; Hag 2 4, 5). Hence Israel is even called "my chosen" (Is 42 1, 45 4, 65 9, 22), and we speak of them as "the Chosen People." (2) In the choice within that people of individuals, etc., as the special organs of revelation (as kings, I S 10 24, 12 13; II S 6 21; I K 8 16; I Ch 28 5, 29 1; prophets, I S 3 4 ff.; Is 6 8, 9; Jer 1 4 ff.; Ezk 2 1-3; Am 7 15; place of worship, Dt 12 11; etc.). (3) In the dealings of God with each soul, as to its own relations to Him. This aspect of experience is of course described with special fulness throughout the Book of Psalms. There the sense of relationship with J" is always as of one who depends wholly upon the Divine righteousness, mercy, and encompassing wisdom and power.

The idea of the Divine initiative is expressed by the use of two words, bāḥar, 'to choose,' and qārā', 'to call'; the one looking at the matter from the side of God's will and the other from the side of that overt act in which His will becomes known to the human mind. But some of the references given above, especially as to the prophets, show that this Divine initiative is often most powerfully set forth, where neither word is used, but where the circumstances are stated through which the Divine will became manifest.

In the N T this aspect of God's relations to men is, if possible, made still more prominent. Again, two words are used to describe the fact in its two elements, of choice (ἐκλέγεσθαι, ἐκλογή, ἐκλεκτός) and call (κλῆσις, κλητός). Of Jesus it is never said that He was "called," except in a quotation (Mt 2 15; cf. Hos 11 1). But He is said to have been chosen (Lk 9 35; Jn 1 34 [?]). Jesus again is said to have both chosen (Lk 6 13; Jn 6 70, 13 18, 15 16, 19) and called (Mt 4 21; Mk 1 20) His disciples. The famous saying "Many are called but few chosen" (Mt. 22 14) is so difficult because it seems to contrast the words in a manner quite unparalleled in Scripture. Our Lord says of Himself that He came to call sinners to repentance (Mt 9 13 and ‖). In His parables He freely represents God as inviting (or calling) men into the kingdom, under the picture of a host inviting his guests (Mt 22 1-14; Lk 14 7-24). This call some accept and some even contemptuously reject. As a whole, the teaching of Jesus represents God as moving toward every human soul to whom salvation comes. There is no suggestion (unless we so interpret Lk 15 17) that the initiative is to be found in the human heart.

2. Teaching of Jesus.

When we turn to the Epistles we find that the words under discussion have assumed an almost startling importance. For the apostolic consciousness two facts stand out above all others: that in Christ God has saved the world, and that every individual believer in Christ has been directly approached, and dealt with, by this determinate will and authoritative purpose of God. The idea of the Divine initiative reaches its climax here. The whole work of determining a man's salvation, in its method, inception, and outcome, is in the hands of the living God. No man can account for it, either as a universal gospel or a personal experience. It flows from the inexplicable nature of mercy. Hence, when speaking out of this new consciousness, the obvious words are that a man has been "called" of God and, if called, he has beyond doubt been "chosen." The familiar and fluent terms begin to assume a technical character quite naturally and inevitably. Those who are in Christ are "the called" (κλητοί, Ro 1 6, 7, 8 28; I Co 1 1, 2; Jude ver. 1; Rev 17 14), and "elect" (ἐκλεκτοί, Ro 8 33, 16 13; Col 3 12; Tit 1 1; I P 1 1, 2 9; II Jn vs. 1, 13; Rev 17 14); and derivatives are used for the Divine act and the resulting human condition (ἐκλογή, Ac 9 15; Ro 9 11; II P 1 10; κλῆσις, Ro 11 29; I Co 1 26; Eph 4 1, 4; He 3 1; II P 1 10). There is in the N T no attempt to discuss the metaphysics of this view of the relations of God and man. Once the idea of election is carried up into eternity (Eph 1 4), and thus for later minds the great and anxious problem was raised. It is taken for granted throughout the whole of Scripture that the call of God can be and is rejected by the choices of men. The election is conditioned by its material. Nowhere does this appear more clearly than in the Apostle's profound and passionate discussion of the position of Israel after the rejection of Christ (Ro chs. 9–11). The original election seems to have been frustrated, the Divine will overthrown. Not so, the Apostle affirms. The Divine will must reach its end, if not in one way, then in another. The material may be recalcitrant, but it can not finally defeat that eternal wisdom and power. Thus we are brought face to face with theological attempts to understand the fact of election in its relation to the fact of freedom. Compare the article PREDESTINATION.

EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL, el″-el″o-hî-iz′ra-el (אֵל אֱלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל), 'God, the God of Israel': The name of an altar near Shechem, whose erection was ascribed in Israel's tradition to the patriarch Jacob (Gn 33 20). E. E. N.

ELEMENT, ELEMENTS (στοιχεῖον, literally 'belonging to a row' [στοῖχος], pl. στοιχεῖα, 'the letters of the alphabet,' the 'A B C' [elements] of anything): (1) In II P 3 10, 12, the reference is probably to the physical elements. Others, however, prefer here (3, below). (2) The same word is correctly translated "rudiments" in He 5 12, owing to the presence of the modifying phrase "of the first principles of the oracles of God." (3) In Gal 4 3, 9 ("elements" AV, "rudiments" RV), and Col 2 8, 20 ("rudiments" AV and RV), the sense is more doubtful. Many explain it similarly to (2, above) of the 'rudiments of religious instruction,' especially of the ritual and ceremonial observances, which were characteristic of both Judaism and heathenism, and which were 'elementary' when compared with Christianity, and a bondage in comparison with the freedom of redemption in Christ. This is, however, reading a great deal into the phrase (στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου) which is not in the words themselves and does not do justice to the contrasts in the contexts, which seem to point to a personal meaning for στοιχεῖα. Probably the best explanation is that Paul here refers to those elemental spirits which, according to Jewish conception, animated everything, especially the heavenly bodies, according to whose movements the feasts and seasons of both Jew and Gentile were calculated (for quotations from Jewish writers illustrating this belief cf. Everling, Paulinische Angelol. und Dämonol., 1888, p. 71 ff.). This meaning of στοιχεῖον is greatly substantiated by the fact that the word is used by Byzantine writers for 'genius,' 'talisman,' etc., and has survived in modern Greek with the sense 'ghost,' 'spook,' 'sprite,' 'fairy,' etc. That Paul believed in a hierarchy of intermediate spiritual beings can be seen from Ro 8 38; I Co 2 6-8, 8 4-6, 10 20 ff., 15 24 f., 40; Eph 1 21, 2 2, 3 10; Col 1 16, 2 15; cf. also He 2 5; Jude vs. 6, 9; Rev 7 1, 14 18, 16 5, 19 17.

In Gal 4 3, 9, Paul apparently refers to the bondage of the Jew to the Law and therefore to the angels by whom it was ordained (3 19), and of the Gentiles to their heathen divinities who "by nature are no gods" (4 8), and in comparison with the true God are "weak and beggarly" (ver. 9).

Similarly in Col 2 8, 20 the στοιχεῖα are angelic beings who are contrasted with Christ (the "principalities and powers" of vs. 10 and 15) and whom perhaps the Colossians were in danger of mistakenly worshiping (ver. 18). S. D.

ELEPH, ī'lef (אֶלְף, 'eleph, with article): A town in Benjamin, mentioned just before Jerusalem (Jos 18 28). Probably the modern Lifta, about 2 m. NW. of Jerusalem. C. S. T.

ELEVEN. See APOSTLE.

ELHANAN, el-hê'nan (אֶלְחָנָן, 'elḥānān), 'God is gracious': 1. A son of Jair, a Bethlehemite, who slew Goliah the Gittite (II S 21 19). In II Ch 20 5 the text has been altered, apparently to avoid contradicting I S ch. 17. 2. Another Bethlehemite, also one of David's heroes, son of Dodo (II S 23 24; I Ch 11 26), perhaps the same as 1, since the reference of both to Bethlehem awakens suspicion. See also GOLIATH. E. E. N.

ELI, ī'lai (עֵלִי, 'ēlī), 'high': A high priest (I S chs. 1–4) reputed to have been of the line of Ithamar, which, however, is not explicitly stated anywhere. He combined with his priestly office that of judge. He must have rendered valuable services in order to secure this additional office. No facts, however, of his earlier life are recorded. He appears in the narrative as a very old man, unable to control his own sons during the critical period of the first conflicts with the Philistines. After training Samuel in the priestly service, he witnessed the subjection of his people to the Philistines, the death in battle of his two sons, and the capture of the Ark of the Covenant. The news of this last event is given as the occasion of his death. A. C. Z.

ELIAB, ę-lai'ab (אֱלִיאָב, 'ĕlī'āḇh), 'God is father': 1. A son of Helon, a Zebulonite leader (Nu 1 9, 2 7, etc.). 2. A son of Pallu, and father of Dathan and Abiram, a Reubenite (Nu 16 1, 12). 3. The eldest son of Jesse and brother of David (I S 16 6). 4. A Levite musician (I Ch 15 18, 20). 5. A Gadite warrior in the reign of David (I Ch 12 9). 6. An ancestor of Samuel the prophet, son of Nathan the Kohathite, also called Eliel in I Ch 6 34, and Elihu in I S 1 1. A. C. Z.

ELIADA, ELIADAH, ę-lai'a-da, -dā (אֶלְיָדָע, 'elyādhā'), 'God knows': 1. A son of David (II S 5 16; I Ch 3 8), called Beeliada in I Ch 14 7 (since Baal was used in the sense of God at one time in Israel, Baaliada may have been the original form). 2. The father of Rezon of Zobah (I K 11 23). 3. A Benjamite chief captain in Jehoshaphat's time (II Ch 17 17). ELIAKIM, ę-lai'a-kim (אֶלְיָקִים, 'elyāqīm), 'God establishes': 1. A son of Hilkiah and steward of the palace under Hezekiah (II K 18 18; Is 36 3, 37 2). 2. A son of Josiah, whom Pharaoh Necho put on the throne of Judah after the death of Josiah, changing his name to Johoiakim (q.v., cf. II K 23 34). 3. A priest in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 12 41). 4. An ancestor of Joseph, the husband of Mary (Mt 1 13). 5. An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 30). A. C. Z.

ELIAM, ę-lai'am (אֱלִיעָם, 'ĕlī'ām), 'God is kinsman': 1. The father of Bath-sheba (II S 11 3), the same as Ammiel (I Ch 3 5). 2. A son of Ahithophel the Gilonite, and one of David's thirty heroes (II S 23 34); possibly the same as 1. This identity may explain the disloyalty of Ahithophel. C. S. T.

ELIASAPH, ę-lai'a-saf (אֶלְיָסָף, 'elyāṣāph), 'God adds': 1. One of the census-takers, representing the tribe of Gad (Nu 1 14, etc.). 2. The head of the Gershonite Levites (Nu 3 24). E. E. N.

ELIASHIB, ę-lai'a-shib (אֶלְיָשִׁיב, 'elyāshībh), 'God brings back,' or 'God returns': 1. The ancestral head of a priestly family in the reign of David (I Ch 24 12). 2. A son of Elioenai, and descendant of the royal line of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 24). 3. The high priest in the days of Nehemiah (Neh 3 1, 20 f., 13 4, 7). 4. A Levite singer who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 24). 5. One of the "sons of Zattu" who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 27). 6. One of the "sons of Bani" who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 36). 7. The father of Jehohanan (Ezr 10 6), probably identical with 3. A. C. Z.

ELIATHAH, ę-lai'a-thā (אֱלִיאָתָה, 'ĕlī'āthāh), 'God comes': The ancestral head of one of the courses of Temple singers (I Ch 25 4, 27). E. E. N.

ELIDAD, ę-lai'dad (אֱלִידָד, 'ĕlīdhādh), 'God has loved' (or 'God is uncle'?): The representative of Benjamin in the allotment of tribal lands (Nu 34 21). E. E. N.

ELIEHOENAI, ę-lai"ę-hō'ę-nai (אֶלְיְהוֹעֵינַי, 'elyᵉhō-'ēnī), 'to J" are my eyes,' a proper name of frequent occurrence in the post-exilic lists of Ch, Ezr, Neh: In most instances the form is Elioenai, once Elienai (I Ch 8 20). The passages designate: 1. One of the descendants of David through Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 23 f.). 2. The head of a Simeonite family (I Ch 4 36). 3. The ancestral head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 7 8). 4. The ancestral head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 8 20). 5. The son of Meshelemiah (I Ch 26 3). 6. A priest who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 22 = Neh 12 41). 7. A leader of 200 of the "sons of Pahath-moab," who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezr 8 4). 8. One of the "sons of Zattu" who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 27). E. E. N.

ELIEL, ę-lai'el (אֱלִיאֵל, 'ĕlī'ēl), 'El is God,' or 'my God is El': 1. A chief of the half-tribe of Manasseh, E. of the Jordan (I Ch 5 24). 2. A Kohathite (I Ch 6 34) = Eliab (I Ch 6 27) = Elihu (I S 1 1), the great-grandfather of Samuel. 3, 4. Two chiefs of Benjamin (I Ch 8 20, 22). 5, 6, 7. Three of David's mighty men (I Ch 11 46 f., 12 11). 8. A Levite who assisted in bringing the Ark from the house of Obed-Edom to Jerusalem (I Ch 15 9, 11). 9. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah (II Ch 31 13). ELIENAI, el"i-ī'nai. See ELIEHOENAI.

ELIEZER, ĭ″lai-ĭ′zẹr (אֱלִיעֶזֶר, 'ĕlī'ezer), 'God is helper': 1. A native of Damascus who was the steward of Abraham (Gn 15 2). 2. The second son of Moses and Zipporah (Ex 18 4; cf. I Ch 23 15). 3. A son of Dodavahu of Mareshah, a prophet of Jehovah in the days of Jehoshaphat (II Ch 20 37). 4. The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 7 8). 5. One of the priests that accompanied the Ark on its removal to Jerusalem (I Ch 15 24). 6. A Reubenite ruler (I Ch 27 16). 7. A messenger of Ezra (Ezr 8 16). 8–10. A priest, a Levite, and one of the "sons of Harim," each of whom married foreign wives (Ezr 10 18, 23, 31). 11. An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 29). A. C. Z.

ELIHOREPH, el″i-hō′ref (אֱלִיחֹרֶף, 'ĕlīḥōreph): One of Solomon's scribes or secretaries (I K 4 3). E. E. N.

ELIHU, ẹ-lai′hiū (אֱלִיהוּ [or אֱלִיהוּא], 'ĕlīhū), 'my God is he': 1. An Ephraimite, the great-grandfather of Samuel (I S 1 1) = Eliel (I Ch 6 34) = Eliab (I Ch 6 27). 2. A man of Manasseh, captain of a thousand, who joined himself to David at Ziklag (I Ch 12 20). 3. A Korahite doorkeeper (I Ch 26 7). 4. The eldest brother of David (I Ch 27 18, instead of Eliab, as in I S 16 6). 5. The youngest of the four friends of Job, who speaks in chs. 32–37. Not being mentioned in the prologue or epilogue, he and his words are thought by some to be a later addition to the Book of Job (q.v.). C. S. T.

ELIJAH (אֵלִיָּהוּ, 'ēlīyāhū, Elias in the AV of NT): 'J″ is God': 1. The greatest prophet of the N. kingdom, and the first after Moses to combine fervor of spiritual and ethical conviction with keen insight into the practical bearing of it on national destiny, and hence eventually the preserver of Israel's distinctiveness. The story of his unique work is contained in I K chs. 17–19, 21 17-28; II K ch. 1 f., which are probably excerpts from one or more fuller accounts of the period. The prophet made his appearance before Ahab the king (876–854 B.C.). His message was a clear and uncompromising declaration that J″ was the sole God of Israel, and paved the way for the later development of ethical monotheism by the great prophets of the following century, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah.

1. Introductory.

That the Elijah narratives in their present form are of considerably later date than the prophet is hardly open to question. But from the fact that in one case (chs. 17–19) the thought of the prophet is presented as of a more primitive type than that of Hosea and Amos, for instance, as well as from some historical allusions (19 3), it may be inferred that the historian of this section was a man of the beginning of the 8th cent. at the latest. As to II K ch. 1 f., these chapters are of later origin, but efforts to date them from the exilic period (Rösch, Stud. u. Kr., 1892), or give them a totally different character from I K chs. 17–19, 21 (Well., Kuenen), are based on unsatisfactory reasons (cf. König, Einl., p. 266).

2. The Sources of the History.

The narratives furnish no data as to E.'s ancestry or tribal connections. The only item they give is contained in the adjective "The Tishbite" which introduces him. This makes him either a native or former resident of Tishbeh in Gilead. Later traditions assign him a priestly connection, but do not appear to be trustworthy. The rest of his biography is interwoven with the account of his work.

3. Elijah the Man.

The appearance of E. on the scene coincides with a crisis in the history of Israel. Ahab had taken for a wife Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, King of Tyre, and ex-priest of Astarte. Under the demonic influence of this princess, he had not only introduced Baal worship into the realm in its most blatant form, but had gone to the extreme of subjecting the prophets of J″ to bloody persecution. The first recorded act of the prophet is that of confronting the apostate king, charging him with his sin before J″, and predicting that as a consequence the land should suffer from a complete drought, not to be ended except by his word as a prophet of J″ Having uttered this prophecy, E. left the king's presence and lived in a deep and picturesque ravine (gorge) through which the brook Cherith made its way to the Jordan. From this refuge he removed to Zarephath near Zidon, where he performed the miracle of perpetuating the contents of the widow's jar of meal, and cruse of oil, and of restoring her son to life.

4. The Conditions of the Time.

5. The Early Ministry of Elijah.

On appearing before Ahab the second time, the prophet put an end to the drought, but brought about a spectacular and impressive contest between himself and the prophets of Baal, whose outcome was the exposure of their impotence and their slaughter. The reaction which followed this event sent the prophet into solitude and despondency on Mount Horeb.

6. The Contest on the Kishon.

From the retirement at Horeb E. came forth with the commission to anoint Hazael as king of Syria, Jehu as king of Israel, and Elisha as his own successor. Of these he accomplished the last. He then came before Ahab for a third time to denounce the king's sin in the affair of Naboth's vineyard (I K 21 17-29). After Ahab's death it was the prophet's duty to rebuke Ahaziah for sending to Baalzebub, the god of Ekron, to inquire regarding the issue of injuries received in an accident (II K 1 2-17). The last accounts of the prophet are those connected with his ascension (II K 2 1-11).

7. Later Ministry.

According to II Ch 21 12-15, E. sent "a writing" to King Jehoram of Judah pronouncing the judgment of J″ on him for his failure to live up to the standard set by his ancestors David, Asa, and Jehoshaphat. But as the ascension of E. precedes the accession of Jehoram to the throne, the statement in Chronicles must mean either that such a letter was sent the king in the name of E., or it is based on a confusion, textual or otherwise.

8. Elijah's Letter to Jehoram.

In the history of Hebrew prophecy, E.'s place is at the head of the earlier group. His method is that of the destroyer. His most striking characteristics are simplicity, directness, fearlessness, and sternness. His contemporaries required firm handling and unmistakable language, and he gave them both.

9. Elijah's Place and Character.

In the later history of Israel, the expectation that E. himself would return and herald, as well as prepare, the way for the ideal king became an integral part of the Messianic hope (Mal 4 5 f.). In the N T he is looked upon as the prototype of John the Baptist, whose mission was to break down an evil condition of things and restore a better one (Mt 17 11).

10. Elijah in the N T.

2. A son of Jeroboam, a Benjamite (I Ch 8 27, Eliah AV) 3. One of the "sons of Harim," a priest (Ezr 10 21). 4. One of the "sons of Elam" (Ezr 10 26). A. C. Z.

ELIKA, ę-lai'ka (אֶלִיקָא, 'ĕlīqā'): One of David's heroes (II S 23 25). E. E. N.

ELIM, ī'lim (אֵילִם, 'ēlīm): The second station of the Israelites after crossing the Red Sea (Ex 15 27; Nu 33 9), commonly identified with the Wady Ghurundel, 63 m. from Suez and 7 m. from Ain Hawwara (Ordnance Survey of Sinai, I, 151), an oasis whose natural features agree with those described in the text. A. C. Z.

ELIMELECH, ę-lim'ę-lec (אֱלִימֶלֶךְ, 'ĕlīmelekh), 'God is king': A Bethlehemite, husband of Naomi, who migrated to Moab in a time of famine, and died there. One of his sons married Ruth, ancestress of David (Ru 1 2 ff.). E. E. N.

ELIOENAI, el''i-o-ī'nai. See ELIEHOENAI.

ELIPHAL, ę-lai'fal. See ELIPHELET.

ELIPHALET, ę-lif'a-let. See ELIPHELET.

ELIPHAZ, el'i-faz (אֱלִיפַז, 'ĕlīphaz), 'God is fine gold' (?): 1. In the Edomite genealogy (Gn 36 4, 10, 15; I Ch 1 35 f.), E. appears as the 'son' of Esau by Adah (Gn 36 5, 10), and 'father' of Teman and others. 2. The first-mentioned and perhaps the oldest friend of Job (2 11), called "the Temanite." Teman, a district of Idumæa (Jer 49 20), was noted for its wisdom (Jer 49 7). C. S. T.

ELIPHELEHU, ę-lif''ę-lī'hū (אֱלִיפְלֵהוּ, 'ĕlīphelēhū, Elipheleh, ę-lif'ę-le, AV): A musician of the Temple choir (I Ch 15 18, 21). E. E. N.

ELIPHELET, ę-lif'ę-let (אֱלִיפֶלֶט, 'ĕlīpheleṭ), 'God delivers.' Other forms of the same name are Eliphal (I Ch 11 35), Eliphalet, Elpalet, and Elpelet (I Ch 14 5): 1. A son of David (II S 5 16; I Ch 3 6, 8, 14 5, 7 [the double occurrence is probably a mistake]). 2. One of David's heroes (II S 23 34; I Ch 11 35). 3. A son of Eshek, descendant of Saul (I Ch 8 39). 4. One of the "sons of Adonikam"; returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr 8 13). 5. One of the "sons of Hashum" who took a foreign wife (Ezr 10 33). E. E. N.

ELISABETH, ę-liz'a-beth (Ἐλεισάβετ, Ἐλισάβετ, WH): The wife of Zacharias (q.v.), and herself of priestly lineage (Lk 1 5). She was the mother of John the Baptist (Lk 1 57) and a kinswoman (συγγενίς, Lk 1 36) of the mother of Jesus. There is nothing to indicate the degree of relationship. J. M. T.

ELISEUS, el''i-sī'us. See ELISHA.

ELISHA, ę-lai'sha (אֱלִישָׁע, 'ĕlīshā'), 'God is salvation,' Eliseus in the AV of N T: The successor and perpetuator of Elijah's work, by whom he was ordained and anointed to this end (I K 19 16, 19) (854–802 B.C.). He was a native of Abel-Meholah, situated on the southern side of the plain of Beth-shean, not far from the Jordan. Here his father Shaphat was evidently the owner of a considerable landed estate. He "was plowing with twelve yoke of oxen before him, and he with the twelfth" when Elijah found him and by the symbolic throwing of his mantle on him called him to the work of the prophet. Henceforth E. became Elijah's disciple and servant (II K 3 11). In his last sickness he was visited by King Joash, to whom he showed in a symbolic transaction, through the shooting of arrows, that he was to conquer Syria three times and might have inflicted on her a crushing defeat, had his faith been stronger (II K 13 14-19). The last mention of his name relates to the case of a man brought for burial and cast hastily into the grave in which E.'s bones were found, and by the mere touch of the corpse with the bones of its restoration to life (II K 13 20-21).

1. Prophetic Call.

The narratives upon which knowledge of E.'s life and work is based are given in II K 2 1-25, 4 1-44, 5 1–6 32, 7 1–8 5, and 13 14-21. They bear marks of diversity of origin and of some chronological displacement. In view of the healing of Naaman's leprosy (II K ch. 5), it does not seem likely that the war between Israel and Syria mentioned in 6 8 ff. can be given in its true order. Gehazi too is represented (8 4) as familiarly conversing with the king, though smitten with leprosy (5 26). These narratives were probably found in an early collection of incidents relating to the prophet. Their approximate date of origin may be set as later than the Elijah fragments, and possibly 700 B.C.

2. Sources of History.

In the main, E.'s work is that of the patriotic preacher of righteousness. While within Israel he did not by a hair's breadth abate the opposition to Baal worship preached by Elijah, he gave attention to the international relations of Israel. Even Jehoram, the last of the dynasty of Ahaz, was constrained to recognize his prophetic influence, and sent for him for advice in the campaign against Mesha of Moab (II K 2 12). But E. sternly declined to have personal dealings with Jehoram (II K 3 14), and it was in the overthrow of the dynasty which this king represented that his statesmanship achieved its master stroke. Sending one of the "sons of the prophets" to Jehu, a restless and ambitious warrior, he symbolically intimated to him, through the act of anointing with oil, that he was called to wrest the scepter from the hands of the descendants of Jezebel (II K 9 1-10). The task was one committed to by him Elijah (I K 19 16), and its accomplishment proved the end of official Baal worship in Israel.

4. Elisha and Foreign Affairs.

Even through the reign of Jehoram, E. acted the patriot's part in all the wars of Israel with Moab and Syria. In the few incidents recorded of the campaign of Ben-hadad II against Samaria, he rendered indispensable aid to the cause of Israel (II K 6 8 ff.). But here too his chief service was the fulfilling of a commission originally given to Elijah, i.e., the changing of the ruling dynasty in Damascus by anointing Hazael as successor to Ben-hadad (cf. I K 19 15; II K 8 7 f.).

5. Elisha's Miracles.

The miraculous element is quite prominent in the accounts of Elisha. He first healed with salt the waters of Jericho (II K 2 19 f.). Next he brought sudden punishment upon the 42 children who mocked him (II K 2 23-25). During a famine he increased oil, saving a poor widow from distress (II K 4 1-7), cured some gourds of poisonous effects (II K 4 38-41), multiplied bread (4 42-44), and caused an ax head to "swim" in water (6 1-7). He restored to life the child of the Shunamite woman (4 8-37) and cured the leprosy of Naaman (ch. 5). These miracles constitute a group, and though differing from those of Elijah (I K 17 14, 17; II K 1 4), may be taken with them as making up an exceptional period in the history of prophecy.

6. Elisha and Elijah.

E. not only inherited the task of Elijah, but he also very much resembled him in character. The chief difference between the two prophets was that the first, as a pioneer, showed greater originality. But to balance this E. was in nearer touch with the people, being accessible to them (cf. II K 4 23, ch. 5) and in better position to have his influence diffused. A. C. Z.

ELISHAH, ę-lai'shā. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

ELISHAMA, ę-lish'a-ma (אֱלִישָׁמָע, 'ĕlīshāmā'), 'God has heard': 1. One of the chiefs of Ephraim (Nu 1 10, etc.). 2. A son of David (II S 5 16; I Ch 3 8, 14 7, confounded with Elishua in I Ch 3 6). 3. A Judahite, son of Jekamiah (I Ch 2 41). 4. A priest, teacher of the people in Jehoshaphat's time (II Ch 17 8). 5. A scribe of King Jehoiakim (Jer 36 12 ff.). 6. The grandfather of Ishmael the rival of Gedaliah (II K 25 25; Jer 41 1). E. E. N.

ELISHAPHAT, ę-lish'a-fat (אֱלִישָׁפָט, 'ĕlīshāphāṭ), 'God has judged': One of the captains assisting Jehoiada in deposing Athaliah (II Ch 23 1). E. E. N.

ELISHEBA, ę-lish'ę-ba (אֱלִישֶׁבַע, 'ĕlīshebha'), 'God has sworn': The wife of Aaron (Ex 6 23). E. E. N.

ELISHUA, el''i-shū'a (אֱלִישׁוּעַ, 'ĕlīshūa'), 'God is help': A son of David (II S 5 15; I Ch 14 5; by mistake called Elishama in I Ch 3 6). E. E. N.

ELIUD, ę-lai'ud (Ἐλιούδ = O T Elihud): An ancestor of Joseph (Mt 1 14 f.). E. E. N.

ELIZAPHAN, el''i-zê'fan (אֱלִיצָפָן, 'ĕlītsāphān), 'God hides' or 'protects': 1. The ancestral head of one of the main divisions of the Levites (Nu 3 30; I Ch 15 8; II Ch 29 13; also called Elzaphan, Ex 6 22; Lv 10 4). 2. A "prince" of Zebulun (Nu 34 25). E. E. N.

ELIZUR, ę-lai'zūr (אֱלִיצוּר, 'ĕlītsūr), 'God is a rock': "Prince" of Reuben (Nu 1 5, etc.). E. E. N.

ELKANAH, el-kê'nā (אֶלְקָנָה, 'elqānāh), 'God has possessed': 1. A son of Jehoram, and father of Samuel (I S 1 1; I Ch 6 27, 34). 2. A son of Joel, descendant of 4 (I Ch 6 36). 3. A Levite, the son of Mahath (I Ch 6 26, 35). 4. A grandson of Korah and eponym of one of the Korahite families (Ex 6 24; I Ch 6 23). 5. A doorkeeper of the tent in which David placed the Ark (I Ch 15 23). 6. A Levite, the grandfather of Berechiah (I Ch 9 16). 7. One of David's heroes (I Ch 12 6). 8. A high official under Ahaz, slain in Pekah's attack on Jerusalem (II Ch 28 7). A. C. Z.

ELKOSHITE, el'kŏsh-ait: The patronymic of Nahum (Nah 1 1). See NAHUM, BOOK OF.

ELLASAR, el''lê'[or-lā']sār (אֶלָּסָר, 'ellāṣār): The city of which Arioch, one of the confederates of Chedorlaomer (Gn 14 1), was king. Correctly identified as the Larsa of the Babylonian inscriptions, the modern Senkereh of lower Babylonia, of which Eri-Aku (Arioch), or Semitic Rim-Sin, was king. I. M. P.

ELM: Properly an oak or terebinth (Hos 4 13 AV; cf. RV). See PALESTINE, § 21. E. E. N.

ELMADAM, el-mê'dam (Ἐλμαδάμ, Elmodam AV): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 28). E. E. N.

ELNAAM, el-nê'am (אֶלְנַעַם, 'elna'am), 'God is graciousness': One of David's warriors (I Ch 11 46). E. E. N.

ELNATHAN, el-nê'than (אֶלְנָתָן, 'elnāthān), 'God has given': 1. The father of Nehushta, mother of Jehoiakim (II K 24 8). 2. A prince of Judah in the reign of Jehoiakim—possibly the same as 1 (Jer 26 22, 36 12, 25). 3–5. The name of three men sent by Ezra on a mission after Levites (Ezr 8 16). The text here may be corrupt, due to dittography. E. E. N.

ELOI, ELOI, LAMA SABACHTHANI, ę-lō'ai, lā'ma sa-bae'tha-nai (ἐλωί, ἐλωί, λαμὰ σαβαχθανεί): Jesus' cry on the cross, according to Mk 15 34. In Mt 27 46 the form is Eli, Eli, etc. The expression in Mark is altogether Aramaic. In Matthew the first two words are as much Hebrew as Aramaic. The Markan form is the Aramaic equivalent of the Hebrew of Ps 22 1, and shows incidentally how familiar Jesus was with the vernacular Aramaic version of the O T. E. E. N.

ELON, ī'lon (אֵלוֹן, 'ēlōn), 'terebinth': I. 1. A Zebulunite, one of the minor judges of Israel (Jg 12 11 f.). 2. A "son" of Zebulun (Gn 46 14), head of the family of Elonites (Nu 26 26). 3. A Hittite, the father-in-law of Esau (Gn 26 34, 36 2). II. A town in the territory of Dan (Jos 19 43). See next title.
A. C. Z.

ELON-BETH-HANAN, -beth"-hē'nan (אֵלוֹן בֵּית חָנָן, 'ēlōn bēth ḥānān) (I K 4 9): Possibly two names, Elon and Beth-hanan, were the original reading. If one place was meant, it must have been the same as Elon (q.v.). No satisfactory identification has been proposed. E. E. N.

ELOTH, ī'loth. See ELATH.

ELPAAL, el-pē'al (אֶלְפַּעַל, 'elpa'al), 'God has done': An ancestor of a Benjamite family (I Ch 8 11 f., 18). E. E. N.

ELPARAN, el-pē'ran (אֵל פָּארָן, 'ēl pā'rān): A place in Edom (Gn 14 6). See ELATH and PARAN.
E. E. N.

ELPELET, el-pī'let (אֶלְפֶּלֶט, 'elpeleṭ, Elpalet AV). See ELIPHELET.

ELTEKEH, el'tę-ke (אֶלְתְּקֵא and אֶלְתְּקֵה, elt'qē' and 'elt'qēh): A city of Dan, mentioned after Ekron (Jos 19 44) and a Levitical city (Jos 21 23). Near Eltekeh (Altaku) Sennacherib won a victory over the combined forces of Palestinians, Egyptians, and others (cf. II K 18 13 ff., 19 8 ff.) and afterward despoiled E. and its neighboring town Timnath (Prism inscrip. of Sen. Col II 69 ff.). Consequently E. must have been situated near Timnath, probably between Timnath and Ekron. The identification Map III, E 5, is probably incorrect. E. E. N.

ELTEKON, el'tę-kon (אֶלְתְּקוֹן, 'elt'qōn): A city in the highlands of Judah (Jos 15 59). Not yet identified. E. E. N.

ELTOLAD, el-tō'lad (אֶלְתּוֹלַד, 'eltōladh): A city in the extreme S. of Judah (Jos 15 30), also assigned to Simeon (Jos 19 4). Elsewhere called Tolad (I Ch 4 29). Not yet identified. E. E. N.

ELUL, ī'lul: The sixth month of the Jewish year. See TIME, § 3. E. E. N.

ELUZAI, ę-lū'zai (אֶלְעוּזַי, 'el'ūzay): 'God my refuge' (?): One of those who deserted Saul for David (I Ch 12 5). E. E. N.

ELYMAS, el'i-mas. See BAR JESUS.

ELZABAD, el-zē'bad (אֶלְזָבָד, 'elzābhādh), 'God has given': 1. A Gadite who attached himself to David (I Ch 12 12). 2. A doorkeeper of the Temple (I Ch 26 7). E. E. N.

ELZAPHAN, el-zē'fan (אֶלְצָפָן, 'eltsāphān), 'God protects,' also called Elizaphan: 1. A son of Uzziel, kinsman of Moses and Aaron, and servant in the Tabernacle (Ex 6 22; Lv 10 4; Nu 3 30). 2. See ELIZAPHAN, 1. 3. The head of a family of Levites (II Ch 29 13). A. C. Z.

EMBALM, EMBALMING. See BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 2.

EMBROIDER, EMBROIDERY. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 16.

EMEK-KEZIZ, ī''mek-ke-ziz' (עֵמֶק קְצִיץ, 'ēmeq qᵉtsīts) (Valley of Keziz AV): A vale in the territory of Benjamin, near the Jordan Valley (Jos 18 21). Site unknown. E. E. N.

EMERALD. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 2.

EMERODS. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5 (7).

EMIM, ī'mim (אֵימִים, 'ēmīm, Emim AV): The name given to the prehistoric race that once occupied the land E. of the Jordan. They were called also Rephaim. According to tradition they were of gigantic stature (Gn 14 5; Dt 2 10 f.). E. E. N.

EMINENT PLACE: The Heb. gabh, rendered "eminent place" (Ezk 16 24, 31, 39 AV; "lofty" RV), is rendered "high-place" (q.v.) in other passages. Here it indicates a place on which an altar for illicit worship was built. In Ezk 17 22, as the AV translation of another Hebrew word, thālūl, it means 'lofty,' so RV. C. S. T.

EMMANUEL, em-man'yu-el. See IMMANUEL.

EMMAUS, em'a-us (Ἐμμαούς): A village mentioned in Lk 24 13. According to the best reading (ABD) 60 stadia distant from Jerusalem. An Emmaus (Ἀμμαοῦς, 60 stadia from Jerusalem) is mentioned by Josephus (BJ, VII, 6 6), who says that Titus had a colony of soldiers there. This suggests the modern Kulōnieh, which is approximately this distance from Jerusalem. Map II, E 1. E. has also been identified with Nicopolis (I Mac 3 40, 57, 4 3-25), the modern 'Amwās in the Shephelah, 20 m. from Jerusalem, Map III, D 5, but this distance is too great. J. M. T.

EMMOR, em'ȯr. See HAMMOR.

EN- (עֵין, 'ēn): The prefix 'En' in Hebrew proper names stands for the word meaning 'spring' or 'fountain,' in opposition to a well or cistern. Places with names compounded with 'En' were almost certainly located near a spring. E. E. N.

ENAIM, ę-nē'im (עֵינַיִם, 'ēnayim): A town of Judah (Jos 15 34, where it is spelled Enam). According to Gn 38 14 it was situated on the road to Timnah and was the scene of Judah's incest with Tamar. Driver locates it in the Shephelah; Conder identifies it with Kh. Wady Alin. Map III, D 1.
J. A. K.

ENAN, ī'nan (עֵינָן, 'ēnān): The father of Ahira (Nu 1 15). E. E. N.

ENCAMP. See WARFARE, § 3.

ENCAMPMENT BY THE SEA: A station on the Exodus route named after Marah and Elim (Nu 33 10), not to be confused with the place mentioned in Ex 14 2 ff. It lay on the E. shore of the sea.
E. E. N.

ENCHANTER, ENCHANTMENT. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3.

ENDOR (עֵין דֹּר, 'ēn dōr), 'fountain of dor': A city in the territory of Manasseh, 4 m. S. of Tabor, made famous as the residence of the witch to whom Saul resorted (I S 28 7). Its modern successor, En-dūr, is built upon a rock full of caves (cf. Socin, in Baedeker, *Palestine*², p. 460 f.). Map III, G 1.
A. C. Z.

ENEAS, ī-nī'as. See ÆNEAS.

EN-EGLAIM, en-eg'la-im (עֵין עֶגְלַיִם, 'ēn 'eglayim), 'fount of the two calves' (Ezk 47 10): From the context it is likely that En-eglaim lay N. of En-gedi, near the mouth of the Jordan. It has not been identified. Some suspect an error for Beth-hoglah (q.v.).
E. E. N.

EN-GANNIM, en-gan'im (עֵין גַּנִּים, 'ēn gannīm), 'fountain of gardens': 1. A city of Judah (Jos 15 34). Map II, D 1. 2. A Levitical city of Issachar (Jos 19 21, 21 29), called Anem in I Ch 6 73. The modern town Jenin is characterized by numerous gardens watered by a spring near by. Map III, F 2.
E. E. N.

ENGEDI, en-gī'dai (עֵין גֶּדִי, 'ēn gedhī), 'spring of the kid': The name of a fertile region on the Dead Sea located about the middle of its W. shore. Map II, G 3. It was so called from a warm spring which issues out of the cliffs at this point. The earlier name of the spot was Hazazon-tamar (II Ch 20 2). The modern Ain Jidi is the Arabic equivalent of the Biblical term. It was famous as the place where David took refuge when fleeing from Saul, and also for its natural beauty and fertility (I S 23 29; Song 1 14; cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 269 ff.; Sayce, Patriarchal Palestine, p. 40).
A. C. Z.

ENGINE OF WAR: A general term to designate the heavier implements used in siege-work, both offensive (Ezk 26 9) and defensive (II Ch 26 15).
E. E. N.

ENGRAFTED: Only in Ja 1 21 AV. The Greek ἔμφυτος means usually 'inborn,' 'innate.' The RV "implanted" is better. The "word," like seed (Mt 13 3-23), 'roots' itself in the heart and life (cf. Mt 15 13; I Co 3 6).
S. D.

ENGRAVE, ENGRAVER, ENGRAVING. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 3.

EN-HADDAH (עֵין חַדָּה, 'ēn ḥaddāh): A place in Issachar (Jos 19 21). Perhaps the modern Kefr Adān. Map III, F 2.
E. E. N.

EN-HAKKORE, en-hak'o-rē (עֵין־הַקּוֹרֵא, 'ēn haqqōrē'), 'spring of the partridge.' The context, however, gives the meaning 'spring of him who called': The name of a spring in Lehi, from which Samson quenched his thirst after slaying the Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass. Location unknown (Jg 15 19).
C. S. T.

EN-HAZOR, en-hē'zer (עֵין חָצוֹר, 'ēn ḥātsōr), 'spring of Hazor': A town in Naphtali (Jos 19 37). The site is not certain, but may be the same as the modern Kh. Hazîreh (Map IV, D 5).
E. E. N.

EN-MISHPAT, en-mish'pat. See KADESH.

ENOCH, ī'nɔc (חֲנוֹךְ, ḥānōkh, Henoch AV, I Ch 1 3): I. 1. The eldest son of Cain, mentioned in Gn 4 17 f. as the builder of a city which he called after himself. This points to a place that bore the name, which can not now be identified. 2. Son of Jared and father of Methuselah, descendant of Seth (Gn 5 18-24). The absence of the usual formula "And he died" at the end of the account given of him and the substitution of the phrase, "And he was not because God took him," gave occasion to a great number of speculations and comments in later times (cf. Shürer, HJP, II, i. 342, iii. 70). The translation of Enoch is paralleled in Assyrian mythology by the translation of Sit-Napisti(m). II. A city (cf. 1, above).

The name of Enoch appears at the head of two apocalyptic books, called respectively from the languages in which they are extant the Ethiopic and the Slavonic Enoch.

I. THE ETHIOPIC ENOCH.—This book first became known in modern times through copies brought from Abyssinia in 1773 by J. Bruce, the traveler. It was known to the Fathers from Jude 14 f. that certain prophetic utterances passed under the name of Enoch (cf. also Ep. Barn. 4 3, 16 5), but all traces of these in book form had disappeared until the date above named. It was in 1821, however, that the Ethiopic text of Enoch was translated by Bishop Lawrence into English, and through Dillmann's studies and translation of it into German (1851–53) its nature, contents, and significance for Bible study were measurably realized. In 1886–87 a portion of the Greek text of the book was made public by H. B. Swete.

1. History of the Modern Editions.

This book contains 107 chapters, but is not a unit. It consists of at least three primary works, fused together by a redactor as follows: (1) The original Book of Enoch, comprising chs. 1–36 and 72–105. (2) The Book of Similitudes, comprising chs. 37–71, and (3) The Apocalypse of Noah, or, more correctly, certain fragments of a book which probably existed as a whole under some title ascribed to Noah. These fragments are inserted within the other two parts of Enoch, and are to be found in chs. 54 7–55 2, 60, 65 1–69 25, and 106–107.

2. Literary Analysis.

The original Book of Enoch has its starting-point in Gn 6 2 f., and recounts the punishment of the sinning angels. In the course of giving information about the places of this punishment, Enoch narrates his extensive travels throughout the universe (1–36). A second section is called The Book of the Luminaries of Heaven, and consists of chs. 78–82, treating of geographical and cosmological matters such as the course of the sun and the stars, of the winds and the four quarters of heaven, and the changes which are destined to come over these things in the last days. A third section, consisting of chs. 83–90, narrates two visions of Enoch, both prophetic in form, but together known as the historical part of the book, because they portray in a general way the history as it transpired and is recorded in the O T. The first vision is a picture of the Deluge; the second covers the whole course of Israel's career under the symbolical form of a warfare of the clean animals (sheep, lambs, and goats = Israel) with unclean animals (dogs, swine, foxes, and birds of prey = Israel's enemies). From the fact that Israel was put under the care of 70 angels, this portion of the work has been also called the Vision of the Seventy Shepherds. At the close of the section the Messiah appears, born in the form of a white bull. The last section (91–105) is called the Book of Exhortations and seems to bring the story to a practical conclusion. Enoch commits matters into the hands of his son Methusaleh preparatory to his ascension. Another special section occurs toward the beginning of this part and is called the Ten Weeks (91 12-17, 93).

3. Contents of Original Enoch.

The Book of Similitudes (chs. 37–71) is Messianic or Christological. It takes its name from the fact that it consists of three parables (similitudes): (1) Chs. 37–44; (2) 45–54, and (3) 55–71. All these are vividly apocalyptic and eschatological. It is in this section that the Messiah is pictured (46, 47) under the name "the Son of Man," standing beside the "Head of Days," and that his character and task as the conqueror of the heathen are plainly set forth.

4. Book of Similitudes.

In the Noachic fragments, the subject of the flood is pictured as an event in the future (from the viewpoint of Enoch, of course), including accounts of Leviathan, Behemoth, and various nature-elements which come into play in the great catastrophe. To this is added a revelation to Noah of the punishment of the fallen angels and of the judgment of men by the Son of Man. The last of these fragments (106, 107) contains an account of the marvels which should accompany the birth of Noah himself, and is made as a revelation to Enoch.

5. Noachic Fragments.

That the first of these three documents of which the Ethiopic Enoch consists was composed during the period 200–175 B.C. is not generally disputed. As to the third, its fragmentary character gives very little ground for a successful investigation of the circumstances and date of its origin. The Book of Similitudes has naturally furnished a bone of contention for critics. Its undoubted relation to the N T and its importance from this point of view have called forth careful study; but no definite consensus has yet been reached. It is contended on one side that it must have been written in the Maccabæn Age (Ewald). Others date it from 95 B.C. (Dillmann, Charles); others from the days of Herod (Baldensperger, Beer); still others from the 2d cent. A.D.; and others, finally, claim that it may have been published as a Jewish apocalypse before the Christian Era, but that it was revised by a Christian who interpolated into it the Son of Man passages. The truth probably lies nearer the view which makes it a prechristian writing. The occurrence in it of the phrase "Son of Man" does not interfere with this conclusion, as this phrase is not altogether a distinctively Christian expression and should not be regarded as the sign of a Christian author or redactor (cf. Baldensperger, *Selbstbewusstsein Jesu*², p. 90; Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 234 f.). The best edition, with introduction and notes for English readers, is by Charles (Book of Enoch, 1893).

6. Dates of the Several Sections.

II. The Slavonic Enoch.—Under this name has come to be known a book first made accessible in modern times in 1896 by Professor Charles and Mr. Morfill. Its existence in a Slavonic text was hinted at by Russian scholars and seized upon as a subject of investigation with the result that the book was fully recovered.

1. Recovery in Modern Times.

The Slavonic Enoch is divided into 68 chapters, which may be grouped under three large sections as follows: (1) Chs. 1–38. This section gives an account of the ascension of Enoch into the seven heavens and his travels and experiences there. (2) Chs. 39–56 describe Enoch's return to earth and give his admonitions and instructions to his children. (3) Chs. 57–68 contain a rehearsal of some additional instructions, closing with the account of a solemn scene in which before an assembly of 2,000 people Enoch is taken up into heaven (Gn 5 24). But just before this took place, a thick darkness fell upon the earth, so that the manner of his assumption was accomplished unwitnessed by mortal eye (ch. 67).

2. Contents.

The original language of the Slavonic Enoch was undoubtedly Greek. This is clear from the explanation of the name Adam given in it, which depends altogether upon the Greek spelling of the name.* The date of the composition can not be earlier than that of the Ethiopic Enoch (Book of Similitudes), or later than 70 A.D. The former date is established by the evident references to the Ethiopic Enoch, the latter by the fact that the Temple was still standing when this book was written. There are also evidences that the author was an Alexandrian Jew. Further than this, little is known of its origin or history.

3. Origin.

The most interesting feature of the book is the explicit form in which there is presented in it the doctrine of the seven heavens. This doctrine not only became a fixed article of faith in medieval lore, but also passed into some forms of N T expression, and left its traces even in the thought of the Apostle Paul (II Co 12 2). The best edition of the book is that by Charles and Morfill (The Book of the Secrets of Enoch, 1896). A. C. Z.

4. The Seven Heavens.

ENOSH, ē'nosh (אֱנוֹשׁ, 'ĕnōsh, Enos AV). 'man': The son of Seth (Gn 4 26, etc.). E. E. N.

* The letters of the name are the initials of the four points of the compass: Ἀ(νατολή) Δ(ύσις), Ἀ(ρκτος), Μ(εσημβρία).

ENQUIRE. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3, and REVELATION, § 7.

EN-RIMMON, en-rim'ǫn (עֵין־רִמּוֹן, 'ēn rimmōn), 'spring of pomegranates': A town in Judah (Neh 11 29), probably the Rimmon of Zech 14 10. "Ain and Rimmon" in Judah (Jos 15 32) and "Ain, Rimmon" in Simeon's territory (Jos 19 7; I Ch 4 32) should probably be read En-Rimmon. ("Ain" in Jos 21 16 and "Ashan" in I Ch 6 59 [44].) Map II, D 3. C. S. T.

EN-ROGEL, en-rō'gęl. See JERUSALEM, § 10.

ENROLMENT (ἀπογραφή), taxing AV, literally 'registering' for any purpose, hence a census: The Romans made such censuses for the purpose of taxation periodically (Lk 2 2; Ac 5 37; cf. Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? 1898). See also CHRONOLOGY OF THE N T. A. C. Z.

EN-SHEMESH, en-shĭ'mesh (עֵין־שֶׁמֶשׁ, 'ēn shemesh), 'fountain of the Sun': A place on the border of Judah between En-rogel (near Jerusalem) and Adummim. The usual identification (Map II, F 1) is far from certain. E. E. N.

ENSIGN. See BANNER, and SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

ENSUE: In I P 3 11 AV. The correct rendering is "pursue," as in RV. E. E. N.

EN-TAPPUAH, en-tap'yu-ā (עֵין־תַּפּוּחַ, 'ēn tappūaḥ), 'fountain of Tappuach.' See TAPPUACH.

ENTERING IN: Used in AV (1) of the approaches to a town (cf. Jg 3 3; Am 6 14, "entrance" RV); (2) of the gate of any enclosed place (cf. Ex 35 15, "door" RV); or (3) of the act of introduction (I Th 1 9). A. C. Z.

EPÆNETUS, ę-pĭ'nę-tus (Ἐπαίνετος, Epenetus AV), 'approved,' 'praised': A Christian brother mentioned by Paul in Ro 16 5 as "my beloved, who is the first-fruit of Asia unto Christ," probably, therefore, the first one converted by Paul at Ephesus. E. E. N.

EPAPHRAS, ep'a-fras (Ἐπαφρᾶς): A name intimately associated with the Colossian Church (ὁ ἐξ ὑμῶν, Col 4 12). Its bearer was probably the founder of this and neighboring churches (4 13). He was also a faithful friend and possibly a fellow-prisoner of Paul's (Phm 24). J. M. T.

EPAPHRODITUS, ep-af''ro-dai'tus (Ἐπαφρόδιτος): A messenger of the Philippian Church by whom their gifts were delivered to Paul (Ph 4 18). He fell sick in Rome (Ph 2 25-30) and upon recovery was sent back with the Philippian Epistle. J. M. T.

EPHAH, ĭ'fā (עֵיפָה, 'ēphāh): 1. A concubine of Caleb (I Ch 2 46). 2. A 'son' of Jahdai (I Ch 2 47). 3. A 'son' of Midian (Gn 25 4, etc.). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11. 4. A measure. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3. C. S. T.

EPHAI, ĭ'fai (עֵיפַי, 'ēphay): A Netophathite (Jer 40 8). E. E. N.

EPHER, ĭ'fęr (עֵפֶר, 'ēpher), 'young deer' or 'fawn': 1. The ancestral head of a Midianite clan or tribe (Gn 25 4; I Ch 1 33). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11. 2. The head of a family of Judah (I Ch 4 17). 3. The head of a family of Manasseh (I Ch 5 24). E. E. N.

EPHES-DAMMIM, ĭ''fez-dam'im (אֶפֶס דַּמִּים, 'epheṣ dammīm): The place where the Philistines encamped in the Valley of Elah, between Soeoh and Azekah (I S 17 1), Map II, D 1. The name is given as Pas-Dammim in I Ch 11 13. The exact site is uncertain. E. E. N.

One of Paul's letters written in connection with the Epistle to the Colossians during his first Roman imprisonment.

1. Introductory.

From the time of the Reformation (Erasmus, 1516) Ephesians has attracted attention because of its peculiarities of diction and its unusualness of thought, from a Pauline point of view. In fact, it was definitely rejected as the work of the Apostle (De Wette, 1826) even before the advent of the Tübingen School (1835), whose critical presuppositions that all the N T writings which lacked the note of controversy and attributed to the Apostolic Age must have been produced in the 2d cent. made the Epistle's characteristic presentation of the idea of church unity an easy mark for attack. In spite of the failure of this school to maintain its views, this Epistle is still quite generally disowned as Paul's, though scholars like Jülicher (N T Introd.) balance in an opinion for and against, while Harnack (History of Dogma) considers the weight of external evidence in its favor sufficient to offset the unfavorable evidence from the letter itself.

2. Contents.

Few letters of the N T consequently demand a more careful study of their contents. After a brief greeting (1 1 f.) the Apostle begins his main thought (1 3–6 18) with a long and involved doxological passage (1 3-14) embodying a thanksgiving for the spiritual blessings of the plan of salvation. At the head of this plan is the great fact of our election and redemption by the death of Christ (1 4-8), and through it is revealed the mystery of His will (1 9), the consummation of which is the establishment of the Headship of Christ (1 10), in whom God's people are secured in their inheritance through faith—the Gentile equally with the Jew (1 11-14).

In view of all this, as it applies to the readers, Paul gives thanks for their Christian life and prays for their progress in spiritual knowledge (1 15-18)—especially in the knowledge of the Divine power exercised toward them in spiritual things, the greatness of which is illustrated in the results accomplished by it in the resurrection and exaltation of Christ (1 19-23), and the actuality of which is recognized in their experience of their own former spiritual death (2 1-3) and their present spiritual life with Christ (2 4-10).

He reminds them, accordingly, of their former and present theocratic condition (2 11-13), the change involved in which had been secured by the work of Christ (2 14-18) and of the fact that this change should lead them up to a fuller appreciation of the ideal unity within the membership of the Church (2 19-22).

In order to the realization of such unity he prays for the readers' growth in spiritual grace and in the knowledge and the love of Christ (3 13-19), prefacing it with a fuller statement of the mystery of the Gospel and his own relation to it as an Apostle (3 1-12) (in order to remove the prejudice which might arise in their minds from the fact that it was the preaching of his Gospel that had brought him into his imprisonment—showing that his chains were not the fault of his Gospel, but of the Jews' failure to grasp his Gospel's truth), and following it with a doxology (3 20 f.).

After a sustained plea that they should walk worthy of their calling (4 1-16) and perform the duties of their new life by conquering their old sin (4 17-24), and special exhortations within the field of the social and the domestic life (4 25–6 9), the message closes with an urgent call to watchfulness and strength in their spiritual struggle (6 10-18), while a brief personal conclusion (6 19-24) brings the letter to its end.

It is perfectly evident from these contents that this Epistle displays peculiarities unusual in Paul's letter-writing. (1) Particularly is there noticeable a lack of local color, a trait characteristic of Paul's letters and especially to be looked for in a letter to a church with which he had been in active service for the greater part of three years (Ac 19 8-10). He must have made many friends in Ephesus during this time, but no salutations of any sort are given in the letter (cf. in contrast Col 4 10 ff.). He had with him in Rome workers who were known to the Ephesians (e.g., Timothy), but no one is associated with him in the letter's opening address (1 1 f.; cf. in contrast Col 1 1, 7 f.; Phm ver. 6). (2) Equally marked is the absence of personal tone, a habit of the Apostle's correspondence and one to be confidently expected in a message to such a well-known church. With the trivial exception of the request for prayer and the reference to Tychicus' commission to acquaint the readers with his affairs—all confined to four verses in the conclusion (6 19-22)—the entire letter is general in its references, even where the personal pronoun is used (cf. 1 15 ff., 3 1 ff., 14 ff., 4 1 ff., 17 ff., in contrast with I Th 1 6 ff., 2 1 ff., etc.; II Th 2 1 ff., 3 7 ff., etc.; I Co 1 10 ff., 2 1 ff., etc.; II Co 1 15 ff., 2 9 ff., etc.; Gal 1 6 ff., 17 ff., etc.; Ro 1 11 ff., 11 13 ff., 15 14 ff., etc.; Ph 1 3 ff., 12 ff., 2 19 ff., etc.; even with Col 1 24 ff., 2 1 ff.).

3. Peculiarities of the Epistle.

(3) There is also this particular emphasis upon Christian unity within the Church—already referred to. It appears in the opening doxology (1 12-14), in the passage explanatory of the Apostle's commission (3 5 f.), in the exhortation to their Christian living (4 3-5, 13-16), and is specially evident in the passage where the Epistle's theme comes to its expression (2 11-22). There are no such unfolding and upgathering of this thought in any other of the Apostle's letters—not even in the Pastorals, which have so much to do with the organized life of the Church.

(4) At the same time a detailed study of the vocabulary and phraseology of the Epistle makes evident that, with all these differences, it stands in specific literary affinity with the Epistle to the Colossians. Paul manifestly not only wrote these two letters at the same time, but in very much the same train of thinking, reproducing in Ephesians what he had already written in Colossians, in spite of the altered setting in which he placed it in the latter Epistle.

Obviously these peculiarities call for explanation, and just as obviously the only explanation which will satisfy the conditions is one that comes from something more than the literary habits of the Apostle. In proportion as these peculiarities go beyond word and phrase their reason must be sought for in the Apostle's life and work.

4. Relation to Paul's Work.

It is consequently worth while to call to mind the effect produced upon Paul by the situation to which he addressed his Roman Epistle. It gave him his first realization of the significance of the racial dualism in the Church and the importance which attached to the harmony and fellowship between the elements which constituted it. From Ph 1 13-20 it is evident that this was confirmed to him by his personal experience after reaching Rome (see ROMANS, § 6). It should not be surprising, therefore, if his desire to see such unity consummated grew upon him during his imprisonment and voiced itself increasingly in the letters he wrote. Especially should it not seem strange, if this great theme came to the emphatic presentation given it in our Epistle, when we remember that the absence of local color and personal tone in this letter is due to the fact that it was not addressed exclusively to any one community, but formed an encyclical letter in all likelihood to the churches of the region which to a large measure was only indirectly ministered to by Paul during his three years' stay in Ephesus. A letter so addressed to a sisterhood of churches would specially invite such a fellowship theme, while the general character of its recipients would render unlikely a specific personalness of address.

Finally, when we remember that Colossians, addressed as it is to a local church troubled with the speculative errors that tended to subordinate Christianity, gathers its thought around the theme of Christ's supremacy, the fact that Ephesians, addressed to a circle of churches troubled more or less with the same errors, simply advances its thought upon that of Colossians and discloses as its theme the unity of the Church in Christ supreme—this fact shows how natural it was that Ephesians should be so similar to Colossians and yet at the same time so different and distinct.

Ephesians stands thus as an almost necessary letter for Paul, in view of the lines along which his thought was developing and the increasingly significant problems presented by his work.

The question as to the specific group of churches to which the Epistle was addressed and the further question as to the mention of a specific locality (ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, 1 1) in the address of a letter intended for a general group of churches are more or less complicated, though they do not affect the position above assumed. The details of the discussion may be found in the Introduction of Zahn (§ 28), the Biblical Essays of Lightfoot (X), and the introductory portions of the Comm. of Abbott, Ewald, Haupt, and Salmond.

5. Recipients of Letter.

LITERATURE: Among the English Introductions to the N T, Jülicher (Eng. trans. 1904) presents the most balanced views regarding the Ep; while Zahn (Eng. trans. 1907) gives the most thorough study of its problems. Further critical material of value will be found in the introductions to the Comm. of v. Soden (Hand-Com. z. N T, 1891), Haupt (Meyer, Krit.-exeget. Kom. üb. d. N T[7], 1897), Abbott (Internat. Crit. Com., 1897), Salmond (Expos. Grk. Test., 1903), Ewald (Zahn, Kom. z. N T, 1905), Robinson (1903), Westcott (Posth., 1906). For detailed discussion of the Ep's problems consult Holtzmann, Kritik der Epheser und Kolosserbriefe (1872), Lightfoot, Biblical Essays (Posth., 1893), Hort, Prolegomena to St. Paul's Epp. to the Romans and Ephesians (1895, 1896).

Ephesus was originally situated at the mouth of the Caÿster, but is now 6 m. inland. The name (of Asiatic origin) referred originally to the sanctuary of the Asiatic goddess of procreation, wrongly identified later by the Greeks with their Artemis (Roman Diana) (q.v.). This sanctuary, which was probably founded by the Hittites (Kara Bel), was a mere tabernacle in a grove on the shore of the sea with a spacious harbor. The religion of this sanctuary was the same as that of all anterior Asia. Its territory was inviolable and had the right of asylum. It was situated at the junction of natural trade-routes — advantages which induced settlers (Carians, Leleges, Lydians) to flock thither in prehistoric times. They dwelt on a hill (originally the island Syria) overlooking the sanctuary, afterward called the Artemisium, which long before the Greek immigration had an organized hierarchy of eunuch priests and virgin priestesses, the chief priest having the Persian title of Megabyzus (Longimanus, 'Mighty One'), later called ἀρχιερεύς and Neocoros ('temple-sweeper,' 'warden') by the Greeks, while the priestesses were called Melissæ ('bees') and the sacrificial priests Essenes ('king [= our queen] bees'). The armed guards of male and particularly female hierodouli gave rise to a tradition that E. was founded by Amazons.

1. History Prior to 11th Cent. B.C.

Such was E. in times prior to 1087 B.C., when Ionian adventurers under the leadership of Androclus, son of Codrus, came from Athens, settled the eastern foot of Mt. Coressus, and gave the name of Samorna (Smyrna) to the settlement. They conquered the earlier inhabitants and made a treaty with the priests of the Artemisium, whom they never assimilated, as was the case in other Greek colonies. The Artemisium was burned by the Cimmerians 678 or 669 B.C., but the town defied them. This aristocratic republic was overthrown in the 7th cent. by the tyrant Pythagoras, who, to atone for excesses, was instructed by the Delphic oracle to build a temple on the site of the tabernacle. This temple was the so-called "columnless temple," with three courts. In the center stood the shrine of green stone which, because of its sanctity, formed the center of all successive temples. Melas, another tyrant, married the daughter of Alyattes. Their son, Pindarus, was tyrant of E. when his uncle Crœsus ascended the Lydian throne (568) and demanded the surrender of E. Crœsus attacked E., but Pindarus bound the city to the Artemisium by a rope (a mile long), thus dedicating the city to the goddess. Crœsus is said to have withdrawn out of respect for the goddess, but really he effected his purpose. Pindarus was banished, and the Greeks forced to abandon their town on Coressus, to settle in the plain about the Artemisium, and pay tribute to Crœsus, while the tyranny gave place to a democracy. Crœsus tried to make amends by favoring the priests, and by contributing to the first great temple—then under construction on the site of the "columnless temple"—some sculptured columns and golden bulls. This colossal dipteral temple, planned by Chersiphron, a Cretan, was 120 years in building; indeed, before completion it was remodeled—practically rebuilt—by Pæonius and Demetrius. Fragments of Crœsus' columns are now in the British Museum, one containing a dedicatory inscription and the name of Crœsus. Nevertheless E. declined to support Crœsus against Cyrus (546), whose general, Harpagus, took the city but spared the Artemisium —the only temple spared by Xerxes later on. In the Ionian revolt (500) E. was loyal to Persia. In 470 it was a member of the Athenian confederacy, paying 7½ talents tribute. In the Peloponnesian war E. was fickle, now Athenian, now Spartan. It was ceded to Persia by Antalcidas in 387. The Artemisium was burned in 356 by Herostratus.

2. From Ionian Settlement to Cession to Persia.

E. was freed from Persia by the battle on the Granicus in 334 and given a democratic constitution by Alexander, who assigned the Persian tribute to the Artemisium and fixed the limit of the right of asylum at one stadium. His offer, however, to rebuild the temple then under construction at his own expense was rejected. Ladies contributed their jewelry to the temple. Its architect was Chirocrates. The pavement was 1.5 meters above that of the burned temple. It was four times as large as the Parthenon, and was one of the seven wonders of the world.

3. From Freedom from Persia to Establishment of Christianity.

E. was subject successively to several of the Diadochi. In 286 Lysimachus, in order to force a change of site, stopped up the sewers, inundated the city, and inclosed a new city on Coressus with strong walls. He transplanted the inhabitants of Colophon and Lebedus to the new E., and renamed it Arsinöe after his wife, built a new harbor, harbor gate, theater, stadium, and made Agathocles, his son, governor. In Revelation (2 5) John refers to the frequent changes of the site of E.: "I will move thy candlestick out of its place, except thou repent." The Ephesians favored Seleucus, tore down part of the walls on the death of Lysimachus (281), and restored the name of Ephesus to the city. For the next 100 years E. belonged alternately to Egypt and Syria.

In 190 the Romans gave it to Eumenes of Pergamum. Attalus II (Philadelphus), in an attempt to improve the harbor, ruined it by building a mole. In 133 E. was incorporated into the Provincia Asia. In 88 it sided with Mithridates. In 86 it fought against Rome and in 84 was sacked by Sulla. In 73 Lucullus, in 51 Cicero, and in 48 Cæsar governed it. In 44 it aided Brutus and Cassius. It became the capital of Provincia Asia in 6 B.C. Augustus built the Augusteum (Sebasteum) for the worship of Rome and Augustus and for meetings of the provincial assembly (Κοινὸν Ἀσίας). In 29 A.D. E. was destroyed by an earthquake, and restored by Tiberius. In 54 Christianity was planted there by Paul (Ac 18 19-21), whose later stay of three years (Ac 19 1-22) was brought to a sudden end through the riot caused by the goldsmith Demetrius (Ac 19 23–20 1).

4. Its Christian History.

E. had now become the third city of Christianity (after Jerusalem and Antioch). It was next to Alexandria (300,000) the most populous city of the East (225,000). In 92 A.D. a great library was constructed by Celsus. In 20 A.D. Hadrian visited E., embellished the city, cleaned the harbor, built a commercial hall on the quay, changed the bed of the Caÿster, built the Olympieum, and instituted the games Ἀδριάνεια. Later (from the 3d cent. onward) E., as the metropolis of the churches of Asia, became a shrine to which Christians made pilgrimages because of its association with Paul, Timothy, as its first bishop, and John, who after the fall of Jerusalem (70 A.D.) and his exile in Patmos, made E. the headquarters of Christianity and died there (100 A.D.). According to popular tradition John was followed thither by the Virgin Mary (who died and was buried there), Mary Magdalene, Andrew and Philip, his fellow townsmen of Bethsaida.

5. Language, People, Government, and Life.

The language of the Ephesians was nominally Ionic Greek, but from earliest times the population was very mixed; so that the Hellenism was not pure, and the Greek blood was further adulterated by the worship of the Asiatic goddess with its attendant religious prostitution; for people who came as pilgrims to the sanctuary, as caravaneers from the Orient, as refugees enjoying right of asylum, as merchants engaged in commerce and slave trade, as financiers on business with the Bank of the Artemisium, all begat children by the female devotees at the shrine, without loss of reputation to mother or child. The money belonging to the goddess was stored in the Artemisium. This resulted in the establishment of the Bank of the Artemisium, which lent money and received deposits from cities, kings, and private persons. The Megabyzus was president of the Bank, whose books were audited by the γραμματεύς (Clerk) of the βουλή (Council). In Roman times the members of the Council numbered 450; they met in the theater; the president was entitled 'Boularch,' next after whom ranked the "Town Clerk" (cf. Ac 19 35) and the Council Clerk. The civil magistrates were entitled στρατηγοί (see SERGEANT), while generals were entitled ἡγεμόνες. The Ἀγορανόμοι administered the commercial affairs. The chief of police was called εἰρηνάρχης.

In early times E. was a home of literature; Heraclitus and Callinus were Ephesians. It had famous works of art by Rhœcus, Endœus, Myron, Phidias, Crcsilas, Phradmon, Policlitus, Timanthes, Zeuxis, Parrhasius, Dædalus, Scopas, Praxiteles, Apelles, Timaretes, Thrason, Menestratus, and others. Its theater seated 24,500. There were two διαζώματα and 60 rows of seats, with a portico above the top row. It dated from Lysimachus, was remodeled in the 1st cent. A.D., and often renovated down to the 4th cent. A.D. The present theater, therefore, is not absolutely identical with that of Paul's day. Ruins of many Christian churches are still extant.

EPHLAL, ef'lal (אֶפְלָל, 'ephlāl): A Jerahmeelite (I Ch 2 37). E. E. N.

EPHOD[1], ī'fod (אֵפוֹד, 'ēphōdh): The father of Hanniel (Nu 34 23). A. C. Z.

EPHOD[2] (אֵפוֹד): In connection with worship, the word ephod appears to have designated two quite different things. (1) An article of priestly apparel (see PRIESTHOOD, § 10[b]).

(2) Something else, the exact nature of which is not easy to determine, the references to it being found in the old narratives in Judges and Samuel. The plainest statements are in I S 23 69 and 30 7, where we read of Abiathar the priest being in David's camp with the ephod "in his hand," 'carrying it' and being told by David to "bring it" for purposes of oracle-consultation. It is clear that here the ephod is not a garment but something that was carried about by the priest and used by him in obtaining answers from deity. This sense is also suitable in I S 2 28, 14 3 (where 'wearing' should be 'bearing') and 18 (where we should read "ephod" with the LXX. instead of "Ark"). We are left in entire ignorance of the shape of this instrument. It may well have been made of costly material and possibly was a box of some sort containing the sacred stones (see URIM AND THUMMIM). If it was usually hung up in the sanctuary, we have a suitable explanation of I S 21 9.

In Jg 8 27 Gideon is said to have made an ephod of gold, which he put (no special emphasis need be laid on this verb; cf. the usage of the same word in 6 37) in his town Ophrah, where it became a center of worship. In Jg 17 5, 18 14 ff. Micah the Ephraimite is said to have made for his sanctuary an ephod, teraphim, and a graven (and a molten?) image. That in these passages in Judges ephod is to be understood as an image is a widely held opinion—but there is no direct proof of this, and the expressions in 18 14, 18, 20, seem to make a distinction between ephod and image. The ephod both of Micah and Gideon may have been instruments of divination similar to those spoken of in I Samuel.

EPHPHATHA, ef'a-tha (ἐφφαθά) (Mk 7 34): The transliteration of an Aramaic word spoken by Jesus. The Greek here may not perfectly represent the original form, which, according to Dalman (*Gram.*² p. 278), was eph-phthāḥah—fem. plur. imperative—'be opened.' E. E. N.

EPHRAIM, ī'fra-im (אֶפְרַיִם, 'ephrayim): I. The youngest son of Joseph. See TRIBES, §§ 3, 4. II. The term is frequently used, especially in the Prophets, to designate the Northern Kingdom of Israel, since the tribe of Ephraim was the most powerful element in that kingdom. III. A city of Judæa mentioned only in Jn 11 54 as the place to which Jesus retired after raising Lazarus. The town near which Absalom had his sheep range (II S 13 23) and the Ἀφαίρεμα of I Mac 11 34 are to be identified with the same place; also called Ophrah (Jos 18 23, etc.) and Ephron (II Ch 13 19). Map II, F 5. See also PALESTINE, § 7 (5). E. E. N.

EPHRAIM, FOREST OF (יַעַר אֶפְרַיִם, ya'ar 'ephrayim, wood of Ephraim AV): The scene of the decisive battle between the forces of David and those of his rebellious son Absalom (II S 18 6). From the account in II S chs. 17 and 18, the place was E. of the Jordan. Possibly it was so named from a colony of Ephraimites, E. of the Jordan (cf. Jos 17 14-18), to which there may be a reference in Jg 12 4. C. S. T.

EPHRATH, ef'rath (אֶפְרָת, 'ephrāth), or EPHRATHAH (אֶפְרָתָה, 'ephrāthāh): The second wife of Caleb, son of Hezron (I Ch 2 19), and the mother of Hur (I Ch 2 50, 4 4), the ancestor of Beth-lehem, Kiriath-jearim, and Beth-Gader. Perhaps this means that Beth-lehem was one town of a district Ephrathah. Ephrathah (Ephratah AV) and Beth-lehem are parallel (Ru 4 11), and we read also of Beth-lehem Ephrathah (Mic 5 2). Jesse is called an Ephrathite of Beth-lehem-judah (I S 17 12). Naomi's sons are Ephrathites of Beth-lehem-judah (Ru 1 2). Ephrathah (Ps 132 6) probably means Beth-lehem or the surrounding district. Perhaps in Ps 132 6b we should read "field of Jaar," i.e., Kiriath-jearim (so RVmg.). In Jg 12 5, I S 1 1, and I K 11 26, the Heb. "Ephrathite" should be read "Ephraimite," as in RV. Ephrath (Gn 35 16, 19, 48 7), the place where Rachel was buried, near Bethel, in the border of Benjamin (I S 10 2), was probably not the same as Bethlehem ("the same is Beth-lehem" is a later addition). C. S. T.

EPHRON, ī'fron (אֶפְרֹן, 'ephrōn): I. A Hittite, the son of Zohar of Hebron, from whom Abraham purchased the cave of Machpelah (Gn 23 ff., 25 9, etc.).

II. 1. A city which with others King Abijah wrested from Jeroboam (II Ch 13 19). (Ephrain AV and RVmg., the same as EPHRAIM, III [q.v.].) 2. A mountainous ridge, forming the northern boundary of Judah between Nephtoah and Kiriath-jearim (Jos 15 9). A. C. Z.

EPICUREANS, Ἐπικούριοι (Ac 17 18): The followers of Epicurus (341–270 B.C.), whose tenets opposed those of the Stoics. He started from hedonism and the atomistic theory, and contended that happiness consists in pleasure by which man arrives at virtue through absence of pain. The theory was sensualistic. It encouraged friendship and discouraged engaging in business and politics, which disturb serenity of mind. Epicurus placed the doctrine of the swerving of atoms in the forefront of the doctrine of the genesis of the world and of cognition and therefore exalted Chance to supreme power. There are either no gods, or else they do not care for man. The Epicureans were very dogmatic, and claimed infallibility for their doctrines. They bound their adherents to defend certain fundamental principles. They held that ethics and morals are of more importance than knowledge, which should be sought mainly to banish the disturbing elements of fear and superstition. Epicureanism reflected the elegance and freedom of Athens, and was therefore regarded by the early Christians as embodying the essence of paganism. J. R. S. S.

EPILEPTIC. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5 (8).

EPISTLE: The literary form of the greater portion of the N T writings. In their main construction the N T Epistles correspond generally to what was customary in the age in which they were written—consisting of an opening greeting, a body containing the message, and a closing salutation. In the construction of these several parts, however, they differ largely from the classical form, being more elaborate in both greeting and salutation, while the message is cast usually in a discussional form. The Epistles differ considerably also among themselves. Taking the letter of the Council, embodied in the narrative of Ac 15, as a sample of classical form, the Epistle of James approximates most closely to literary usage in its employment of χαίρειν in its greeting, though it has no salutation; while III John resembles this classical usage in the brevity of its greeting, though it is of the usual N T type in its salutation. On the other hand, Hebrews and I John have no greeting at all. The remaining Epistles are of a peculiar Semitic form of greeting, in their wishing to the readers grace, mercy, and peace from the Divine source, I and II P, Jude, and II Jn introducing the verbal form (I, II P, Jude, πληθυνθείη; II Jn, ἔσται), which is lacking in Paul's letters. The form of the closing salutation varies greatly, though in several (I P, Ro, I and II Co, I Th) appears the idea of the holy kiss, which was a common form of salutation among the Hebrews, and in many (III Jn, Ro, I and II Co, Gal, Eph, Ph, Col, I and II Th, He, I and II Ti, Tit, Phm) there is a renewal of the benedictory wish of grace, or peace from above; while in some (I Co, Ro, Col, I Th, II Ti) there are added personal remembrances or requests from the writer himself. A few (Ja, II P, I Jn, Jude) can not be said to have any farewell salutation.

The messages of the N T Epistles are naturally determined as to their contents by the peculiar religious and spiritual condition of their readers. The usual form which the message assumes is that given characteristically by Paul — a discussion of the readers' situation from a doctrinal point of view, followed by a series of exhortations based upon the previous discussion and applied to the various phases presented by the situation. The best illustrations of this form are given by Ro, Gal, Eph, and Col. In Ph this form is modified somewhat by the personal cast of its contents, which is seen most distinctively in Phm. In I Co the form is constrained by the seriatim discussion of questions raised in the correspondence between the church and the Apostle, and of information given to the Apostle by members of the church. The composite character of II Co makes any classification of its message form difficult, while I and II Th are so peculiarly pastoral, and are determined so largely by the religiously undeveloped character of their readers as to lack formality of discussion. This informality is seen in its extreme form in the personal letters to Timothy and Titus.

Outside of Paul's letters, the variety is more marked. I P and He are the only ones which can be said to reproduce the general Pauline form, and in Hebrews the homiletic quality of the discussion so dominates it as to reduce to a minimum its resemblance to Paul's form. II P and Jude resemble each other, but only feebly suggest the Pauline cast. Ja is a homily, after the style of the O T wisdom writings; while the peculiar literary relation of I John to the Fourth Gospel makes it practically throughout a spiritual application of the Gospel's narrated facts, and the specifically personal character of II and III Jn places them in the category of Phm.

To the character of their contents is due the designation of I and II Ti and Tit as the "Pastoral Epistles." The name "Catholic," however, as applied to Ja, II P, I, II, and III Jn, and Jude, while originating in the conception of them as circular or encyclical letters, was applied at the first only to certain of the group and came later to have the more ecclesiastical sense of 'generally accepted' (see CATHOLIC EPISTLES and PASTORAL EPISTLES).

In general, it is clear that these N T writings took their epistolary form in the way of natural correspondence and not as pure literary productions. They were written for their respective readers, with no thought of a general literary public; so that Deissmann's contention that they are letters rather than Epistles is justified (ET, Dec., 1906).

Besides the formal epistolary writings of the N T there are to be found in the O T and the N T references to individual letters, with more or less reproduction of their contents, such as (O T) the letter of David to Joab (II S 11 14 f.), Jezebel to the elders of Naboth's city (I K 21 8 f.), Ahab to the rulers of Jezreel (II K 10 1-7), Ben-hadad to the king of Israel (II K 5 5-7), Sennacherib to Hezekiah (II K 20 12; Is 39), Hiram to Solomon (II Ch 2 11), Jeremiah to the Exiles in Babylon (Jer 29 [Shemaiah to the rulers of Jerusalem, vs. 25, 31]), Elijah to Jehoram (II Ch 21 12-15), Hezekiah to the remnants of the Northern Kingdom (II Ch 30 1, 6), between officials at the Restoration (Ezr 4 7 ff., 5 5 ff.; cf. Neh 2 7-9, 6 5, 17, 19), Ahasuerus to the royal provinces (Est 3 13 f.), Esther and Mordecai to the Jews (Est 9 29), and (N T) the letter of the High Priest to the Synagogue of Damascus (Ac 9 2; cf. 22 5, 28 21), the Council to the Gentile Converts of Syria and Cilicia (Ac 15 22-29), Claudius Lysias to Felix (Ac 23 26-30). Notice also reference to letters of introduction in II Co 3 1; Ac 18 27; I Co 16 3 (cf. Ro 16 1 f.), and to letters from the churches to the apostle (I Co 7 1); while the Book of Revelation, apocalyptic though it is in its contents, is cast in the form of a letter from the Seer "to the seven churches which are in Asia" (1 4; cf. 2 1, 8, 12, 18, 3 1, 7, 14). M. W. J.

ER, ẽr (עֵר, 'ēr): 1. A son of Judah by the Canaanitess Shua (Gn 38 3 ff., etc.). Er married Tamar, but was slain by J" for his wickedness. The whole story in Gn ch. 38 probably represents tribal (or clan) rather than individual experiences. Er was thus a small clan that was lost (by conquest or absorption) in the larger clan of Tamar or Shelah. 2. 'Son' of Shelah (I Ch 4 21). 3. An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 28). E. E. N.

ERAN, ĭ'ran (עֵרָן, 'ērān): The ancestral head of the Ephraimite clan of Eranites (Nu 26 36). E. E. N.

ERASTUS (Ἔραστος): 1. One of those ministering to Paul (οἱ διακονοῦντες), who was sent in advance from Ephesus to Macedonia (Ac 19 22). 2. The "treasurer (οἰκονόμος) of the city," probably of Corinth, in Ro 16 23. This is all the more likely if this Erastus be identical with the following. 3. An Erastus who, according to II Ti 4 20, remained in Corinth, presumably because it was his home. J. M. T.

ERECH, ĭ'rec (אֶרֶךְ, 'erekh): A city of S. Babylonia to the E. of the lower Euphrates, the modern Warka, the inscriptional Uruk and Arku, whose immense ruins indicate the site of a large city with a very long history. It is mentioned in Gn 10 10 as one of the four cities founded by Nimrod. Its antiquity is attested by its having been the center for S. Babylonia of the worship of the goddess Ishtar (cf. ASHTORETH), the Semitic Venus. It was also the principal scene of the great Gilgamesh or 'Nimrod' Epic. See BABYLONIA, § 7. Archevites are named in Ezr 4 9 f. as among the peoples settled in Samaria by Osnapper (Asshurbanipal). According to the usual explanation it is the inhabitants of the territory of Erech that are meant. J. F McC.

ERI, ĭ'rai (עֵרִי, 'ērī): The ancestral head of the Erites, a clan of Gad (Gn 46 16; Nu 26 16). E. E. N.

ESAIAS, ẽ-zẽ'yas. See ISAIAH.

ESARHADDON, ĭ"sār-had'ẽn (אֵסַר חַדֹּן, 'ēṣar ḥaddōn = Assyr. Aššur-aḫa-iddin), 'Assur has given a brother': A son and succcssor of King Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.) on the throne of Assyria, 681–

668 B.C. He came to his rule after a revolution in which his father was slain (cf. Is 37 38; II K 19 37). As soon as he was established he rebuilt Babylon, which his father had destroyed (689 B.C.). His early military activity was a defense of his country from the Cimmerians on the N. His most notable and far-reaching campaign was that in which he invaded Egypt, 674 B.C. In 673 he repeated the attack and in 670 his army victoriously reached Memphis, captured it, and Egypt became a vassal to Assyria. While on the way to put down revolt in Egypt in 668, Esarhaddon fell a victim to death. I. M. P.

ESAU, ē'sō (עֵשָׂו, 'ēsāw), 'hairy,' according to the popular etymology of Gn 25 25, which, however, is pronounced unsatisfactory by Buhl and others: The name of the first-born of the twin sons of Rebekah and Isaac (Gn 25 21 ff.). The story of E. in Gn is made up of several strands (J, E [?], and P. See GENESIS, § 4). The notice in 25 25 seems to be composite, as in it emphasis is laid upon his ruddy color, whence his name Edom, and upon his skin being like a "hairy" (sē'ār) garment, whence the name Seir, with which the name Esau is connected without explanation. But the origin of his name Edom is given later (25 29-34, as "red," in connection with the red pottage). The name Seir is used often interchangeably with Edom for the country inhabited by Esau's descendants, and the descendants of Seir are given in the genealogy of Esau-Edom, probably as a parallel table (Gn 36 20-30). In the old accounts in JE the interest centers about the relations between Esau and Jacob. In these stories Jacob is represented as gaining the advantage over E. in connection with the question of inheritance (the birthright, 25 29-34 E [?], the blessing, ch. 27 E [?], and J). But on his return from Aram, Jacob is constrained to sue for favor from E., who is represented as meeting him graciously and forgiving all past offenses (chs. 32, 33 mainly J). In P the interest is mainly in Esau's marriages to Hittite (26 34 f.) and Ishmaelite (28 8 f.) wives, which is the reason for sending Jacob to Paddan-Aram (28 1-7).

In JE the stories are told with remarkable impartial objectivity. While E. is a "hunter," "a man of the field," and therefore a contrast to the "quiet," businesslike, crafty Jacob, little is said that shows that the writers condemn him. If Jacob well represents Israel's national traits, E. may also represent those of Edom. For, after all, it is the story of two peoples, the elder of which (Esau-Edom) was at last compelled to give way to the younger (Israel), that gives these stories their real historical significance, as is plainly indicated in the oracle in 25 23. 49. Summary Eschatology (from ἔσχατα, 'last things') is strictly the systematic presentation of ideas regarding the ultimate condition of mankind, and of the world in general; but, more broadly, it includes ideas regarding events leading to the ultimate things. Further, by ultimate is meant not only the absolutely last, but also all that relatively to the present may be regarded as last, i.e., the end of the series of events, as far as the present life of the individual is concerned, and the end of the present dispensation, as far as the world is concerned. In a religious system its importance is even greater than that of the systematic presentation of origins or cosmogony.

1. Definition.

Biblical eschatology, at least as much as any other department of the Biblical system of thought, shows signs of gradual development, and may, therefore, be properly subdivided into the eschatology, I of the O T, II of the intertestamental period, and III of the N T. These three sections represent three periods of unequal duration. The first covers more than 1,000 years and ends with the 2d cent. B.C. The second lasts for approximately 200 years, and the third for somewhat less than one century. Beginning with the first, the two later phases represent the appearance of distinctly new features.

2. Development.

I. Old Testament Eschatology.

1. The Nation. The central subject in the O T is the Chosen People. In eschatology, therefore, the destiny of Israel furnishes the starting-point of the development of thought. And in the portraiture of the future of the Chosen People two things are distinguished: a final future glory reserved for it and an intervening period of judgment, called "the Day of Jehovah." Both of these are comprehended under the eschatological phrase latter days (last days, also "end of days," Is 2 2; Ezk 38 16).

3. General Features of O T Eschatology.

The "Day of Jehovah" ("Day of the Lord" AV), as a phrase, was first used in the 8th cent. and is represented as a consummation to which the people were eagerly looking forward (Am 5 18-20). Before it became a popular expression, however, the phrase must have been used by the prophets in oral encouragements and warning. At any rate, in its first appearance it had already attained a misleading content and Amos aims to correct the misconception. To the expectant people the Day of J" conveyed the meaning of a time of indefinite duration (cf. DAY) when J" would show His favor to His people by delivering them either from foreign oppression or from social irregularities and injustices. This conception takes its name, no doubt, from J"'s special manifestation at the time, just as "day of Midian," "day of Temptation," etc., are times distinguished by these features. It is, however, often spoken of also as that day (Is 17 7, 30 23; Mic 4 6; Zec 9 16, etc.).

4. The Day of Jehovah.

The prophets of the pre-exilic period, true to their character as ethical teachers, develop the idea by calling attention to the fact that, if Jehovah reveals Himself at any time, it must be as the God of righteousness, in order to visit punishment upon sin. With the preaching of this idea the Day of Jehovah became the Day of God's appearance to judge the nations of the earth for their unrighteousness (Zeph 1 7; Is 13 6, 9; Jl 3 14 [spectacular judgment in the Valley of Jehoshaphat]). But God's justice is from the nature of the case set against unrighteousness in all places with equal rigidity. Israel is no exception, and, therefore, both branches of the Chosen People must submit to the visitation of justice. The thought is enunciated with considerable emphasis by Amos (5 18). But the idea of judgment upon all nations opposed to the will of Jehovah is not bound up in the single phrase "Day of Jehovah." It appears independently as the constant refrain of the prophetic discourses; it is given eschatological distinctiveness only through its association with the Day. The usage of the exilic and post-exilic period is best understood upon the basis of this free application of the term (Ezk 13 5, 30 3; Jl 1 15, 2 1, 11, 31; Ob ver. 15).

5. A Day of Righteous Judgment.

The specific character of such a period is more distinctly emphasized by placing between it and what precedes it certain events of exceptional or preternatural aspect. These were conceived as affecting not only the inner social and moral life of nations, but also the world of physical nature. They included portentous convulsions and alterations in the order and movements of the heavenly bodies as well as in the earth itself (Is 24 1; Jl 2 2, 10).

6. Precursors of the Day.

But behind the Day of Judgment the eschatological prospect of the Israelite beheld a day of glory. This too was rooted in the character of Jehovah, as a God exercising mercy and keeping faith with His covenant people. At this point eschatology coalesces with the vaguer forms of the Messianic hope (see MESSIAH). Deutero-Isaiah portrays the prospect of the renovation and restoration of the nation (Is ch. 60). It is an age of perfection which needs no further change and undergoes none. The characteristics of it are the gathering together of all Israelites from all parts of the world (Is 43 6), the bestowment of all earthly blessings upon them (Am 9 11-15), the passing away of sorrow and sighing (Is 35 10, 65 19), and the change of all into righteous servants of Jehovah who glory in Him (Is 45 25).

7. A Day of Israel's Glory.

The other nations are in this prospect brought into subjection to Israel either by conquest as a consequence of the warfare which they themselves have brought on by their attack on God's people (Ezk 38 18; Jl 2 20; Zec ch. 14 [passim]; Ob ver. 18), or by the voluntary adoption of the God of Israel as a God, because they shall recognize Him as the righteous King of the whole earth (Is 2 2-4). To this they will be led either by the manifestation of His great and fearful power (Zeph 3 8, 9; Is 16 8 ff.), or by the teaching of Israel, especially by the Servant of J" (Is 42 6, 49 6, 50 5 ff., 51 4 f., 60 3). This, however, means that Israel is to rule over them and not merely take a primacy among them, as the first among equals (Dn 7 27).

8. Supremacy of Israel.

Of this ideal condition Ezekiel draws a general picture, as far as it concerns the internal conditions and arrangement of the land together with its laws and the ritual provisions that should prevail in the restored Israel (chs. 40–48).

9. Ezekiel's Ideal Israel.

This is the restitution and resurrection of Israel. It is the new era ushered in by a new covenant under which all the imperfections of the old pass away. To use a term derived from pagan lore, it is the "Golden Age." In this renovation even the material creation and the animal kingdom will have a share. The earth shall increase her fruitfulness (Is 30 23-25, 32 15). Prosperity will extend through all the departments of life (Jer 31 18; Jl 3 18; Am 9 13). Noxious beasts and birds of prey will change their natures; so that man shall no longer fear them (Is 11 6-8, 65 25), or else they will be exterminated (Ezk 34 25, 28). The age of man will be prolonged, and none shall die in youth (Is 65 20). Physical infirmities will be removed, as will also disease (Is 29 18). The light of the moon will be equal to that of the sun, and that of the sun will be sevenfold greater (Is 30 26), or Jehovah Himself will take the place of both sun and moon (Is 60 19). In fact, this will be a new world with new heavens and a new earth (Is 65 17, 66 22).

10. National Resurrection.

All these representations could not have been meant literally, but that some of them were there can be little doubt. Yet, however meant and however understood, they are in themselves evidences of an expectation of a deeper and more essential transformation affecting the character of the people, and this is grounded in God's love and work in His Chosen People.

11. Literal and Figurative Blended.

As to the method of the realization of this ideal, it was understood that it would be by the separation of a nucleus of righteous membership in the nation. How large this nucleus should be at the outset is not clear. Isaiah believed that it would include the main body of the state, or at least as much of it as could control the whole body. More frequently, however, the name "remnant," applied to it, carries with it the conception of a small beginning (see REMNANT, and cf. Is 37 4; Zeph 3 13; Zec 8 12).

12. The Remnant.

The moral line of distinction between the sound and unsound parts of the Chosen People is the link of connection between the collectivism and individualism of the O T. For the Remnant is after all constituted of persons who sustain independent relations with Jehovah, not shared in by the general body. Their course is not determined by the whole body, else they must be of the same character and under the same condemnation.

13. Transition to Individualism.

In this transition to the individualistic view of religion Jeremiah served as a pioneer. Every one shall die for his own iniquity is his dictum (31 29 f.). The collapse of the national life with the Captivity no doubt helped to bring into view the importance of a change of basis. At any rate, Ezekiel closely follows Jeremiah's individualism (Ezk 18 4). All souls stand in direct relation to God ("the soul that sinneth, it shall die"). Therefore one may raise himself out of the evil into which he is born and in which he lives (Ezk 18 21-24) and enter a new community.

14. Individualism in Jer and Ezk.

2. The Individual. To the individual the fact of primary importance in eschatology is death. The thought of death was from the very beginning present to the mind of the Hebrew, as it was not among some other races. As to the nature of death itself, however, there is no discussion or explanation of it as a physiological or physical reality. It is certain that it is viewed not as the end of all existence but simply as an end of earthly life. Death is caused by the escape of the soul from the body; and soul and life are practically synonymous. As the life is in the blood (Lv 17 11; Gn 9 4 f.; Dt 12 23), the shedding of the blood is the liberation of the soul. If unjustly forced out of the body, the life could cry out to God for vengeance (Gn 4 10).

15. Death.

Thus expelled or left to escape from the body, life does not become extinct nor lose its personal continuity. Personal continuity and life in the body are not identical. The spirit of life is indeed necessary for existence on earth; but the person may continue to exist in another form after it has left the body. This doctrine, however, is quite different from the idea of inherent immortality in the Greek sense, which involves the indestructibility of the essential being of man. The Hebrew notion involves simply the belief that death does not end all for the individual. The prohibition of necromancy, the sharp distinction between man and other animals, and belief in resurrection, though distinctly enunciated only in the latest times (Dn 12 2), put this conclusion beyond doubt.

16. Immortality.

Just what becomes of the person at death is a question answered variously. According to the popular conception he is "gathered to his fathers" (Jg 2 10; II K 22 20, or "his people," Dt 32 50). But this is very vague. A more developed answer is found in the doctrine of Sheol.

17. State After Death.

The O T Sheol[1] (Hell AV) and the N T Hades must be distinguished from the grave. Abraham, Moses, Jacob, and Aaron are buried in graves far from the sepulchers of their ancestors, and yet they are gathered to their fathers, or pass into Sheol. Sheol is then a distinct place, but where it is located is not clear, unless it be conceived as in the depths of the earth (Pr 15 24; Ps 86 13). It is a region of darkness (La 3 6; Ps 143 3). It is the land where light is as midnight (Job 10 22). It is a vast place, for it receives all and is never full (Pr 27 20; Ezk 32 21). It is known also by other names, such as the pit (Ps 28 1, 30 3; Ezk 32 18); Abaddon, i.e., 'destruction' (Job 26 6, 28 22; Pr 15 11; Ps 88 11); "the lower parts of the earth" (Is 44 23; Eph 4 9); also poetically a "place of silence" (Ps 94 17, 115 17), "the land of forgetfulness" (Ps 88 12); and in a still more imaginative description it is compared to a huge monster with wide-open mouth swallowing those who come near (Is 5 14).

18. Sheol. Hell (AV).

The mode of existence in Sheol is certainly inferior to that upon earth. It is shadowy and dim, owing to the absence of the spirit of life. But it is not a mere disembodied soul or spirit existence. The names of soul and spirit are not given to those who dwell in Sheol. The only exception is Job 14 22, and here the person in Sheol is conceived of as being there in soul and body. More frequently those in Sheol are called 'stiff' or 'weary' ones (Rephaim, "weak," Is 14 9 f., so also in the Phœnician inscription of Eshmunazzar, who are, however, not to be confused with the Rephaim named as primitive giants in Gn 14 5, 15 20). Hence their state is one of privation. They have done with all activity and feel neither pain nor the thrill of excitement (Job 3 13-19); and yet in Is 14 10 they are poetically said to be roused up to meet the king of Babylon who is about to join them. In any case they lack all comfort and joy (Job 17 16).

19. Mode of Existence in Sheol.

[1] The word "Sheol" should be derived not from sha'al, 'to ask,' as if it denoted 'one who demands'; nor from shūl, 'to be limp,' or 'slack'; but from sha'al, 'to dig up,' 'to hollow.'

To what extent even consciousness was believed to continue in the state after death is uncertain. That some degree of mental activity must exist in any condition in which the distinctiveness of man is preserved goes without saying; but it is possible both to exaggerate the amount of feeling implied and to minimize it. It is not safe to infer from the use of the term "knowing ones" (Lv 19 31; Is 19 3, "familiar spirits" RV) that the dead appealed to in necromancy were regarded as more than usually gifted in knowledge (I S 28) or that there is an earlier and a later doctrine on the subject. The more legitimate inference is that the thought of the superior wisdom of the departed was entertained among the heathen, but that in Israel it was especially repudiated as contrary to the principles of Jehovah worship. Nevertheless it is true that the later thought of the O T is more consistent on this point to the effect, namely, that the departed pass a dreamlike incoherent semiconscious existence (Job 10 22).

20. Consciousness in Sheol.

The most important aspect of existence in Sheol to the Israelite was its separation from J″ This caused him great regret (Ps 6 5, 88 10-12; Is 38 18); therefore the dead are mourned (II S 1 17), and the prospect of future reunion with them affords no comfort (II S 12 23). Whatever differences between dwellers in Sheol may exist, they are based not on moral grounds but on racial distinctions. The idea of translation to heaven, as in the case of Enoch and Elijah, does not seem to have formed an appreciable factor in the religious thought of the Hebrews.

21. Separation from J″ in Sheol.

That the dead should be raised from the grave, reclothed in bodily life, and rewarded or subjected to punishment is a conception which appears only in the latest generations of the O T period, and plays an important part in ministering comfort to the surviving comrades and kinsfolk of martyrs (Dn 12 2). The question of the return from Sheol is, however, suggested with a decided negative bias by Job (14 14). In 19 25-29 of the same book (a most obscure passage, "in my flesh" AV, "from my flesh" ERV, "without my flesh" ARV), the testimony for a belief in a bodily resurrection is quite doubtful.

22. Individual Resurrection.

The type of thought in Ecclesiastes (q.v.) does not allow itself to be fused with that of the other O T books. That in this book there are two inconsistent systems is very clear. Whatever the occasion and cause may be, the pessimistic system is more nearly allied to the materialistic view of man's nature and future. Evidently, however, this was felt to be incompatible with the spirit of the Israelite. Either the author himself, or some one else for him, explains the eschatological correlatives (cf. 12 13 f.). See also Ecclesiastes, § 4 (iv).

23. The Eschatology of Ecclesiastes.

II. The Intertestamental Period.

In the interval between the close of the O T and the opening of the N T, eschatology assumed very great prominence. This was due to (1) the distressing circumstances of the period, in which, however, the conviction that all was well, and should ultimately issue in an auspicious consummation never failed or faded; (2) fresh and great interest in the individual and the contemplation of the problems of religion from that view-point; and (3) contact with the Greek world with its doctrine of immortality, which was carefully wrought out upon philosophical grounds. The three branches of eschatology (the world, the nation, and the individual) are, however, still held in view.

24. Formative Influences.

Of the three classes of writings of the period (the Apocrypha, the works of Josephus and Philo, and the apocalyptic literature) the first furnishes nothing distinctive. In II Maccabees the latest development of O T eschatology (especially the idea of the bodily resurrection of the faithful) is acutely presented; but the other Apocrypha contain either no eschatological data or only such as are duplicated in the canonical O T.

25. Literary Sources: Apocrypha.

Jewish eschatology, as far as reflected in Philo and Josephus, shows the development of a difference between Palestinian and Alexandrian types of thought; but essentially its general outline and fundamental position are the same in both. The Messiah and the Messianic restoration of prosperity are quite prominent (Philo, De Exec. 8–9; De Præm. et Pœn. 15–20; Jos. Ant. IV, 6 5; X, 11 7). Philo believed in the final state for the individual at death without subsequent judgment and resurrection, but with everlasting rewards and punishments; and in a special place of punishment (Tartarus, as among the Greeks, De Exec. 6). Josephus, on the other hand, held to the very safe idea of an intermediate condition for both righteous and wicked and a resurrection for the righteous only (Ant. XVIII, 8 14; BJ, II, 1 3).

26. Philo and Josephus.

The most prolific source of eschatological notions for this period is the apocalyptic literature. So large a place is given to the last things in these writings that with some the terms "apocalyptic" and "eschatological" are interchangeable. It is the chief feature of this literature that it divides the whole history of the world into two sections called eons, or ages, separated by a sharp line. All that precedes the moment of separation is the 'present age' (ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος), all that follows is the 'age to come' (ὁ αἰὼν ὁ ἐρχόμενος). They differ from each other in moral character and also in outward conditions. The present age is controlled by brute forces; it is the world-kingdom, symbolized under the figures of beasts. The future is the age of the Divine king, presented under a human aspect (Dn 7 27). The duration of the evil age is absolutely fixed, and though reckoned differently (Eth. En. 16 1, 18 16, 10,000 years; Assump. Mos. 5,000 years) it is near its end, and the question with those living is whether they shall continue through it and witness the advent of the new eon.

27. Apocalyptic Literature.

The future age is naturally characterized by the setting up of the Messianic kingdom and the coming of the Messiah. In both these matters, the thought is rooted in the O T, but developed into a diversity of form not always capable of reduction into a systematic unity. But for the most part these developments are subsequent to the beginning of the N T and influenced by it. More emphasis, however, is laid in the Apocalypses upon the dolores Messiæ, i.e., the disturbances which are to precede and introduce the Messianic Age, and on the appearance of an anti-Messianic personality representing all enmity against God (Antichrist, cf. Sib. Or. 3 63).

28. Messianism in Apocalyptic Literature.

The individual eschatology of the Apocalypses carries out the O T conception on the various phases of the subject to their fuller outline, especially those which cluster about judgment, resurrection, and retribution. On all these subjects, ideas were more clearly outlined. Belief in the resurrection took into its scope the reembodiment of all men with a view to their being judged either individually or in a great and common assize and being assigned to their respective destinies of reward or penalty. Sheol was also developed into the conception of a place subdivided into two caverns, separated by a wall or chasm (gulf, Lk 16 26), one occupied by the departed just and the other by the unjust.

29. Expansion of Ideas.

Furthermore, the growing use of the Valley of Hinnom (gē-hinnōm) as the figure of everything suggestive of disgust and abhorrence furnished a ready mold for the thought of a place of punishment for the wicked. Gehenna (and in a simpler form, "the Valley," Jer 2 23, 31 40) is clearly identified with Sheol in Assump. Mos. 10 10 (cf. also Eth. En. 99 11, 103 7 f.).[1]

30. Gehenna.

A counterpart of Gehenna, a place for the righteous after death, was found in the idea of Paradise (a Persian word meaning 'park,' 'garden'). But the location of Paradise is uncertain. By some it was thought to be a portion of Sheol separated by a chasm from the abode of the wicked, by others it was made a place in the presence of God Himself (Heaven, so the Pharisees, Jos. Ant. XVIII, 1 3; BJ, II, 8 14; Wis 3 14, 4 10, 5 5, 7). Finally the Essenes regarded it as a place on the renovated earth in the future. In the Apocalypses, so far as the subject is touched upon, Paradise is located on the earth (Eth. En. 32 8-23; Jub. 4; but cf. IV Esd 6 51-76).

31. Paradise.

III. New Testament Eschatology.

True to its essential characteristics, N T thought completely eliminates from eschatology the national phase and distributes the interest on the individual and universal aspects of the subject. The problem of the destiny of a special community, however, is not totally left out of consideration. The Christian brotherhood clustering around Jesus Christ assumes a place among the subjects of thought. The struggles and the final victory of the Church are very largely in the foreground; and yet they come into view as features of a world dispensation rather than as experiences of a limited circle of human beings.

32. General Aspects.

1. Eschatology of Jesus.

All N T teaching naturally begins with the words of Jesus. And in this realm the establishment and growth of the Kingdom of God upon earth forms the starting-point. There can be no doubt that the Kingdom of God, as Jesus conceived it, was an inner living organism. Neither can there be any doubt that such an organism must find a body in an outward order of things. The question, however, what this body was to be, and by what processes it was to make its appearance and take its place in the world is not so easily answered. On the one hand, it is stoutly contended that the Kingdom, even in the teaching of Jesus, can only be a visible organization, which Jesus thought would be divinely established for Him by a sudden manifestation of power (Bousset, Die Predigt Jesu in ihrem Gegensatz zum Judenthum; Shailer Mathews, The Mess. Hope in N T, 1905). On the other hand, there is abundant ground for the position that Jesus viewed the Kingdom as already established while He was teaching His disciples, and that He expected it, while starting with small beginnings, to attain through natural processes unto a world-wide diffusion and growth.

33. Eschatology in the Teaching of Jesus.

Whichever of these two antagonistic views may be correct, it remains true that for the disciples of Jesus the essential portion of the foundation and organization of the Kingdom lay in the future. Only after His earthly work was ended and Jesus had returned as the glorified Messiah would the Kingdom be in full manifestation. Hence the promise of His second coming (παρουσία, Mt 24 3, 27, 39) of which the time is concealed from all, even from the Son (Mk 13 32), but of which He gives certain signs that they may recognize it. This thenceforth is the central factor in all N T eschatology.

34. The Kingdom of God in the Future. The Parousia.

The parousia, however, is in the eschatological discourse of Jesus (Mt chs. 24, 25; Mk ch. 13) associated with the end of the world, and with the collapse of the Jewish community, and it has been impossible to extricate the matter from the obscurity which has surrounded it on this account. While the assumption that there is a double coming spoken of, or that a Jewish Apocalypse has been adopted into the teaching of Jesus and given as a discourse of His, and other assumptions of the same kind are arbitrary and improbable, there is, on the other hand, a considerable amount of vagueness in the evangelic reports of what Jesus said, indicating that perhaps from the very nature of the case the reporters of the discourse were not able to grasp His thought with clearness.

35. Sources of the Material in the Parousia Discourse.

[1] This is the purely Palestinian form of what Philo clothes under the Greek term Tartarus.

Closely associated with the declaration of the parousia is the other declaration that its object would be the Judgment. This is clearly an indication of the whole setting and trend of the discourses in Mt chs. 24 and 25. A judgment is more explicitly foretold also in other connections (Mt 10 15, 11 22, 24). In this Judgment Christ Himself is the Judge; those who are judged are all classes of men, including peoples of the past ages, such as the Queen of Sheba, Sodom and Gomorrah (Mt 11 20, 24), and Nineveh; hence also the Gentiles, the twelve tribes of Israel (Mt 19 28), and His own adherents. The rule of Judgment is the ethical one of the exercise of love (Mt 25 31 f.).

36. Parousia and Judgment.

The question of resurrection comes into view as a point of controversy between the Sadducees and the Pharisees, on which His teaching is sought. And Jesus unhesitatingly places Himself on record (Mt 22 23 f.; Mk 12 18 f.; Lk 20 27; cf. also Mt 8 11; Lk 13 28) in favor of the essential truth of the belief. The difficulties of the Sadducees upon the subject have no existence for Him, because it belongs to a different order of reality from those of common experience. But to the same order belongs also immortality. In fact, the latter is in the conception of Jesus based upon the former, and both are rooted in man's relation to God as the object of God's paternal love. Jesus appeals to the fact that J" calls Himself the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Mt 22 32). This was the ground for believing that the patriarchs were not dead. For whom God attaches to Himself in the relation implied in such an utterance, the experience of death can not be the end of all. This is an explicit assertion of the immortality only of some men; but it does not exclude the doctrine of the immortality of all. Further, to the Jewish mind at least, the fact that the patriarchs were living carried with it the implication that they must some time be raised out of their graves. For in mere bodiless existence they could not be ideally perfect.

37. Immortality and Resurrection.

The question, then, what becomes of men at death, was never asked of Jesus or taken up by Him independently. Belief in an intermediate state, however, connecting the present dispensation with that which shall be at His second coming (and the Judgment) underlies as an assumption and unifies the two parts of His teaching. And as a substructure for this idea the belief in an underworld ('Sheol,' 'Hades') appears in a transformed and spiritualized aspect. Hades is no longer a place distinctly and per se, but the figure of a place, or a place as the figure of a moral reality. This is undoubtedly true also of such other terms as were designed to give a notion of the hereafter. Abraham's bosom (Lk 16 22) can not be regarded as anything more than the name of a fellowship with the righteous and faithful (cf. Paradise, above, § 31). Similarly, the statement that a gulf is fixed between those who are in Abraham's bosom and those in torment (ver. 26), though perhaps reflecting the intertestamental notion that a chasm ("gulf") separates the two compartments of Sheol, can be given here only a figurative significance.

38. Intermediate State: Hades.

The rewards and punishments of moral conduct in this life are measured out at the Judgment and become permanent. The wicked are cast down into Gehenna (Mt 5 29 f., 10 28; Mk 9 43). Sometimes, however, the place of punishment is called outer darkness (Mt 8 12), or a place where there are wailing and gnashing of teeth (Mt 22 13, 24 51), a place of torment (Lk 16 23) and of unquenchable fire (Mk 9 43, 45). Of the duration of this punishment, all that may be said is that it is eternal (eonian, or age-long), just as its counterpart is eternal life for the righteous (Mt 25 46, everlasting AV). There is, however, an intimation of the modulation of penalty according to the amount of knowledge of the sinner (Lk 12 46, 48). The righteous enter into the joy of their father; they inherit the kingdom; they possess treasures in heaven; they live like the angels in a state above need and care (Mt 25 31-46).

39. Rewards and Penalties Hereafter.

2. Eschatology of the Apostles.

The apostolic treatment of these subjects is an unfolding of the germs given in the thought of Jesus. In general, it may be included under the four types (the earlier, the Pauline, the Deutero-Pauline, and the apocalyptic).

The first phase of apostolic eschatology (that of James, Peter, and the Acts) revolves about the conception of the parousia. It forecasts some trials and persecutions but also an impending restoration (ἀποκατάστασις, Ac 3 21, restitution AV). The belief in the underworld, with its corollary the intermediate state, also comes to the surface (I P 3 19-21, 4 6); but the interpretation of the passages in which it is expressed is beset with great difficulty. The "spirits in prison" alluded to in them may be either men in Hades or the fallen angels of II P 2 4 and Jude 6; and, so long as it is impossible to say what they are, nothing definite can be built on these expressions.

40. Early Apostolic Eschatology.

The Pauline eschatology is presented in a variety of forms which do not blend into an altogether perfect unity. Especially is this true of the necessary inferences that may be drawn from them. An important place in it is occupied by the establishment of God's kingdom through the second coming of Jesus (described as "the day of the Lord Jesus Christ," "his revelation," I Co 1 7, "his coming," "presence," I Th 2 19, RVmg.). This coming, however, has for its end the judgment of men by Christ Himself. It is to introduce a universal crisis which would include in its scope the heathen as well as the Jews, and to consist in the revelation of the depths of men's moral character (it is a day of the manifestation of God's wrath, Ro 2 5; II Co 5 10). But it is to be characterized also by the manifestation of the Antichrist as a single person (II Th 2 8. See ANTICHRIST).

41. Pauline Eschatology.

But the eschatological idea most fully elaborated by Paul is that of the resurrection. His relation with Greek thought, and his desire to conquer it for Christ led him to consider the prejudice against the conception as it ruled the Greek mind, and to make a synthesis of it with the Platonic doctrine of immortality. Paul thus stands as the connecting-link between the Jew to whom immortality in any sense worth considering was, apart from the body, unthinkable and the Greek to whom the resurrection of the body was a grotesque Oriental superstition.

42. Pauline Idea of Resurrection.

In working out the problem of this synthesis, Paul found the conception of a spiritual body a great help, but not much more than a help; for he does not exactly define what the spiritual body is, i.e., whether it is made of a third substance partaking of the qualities of matter and of spirit, yet free from those characteristics of either which offer difficulties to the idea of resurrection, or whether it is a symbol or picture of a reality not otherwise to be appreciated. The analogy by which he brings it to the mind (I Co 15 36 f.) is after all only an analogy.

43. The "Spiritual Body."

In any case, Paul's belief in the resurrection is intimately connected with the historic fact of the resurrection of Jesus. The fact indicates the existence of a law of resurrection whose operation at the last day will be universal (I Co 15 20). The application of this law, however, must be limited by his view that it is through the implanting of a Divine life in them that Christ secures the resurrection of those who belong to Him (cf. Ro 8 11). But if so, a resurrection for unbelievers, if it take place at all, must be secured in some other way; and just what this way is the Apostle does not say. Hence it has been said, though not convincingly, that his idea does not include the resurrection of unbelievers (Kabisch, Eschatol. d. Paulus, 1893, p. 267 ff.).

44. The Resurrection of Jesus.

Another cardinal point in the Pauline eschatology is the doctrine of the consummation. Here Paul passes into the realm of cosmic application of Biblical ideas. The Gospel which originates with the creation of man bears also upon the destiny of man, to the uttermost end. But if it does this for man, it can not stop there; it must have its sweep through the whole sphere of intelligent beings; hence the Apostle looks forward to the time when all things shall be headed and ruled by the Creator alone (I Co 15 24).

45. The Consummation.

The Deutero-Pauline eschatology, as given in the Epistle to the Hebrews, though not so explicit as that of the Pauline writings, moves along the same lines. The single feature of it which may be said to introduce a strikingly new form is the summing up of all the portents and convulsions foreshadowed in the old prophets under the figure of a shaking of all things (He 12 26, "make to tremble").

46. Deutero-Pauline Eschatology.

The Johannine eschatology includes the two forms given in the Gospel and Epistles on the one side, and in the Apocalypse on the other. Though differing in form, these two are in substance the same. The difference in form is the result of the use of such diverse methods of presentation as the direct and the apocalyptic. The first of these (in the Gospels and Epistles) shows the parousia at the center. Judgment, resurrection, rewards, and punishments are grouped about that main conception. The Apocalypse, taking the author's times as a basis, views the experience of the Christian community as one of struggle, culminating in a final crisis, out of which the Church emerges victorious, purified, and renewed. Its view of the Messianic Kingdom, of the resurrection and judgment, and of all other points of interest, is determined by this thought (cf. also Revelation, Book of).

47. Johannine Eschatology.

The salient points of its forecast are: (1) The second coming of Christ for judgment; (2) a first resurrection, with the establishment of a millennium of peace under Messianic rule; (3) a second or general resurrection; (4) the final overthrow of Satan and punishment of the wicked; and (5) the reconstitution of the world with new heavens and a new earth and a heavenly Jerusalem. The Millennium (a period symbolically limited to a thousand years) is to be ushered in by the casting of Satan into the abyss (q.v., 20 1, bottomless pit AV), and to be characterized by the prevalence of ideal righteousness, peace, and prosperity. It is to end with the release of Satan, and the renewal of the struggle and its final stage. The general resurrection issues in the judgment of the wicked and their being cast into the lake of fire together with Hades and Death. This is the Second Death (20 14, 21 8).

48. Eschatology of the Apocalypse.

The essentials of Biblical eschatology, as they appear when all that was formal and temporary in the process of their gradual revelation is laid aside, include the following: (1) A continuity of conscious existence for the individual (personal immortality). This, however, viewed as life, is so much richer and fuller for those who are identified with Christ that comparatively speaking they only may be said to be immortal. (2) An intermediate state of pure psychical existence, whose nature must necessarily be incapable of explanation. (3) Bodily resurrection for all. But neither is the reassumption of the material of the body necessary to the conception of such resurrection, nor is any mode of revivification included in the doctrine. (4) A new world dispensation, or order of being, ushered in by a remanifestation of the Incarnate and Risen Savior. (5) The judgment of all men by the Risen Christ, issuing in the separation upon spiritual and moral principles of those who are in living fellowship with God through Christ from those who are not. (6) The award of eternal blessedness to the former and of eternal loss to the latter (perdition), because of persistence in alienation from God.

The books that bear the name of Ezra (Gr. form, Esdras, Ἔσδρας) are found variously numbered in the ancient codices. The Vatican MS.

1. Name. of the LXX. gives three books under two titles, i.e., Esdras A (the apocryphon) and Esdras B (embracing the canonical books Ezr and Neh). The Vulgate separates Ezr and Neh and gives them the titles of I Es and II Es respectively, thus placing Es A of LXX. as III Es and another book (the Apocalypse of Es) as IV Es. Of the English translations the Genevan initiated the usage according to which the canonical books are called Ezra and Nehemiah and the apocryphal I Esdras and II Esdras respectively. Other names given to the apocryphal books are the Priest (ὁ Ἱερεύς) and the Greek Esdras for I Es and the Apocalypse of Ezra (Westcott) and the Prophet (ὁ προφήτης, Hilgenfeld) for II Es. Common usage predominantly favors I Es and IV Ezra (II Es) for these books. In the English Revision of 1894 they are called I and II Esdras.

I ESDRAS.

The book falls into two main parts. I. The first chapter opens with a summary of the history from the year in which King Josiah observed the

2. Contents of I Es. Passover (622 B.C.) to the date of the fall of Jerusalem into the hands of Nebuchadrezzar (586). The history runs parallel with II Ch chs. 35 and 36. Without attempting to give information with reference to the interval, the second chapter takes up the story with the first year of Cyrus (539), tells of the delivery of the sacred vessels into the hands of Sanabassar (Zerubbabel) and of his return to Jerusalem (vs. 1-14 = Ezr ch. 1). This is then followed by an account of the opposition to the rebuilding of the Temple and the abandonment of the work until the reign of Darius (‖ to Ezr 4 6-24). Ch. 3 introduces the figure of Zerubbabel in extreme youth as one of three pages who at the court of Darius compete for preeminence in logical acumen, each one undertaking to sustain a thesis. Zerubbabel succeeds in the contest and is given as a reward permission to head a caravan of Jewish exiles back to Jerusalem. The story of the return is naturally given at this point, extending through 5 6. This section has no parallel in the canonical books. It is followed by a list of the returned (5 7-45 = Ezr ch. 2). Next comes the narrative of the setting up of the altar of burnt-offering, the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles, the laying of the foundations of the Temple, the rejection of the offer of the enemies to cooperate in the building and the suspension of the work (5 46-70 = Ezr 3 1–4 5). The story of the resumption of the work and the completion of the Temple is then appended (chs. 6 and 7 = Ezr 5 and 6). II. The remainder of the book narrates the return under Ezra during the reign of Artaxerxes (458) and his reforms, including the abolition of mixed marriages and the promulgation of the Law (chs. 8 and 9 = Ezr 7–10 and Neh 7 73–8 13). At this point the book breaks off abruptly, as if the author had never finished it or the end were lost.

The identity of the materials in the book with those in Ezr-Neh has from the first called for an explanation of its precise relation to the

3. The Relation to Ezr-Neh. canonical work. Leaving out of consideration the original section of our book (3 1–5 6, which was undoubtedly not a translation but a Greek writing from the first), the remainder may be a translation of portions of the canonical books, but from a Hebrew text which was somewhat different and better than the Massoretic (Fritzsche, De Wette); or, as appears more probable, it may be simply a free and somewhat thorough working over of a Greek translation of the latter, either the LXX. or some other.

In the determination of the date of I Es the latest limit of time is furnished by the fact that Josephus (cf. Ant. XI, chs. 1–4) uses it in prefer-

4. Author and Date. ence to the canonical Ezr-Neh. The reasons for this are evidently the better Greek diction of the apocryphal work and the easier chronology from the point of view of Josephus. It is not so easy to fix on an earliest possible date; but the dependence on Dn as suggested in the section 3 1–5 6 would indicate the middle of the 2d cent. as such a limit. Accordingly, it is currently taken for granted that I Es was composed during the century between 150 and 50 B.C. with the probability that the latter date is more nearly correct. Who the author of the book was is also difficult to say. One slight allusion in it is thought to point to Egypt as the place of its origin, that in 4 23 to "sailing upon the sea and upon rivers" for the purpose of "robbing and stealing." This would locate the author as a Jew of Alexandria.

The question why the author should undertake to retell the familiar story of the return finds its answer, first, in the evident desire to

5. Design. stimulate a community of Jews to better and more zealous observance of the Law. The book begins with the observance of the legal Passover and closes with the promulgation of the Law as a whole. But a second motive in it appears to be the desire to commend the Jews to some foreign ruler by holding up before him the example of the Persian kings who in older days had bestowed privileges on them. If the Alexandrian origin of the book be assumed, such a ruler must have been one of the Ptolemies of the 1st cent. B.C.

While I Es was used by Josephus in preference to its canonical parallels, and the Christian writers of the first three centuries quote from it freely (cf. Clem. Alex. Strom., I. 392; Origen, in Jos., hom. ix. 10; Eus. Com. in Ps. 76 19; Tertull. De Coron. milit. 9; Cyp. Ep. 74 9; Athan. Contr. Arian., 11 20), Jerome (Præf. in Ezr.) clearly and decidedly rejected the book (together with II Es) as apocryphal, and declined to translate it. This is probably the ground for the exclusion of both of these books from the Roman Catholic Canon by the Council of Trent (1546). The book is found in the Vatican and Alexandrian MSS. of the LXX.; also in two ancient Latin translations (but not in the Vulg.), and in the Syro-Hexaplar of the early part of the 7th cent. (but not in the Peshiṭṭa). The best editions in English are those by Bissell (in Lange's Com., 1880) and Lupton (in the Speaker's Com., Apocr. I, 1888); in German the one by Guthe (in Kautzsch's Die Apocr. des A. T., 1900).

6. History of I Es.

II Esdras (IV Ezra).

II Es is an apocalypse in form, containing, however, an introduction (chs. 1 and 2), which is not by the same hand, and an appendix (chs. 15 and 16), which is likewise by another hand. The introduction is manifestly a Christian writing, and justifies the rejection of the Jews and the substitution of the Gentiles in the Divine favor. The Apocalypse (chs. 3–14) consists of seven visions vouchsafed to Ezra in the Babylonian exile. In the first of these Ezra is represented as suffering great distress of mind on account of his failure to understand the meaning of sin and suffering in the world. An angel reminds him that God's ways are inscrutable, and that a new age (eon) is about to begin, in which all wrongs shall be righted (3 1–5 19). The second vision is intended to quiet the disturbing thought that God had given over His Chosen People into the hands of the heathen. Here, too, the ground of the reassurance is the imminence of the new age (5 20–6 34). The third vision finds Ezra speculating as to why Israel is not in possession of the land which God had given it. The answer is long and indirect; but it culminates in the assurance that the end of the world is nigh (6 35–9 25). The fourth vision presents in a symbolic figure the sorrow of Zion followed by her glory (9 26–10 58). The fifth depicts the fourth world-empire under the figure of an eagle coming out of the sea (10 60–12 51). The sixth portrays the Messiah under the form of a man who comes out of the stormy sea, is attacked by a countless multitude of enemies, whom, however, he overcomes, and gains a great number of followers (13 1-58). The seventh vision consists of the familiar legend of Ezra's restoring the lost Scriptures. Ezra prays for the privilege of rewriting the sacred books, lost before his day. His prayer is answered. He makes arrangements for the writing down of what he shall dictate, and is given a liquid which when drunk by him imparts the power of reproducing the contents of the lost writings. These together with seventy other books he dictates, but publishes only those at present contained in the O T Canon (14 1-50). The last portion of the book (chs. 15 and 16) contains a long and tedious arraignment of sinners, together with predictions of wars and calamities, similar to those foretold by Jeremiah.

7. Contents of II Es.

Chs. 1, 2, 15, 16 of IV Ezr are not included in the Latin versions, which serve as the basis of the chapter divisions in the book, and also of the text in the English editions by C. J. Ball (Variorum Apocrypha) and Lupton (Wace's Holy Bible). These four chapters are evidently later additions. The other versions do not contain them. They have been detached and published together as V Ezr by Fritzsche (Lib. Apoc. Vet. Test., Liber Esdræ Quintus, pp. 640–653). But if the separate origin of these chapters is to serve as the ground of their being put forth as numerically a different book, the same reasoning would require that instead of V Ezr they should be made into V and VI Ezr, inasmuch as these four chapters are not a unit but fall into two groups (1 and 2 and 15 and 16 respectively). It seems best, upon the whole, to adhere to the custom of attaching the chapters to the apocalypse as simpler and less confusing.

8. V Ezr.

The Apocalypse of Ezra (chs. 3–14) is a literary unity comparatively free from interpolations and editorial tampering. The author was a devout Jew, who lived not earlier than the fall of Jerusalem; for he distinctly refers to that event (3 2, 10 48, 12 48). He knows also of the death of Titus (11 35). Accordingly he must have flourished toward the latter part of the 1st cent. A.D., and the year 85 may be regarded as the approximate date of his writing. His object was manifestly to infuse courage into the hearts of the faithful by holding up to them the dawn of the coming age as the end of all their misfortunes. The history of the reception of the book and of its translation and publication is the same as that of I Es (sec § 6, above). For a separate treatment of the religious content see Schieffer, Die religiösen und ethischen Anschauungen des IV Ezra-buches (1901). A. C. Z.

ESTHER (Person and Book): The Book of Esther, according to 1 1, is an episode from the reign of Ahasuerus. Since Grotefend's decipherment of the proper names in the Persepolis inscriptions it has been generally recognized that this monarch is Xerxes. The Hebrew form 'Aḥashwērōsh corresponds to the Babylonian and Aramaic spelling of the Persian Khshayārshā, Xerxes. According to Ezr 4 6, his reign fell between those of Darius and Artaxerxes. The book narrates how Esther, a Jewish maiden, became Xerxes' queen; how she delivered her people from the destruction planned by Haman, the king's favorite; and how, in commemoration of this deliverance, the feast of Purim was instituted.

1. Contents.

MSS. of the Hebrew Esther are more numerous than of any other portion of the O T. All are descendants of a single standard codex that was adopted by the Scribes about 100 A.D. From this codex are descended also a larger number of targums and midrashes than are attached to any other Biblical book (see JE, article Esther). These are too late to be of any text-critical value. Their additions to the Massoretic text rest upon no documentary authority, but only upon legendary oral tradition.

2. Text.

For the restoration of the pre-Massoretic text our most important aid is the Greek version (1st cent. B.C.). This has come down in five main recensions: that of the Uncials, of Origen, of Hesychius, of Lucian, and of the old Latin. All agree in presenting a text that differs from the Massoretic text more widely than any other book in the LXX. Many verses have long additions, and there are 107 new verses not found in the Hebrew. Jerome, in the Vulgate, translated the longer additions, but removed them from the body of the book and placed them at the end. This senseless arrangement is perpetuated in the English Apocrypha. In Swete's edition of the LXX. they are given their proper place, and are designated by the letters A, B, etc. The attempt has been made at various times to show that these additions have been translated from a Hebrew or Aramaic original that stood in a larger recension of Esther; but modern critical authorities are agreed that there is no trace of them in Hebrew or Aramaic literature, and that they are not translated from a Semitic language, but are interpolated to correct the lack of religion in the Hebrew book in its original form.

In regard to the unity of the book in general no doubt can be felt. Only the section 9 20–10 3 presents difficulties which have suggested to a number of critics that it comes from a different hand. Possibly it is a quotation by the author of Esther from the book mentioned in 10 2.

3. Unity.

The book makes no claim of age or authorship for itself. The statement of 9 20, "Mordecai wrote these things," does not refer to the foregoing book but to the letter that follows. The "book" mentioned in 9 32 is not Esther, but the letter mentioned in 9 29. Esther is never quoted by any prechristian writer. The earliest literary evidence of its existence is the LXX. version. Purim is first mentioned in II Mac 15 36. The external evidence, accordingly, does not demand an earlier date than the 1st cent. B.C.

4. Date.

The internal evidence leads to a similar conclusion. In 1 1, 13 f., 4 11, 8 8, the author speaks of the times of Xerxes as long passed. In 3 8 the Diaspora of the Greek period is known. The conversion of multitudes to Judaism (8 17, 9 27) was not true of the Persian period, but was characteristic of the proselyting zeal of the Greco-Roman period (cf. Mt 23 15).

The intellectual standpoint of the book also indicates a date in the late Greek period. There is no trace of the Messianic hope that characterized the early days of the return from captivity. The bitter hatred of the Gentiles, and the longing for their destruction that this book discloses, were first induced by Antiochus' determination either to Hellenize or to exterminate the Jews. Mordecai's refusal to bow before Haman (3 2) is not in accord with old Hebrew usage, but shows a Greek spirit of independence. The prominence given to financial considerations (3 9) is also indicative of a commercialism that developed in the Greek period. The national pride, bereft of religious enthusiasm, indicates that the book was not written at the time of the Maccabæan struggle, but in the period of worldliness and self-complacency that followed the attainment of independence in 135 B.C.

With this conclusion the language of the book is in accord. The Hebrew is as late as any in the O T. There are a number of words that are found elsewhere only in the Mishna and other Rabbinical writings. Aramaic influence is conspicuous in diction and construction.

5. Historical Character.

In regard to the historical character of the book the following facts may be noted: (1) Ahasuerus is a historical personage, and the picture of his character in Esther corresponds with that of Xerxes given by Herod., vii. ix; Æsch. Pers. 467 ff., Juv. x. 174–187. The incidents of Esther can be fitted into the life of Xerxes without great difficulty. Apart from this there are no coincidences with the Greek account of Xerxes.

(2) The chief personages of the book, Vashti, Haman, Esther, and Mordecai, are unknown to history. Ezra, Nehemiah, the later Psalms, Sirach in his list of Hebrew worthies (Sir chs. 44–49), say nothing of the Jewish queen who saved her nation, or of the mighty Jewish chancellor. Greek writers show us that during the period between the 7th and the 12th years (2 16, 3 7) Xerxes' queen was not Esther but Amestris, the daughter of a Persian general (Herod. xvii. 114; ix. 112).

(3) The Book of Esther gives many proper names, e.g., 1 10, 14, 2 3, 5, 8, 14 f., 21, 3 1, 4 5, 5 10, 7 9, 9 7-9, 29. Not one of these persons appears in the Greek account of Xerxes' reign, and their names can not even be shown to have been in use in the time of Xerxes. A number are certainly Persian, but it is not clear that they are old Persian. Some are probably of Babylonian, Aramaic, or even Hebrew origin. They might all have been picked up in the Greek period by an author who knew something about Persia.

(4) The account of the origin of Purim given by this book is historically improbable. It represents it as instituted by Esther and Mordecai, and as adopted by the Jews in commemoration of their deliverance; but Purim is not a Hebrew word, and it is unnatural that a Jewish commemoration should be called by a foreign name. In 3 7, 9 26, it is said that the feast is so called because "Haman cast Pur, that is, the lot"; but it is unlikely that the trivial circumstance of the way in which Haman determined the day of destruction should give its name to the day of deliverance. Moreover, there is no Persian word pur with the meaning 'lot.' If Purim had originated in the time of Xerxes, as Esther represents, and had been enjoined upon all the Jews in all provinces of the empire (9 20), and had been accepted by the Jews for themselves and for their posterity (9 27), there is no reason why it should not have been included in the Priestly Code as promulgated by Ezra.

(5) Some of the statements in regard to Persia and Persian customs are confirmed by classical historians, e.g., 1 6-8, 14, 3 2, 7, 13, 4 2, 5 14, 6 8, 8 10. All that this proves is that the author had some familiarity with Persian life which he used for local color. It is offset by statements which show that he had no first-hand knowledge of the Achæmenian Empire, e.g., 127 satrapies (1 1, 8 9; cf. Herod. iii. 98), the veiling of women (1 9-12; cf. Herod. x. 110 f.), the unchangeability of the laws of the Medes and Persians (1 19, 8 8), the idea that no person could approach the king without summons on pain of death (4 11).

(6) There are a number of incidents in Esther which, although they can not be shown to be unhistorical, are yet so contrary to Persian law and custom as to be improbable. Thus 2 2, 4, 8, 10, 17, are contrary to the law of the Avesta and the testimony of Herod. iii. 34 that the queen might be selected only from seven of the noblest Persian families. Mordecai's free access to Esther (2 11, 4 2-17) is contrary to the custom of Oriental harems. The appointment of two foreigners, Haman the Agagite (cf. Nu 24 7; I S 15 8) and Mordecai the Jew, as prime ministers (3 1, 10 3) is not consistent with Persian national pride. The issuing of decrees in the languages of all the provinces (1 22, 3 12) was not the usual practise of the Persian Empire.

(7) The book contains a number of inconsistencies with itself. In 2 6 Mordecai is one of the captives carried away with Jehoiachin in 596 B.C., but in 3 7, 8 2, he becomes prime minister in the 12th year of Xerxes, 474 B.C. In 3 2, 4, 4 1, Mordecai parades the fact that he is a Jew, but in 2 10 he forbids Esther to make her kindred known. Esther successfully conceals the fact that she is a Jewess from the king, Haman, and everybody else (2 10, 7 3 f.), and yet Mordecai, who is well known to be a Jew, is her uncle, and comes to the palace every day to inquire after her (2 11), and all the Jews in Susa fast for her before she ventures to go to the king (4 16). Haman obtains an edict to destroy all the Jews because Mordecai the Jew will not do obeisance to him (3 6), but Haman's friends and family are ignorant as to Mordecai's race (6 13). Xerxes delivers the Jews to destruction (3 11), yet heaps honors upon Mordecai the Jew (6 10 f.). Haman is still the royal favorite, but he is given the menial task of conducting Mordecai through the streets (6 10 f.). Xerxes authorizes the act of Haman (3 11), yet he is much surprised at the information that Esther gives him of Haman's plot (7 5 f.).

(8) The book contains a number of details which can not be proved to be untrue, but which are so intrinsically improbable that one has difficulty in believing that they are historical, e.g., 1 1-5, 12, 13-15, 16-22, 2 1-4, 12, 16, 3 1 (cf. Ex 17 8; Nu 24 7; I S 15 8), 2 5 (cf. I S ch. 15), 2 23, 3 6-9 (cf. II Targ. 3 9, 4 1), 3 8-15, 5 4, 7, 14, 6 1, 4, 7 5, 8, 8 11, 9 2 f., 13 f.

In view of these facts the conclusion seems to be inevitable that the Book of Esther is not historical, and that it is doubtful whether even a historical kernel underlies its narrative.

6. Origin of Purim.

All the objections urged above against the historicity of the account of Purim in the Book of Esther apply with equal force to any theory that assigns it a Hebrew origin. A feast that the Jews had invented would not be called by a foreign name for which no rational explanation can be given. Purim must be a holiday adopted by the Jews from their neighbors, just as Fourth of July and Thanksgiving Day have been adopted by them in America. The only question is, From which nation was this feast borrowed?

A Persian origin is naturally suggested by the facts that the scene of the book is laid in Persia, and that it has a strong Persian color (so Hitzig, Meier, Fürst, Zunz). Lagarde (Purim, 1887) pointed out that in the Lucianic Greek recension Purim appears as Phourdaia, which he conjectured was the same as the Persian Farwardīgān, a sort of All Saints' Day. This theory has found wide acceptance, but labors under the difficulties that Farwardīgān does not fall on the 14th of Adar, and that the Greek form Phourdaia is less likely to be correct than the Hebrew Purim.

Of late the theory of Babylonian origin has become dominant. In WZKM, vi. (1892), p. 70 ff., Jensen shows that Esther is the regular Syrian form of the name of Ishtar, the Babylonian goddess. Her other name Hadassah, is the Babylonian hadashatu, 'bride,' used as a title of goddesses. Mordecai (Gr., Μαρδοχαῖος) is the same as Marduk (Merodach), the chief male divinity of Babylon. He is the cousin of Esther, as Marduk is of Ishtar. Haman, the adversary of Mordecai, is the same as Hamman, or Humman, the chief divinity of the Elamites, in whose capital, Susa, the action of this book takes place. Vashti is an Elamite deity, probably feminine. Zeresh (in some Gr. MSS. Geresh), the wife of Haman, may be the same as Kirisha, another Elamite goddess, apparently the consort of Humman. The conflict of Esther and Mordecai against Haman, Vashti, and Zeresh is the conflict of the gods of Babylonia against the gods of Elam, which is a reflex of the 1,000 years' struggle for supremacy between Babylonia and Elam, ending with the victory of Babylonia. Jensen, Winckler (AOF, ii. 274 f.), and Zimmern (KAT,[3] 514 f.) point out other mythical parallels, and create a strong suspicion that the story of Esther is a Euhemeristic Jewish version of Babylonian legends learned at the time of the Captivity. This view has found the approval of Nöldeke, Wildeboer, Smend, Cornill, and most recent writers. If the story of Esther is Babylonian, then the feast which it aims to explain must be Babylonian also, but thus far it has not been identified with certainty. Zimmern (ZATW, 1891, pp. 157–169) suggests that Purim = pukhru, 'assembly,' a name of Zagmuk, or the New Year Feast of Marduk. Jensen identifies it with the Ishtar feast, in the month Ab. It is more likely that with Johns (EB, 3979) we are to connect Purim with the Babylonian observances in the month Adar. The 13th of this month is known to have been unlucky, and the 14th and 15th lucky. The eponyms entered upon their office on the first of Nisan, and they must have been chosen during the preceding month. The word puru, or buru, means 'stone,' then 'lot,' 'inheritance,' and 'eponymate,' and may easily have been applied to the day in Adar on which the officials for the new year were selected. On this theory Purim was the Babylonian Election Day, a time of feasting and sending of presents, that the Jews adopted from their neighbors during the Exile and continued to observe long after they had forgotten its real origin. The decision of this interesting question depends upon the publication of further Babylonian material in regard to the religious observances of the month Adar.

7. Religious Value. Canonicity.

The Alexandrian Jews were so conscious of the religious deficiencies of Esther that they tried to remedy them with the apocryphal additions noted above (§ 2). This free treatment shows that no sacred character was yet attached to the book. In Palestine there was long opposition before it was admitted to the Canon. It is never quoted by Christ, nor by any of the N T writers. The early Christian Church made no use of it, and no Church Father attempted an exposition of it. Melito (c. 170 A.D.) omits it from his Canon, and Origen (c. 225) does not include it among the historical books. The Syrian Christians regarded it as apocryphal, and the Nestorians never had it in their O T.

In significant contrast to this attitude of early Judaism and early Christianity stands the high esteem of this book in later Judaism. The Synod of Jamnia in the 1st cent. decreed it to be canonical. Later writers sought to explain away the opposition of their predecessors, and praised the book in most extravagant terms. Rabbi Simeon b. Lakish (c. 300 A.D.) ranked it next to the Law. Maimonides declared that although the Prophets and the Writings should pass away when the Messiah came, yet this book and the Law should remain. This is the attitude of orthodox Judaism. Esther is inserted with the Law in the synagogue rolls and is treated with the highest reverence. More targums and midrashes are based upon it than upon any other portion of the O T.

With this verdict of late Judaism modern Christians can not agree. The book is so conspicuously lacking in religion that it should never have been included in the Canon of the O T, but should have been left with Judith and Tobit among the apocryphal writings. God is never once mentioned in the book. The author doubtless believes that there is a God (cf. 4 14, 16., 9 31 f.), but he has no consciousness of His nearness. He alone of all the writers in the O T and Apoc ascribes deliverance to men. Fasting is the only religious rite that he names. He has not one noble character in his book. Xerxes is a sensual despot. Esther, for the chance of winning wealth and power, takes her place in the herd of maidens who become concubines of the king. She wins her victories not by skill or by character, but by her beauty. She conceals her origin, is relentless toward a fallen enemy (7 8-10), secures not merely that the Jews escape from danger, but that they fall upon their enemies, slay their wives and children, and plunder their property (8 11, 9 2-10). Not satisfied with this slaughter, she asks that Haman's ten sons may be hanged, and that the Jews may be allowed another day for killing their enemies in Susa (9 13-15). The only redeeming traits in her character are her loyalty to her people, and her bravery in attempting to save them (4 16). Mordecai sacrifices his cousin to advance his interests, advises her to conceal her religion, displays wanton insolence in his refusal to bow to Haman, and helps Esther in carrying out her schemes of vengeance. All this the author narrates with interest and approval. He gloats over the wealth and the triumph of his heroes, and is oblivious to their moral shortcomings. Religiously Esther falls far below the general level of the O T and even of the Apoc. Its lesson of hatred toward one's enemies and of bloody vengeance upon them is irreconcilable with the teaching of Christ. The verdict of Luther is not too severe: "I am so hostile to this book that I wish it did not exist, for it Judaizes too much, and has too much heathen naughtiness."

Map II, D 3. A. C. Z.

ETERNAL: Time whose limits on account of their remoteness are hidden from view. The word may be applied to the past or to the future (Dt 33 27; Is 60 15). In the N T eternal (αἰώνιος, Mt 19 16, etc.) denotes that which belongs to the coming age (αἰών) and is strictly equivalent to age-long (Mt 19 16; Ro 2 7). For this and Eternal Life see also ESCHATOLOGY, § 39. A. C. Z.

ETHAM, ī'tham (אֵתָם, 'ēthām): A station on the Exodus route, reached after leaving Succoth, in the W. edge of the wilderness (Ex 13 20; Nu 33 6 f.), called "the wilderness of Shur" (Ex 15 22), and "the wilderness of Ethan" (Nu 33 8). It lay on the E. border of Egypt, perhaps N. of Lake Timsah. Cf. the Egyptian word ḥetem, the name of a fortress on the E. boundary of Egypt. C. S. T.

ETHAN, ī'than (אֵתָן, 'ēthān): 1. A wise man, "the Ezrahite" (I K 4 31), designated as the author of Ps 89 (title). According to I Ch 2 6, 8, a son of Zerah (= Ezra[hite]?). 2. An ancestor of Asaph (I Ch 6 42), called Joah in ver. 21. 3. A 'son' of Kishi, like Heman and Asaph, the eponymous ancestor of a gild of temple-singers (I Ch 6 44, 15 17, 19). Identified with Jeduthun (cf. I Ch 16 41, 25 1, 6; II Ch 5 12, 35 15). C. S. T.

ETHANIM, eth'a-nim : The old name of the seventh month of the Jewish year. See TIME, § 3. E. E. N.

ETH-BAAL, eth-bē'al (אֶתְבַּעַל, 'ethba'al), 'man of Baal': A king of Sidon, father of Jezebel (I K 16 31). Eth-baal (or Ithobaal) was priest of Astarte in Sidon. He murdered Phelles, King of Sidon, and usurped the throne c. 887 B.C. (Winckler); cf. Jos. Contra Ap., I, 18. See CHRONOLOGY OF O T (Table). E. E. N.

ETHER, ī'ther (עֶתֶר, 'ether): A town of Judah near Libnah (Jos 15 42), assigned to Simeon in 19 7. Site unknown. E. E. N.

ETHIOPIA, ī"thi-ō'pi-a: In the EV of the O T this term represents directly the N T Gr. word Αἰθίοψ, which in the LXX. is the equivalent of the Hebrew Cush (q.v.) of the O T. The Gr. word originally meant 'dark-skinned,' and was employed both of the population to the south of Egypt and of dark-hued southern peoples generally. The equivalent Cush is in the EV used only of one of the sons of Ham (Gn 10 6-8 = I Ch 1 8-10), except in Is 11 11, where it appears in place of the usual "Ethiopia." Cush is the common Semitic name of the Ethiopian country and people, being borrowed from the Egyptian, in which Kosh is their regular designation. Cush, as a country, corresponds roughly to the modern Nubia, and the Cushites appear to have been the principal ancestors of the Nubians. Their extreme northern boundary was the first cataract of the Nile at Assouan; but, as Cush was normally subject or tributary to Egypt, no definite limit was regularly maintained. The southern boundary was still more indefinite, depending on the extent of the Egyptian conquests and trade at different periods. The people were not of the negro type, but essentially Hamitic (cf. Gn 10 6). The Egyptians themselves, however, seem to have classed them with the negroes, as the Greeks and Romans did the Ethiopians. Their dark-brown color, due to their southern habitat, is referred to in Jer 13 23.

1. Name and Boundaries.

In the reign of the 12th dynasty (c. 2000 B.C.) northern Ethiopia became independent, but was again subdued along with much southern territory in the 16th cent. B.C. The new province, extending at length to the third cataract of the Nile, was made thoroughly Egyptian in manners and religion. Under the 22d or Libyan dynasty, native rulers threw off the yoke of Egypt, and about 750 B.C. the new Ethiopian kingdom gained control of Egypt itself, though the princes of the Delta retained their autonomy and some freedom of action. This situation explains the relations between Seve (EV So), "King of Egypt," and Hoshea, King of northern Israel (II K 17 4), and the alliance of Tirhakah, "King of Ethiopia," with Hezekiah of Judah (II K 19 9). The Ethiopians were still in control when Egypt was subdued by the Assyrians (668 B.C.). After the subjugation of Ethiopia itself in its final struggle the country ceased to exercise any influence abroad. Royal authority, however, was frequently wielded by powerful native chiefs, and at the beginning of the Christian era Meroe, in southern Nubia, was the seat of a kingdom whose rulers held their title through the female line. Hence the queen-mother, who seems to have borne officially the name Candace (q.v.), was often the virtual ruler. The chamberlain of one of these quasi-queens is mentioned in Ac 8 27 ff.

2. History.

Some of the references to the southern 'Cush' in the O T can hardly be explained of the African Ethiopia, and it has been conjectured that, as the Assyrians seem to have understood Cush as including southern Arabia as well, the Hebrews may have had a similar usage. Upon this hypothesis the invasion of Judah by "Zerah the Ethiopian" in the time of Asa (II Ch 14 8-14) is explained; since at this date the Ethiopians were confined to their own proper territory, while the South-Arabian kingdom of Ma'in was flourishing and aggressive. The "Cushites" of II Ch 21 16 may also be plausibly referred to the same region. Cf. Winckler in *KAT*³, p. 143 ff. See also CUSH. J. F. McC.

3. The Arabian Cush.

ETH-KAZIN, eth″-kê′zin (עִתָּה קָצִין, 'ittāh qātsīn, Ittah-Kazin AV): A town on the E. border of Zebulun (Jos 19 13). Site unknown. E. E. N.

ETHNAN, eth′nan (אֶתְנָן, 'ethnān): The head of a Judahite family (I Ch 4 7). E. E. N.

ETHNARCH, eth′nārc. See ARETAS.

ETHNI, eth′nai (אֶתְנִי, 'ethnī): An ancestor of Asaph (I Ch 6 41). E. E. N.

The races of the Bible may be most profitably studied either (1) by taking up one by one the peoples mentioned in Scripture, referring them to their several racial divisions, and then inquiring into the most important distinctive features of these divisions; or, (2) we may first distinguish the races that are prominent in the Bible according to their characteristics and their history, and then show the place occupied by each people in this classification. Both methods will be followed in this summary presentation.

1. Treatment of the Subject.

In one main aspect, the ethnology of the Bible lands in antiquity was strikingly similar to that of to-day. The geographical sphere of chief interest in the O T was the region extending from the Mediterranean Sea to the mountains of Persia, and from the southern mountain boundaries of Asia Minor and Armenia to the first cataract of the Nile on the SW. and to the estuary of the Euphrates and Tigris on the SE. These limits include the lowlands of Western Asia along with Egypt proper. Beyond this region many countries were known to the O T writers and mentioned by them, but their inhabitants were to the Hebrews strange and remote, at least until the Persian supremacy. Now this same territory was from the remotest times the proper home of one race and one only, that is, the Semitic. And to-day scarcely any other race than the Semitic has any representation in this region.

2. Geographical Limits.

The Semites have their current name from Shem, the eldest son of Noah. Their chief Biblical significance is that the Hebrews, the people of Revelation, belonged to that race. The Hebrews did not, however, form one of its principal divisions. They were, in fact, a very composite people, that came into existence late in the history of the Semites. A preliminary distinction might perhaps be made, in the whole family, between African and Asiatic Semites. The evidence of language and, to a less degree, of physical features points clearly to a remote affinity between the Egyptians and the Semites of Asia. With the Egyptians must be grouped the Berbers and other N. African tribes. All these taken together are often termed Hamitic, from the name of the second son of Noah. The Hamites, therefore, are to be reckoned as a distant kindred of the Semites, currently so called. The separation between them and the Asiatic Semites took place at an extremely early period. The latter, or the Semites par excellence, may be geographically divided into the inhabitants of Arabia, of Upper and Lower Mesopotamia, of Syria, and of Palestine. But this sort of classification is superficial, since everywhere within the limits of Semitism important changes of population have constantly been taking place, through shifting and substitution. A more accurate general division is that into Northern and Southern Semites, with subdivisions according to the following scheme:

3. Classification.

A. Northern Semites: I. Babylonian. II. Aramæan. III. Canaanitic. IV. Hebraic.

B. Southern Semites: I. Arabian. II. Sabean. III. Abyssinian.

This classification is also very general. No single people, known to have lived separately from every other, can be exactly comprehended under any one of the above-mentioned racial names, each of which designates rather a group of peoples, more or less closely allied in origin and affiliation, and found at one time or another during the long Semitic ages associated together. Hence brief historical statements will have to accompany the following explanation of the table.

However the question of Semitic beginnings may be complicated by the problem of the starting-place of the Hamites, or the secondary Semites of Africa, it seems reasonably certain that the Semites of Asia had their origin among the oases of central and north-central Arabia. The first permanent settlement was made by colonies that occupied Babylonia, or the fertile lands between the lower Euphrates and Tigris, a region whose southern portion had been already a possession of an alien race. This Semitic settlement was made not later than 5000 B.C. The rich communities that thereafter developed, of which the city of Babylon eventually became the political center, were the perpetual resort of invaders and immigrants from among non-Semitic peoples to the E. and NE., so that Babylonia proper was never the home of a purely Semitic population. The Assyrians, an offshoot that founded an empire on the Tigris, to the N., and the later Chaldeans, to the S., were more genuinely Semitic.

4. The Babylonians.

The Aramæans were more widely extended in their permanent settlement than any other branch of the Northern Semites. They were found on both sides of the lower Tigris and Euphrates, in Lower and Upper Mesopotamia, and through the whole of Syria, not merely as shepherds and traveling merchants, but as the controlling inhabitants of large cities, such as Charran (Haran), Aleppo, and Damascus. The Euphrates was the most important dividing-line between them, yet they did not migrate to the W. of that river in any numbers till the 13th cent. B.C. Later they became dominant there until, long before the Christian era, their language was spoken by most of the inhabitants of Syria, where it continued to prevail until after the Mohammedan conquest. We, therefore, make a very general division upon these lines into E. and W Aramæans. The ubiquity of this branch of the Semites, as well as their inability to consolidate into large communities, is illustrated by the fact that more ancient dialects of Aramaic have survived than of any other Semitic language. Aramæans are still found in considerable numbers in the region of ancient Assyria, in Kurdistan, and in Urumiah in Persia. The importance of distinguishing between language, race, and local habitation is illustrated by the fact that the Aramaic dialect employed by these survivors, the modern 'Syriac,' is not derived from the ancient classical Syriac; and that the latter is itself an incorrect designation, since it was properly the language of a people in Mesopotamia proper, divided from Syria by the Euphrates, and is, therefore, a dialect not of W. but E. Aramaic. Again, the Aramaic portions of the O T, which are written in a dialect of W. Aramaic, are still often improperly called 'Chaldee,' though the Chaldeans did not speak Aramaic at all, but Babylonian or 'Assyrian' (see ARAMAIC LANGUAGE).

5. The Aramæans.

The third branch, the Canaanitic, like the Aramæan, did not form any permanent settlements till long after the Babylonian. Canaan, like most other racial terms, was originally a local name, the designation of a district and community in Phœnicia, so that, roughly speaking, the Canaanites originally were practically equivalent to the Phœnicians, who, down to the end of their history, called themselves by this synonym. They had kindred in the highlands of Palestine, of whom the several smaller local tribes, Perizzites, Hivites, Jebusites, and Girgashites, were doubtless subdivisions. It is quite possible that the Canaanites were originally a branch of the Amorites. One fact is clear, that both peoples settled in and about Palestine from the N., the Canaanites tending at first to the seacoast, while the Amorites were attracted to Anti-Lebanon and its eastern slopes, whence they spread southward, E. of the Jordan. There is some reason to suppose that the Canaanites (and Amorites) were preceded in Palestine by non-Semitic peoples or hordes, who are perhaps represented indistinctly by the more or less legendary Anakim, Rephaim, Emim, and Zamzummim of Dt, chs. 2 and 3.

6. The Canaanites.

The Hebraic division comprised, besides the Hebrews, the peoples lying nearest to them to the S. and E.: the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites. The chief evidence for the relationship is found in the personifying genealogical traditions of the Hebrew literature, according to which Edom was the brother of Israel, and Moab and Ammon were his second cousins. Language gives but little help here, for although the Moabites spoke Hebrew, this was learned from the Canaanites by both peoples alike. The Hebrews and their kindred were, in fact, the most composite of all the ancient Semitic families. The two names Hebrew and Israel are themselves indicative of a dual origin. Israel was proximately Aramæan (cf. Dt 26 5), and there is reason to suppose that the Hebrews are identical with the Chabirē, a small aggressive tribe in S. Palestine in the 15th cent. B.C. A remote Babylonian derivation seems also to be claimed in Gn 11 28, 31, though their ancestors in the district of Ur on the lower Euphrates may have been nomadic Aramæans. Like the Edomites, though to a less degree, the Hebrews received an Arabian admixture, not merely in the old tribal days (Kenites, Kenizzites, etc.), but all through the period of their abode in Canaan.

7. The Hebraic Peoples.

The Bible has little interest in the Southern Semites. Hence a formal classification is of minor consequence here; but a few words of explanation are necessary to prevent confusion. In one sense all the S. Semites are 'Arabian,' all having had their origin and earliest home in the great peninsula, for Sabean (from the Gr. form of the Biblical "Sheba") is a term roughly including the peoples of S. and SW Arabia, and the ancestors of the ancient Abyssinians crossed over the Red Sea from the same region. On the other hand, the term Arabia has immensely enlarged its signification since early Bible times. The Arabs of the O T were merely the most important tribe of north-central Arabia and are to be coordinated with Ishmael, Midian, Kedar, and the other desert tribes extending from Palestine and the peninsula of Sinai to the borders of lower Babylonia. Another remark must be made as to the character of the tribal aggregations. They were very numerous, and many of them wealthy and powerful, some of them being ruled by kings, or oftener by queens. Their habitat was much more fertile than at present, the oases being more numerous and extensive. It was from their population that the more settled communities to the W., N., and E. were constantly replenished.

8. The Southern Semites.

The Indo-European race, corresponding to the descendants of Japhet, is comparatively of little Biblical significance. Its various races were of interest mainly to the later prophets, and that by reason of their influence, direct or indirect, upon the fortunes of Israel, or because they became involved in one way or another with peoples that were the subject of prophetic discourse. The Indo-Europeans that are thus distinguished are the Medes and Persians (q.v.), various branches of the Scythian race (e.g., Ashkenaz, Gomer) and of the Hellenes (Javan) (see § 11, below). The N T has naturally much more to say of Indo-European peoples. These are usually referred to, however, not as races but according to the political and geographical divisions in vogue under the Roman Empire. Outside the great races already mentioned the Bible writers rarely step. Elam, for example, is neither Semitic nor Indo-European, but it is assigned to the family of Shem in Gn ch. 10.

9. Indo-Europeans.

10. The Ethnological Lists.

The genealogical tables of Gn ch. 10 (and the summary in I Ch ch. 1) make a composite document drawn from the two sources J and P The framework (vs. 1a, 2-7, 20, 22, 23, 31, 32) was taken from P by a redactor, the remainder being excerpted by him from J. These component parts are accordingly of different ages as regards their first compilation; but this does not affect their general character. The lists of names are often not directly those of races, but of persons, of countries, and even of cities. This is due to the fact (1) that both social and political communities were regarded by the early Semites as the direct descendants of individuals, (2) that a race and its dwelling-place were identified in ordinary speech, and (3) that the city was the ultimate political unit, not easily separated in thought from the founder, who himself was the quasi-head or "father" of his community. Thus the cities Tarshish, Kittim, and Sidon appear explicitly as persons and implicitly as tribes or races. A good illustration of the general principle is afforded by Gn 25 12-16, where the "sons of Ishmael" are expressly said to be named "by their villages (cf. Is 42 11) and their encampments" (cf. also Gn 36 40-43).

Another important feature of the tables is that their compilers did not take account of the inhabited world as a whole, of which they were profoundly ignorant, but only of the peoples of their own acquaintance. These were, primarily, their own Semitic kindred and neighbors, and, secondarily, the peoples of which they learned, directly or indirectly, through political association, trade, or migration: i.e., the Egyptians and Cushites, the Persians, Medes, and Elamites, the most noted islands and coast-lands of the Mediterranean, and the best-known peoples of Asia Minor. The widening of the outlook was due mainly to the extension of the Assyrio-Babylonian régime and the ubiquitous traffic of the Phœnicians. The most significant step taken beyond the primitive style of genealogies was the remarkable attempt to group the families, cited according to genetic principles, in comprehensive and exhaustive divisions. The tables are thus "a first essay in ethnography . made at the point where the narrators close the history of early mankind and turn to that of the ancestors of Israel. They are prompted by the scientific impulse to declare something as to the origin of the peoples of the world, by the artistic motive to round off completely the primitive history, and especially by the desire to make it clear how Israel was divinely chosen from out of the general mass of humanity" (Gunkel, Genesis, 2d ed., p. 76 f.).

Criticisms of the lists in Gn ch. 10 on the score of accuracy are not a necessary part of this article. Certain inconsistencies will be noted below under the individual names. A general remark must be made, however, as to the degree in which the classification is in agreement with the well-established modern racial divisions. The "sons of Japheth" (vs. 2-5) are, as far as we can identify them, wholly Indo-European, and the compiler (P) uses in their case the most recent knowledge of his time (5th cent. B.C.). But the same writer is strangely in error as to the "sons of Ham." Ham is really an old name of Egypt, and the Hamites were doubtless at first intended to include by synecdoche all North-Africans (cf. § 3, above). But either political and religious antagonism or some fanciful association led him, as well as J, to place among the Hamites many who were of pure Semitic stock. Cush, properly meaning Ethiopia (q.v.), is rightly a "son of Ham" (ver. 6). But he is made, for reasons not yet quite clear, to include several of the Arabian tribes, as well as the great Semitic race of Babylonians and Assyrians (vs. 8-12, J). More striking still is the assignment of the Canaanites to the race of Ham (cf. Gn 9 18, 25-27, J), apparently on account of the long and bitter struggle for the possession of the "land of Canaan." Of course, consistency throughout the lists was impossible; and we find, for example, that while P assigns Sheba and Havilah to Ham, J correctly includes them (ver. 29) among the descendants of Shem. On the other hand, Shem is made by P the ancestor of the Elamites, although these were non-Semitic, probably on account of their close relations with Babylonia; and for some obscure reason, of the Lydians also.

11. Minor Ethnological Terms.

The following names of minor importance occur in the genealogical lists of the early historians: Abida, a 'son' of Midian, i.e., a tribe of Midianites (Gn 25 4; I Ch 1 33). Otherwise unknown. Abimael, a S. Arabian people descended from Joktan (Gn 10 28; I Ch 1 22). Otherwise unknown. Adbeel, a 'son' or tribe of Ishmael (Gn 25 13; I Ch 1 29), is mentioned also in the inscription of Tiglath-pileser III under the form Idiba'il as one of the tribes "among the western countries whose dwelling-place is remote." He names also a chief of the same region, Idibi'il. In the LXX. of Gn 25 3 he appears in the form "Nabdeel," as an additional son of Dedan. Almodad, a 'son' or tribe of Joktan in S. Arabia near Ḥaḍramaut (Gn 10 26; I Ch 1 20). Exact location not known. Amorites. See § 6, above. Anamim, a people descended from Mizraim (Gn 10 13; I Ch 1 11), located somewhere near Egypt, but the precise region is not known. Arkite, descendants ('sons') of Canaan, the singular with Gentile names being generally used in Hebrew for the plural (Gn 10 17; I Ch 1 15), were the inhabitants of Arka, a town and district of Phœnicia about 12 m. N. of Tripolis, probably referred to in the Amarna Letters under the name Irkata, and taken by Tiglath-pileser in 738 B.C. Arpachshad, the third son of Shem and the second in line of descent from Shem to Abraham (Gn 10 22, 11 10). This word-form is a monstrosity, and has defied all attempts at identification with any known people. Occurring with Asshur and Aram, it is natural to think of the people of Babylonia. Since the second half of the name is the singular form of Chasdim (Kasdīm), or Chaldees, it almost certainly forms here a separate word with that significance. The remainder of the word still awaits a satisfactory explanation. Arvad, Arvadite. The Phœnician city of Arvad, the mod. Ruād, was the most important of the northern coast settlements. It was built on an island 70 m. N. of Beirût with another town on the opposite mainland. In trade and general enterprise it ranked after Tyre and Sidon. In Ezk 27 8, 11 it appears as contributing oarsmen and warriors for the service and defense of Tyre. Ashkenaz, the eldest son of Gomer (Gn 10 3; I Ch 1 6). This implies that the name represents a people akin to the Kimmerians, who appeared in force in and about Armenia in the 7th cent. B.C., and who, followed by the Scythians, helped to put an end to Assyrian domination in the N. Jer 51 27 associates A. with Ararat and Minni. The old comparison with the Homeric Ascanios, a Phrygian hero, must be given up. Probably the traditional form of the word arose through a misreading for Ashkûz (cf. the Ashgūz of the Assyr. inscriptions), allies of the Kimmerians, who gave trouble to the latest kings of Assyria. It has been further suggested that the Skuthoi (Scythians) represent the same famous people. The medieval and some modern Jews have made the word equivalent to the Teutonic race. Asshurim, the eldest son of Dedan (Gn 25 3). In the parallel I Ch 1 32, the sons of Dedan are entirely lacking. The exact location of none of them is known. See Dedan, below. In Gn 25 18 and Ps 83 8 read the singular form "Asshur," instead of "Assyria" (EV), but not in Nu 24 24, where the reference is to the Assyrian Empire, or rather to its surviving elements. We should perhaps read instead "Ashur" and "Ashurim." Canaan, the fourth son of Ham, according to P (Gn 10 6; I Ch 1 8), whose name is substituted by J for Ham in Gn 9 25, probably also in ver. 22, where the words "Ham the father of" are apparently repeated from ver. 18. The list of Canaan's descendants (Gn 10 15-19; I Ch 1 13-16) is from J and the Redactor. See §§ 6 and 12, above. Caphtor, Caphtorim, children of Mizraim (Egypt), son of Cush (Gn 10 14). Am 9 7 and Jer 47 4 declare that the Philistines came from Caphtor, which in the latter passage is called a maritime country, and Dt 2 23 informs us that the C. expelled the Avvim as far as Gaza. Of the many attempts made to locate this original home of the Philistines, the most convincing is that which identifies it with Keftō, or Kaftō, which in the Egyptian inscriptions stands for the S. coast of Asia Minor. This is confirmed by the fact that among the invaders of Syria and Palestine from the N. in the time of Rameses III (c. 1200 B.C.) were the Purusati, the Egyptian form of the Hebrew Pelishtī, Philistine. Any one of the other proposed identifications, with the Phœnicians, the Egyptians of the Delta, and with the island of Crete, is much less probable (see Casluhim). Casluhim, a people of unknown location named in Gn 10 14 as descendants of Mizraim, and, therefore, related to the Egyptians. The words which follow in the traditional text, "Whence went forth the Philistines," should properly come after "Caphtorim" in the same verse. Dedan was a somewhat widely spread Arabian people assigned in Gn 10 7 to the race of Cush (see § 10, above), while in Gn 25 3 and I Ch 1 32 he appears as a son of Jokshan (son of Keturah), and a brother of Sheba. He is grouped with Sheba (q.v.) and Tarshish in Ezk 38 13 as a wealthy trading people, indicative of his rank among the tribes of Arabia. In Ezk 27 20 he is one of the chief customers of Tyre in similar company. In Ezk 25 13 he is said to extend to the borders of Edom. With this agrees Jer 49 8, while Is 21 13 f. associates him with Tema (q.v.). We, therefore, infer that D. occupied a large region SE. of Edom, stretching into central Arabia. The combination in Gn 25 3 with Sheba does not necessarily imply a S. Arabian origin, but merely illustrates the fact that Sheba had trading settlements in the N. In Ezk 27 15 read "Rodan" for "Dedan." Diklah (Gn 10 27; I Ch 1 21), one of the 'sons' of Joktan, and, therefore, a S. Arabian tribe. Location unknown. Dodanim, a son of Javan (Gn 10 4; "Rodanim" in I Ch 1 7, and also in Gn 10 4, LXX.). For a similar interchange of letters in Ezk 27 15 see Dedan, above. See also RODANIM. Dumah, a son of Ishmael (Gn 25 14; I Ch 1 30). Probably the region in N. Arabia, formerly called Dūmat el Jendel, and now known as el Jōf, is referred to. It is a large oasis on the way from Damascus to Medina. See Map of Ancient Semitic World. The "Dumah" of Is 21 11 is a misreading for "Edom" (so LXX.). Eber, 'son' of Shelah and great-grandson of Shem. He was counted the eponymous ancestor of the Hebrew race (Gn 10 24 f., 11 14 ff.; I Ch 1 18 f.). The name coincides in form with the word 'ēbher, 'the other side,' and it has been assumed that it is the same word, alluding to the fact that the Hebrews came from the other side of the Jordan. But the fact is that E. is derived from 'ibhrī, 'Hebrew,' not vice versa, and the origin of 'Hebrew' is as yet uncertain. The Hebrews were probably the same as the Chabiri of the Amarna Letters, a small warlike tribe in S. Palestine, whose earlier history is obscure. E. was considered the ancestor not only of the Hebrews, but of a vast number of eastern and southern Arabians (Gn 10 25-30), whose relations with the Hebraic peoples are unknown. Eldaah, a 'son,' or tribe, of Midian (Gn 25 4; I Ch 1 33). Otherwise unknown. Elishah, a 'son' of Japheth (Gn 10 4; I Ch 1 7). The people, or region, meant is not certain. Perhaps the combination with Elissa, or Elisa, the traditional foundress of Carthage, is the most probable, as this name was also used for Carthaginian territory by Roman writers. The statement in Ezk 27 7 that Tyre imported "blue and purple from the sea-lands of Elishah" is in harmony with this view. Equally so is an identification with Sicily and lower Italy, which is indicated by the Targum; but the similarity of the names may be urged in favor of the N. African locality. Ephah, a 'son' of Midian (Gn 25 4; I Ch 1 33), and, therefore, the name of a people of NW. Arabia. In Is 60 6 it appears as being engaged in the caravan trade, bringing gold and incense from Sheba. Apparently the Chayāpa mentioned in cuneiform inscriptions of the 8th cent. B.C. is the same name, being really phonetically equivalent to the original Hebrew form. Epher, 'brother' of the foregoing, not yet identified with any known people or region. Perhaps the word is merely an erroneous repetition of Ephah. Gether, a 'son,' i.e., tribe, of Aram (Gn 10 23). In I Ch 1 17 wrongly given as a 'son' of Shem. Otherwise unknown. Girgashite, see Canaan, § 6, above. Gomer, the eldest 'son' of Japheth (Gn 10 2 f.; I Ch 1 5 f.). The name, originally Gamer (so LXX.), is the same as the Assyrian Gimirrai (the Kimmerians of the Greeks), who in the region, of S., or SE., Arabia. Locality unknown. Jokshan, a 'son' of Abraham and Keturah, and father of the two Arabian peoples Sheba and Dedan (Gn 25 2 f.). Apparently an ancient people of central Arabia, that can not be certainly identified. Joktan, one of the two 'sons' of Eber and the father of thirteen tribes, or peoples, in J's list of the descendants of Shem (Gn 10 25-30). The 'sons' of Joktan seem to be wholly S. Arabian, as those of Abraham by Keturah and Hagar (Gn ch. 25) are N. Arabian. The exact limits of the Joktanites can not be ascertained, since we do not know the location of the boundary districts given in Gn 10 30. Kadmonite, named along with Kenite and Kenizzite in the most comprehensive list left to us of the early inhabitants of Palestine (Gn 15 19-21). The last two are from the Sinaitic peninsula, and the Kadmonites are naturally to be grouped with them. All three contributed to the growth of the people of Israel through their settlement in S. Canaan. Kedar, a 'son' of Ishmael (Gn 25 13; I Ch 1 29). An important nomadic tribe of the Syro-Arabian desert, probably lying to the E. of Nebaioth and N. of Dedan (q.v.). The people of K. were noted for their wealth in flocks and herds (Is 60 7; Ezk 27 21), and are a favorite type of tent-dwellers (Jer 2 10, 49 28 f.; Song 1 5), of seminomadic life (Is 42 11), and of the love of war which marked the Arabian tribes (Ps 120 5). Kedemah, a 'son' of Ishmael, i.e., a N. Arabian tribe (Gn 25 15; I Ch 1 31). Perhaps equivalent to Kadmonite (q.v.). Kittim (Chittim AV, except in Gn and Ch). The third 'son' of Javan (Gn 10 4; I Ch 1 7). The connection with Javan (the Ionians) is not quite evident, for the name, as generally understood, is derived from Kition (Citium), a settlement on the SE. end of the island of Cyprus, the modern Larnaka, and the first settlers on Cyprus were not Hellenes at all. The probable explanation is that when these lists of P were written (5th cent. B.C.) Hellenic influence in Cyprus was paramount. In the 8th cent. B.C. Greek settlers were already beginning to rival the earlier Phœnicians who had founded Kition and given its name, as equivalent to Cyprus, currency in Palestine. In the 5th cent. B.C. Greek kings ruled in the neighboring city of Salamis. Ezk 27 6 (6th cent. B.C.) illustrates the importance of the place as the supposed mother-city of the westward islands. In Nu 24 24; I Mac 1 1, 8 5 the word is applied to the Macedonians and in Dn 11 30 even to the Romans. See also Japheth, Javan, above, and Cyprus. Lehabim (only in Gn 10 13; I Ch 1 11) is perhaps the same as Lubim and should be read "Lehubim." Lubim (q.v.) seems to be almost necessary here as associated with Mizraim or Egypt. Letushim, the second 'son' of Dedan (Gn 25 3), and, therefore, an Arabian tribe SE. of Palestine, located by some (doubtfully) in the district of Sinai. See Dedan, above. Leummim, a son of Dedan (Gn 25 3), that is, a tribe in N. Arabia, not yet identified. Lubim (so correctly transliterated in Nah 3 9; II Ch 12 3, 16 8, but changed to "Libyans" in EV in Dn 11 43). The Libyans were an Oriental people of Hamitic stock living to the W. of Egypt, to which country they long furnished mercenary soldiers. They at length subdued Egypt itself and, under the Biblical Shishak (I K 14 25), founded an important dynasty. See also Ludim, below. Lud, Ludim, apparently the singular and plural forms of the same word, generally held to mean the Lydians and their country. See Lydia. While Lud appears in the list of the sons of Shem (Gn 10 22; I Ch 1 17), the historic Lydians were not of Semitic descent, but neither were the Elamites in the same list. The latter, however, were always closely associated with the Babylonians, while no plausible explanation has yet been given why the very remote Lydians are not assigned to Japheth, who is the theoretical ancestor of the northern and northwestern nations. Ludim is given among the descendants of Mizraim, i.e., Egypt (Gn 10 13; I Ch 1 11) in a list of peoples all clearly African. The only solution of the difficulties thus involved is that we should read "Lubim" instead of "Ludim." The same reading would also be an appropriate substitute in Jer 46 9, and it would also be a gain to exchange "Lud" for "Lub" in Is 66 19; Ezk 27 10, and 30 5. Madai, the Heb. word for the Medes and their country. In Gn 10 2; I Ch 1 5, M. is the third 'son' of Japheth. See Medes and also § 9, above. Magog, the second son of Japheth (Gn 10 2; I Ch 1 5). In Ezk 38 2 the word appears as the name of a country, and in 39 6 as the name of a people (cf. Rev 20 8). No attempt made to identify the racial name has been successful. It is quite possible that the word is a mistake for "Gog" in Gn ch. 10, due to the scribe having intended to write "Gog" and having then written the first syllable of the following "Madai" at the beginning without erasing it. The words "of the land of Magog" in Ezk 38 2 would then have been a gloss, as the ungrammatical combination with "Gog" in the original Hebrew suggests. In Ezk 39 6 the word should be "Gog," as the LXX. has it, and as the parallels 38 14, 16, 18, 39 1 make probable. See Gog. Mash, the youngest 'son' of Aram (Gn 10 23). In the parallel passage I Ch 1 17 "Meshech" takes its place, but wrongly, since Meshech was a son of Japheth. The favorite identification with Mons Masius (the mod. Ṭur ʿAbdin) in N. Mesopotamia gives perhaps a too remote situation, and it is possible that the people of the "desert of Mash" on the E. side of the Syro-Arabian desert is meant—a region often mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions. Massa, a 'son' of Ishmael (Gn 25 14; I Ch 1 30), and, therefore, a tribe of N. Arabia. Its exact location is unknown, but it appears to be mentioned in an inscription of one of the later Assyrian kings under the Gentile name Mas'ā'a, 'the Mas'aites.' These tribesmen were in conflict with the people of Nebaioth (q.v.), from which we infer that they lived not far from E. Palestine. This supposition would agree with the fact that in Pr 31 1 mg. we read "the words of Lemuel, king of Massa." The sayings given in Pr chs. 30, 31 (cf. RVmg.) are part of the wisdom of the border-land of the Hebrews. The supposed reference to Massa in Pr 30 1 is perhaps a gloss. Medan is mentioned among the sons of Abraham and Keturah (Gn 25 2; I Ch 1 32). There can be little doubt, however, that the word is here merely a doublet for "Midian," which immediately follows, just as in Gn 37 36 "Midianites" has been replaced by "Medanites" (cf. RVmg.). Hence the existence of Medan is more than questionable. Meshech, a 'son' of Japheth, named along with Tubal (Gn 10 2).

It occurs only in conjunction with Tubal, except in Ps 120 5 (where Kedar is joined with it as a type of warlike barbarians). The same combination is found even in Is 66 19, where we should read "Meshech" instead of "that draw," and omit "the bow" as being a gloss to the supposed reading. In Assyrian inscriptions we find in like fashion the Tabalê (=Tubal) and Mushkê (=Meshech) mentioned together. They were determined opponents of Assyria in the 12th cent. B.C. The former lay to the NE. of Cilicia, the latter between them and the upper Euphrates. The same two peoples are represented by the Tibareni and Moschi of the classical writers. In Ezk 27 13 they are mentioned as traders in slaves and bronze articles. For "Meshech" in I Ch 1 17 see Mash. Mibsam, a 'son' of Ishmael (Gn 25 13; I Ch 1 29), not otherwise known. Raamah is named by P (Gn 10 7; I Ch 1 9) as a 'son' of Cush and 'father' of Sheba (but cf. ver. 28) and Dedan. He is also associated with Sheba as a trading people in Ezk 27 22. A suitable identification has been found with the Rammanitæ of Ptolemy, a tribe living NW. of Ḥaḍramaut (see Hazarmaveth) and therefore E. of Sheba. A combination with the Regma of Ptolemy on the Persian Gulf has also been proposed, but the locality is not so suitable. J. F. McC.

Obal, a 'son' of Joktan (Gn 10 28; Ebal in I Ch 1 22). A S. Arabian tribe, or district, of which the place-name 'Âbil, found to-day in Yemen, may be a survival. Ophir, a 'son' of Joktan (Gn 10 29; I Ch 1 23), and hence some district connected with S. Arabia. It was famed for its commerce (I K 9 28, 10 11), especially for its gold (I K 10 11, 22 48; Job 22 24, 28 16; Ps 45 9; Is 13 12). Much has been written and many theories advanced as to the site of O., but it still remains uncertain. The theory that places it on the S. or SE. coast of Arabia, where it may have been a center of trade from India and elsewhere, has much to commend it. Pathrusim, descendants of Mizraim (Gn 10 14; I Ch 1 12). The people of Pathros are mentioned in Is 11 11; Jer 44 1, etc. Pathros was a designation of Upper Egypt. Peleg, one of the 'sons' of Eber (Gn 10 25, 11 16-19; I Ch 1 19, 25). Probably an ancient place-name, but unidentified. Tradition assigned the 'division' of the earth to his days, probably a fanciful etymological deduction from his name (pālag = 'to divide'). Put, a 'son' of Ham (Gn 10 6; I Ch 1 8). Frequently mentioned as a source of supply for soldiers, especially for the armies of Egypt (Jer 46 9; Nah 3 9; Ezk 30 5; cf. also Ezk 27 10, 38 5), always with Lud, or the Lubim, or Cush. Probably the land of Punt, the region along both sides of the Red Sea, frequently mentioned in Egyptian inscriptions. Riphath, a 'son' of Gomer (Gn 10 3; in I Ch 1 6 Diphath). Otherwise unknown. Sabtah, a 'son' of Cush (Gn 10 7; I Ch 1 9). Perhaps the same as Sabotah, the capital of Ḥaḍramaut (cf. Hazarmaveth, above). Sabtecah, a 'son' of Cush (Gn 10 7; I Ch 1 9). Not identified, perhaps a variant for Sabtah. Seba, a 'son' of Cush (Gn 10 7; I Ch 1 9). Some part of Arabia is probably meant, or an Arabian people on the W coast of the Red Sea. S. is mentioned also in Ps 72 10; Is 43 3. Sephar, a place in Arabia mentioned in Gn 10 30, as showing the general location of the Joktan tribes. Identification uncertain, though the modern Dhofar on the S. coast of Arabia has much to commend it. Sheba, a 'son' of the Cushite Raamah (Gn 10 7; I Ch 1 9), but in Gn 10 28, I Ch 1 22 of Joktan, of the line of Shem, while in Gn 25 3, I Ch 1 32, he is a 'son' of Joktan, 'son' of Keturah. These variant traditions represent various ways of accounting for the same people (or possibly different sections of it), the inhabitants of the Sheba in SW. Arabia so frequently mentioned in the O T (I K 10 1-13; Job 6 19; Ps 72 10; Is 60 6; Jer 6 20; Ezk 27 22 f., 38 13, etc.) and famous for its wealth and commerce. See Dedan, above, and SHEBA, QUEEN OF. Shelah, Salah AV. a 'son' of Arpachshad (Gn 10 24, 11 12 f.; I Ch 1 18). Unidentified. The LXX. makes S. a son of Cainan, son of Arpachshad. Sheleph, a 'son' of Joktan (Gn 10 26; I Ch 1 20). Probably a S. Arabian tribe, as the place-name Salf is common in that region. Shuah, a 'son' of Abraham by Keturah (Gn 25 2; I Ch 1 32). An Arabian tribe, or region, to which Bildad the "Shuhite," Job's friend (Job 2 11, 8 1, etc.), belonged. Perhaps "the land of Suḥu," of the Assyrian inscriptions, a region on the Euphrates near its junction with the Belik, is meant. Sidon, reckoned genealogically as the "first-born" of Canaan (Gn 10 15; I Ch 1 13). It stands here for Phœnicia, as the oldest city of Phœnicia. See PHŒNICIA and SIDON. Sinite, a 'son' of Canaan (Gn 10 17; I Ch 1 15). The inhabitants of Siannu, a place mentioned by Tiglath-pileser III as near Arka. See Arkite, above. Tarshish, a 'son' of Javan (Gn 10 4; I Ch 1 7). T. is frequently mentioned in the O T, and is probably to be identified with the ancient Tartessus in S. Spain. In Ezk 27 12 (cf. Jer 10 9) it is mentioned as a source whence Tyrian merchants procured silver, iron, tin, and lead (see also I K 10 22, 22 48; Ps 48 7, 72 10; Is 23 6, 10, 66 19; Jon 1 3, etc.). Tiras, a 'son' of Japheth (Gn 10 2), perhaps the Τυρσηνοί, a piratical sea-folk of the Ægean Sea, mentioned in Egyptian inscriptions of the 13th cent. B.C. Togarmah, a 'son' of Gomer (Gn 10 3; I Ch 1 6), located (Ezk 38 6) in the extreme N., and spoken of in Ezk 27 14 as a place whence horses and mules were procured by Tyrian merchants. Probably the same as the Assyrian Tilgarimmu, N. of the Taurus Mts. and near the river Halys. Tubal (Gn 10 2). See Meshech, above. Uzal, a 'son' of Joktan (Gn 10 27; I Ch 1 21). Probably a S. Arabian district. Its commerce was famed, as its exports of steel and spices are mentioned in Ezk 27 19 RVmg. (the correct reading). It is perhaps to be identified with San'â, the capital of Yemen, whose old name was Azal, according to Arabian tradition. Zemarite, a 'son' of Canaan (Gn 10 18; I Ch 1 16). The people of Ṣimirra (of the Assyrian inscriptions), the same as the Ṣumur of the Amarna letters, a place S. of Arka, between it and Gebal. Zimran, a 'son' of Abraham by Keturah (Gn 25 2; I Ch 1 32) and therefore a tribe, or district, of Arabia. Perhaps the region of Zabram, an Arabian city W of Mecca, on the Red Sea. E. E. N.

EUBULUS, yu-biū'lus (Εὔβουλος): A Roman Christian from whom greetings are sent in II Ti 4 21. Nothing further is known of him. J. M. T.

EUCHARIST. See Lord's Supper.

EUNICE, yū'nis (Εὐνίκη): The mother of Timothy (II Ti 1 5). According to Ac 16 1 she was a Jewess, whose home was in Derbe or Lystra, and who had probably been converted to Christianity as a result of Paul's first missionary journey. J. M. T.

EUNUCH (סָרִיס, ṣārīṣ, εὐνοῦχος): An emasculated person. Such were commonly employed in Oriental courts as a measure of safety against possible intrigues with inmates of harems. There is no clear evidence, however, that such persons were used by the kings of Israel. The term ṣārīṣ seems to have a double derivation and significance ("officer," Gn 37 36). Pharaoh's eunuch was married (39 1). One of the meanings of the word is associated with the Assyrian ṣarit (cf. Rab-saris, II K 18 17). But if there is a doubt about the eunuchs of II K 9 32, etc., being mutilated men, there is no doubt as to the employment of such men by the Herods in their palace (Jos. Ant. XV, 7 4, 16 8). Mt 19 12, though based on the existence at the time of real emasculation, points to the principle of renouncing the married state for the sake of service, and is not directly concerned with the physical feature of the case. A. C. Z.

EUODIA, yu-ō'di-a (Εὐοδία): A Christian woman in Philippi whom Paul exhorts to harmony with Syntyche (Ph 4 2). Both labored with Paul in the Gospel (Ph 4 3), evidently at the time when the Church was being founded. Baur's theory that the two names refer to the Jewish and Gentile parties in the Church is generally abandoned. See Zahn, *Einl. in d. N T*², I, 397 f. J. M. T.

EUPHRATES, yu-frê'tîz (פְּרָת, phᵉrāth): The largest river of Southwestern Asia, and one of the two arterial streams of Babylonia. It has two main sources in two valleys of the highlands of Armenia, 6,000 to 6,500 ft. above sea-level. One rises in the Anti-Taurus, and the other in Mount Ararat. They meet at Malatiyeh, about 2,000 ft. high and jointly flow toward the Syrian plain. Thence, instead of emptying into the Mediterranean Sea, which at places is no more than 50 m. away, it flows southeastward, falling 1,000 ft. in the 700 miles to the Persian Gulf. Its entire length is about 1,780 m., of which about 1,200 are navigable for small boats. It was one of the rivers of Eden (Gn 2 14), and is variously designated as "the river," "the great river," and was viewed as the ideal but not actual NE. boundary of Israel. By irrigating canals it supplied the greater part of lower Babylonia with its fertility. It was a highway for maritime commerce from times immemorial. In primitive days it emptied its water into the Persian Gulf by its own mouth, but the deposit of silt from the Armenian mountains has so filled the head of the gulf that the two great streams now join waters far above their common mouth. I. M. P.

EURAQUILO, yu-rā'cwi-lō (Εὐρακύλων, from Gr. Εὖρος, 'east wind,' and Lat. Aquilo, 'northeast wind'): The popular name of the wind that beat down upon the ship on which Paul was making his voyage to Rome (Ac 27 13 f.). It showed itself in a sudden change from the mild south wind under which the ship had been sailing, taking the form of a typhonic squall (ἄνεμος τυφωνικός, ver. 14) from the mountainous heights of the island, the precursor of a long-continued NE. gale. The AV Euroclydon (Cod. B [3]) is one of the many variants which arose from the fact that the name was not in common use and thus lent itself easily to corruption. M. W J.

EUTYCHUS, yū'ti-cus (Εὔτυχος): A lad in Troas, otherwise unknown, the name, however, not being uncommon. While asleep, seated in a window of the room where Paul was preaching at some length, he fell from the third story and was taken up for dead. Paul stretching himself upon him declared "his life is in him" (Ac 20 7-12). R. A. F.

EVANGELIST. See Church, § 6.

EVE (חַוָּה, ḥawwāh): Adam's wife (Gn 3 20, 4 1; II Co 11 3; I Ti 2 13). Similar word-formations are often used to denote occupations, hence חַוָּה should mean 'motherhood' preeminently. The story of the Fall indicates a stage of culture wherein woman was already subordinate, hence it is probably subsequent to the hypothetic matriarchate period. A. S. C.

EVEN, EVENING, EVENTIDE. See Time, § 1.

EVER, EVERLASTING, EVERMORE, FOREVER: In the O T these words usually render one of the following Heb. terms: (1) netsaḥ—with the idea of 'abiding,' 'enduring.' (2) 'ōlam—i.e., 'age,' 'age-long' (the most common term). (3) 'adh—i.e., 'continuous,' 'continuity.' (4) Another term of more limited meaning is tāmīdh, 'continually' (Ps 25 15, 51 3, 105 4). In two instances the Hebrew means 'for length of days' (Ps 23 6, 93 5). On Lv 25 23, 30 cf. RV In Pr 8 23, Hab 1 12, the Hebrew means 'from beforetime' in reference to the past. In Ps 77 8 it means 'from generation to generation.'

In the N T, with a few exceptions, the Greek term is αἰών, 'age' (often in such expressions as 'to the age' or 'to the ages of the ages'), or the adjective αἰώνιος, 'age-long,' derived from αἰών. In He 10 12, 14, the original means 'continuous' or 'perpetual,' i.e., the sacrifice has perpetual validity. In Jude ver. 6, the Greek means literally 'everlasting.' See also Eschatology, § 39. E. E. N.

EVI, ī'vai (עֵוִי, 'ĕwī): A Midianite chieftain (Nu 31 8; Jos 13 21). E. E. N.

EVIL-MERODACH, ī"vil-mẹ-rō'dac (אֱוִיל מְרֹדַךְ, 'ĕwīl mᵉrōdhakh), 'Man of Marduk': The son and successor of the great Nebuchadrezzar on the throne of Babylon, 561 B.C. He reigned two years and in the first is said to have promoted Jehoiakim (II K 25 27-30), the captive king of Judah (of 597 B.C.), to special favors in the court. His own brother-in-law, Neriglissar (Nergalsharezer), conspired against him, slew him, and seized the throne in 560 B.C. I. M. P.

EVIL ONE, THE. See SATAN.

EVIL SPIRIT. See DEMON, DEMONOLOGY.

EVIL THING: The term is used (1) of material conditions, involving destitution and suffering, as in the case of Lazarus (Lk 16 25). (2) Of utterances, as expressions of evil thoughts and passions (ra', Pr 15 28; πονηρός, Mt 12 35; Mk 7 23, also φαῦλος, Tit 2 8). (3) Of moral purposes and aims (Ro 1 30; I Co 10 6). A. C. Z.

EWE. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 8.

EXACTOR (Is 60 17; Dn 11 20, but "raiser of taxes" AV): The more usual meaning of the Hebrew word thus rendered is 'oppressor' or 'tyrant.' In the passages referred to above the context indicates the especial form of oppression practised. A. C. Z.

EXALT: In this term the general idea of raising or being raised above the ordinary level predominates—(1) Metaphorically, "to exalt the gate" (Pr 17 19 gābhāh) is to claim superiority, or arrogate to oneself prerogatives above the ordinary (also nāsā' Hos 13 1). This sense is most frequently found in the reflexive (Ob ver. 4; Ezk 31 14). (2) To esteem highly (rūm), especially in the phrase "exalt J" " (Ex 15 2; Ps 99 5, 9). (3) To raise morally or socially (I K 16 2; Ps 89 19; also sāgābh, Job 36 22). In the N T all these shades of meaning are included in the comprehensive ὑψοῦν (Mt 11 23, 23 12; Ac 2 33). A. C. Z.

EXAMINE, EXAMINATION. See LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE, § 4.

EXCEL, EXCELLENT, EXCELLENCY: The original Hebrew and Greek terms translated by these words represent the following general ideas: (1) Of elevation, exaltation, in Ex 15 7; Dt 33 26, 29; Job 13 11, 20 6, 37 4, 40 10; Ps 47 4, 62 4, 68 34, 148 13; Pr 8 6, 31 29; Is 4 2, 12 5, 13 19, 60 15; Ezk 24 21; Dn 2 31, 4 36, 5 12, 14, 6 3; Am 6 8, 8 7; Nah 2 2. (2) Of excess or abundance, Gn 49 3; Job 4 21; Pr 17 7; Ec 2 13, 7 12; I Co 2 1, 12 31; Ph 3 8. (3) Of greatness or largeness, I K 4 30; Job 37 23; Ps 8 1, 9, 16 3, 76 4, 150 2; Is 28 29; He 11 4. (4) Of beauty, Est 1 4; Is 35 2. (5) Of difference, Ro 2 18; Ph 1 10; He 1 4, 8 6. (6) Choice or selected, Song 5 15. In Lk 1 3; Ac 23 26, it is an honorary title. In the following passages the RV gives the more correct rendering—Gn 49 4 (AmRV); Ps 36 7, 103 20, 141 5; Pr 12 26, 17 27, 22 20 (mg.); Ezk 16 7 (mg.); Ro 2 18 (mg.); I Co 14 12; II Co 3 10, 8 7; II P 1 17 (AmRV). In I Ch 15 21 (AV) the text is obscure. E. E. N.

EXCHANGER. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

EXECUTE, EXECUTION, EXECUTIONER: "Execute" in EV is the rendering of words meaning simply 'to do,' except in Jer 21 12; Zec 7 9, 8 16, where the Hebrew means 'judge.' For "executioner" AV (Mk 6 27) cf. RV, which gives the correct rendering. E. E. N.

EXERCISE (noun and verb): The translation of several different Hebrew and Greek terms (1) of γυμνασία, training in the gymnasium (I Ti 4 8); (2) of the verb γυμνάζειν, meaning literally 'to strip naked' (for physical exercise), then 'to exert oneself vigorously' or seriously (I Ti 4 7; He 5 14, 12 11; II P 2 14); (3) of 'ānāh (III*), 'to toil' or 'work hard' (Ec 1 13, 3 10); (4) of gāzal, 'to rob' (Ezk 22 29); (5) of hālakk, 'to walk'; (6) of 'āsāh and ποιεῖν, 'to do' or 'make' (Jer 9 24; Rev 13 12); (7) of ἀσκεῖν, i.e., 'to train' or 'discipline' [oneself] (Acts 24 16). 9. The Importance of Exodus Exodus, the second book of the Bible, was so named by the Alexandrian Jews, because the first part narrates the exodus (ἔξοδος, 'going out') of Israel from Egypt. In the Hebrew Bible the book is called ואלה שמות, w'ēleh shᵉmōth ("now these are the names"), or simply שמות, shᵉmōth ("names"), from its opening words.

1. Name.

Exodus is but a part of the larger history known as the Hexateuch (q.v.). It begins with the story of the oppression of Israel in Egypt and ends with the account of the setting up of the Tabernacle at Sinai. A brief outline may be given as follows:

2. Contents.

I. The deliverance of Israel from Egypt through Moses, chs. 1–18.
  1. The changed status of Israel in Egypt (ch. 1).
    (1) The great increase of the Israelites (1^{1-7}).
    (2) The measures taken by the king of Egypt to oppress and diminish them (1^{8-22}).
  2. Moses commissioned to be the leader of Israel (2^{1}–7^{7}).
  3. Jehovah's deliverance of His people (7^{8}–15^{21}).
  4. From the Red Sea to Sinai (bitter water, manna, war with Amalek, etc.) (15^{22}–17^{16}).
  5. Visit of Jethro (ch. 18).
II. The organization of Israel at Sinai (chs. 19–40).
  1. The announcement of the Covenant (19^{1}–23^{33}).
    (1) The great Theophany, with the Ten Commandments (19^{1}–20^{17}).
    (2) A code of civil and ceremonial law (20^{18}–23^{19}).
    (3) Promise and warning (23^{20-33}).
  2. The ratification of the Covenant (24^{1-11}).
  3. Moses receives the tables of stone and the commands concerning the Tabernacle (24^{12}–31^{18}).
  4. The apostasy and reorganization (32^{1}–34^{28}).
  5. The construction of the Tabernacle (34^{29}–39^{43}).
  6. The Tabernacle set up (ch. 40).

As in the other books of the Hexateuch, so in Exodus there are many evidences that the narrative at present consists of several threads (J, E, P) with editorial additions of various kinds (see HEXATEUCH, §§ 5, 10–15, etc.). Of these J and E were very similar, in the main. The account of P, on the other hand, was quite different. The result of the combination of P with JE, in which P was taken as furnishing the main outline, was that not only a much more lengthy, but a very confused narrative was produced.

4. The Narrative of P.

The Narrative of P was as follows:

(1) An introductory genealogical statement (a) of the heads of the tribes in Egypt (1^{1-5}) and (b) of the lineage of Moses and Aaron (6^{14-27}).

(2) A brief account of the oppression ($1^{7, 13-14}$) introducing the intervention of God (2^{23b-25}).

(3) God reveals Himself in Egypt to Moses as Jehovah, and commissions him and Aaron to demand Israel's release (6^{2}–7^{7}).

(4) The wonders done by Aaron fail to convince Pharaoh (7^{8-13}).

(5) The plagues, mostly worked by Aaron (blood, frogs, lice, boils, 7^{19-20a}, $21b$, 22, 8^{5-7}, $15b-19$, 9^{8-12}), all fail to persuade Pharaoh ($11^{9,10}$).

(6) The Passover instituted; its time, its ritual, its law, also that of the unleavened bread and the firstlings ($12^{1-20, 24, 28, 40-51}$, $13^{1-2, 20}$).

(7) Notes of the itinerary from Egypt to the sea and the wonderful passage of the sea ($14^{1-4, 8, 9b, 15b, 16b-18, 21a, 21c-23, 26-27a, 28a, 29}$).

(8) Notes of the itinerary from the sea to Sinai. The manna and its law ($16^{1-3, 5-36}$, 17^{1a}. 19^{1-2}).

(9) Moses ascends Mt. Sinai to meet God (24^{15-18a}).

(10) Moses given directions regarding a Sanctuary (25^{1}–31^{17}); also the two tables of the testimony (31^{18a}).

(11) Moses descends the Mount with the tables (34^{29-35}) and proceeds to the construction of the Sanctuary (chs. 35–39).

(12) The Sanctuary completed and set up on the first day of the second year (ch. 40).

In P's narrative special emphasis is laid (a) on the name Jehovah, as unknown to the patriarchs (6^{2} f.); (b) on Aaron, as playing an important part in the transactions of the Exodus; (c) on the cultus-significance of the Passover, unleavened bread and firstlings, and of the manna; (d) on the Tabernacle, as the main subject of the revelation to Moses on the Mount; (e) on the miraculous character of the whole series of events.

5. The Narratives of J and E.

The narratives of J and E are woven together quite closely in Exodus and in many places a sure analysis is very difficult, if not impossible. The following table presents results that are in part only tentative.

J.	E.
1^{6} Death of Joseph.	$1^{15-20a, 21}$ Command to the midwives to slay the male children.
1^{8-12} Oppression of Israel. 2^{11-14} Moses kills an Egyptian. 2^{15-22} M. flees to Midian and marries the daughter of a priest-chieftain. 2^{23a} The death of the king of Egypt. 3^{1-3} Theophany at the bush (also in E). $3^{4a, 5, 7-9a, 16-18}$ Jehovah commissions M. to deliver Israel. 4^{1-16} The objections of M. are overcome. Aaron appointed his spokesman. 4^{19-20a} M. commanded to return to Egypt. 4^{24-26} An incident on the way. $4^{27f.}$ A. meets M.	2^{1-10} Moses, his birth and preservation. 3^{1-3} Theophany at the bush (also in J). $3^{4b, 6, 9b-15, 19-22}$ God commissions M. and reveals Himself as Jehovah. $4^{17f.}$ M. given a rod. Says farewell to Jethro. 4^{20b-23} M takes the rod of God and returns to Egypt.
4^{29-31} M. and A. do the wonders and are accepted as leaders. 5^{1}–6^{1} The demand made on Pharaoh refused and the bondage made worse (mainly from J). $7^{14, 16, 17a, 18, 21a, 24, 25}$ The river made foul. $8^{1-4, 8-15a}$ Frogs. 8^{20-32} Flies. 9^{1-7} Murrain on cattle. $9^{13-21, 23b, 24b, 25b-30, 33f.}$ Hail. $10^{1-11, 13b, 14b, 15b-19}$ Locusts. $10^{24-26, 28f}$ Final interview of M. with Pharaoh. $12^{21-23, 25-27}$ The command to slay the Passover. 12^{29-34} The death of the firstborn of Egypt. Hasty departure of Israel. 12^{37-39} The route. Unleavened bread made. 13^{3-10} Law of unleavened bread. 13^{11-16} Law of firstborn and firstlings. $13^{21f.}$ The pillar of cloud and fire. $14^{5f., 10a, 11-14, 19b, 20b, 21b, 24a, 25, 27b, 28b, 30}$ The passage of the Red Sea. (The sea driven back by wind. Cf. the account in P.) $15^{22-25a, 27}$ Marah and Elim. 17^{2-7} Water at Massah (cf. Nu 11^{4} ff.). [18^{1-11} Visit of M.'s father-in-law.] 19^{3-9} (JE) $12-13a, 20-21a$ The great theophany on Mt. Sinai. J" speaks. M. alone near J" [Possibly a version of the Decalogue stood here in J.] [Also the Covenant terms now found in 34^{10-28} may have stood here originally in J's account.] 19^{24-25}, $20^{1-2, 9-12}$ Ratifications of the Covenant by M. and A. and elders of Israel. 32^{7-14} J" tells M. that the people have apostatized (mutinied in J originally?) and declares that He will destroy them. M. intercedes.	5^{1}–6^{1} (mostly J) M. demands the release of Israel. Pharaoh refuses. $7^{15, 17b, 20b, 23}$ The river turned to blood. $9^{22-23a, 24a, 25a, 31f.}$ Hail, thunder, and fire. $10^{12, 13a, 14a, 15a, 20}$ Locusts. $10^{21-23, 27}$ Darkness. 11^{1-3} M. informed of the final visitation on Egypt. 12^{35-36} Israel asks and receives presents from the Egyptians. 13^{17-19} The route. 13^{19} Joseph's bones taken. $7, 9a,$ $14^{10b, 15a, 16a, 19a, 20a, 24b, 27c, 31}$. The passage of the Red Sea. (The angel of God overthrows the Egyptians.) 15^{1-21} The Song of Triumph. 15^{25b-26}, 16^{4} [and other verses?] Fragments of E's manna story. 17^{2-7} Water at Meribah (cf. Dt 25^{17-19}). 17^{8-15} War with Amalek. 18^{1-11} M. visited by Jethro. 18^{12-27} Appointment of assistant judges (cf. Dt 1^{9-18}). 19^{3-9} (JE) $10-11, 13b-19$ The great theophany. M. leads the people out to meet God, God speaks. 20^{1-17} The Ten Commandments spoken by God. 20^{18-21} The people are afraid and ask M. to go and receive the rest of God's message. 20^{22-26} Principles of worship. 21^{1}–23^{9} A code of "judgments." 23^{10-19} Principles of worship. 23^{20-33} Promises and warnings. 24^{9-11} Ratification of the Covenant by the people at a sacrifice. $25^{12-14, 18b}$, M. goes up again to the Mount to receive the tables. Stays 40 days and nights. 31^{18} M. receives the tables. 32^{1-6} The people make a calf and worship it.

32^{25-29} M. comes to the camp. Calls for loyal volunteers. Levites respond and are rewarded with the priesthood.

$33^{1, 3, 5bd}$ J'' promises to send His angel to guide them.

33^{12-17} M. pleads for J''s own presence to go with them.

33^{18-23} M. now pleads for a fuller revelation to himself.

34^{1-9} The great revelation in the name of J'' and the reconciliation of J'' to His people.

32^{15-24} M. with Joshua, on the way down hears the singing, etc., is very angry, breaks the tables, and grinds the calf to powder.

32^{30-34} On the morrow M. pleads with J'' to forgive the sin.

33^{2} J'' promises to send His angel.

$33^{5ac, 6-11}$ The people told to take off their ornaments. The tent with Joshua as its minister.

The main differences (in Exodus) between these two ancient histories relate to these points: (1) In J the name Jehovah is used from the beginning (as in Genesis), emphasis being laid on J''s action rather than on the significance of the name, which, however, is interpreted later in the wonderful passage 34 1-9. In E the name is revealed to Moses and its significance indicated at the bush. (2) In J Aaron plays an important part as Moses' spokesman to Israel (cf. P). In E Aaron is not given any special prominence. (3) In J the Israelites are conceived of as dwelling mainly in Goshen. In E they seem to be living in the midst of the Egyptians. (4) In J the plagues and wonders are wrought by J'' either immediately or by the use of nature forces (such as the wind). In E Moses' rod plays an important part in these matters (cf. P). (5) In J, at the great theophany on Mount Sinai, Moses alone draws near to J'' to hear His words and later the Covenant is ratified on the Mount by a few chosen individuals representing the people. In E both Moses and the people draw near the Mount to meet God and only later is Moses asked by the people (who are afraid) to go and receive the message alone. The Covenant in E is ratified by the people as a whole after its terms were written in a book. (6) In J the apostasy is more like a mutiny, to be put down in blood, and the loyal Levites receive the priesthood as their reward. Moses is forewarned of the trouble before he descends, and acts at once as soon as he reaches the gate of the camp. In E the trouble is idolatry and Moses is ignorant of it until he draws near the camp. (7) In J the promise of an angel to guide them does not satisfy Moses, who wants the presence of J'' Himself. In E the angel is considered the same as J'' Himself.

6. Differences Between E and J.

The editor who combined J with E, or some later editor, often thought it necessary to alter the order of the original documents, so that the combined narrative might read satisfactorily. Minor instances of this are 4 19, which seems out of place; 4 22 f., which seems to belong with 10 26–11 8; 17 2-7, which, in part, may have been transferred from Nu 11 4 ff.; 18 1-11, which, in part, may have belonged to an account of a visit of Hobab, presupposed in Nu 10 29 ff.; and possibly 18 12-27, which in Dt 1 9-18 comes after the giving of the law. But the most important transposition affected J's account of the Covenant. It is evident that at 19 21a there is a break (for vs. 21b–23 are in the main only an editor's repetition of vs. 12-13) and the continuation is not apparent in the immediate context. What did J'' speak to Moses when he went up to Him to the top of the Mount? According to E, God spoke the Ten Commandments and also certain fundamental principles as the basis of a covenant (20 1-17, 22-26, 23 10-33). Now, it is remarkable that in J (34 1, 4, 28) there are hints of "ten words" on tables and that in 34 10-27 exactly the same ground is covered, and partly in the same words, as in E in 20 22-26, 23 10-33. But in the present arrangement this material is placed after the apostasy while in E it comes before it. It is likely, therefore, that in J after 19 21a there followed something similar (10 'words' and certain covenant terms) to what we have in E, i.e., the statements in 34 10-27. The editor simply followed E here and transposed the material in J to a later place. If this reconstruction of J is correct, it furnishes an additional proof of the fundamental unity of Israel's tradition of the Mosaic Age.

7. Changes in the Order of Events.

As compared with P the narratives of J and E are marked by a closer touch with the real progress and development of events. In P the interest centers mainly about the cultus, as the most important aspect of Israel's life. Consequently, the emphasis is placed on Aaron, the Passover ritual, the Sabbath in connection with the manna, and, above all, upon the Tabernacle, as the main thing revealed to Moses at Sinai. In both J and E there is a recognition of the cultus elements of Israel's ancient religion, but all is of a more simple, undeveloped character. It is also likely that in the original form of J or E more was said about the Ark, the Sanctuary, and the Levitical priesthood than now appears. The final editor preferred P's account of these things and left only mere fragments of the older accounts. But in both J and E the emphasis was placed on the spiritual and moral aspects of the Covenant rather than on the merely formal.

8. Comparison of J and E with P.

The history contained in Exodus is of the highest importance. In J and E we have the oldest and fullest accounts of the Mosaic constitution we possess. Though these differ in details, they are fundamentally at one in representing this as due to a great spiritual awakening in the soul of one man, who had a vision of God and who was enabled to translate that vision into terms of actual life; who gave the tribes of Israel a principle of unity of unique and far-reaching significance; who brought about the existence of a religion of moral and spiritual import and tendency among men. It is in the basis of fact in the Exodus narrative that we find the explanation of Israel and of Israel's subsequent history. Criticism, by analyzing this narrative into its component parts, has only enabled us to get closer to the facts, firmly recorded in Israel's na-

EYE: The eye is regarded in the Bible from the point of view of its importance as the chief organ of perception. It is of priceless value (Ps 17 8); but it is the avenue through which allurements reach the soul and sensation is born (Ezk 6 9; I Jn 2 16; II P 2 14). Hence, too, it often denotes the whole man. It is the eye that spares or withholds pity (Is 13 18; Ezk 16 5); mocks (Pr 30 17); is satisfied or not (Pr 27 20). It is the light of the body (Mt 6 22). The expression "evil eye" is used in a superstitious sense in the modern Orient; but it is questionable whether it is so to be taken in Pr 23 6 or Mt 20 15. A. C. Z.

EYEPAINT: It was, and still is, the custom of Oriental women to stain their eyebrows and eyelashes with a dark paint (pūkh, II K 9 30; Jer 4 30; kāḥal, Ezk 23 40) usually composed of oil mixed with powder of antimony, which was thought to add to their luster and beauty, especially by making them appear larger. The ointment was kept in small horn-like vases (cf. "Keren-happuch," 'horn of eye-paint,' the name of one of Job's daughters, Job 42 14). E. E. N.

EZEKIEL, ę-zi'ki-el (יְחֶזְקֵאל, yᵉḥezqē'l), 'God strengthens': Ezekiel, the son of Buzi, is known through his prophetical writings as one of the leading Israelites of the early exilic period.

1. Life Before Prophetic Call. Though there is considerable obscurity as to his birth and early life, the following facts are beyond question: He was of priestly descent, for he calls himself "the priest." He belonged to the priestly family of Zadok, serving at Jerusalem, for he limits the priesthood to the sons of Zadok (40 46, 43 19). He was born during the reign of Josiah, but the exact year is left in doubt. If the words, "in the 30th year," with which he introduces the record of his work (1 1) refer to his age, the year of his birth was 627 B.C. But this is by no means fixed. He was married, and his wife died at the beginning of the year 587 B.C. It has been conjectured upon the basis of certain affinities of thought that Ezekiel was at one time a pupil of Jeremiah's. In the circumstances this is highly probable.

2. Prophetic Ministry. The familiar portion of Ezekiel's life begins with his call to the prophetic work, which took place in the 5th year of King Jehoiachin's captivity, 592 B.C. (1 2). At this time Ezekiel was living in one of the Jewish colonies of exiles established at Tel-Abib (probably the Til-abub, 'hill of deluge,' of Assyrian inscriptions), on a canal in Babylon called the Chebar (the Nar-kabari, of Babylonian tablets, probably the present Shatten-Nil; Peters, Nippur II, pp. 106–192). Here he had a house (8 1, 24 1, 18) and was apparently held in high esteem by his fellow Israelites. Their elders were accustomed to visit him for purposes of consultation (14 1, 20 1). He frequently uttered public prophetic discourses which were listened to by large and eager crowds (33 30-32). The Babylonian authorities were evidently not very rigid in their treatment of the exiles; for both prophet and people enjoyed a reasonable measure of freedom. How long the ministry of Ezekiel lasted is not known. It could not, however, have been less than 22 years. The latest date he mentions is the 27th year of the captivity of Jehoiachin, 570 B.C. (29 17). A late unverifiable tradition has it that he was put to death by a Jewish prince whom he reproved for idolatry.

3. The Book in General. The Book of Ezekiel is from the literary and critical view-point in a fair state of preservation. The text is, indeed, full of corruptions; but its general smoothness and intelligibility are not seriously impaired, except in a few and unimportant places. The prophet's dominant idea is that the hope of Israel for the future rests with the exiles. The religious life of Jerusalem after the deportation under Jehoiachin seems to have been reduced to a very low state. From this Ezekiel looked for a restoration, first through a speedy return of the captives, and afterward through a reorganization of Israel upon an ideal basis (chs. 40–48). The book may be divided into four parts.

4. Prophecies Against Judah. I. Prophecies delivered before the siege of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. (chs. 1–24). The portraiture of the inaugural vision which the whole book opens is more than usually elaborate and also highly symbolical (1 4-28, repeated in 3 23, 8 4, 10 20). Upon the whole, it gives the impression of an apocalyptic rather than an ecstatic experience. Its symbolism is designed to present God in all His power. The flashing fires evidently stand for the forces of nature, while the rainbow represents the hope of help, and the living creatures, various forms of life, all of which are God's creatures and ministers. The wings and wheels signify omnipresence and the many eyes omniscience. The blaze of light in which the whole is framed is the glory of God. Like the visions of Moses and Isaiah, this, too, is intended to assure the prophet that his ministry is to have the approval and support of Jehovah. The elaborateness of the vision furnished the rabbinical interpreters a favorite subject for speculation, and was put on a par with the story of the Creation, both serving as bases for cabalistic and theosophical mythologizing (Zunz, Die Gottes-Dienstl. Vortr. d. Juden, p. 162). The remainder of this portion of the book foreshadows impending ruin over Judah and Jerusalem, and justifies this by the exposure of the idolatry and sin of the people (2–24). Whence Ezekiel derived the concrete imagery of his visions is a secondary question, and yet it is not difficult to see that both in the Cherubim of the Temple and in the winged bulls of Babylonia he had the materials for the construction of even such a symbolical structure as the chariot of ch. 1.

II. Chs. 25–32. As the prediction of disasters to God's people might be construed as a vindication of the heathen, these are next shown to be under condemnation for their transgression. Taken in their order, the prophecies against foreign nations are those against: (1) Ammon (25 1-7); (2) Moab (25 8-11); (3) Edom (25 12-14); (4) the Philistines (25 15-17); (5) Tyre (26 1–28 19); (6) Sidon (28 20-26); and (7) Egypt (29–32). The prophecy against Egypt includes six separate discourses and a funeral dirge, making the sacred number 7.

5. Prophecies Against Heathen Nations.

III. Prophecies of restoration (chs. 33–39). Here the prophet rises out of the contemplation of distress and ruin to a vision of a glorious future. But he first vindicates and characterizes the office of the prophet so clearly brought into view in the fulfilment of the foreshadowing of doom for Jerusalem (33). He then points to the devastation of the flock of Israel because of false shepherds, and predicts the coming of the good shepherd whom he calls David (cf. 34). He foretells doom for Edom (35) and blessing and renewal for Israel, both plainly (36) and under the figure of the Valley of Dry Bones restored to a living army (37) and closes with a symbolical denunciation of the enemies of God under the names of Gog and Magog (38–39).

6. Prophecies of Restoration.

IV. Vision of the ideally restored Israel (chs. 40–48). This opens with an ideal temple (40–43), which is followed by the vision of an ideal priesthood and sacrifice (44–46), and an ideal legislation for the land (47, 48). To this, however, is prefixed a vision of the river of life (48 1-12). In this section Ezekiel puts what the event proved to be his most important contribution to the growth of Israel's thought, and that in a twofold way, i.e., first by propounding the doctrine of the separateness of the civil from the ecclesiastical power or, at any rate, the independence of the latter, and second by giving to his ritual code distinctive features, which place it between Deuteronomy and the Holiness Code (Lv chs. 17–26). He has, accordingly, been conceded an epoch-making place in the history of the religion of Israel. (He is called "the father of Judaism.")

7. Vision of Ideal Israel.

The style of Ezekiel is marked by love of elaboration. He makes frequent use of vivid imagery, and is fond of pursuing a thought to its detailed application. His diction, however, is never obscure, although it lacks the spontaneity of the earlier prophets, and is more like the style of the literary man than that of the fervent orator, and yet there is neither the coldness of the mere thinker's method of expression nor the prosaic formality of the professional writer, but rather the fervor and poetic glow of an aggressive, earnest soul.

The books of Ezra and Nehemiah occupy the last place in that portion of the Hebrew O T which records the continuous history of Israel. The period covered in them extends from the beginning of the return from the Babylonian captivity (536 B.C.) to the second visit of Nehemiah to Palestine (432 B.C.). The chief events in this period are: The building of the Temple in the 2d–6th years of Darius Hystaspis (520–516; cf. Ezr 6 15); the return of Ezra (458; cf. 7 1–10 44); the completion of the walls of Jerusalem after Nehemiah's first return (445; cf. Neh 1 1–7 73a); the recognition of the Law as the constitution of the post-exilic theocracy (c. 444; cf. 7 73b–10 40); the consecration of the walls of Jerusalem (11 1–13 3); the prohibition of mixed marriages; the expulsion of a son of the high priest and the resultant organization of the Samaritan community (432 B.C.; cf. 13 4–31).

1. Period and Events Covered by the Books.

(1) The first document that the author has turned to account is ch. 2, containing the list of those who returned from Babylon in 536 B.C. That this is a source appears from its form, as well as from the fact that the same list is found in Neh 7 6-73a. (2) Next come a couplet of documents in the passage 4 7-23, viz., a letter of the Samaritans and other enemies of Judah to Artaxerxes, and the answer of the king. These letters, composed in Aramaic, which was widely used at the time, originally referred to the building of the wall; they speak only of the fortifications of Jerusalem (12 f., 16, 21, 23), and are concerned with Artachshasta, who can be identified only with Artaxerxes I, Longimanus (465–424), mentioned about 15 times in these books. (3) Documents which originally related to the building of the Temple are preserved in the Aramaic section (4 24–6 18). These, with the exception of 6 14b, had been earlier worked over into a primitive history of the building of the Temple; for the narrative framework which surrounds them in the above section makes use of the same simple expression "the king" in designating the Persian monarch (5 6, 6 1, 13) as is used in the letter (5 5 f., 13 f., 17, 6 3 f., 8, 10). (4) Similarly the Persian monarch is called "the king" in the Aramaic letter, 7 12-26 (vs. 14 f., 20 f., 26). (5) The same peculiarity is met with in the Hebrew section, 7 27–9 15 (7 27 f., 8 1, 22, 25, 36), which rightly passes among modern scholars under the name of "The Memoirs of Ezra," because Ezra speaks in it in the first person. (6) To these "Memoirs," however, can not be assigned 7 1-11 and ch. 10, since in these passages Ezra is spoken of in the third person. Keil has indeed said (Einl., p. 478) that Ezra must needs introduce himself in the third person (7 1-11); but even if this be admitted, he could not have given his genealogy so defectively as to make himself the son of Seraiah, who was chief priest at the time of the capture of Jerusalem (II K 25 18). Further, the description "ready scribe" (7 6) would be too petty a self-characterization to be used by a great man.

2. The Sources of Ezra.

(1) The passage 1 1–7 5 consists of "Memoirs of Nehemiah"; since in this section the narrative of Nehemiah's deeds is in the first person, while its unity is evident from the repetition of the expression "the good hand of my God" (2 8, 18), and of other characteristic phrases (2 12, 20, 4 4 f., 21, 5 19, 6 14, 16, 7 5). (2) After the introductory words, "I found the book of the genealogy of them that came up at the first and I found written therein" (7 5b), Nehemiah incorporates the list of the first returning exiles (7 6-73a), which is found also in Ezr 2. (3) Chs. 8–10, however, are from another hand; for (a) Nehemiah is here spoken of in the third person (8 9,10 1); (b) while in his memoirs Nehemiah has the title Peḥāh, i.e., 'circuit superintendent' (5 14 f., 18), in 8 9 and 10 1 he is called Tirshāthā', i.e., 'deputy'; (c) Nehemiah uses the Divine name "Jehovah" for God only in 1 5, and "Lord" only in 1 11 and 4 14, though for the most part he uses "God" and especially "God of Heaven." But in 8 1, 6, 8, 10, 14, 9 3-5 onward the three designations "Jehovah," "Lord," and "God" are indiscriminately employed. (4) Ch. 11 presents a list of Jerusalemites which Nehemiah himself might have incorporated in his memoirs. (5) The passage 12 1-26, as shown by the mention of the high priest Jaddua, belongs to the time of Alexander the Great; since it was then that Ἰαδδοῦς officiated as high priest (cf. Jos. Ant. XI, 8 7). (6) In the passage 12 27-43 we have another portion of the "Memoirs," while in vs. 44-47 the expression "in the days of Nehemiah" points to another source. Finally, (7) the passage 13 1-31 probably belongs even from ver. 1 on, instead of from ver. 4 on, to the "Memoirs" (cf. Driver, LOT, p. 551).

3. The Composition of the Book of Nehemiah.

(1) There are indications that the sources disclosed by the critical analysis of the two books have been worked over by more than one hand. (a) Immediately after each of the two identical lists, Ezr ch. 2 and Neh 7 6-73a, we find the statement "and when the seventh month was come," etc., which can scarcely be attributed to the separate editors of the lists as they now stand. (b) The manner of designating the Persian king above referred to, § 2 (3). (2) The main question, however, is whether both the books of Ezra and Nehemiah as they now stand have one final author, and whether he is identical with the Chronicler. (a) If we investigate the passages which must have originated in the editing of the books, viz., Ezr chs. 1, 3, 4 1-5, 7, 24, 6 14b, 7 1-11, 10; Neh chs. 8–10, 12 1-26, 44-47, it is certain that the final editing of our books was done in the days of the Chronicler; for in distinction from the simple designation "the king"—see above, § 2 (3)—there is used the expression "the king of Persia" (Ezr 1 1 f., 8, 4 3, 5, 7, 24, 6 14b, 7 1). At all events, the mention of Jaddua (Neh 12 11, 22) points to the time of Alexander the Great (Jos. Ant. XI, 8 7); for Jaddua must have been high priest before one could speak of "his days." Nehemiah, however, could not have survived to a time when such an expression could be used (contrary to Keil, Einl., § 149), while, on the other hand, in 12 26 the "days of Nehemiah" are considered as belonging to the remote past. (b) A double editorship is demonstrable, at least beyond reasonable doubt. A significant evidence of this is found in the fact that the list of those who made up the first company of returning exiles is given both in Ezr ch. 2 and in Neh 7 6-73a. In the latter case Nehemiah himself inserts the list into his memoirs with the introductory words (ver. 5): "And I found the book of the genealogy of them that came up." The repetition of this list in Ezr ch. 2 shows, first, that the setting of this chapter was not written by Nehemiah, and also that the final editing of the two books is from different hands. For it is hardly conceivable that an editor having once appropriated a list, as is done in Neh 7 6-73a, should again make use of it in the selfsame work. (c) On the other hand, both books offer no serious objections to a double editorship; for the formal similarity of the passages cited under (a) (Ezr chs. 1, 3, 4 1-5, etc.) furnishes no proof of identity of editorship. (d) The question as to the identity of the final editor with the Chronicler is answered affirmatively by Cornill (Einl.[5] 1905, p. 156). However, inasmuch as he makes no attempt to explain the twofold use of the list in Ezr ch. 2 and Neh ch. 7, his statement that, where in the two books no earlier sources have been worked over, the style, spirit, view-point, and manner of expression are wholly those of the Chronicler proves nothing as to identity of authorship. Neither can the original unity of Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah be evidenced from the identity of the conclusion of Chronicles with the beginning of Ezra. For (α) there is no smooth connection between the narratives of Chronicles and Ezra; while (β) it is quite as likely that the edict of liberation was chosen by the Chronicler as a suitable conclusion for his work as that in the doubtful partition of an originally integral work it was partly allowed to remain in one portion and to be repeated in the other. (γ) The two texts do not agree throughout. Recently the conclusion to II Chronicles has been ascribed to the effort to have this book end with comforting expressions (K. J. Grimm, Euphemistic Liturgical Appendixes, 1901, p. 1 ff.). But he overlooked the fact that the book would have concluded with a cheerful note even without ver. 22f. S. Jampel (Die Wiederherstellung Israels unter den Achaemeniden, 1904, p. 17) has therefore attempted to modify the theory of Grimm by alleging that the book should have closed with an encouraging expression (wᵉyā'al, "and let him go up"). But this is quite precarious and petty. On the other hand, the conclusion of II Chronicles can not be called a quotation from Ezr ch. 1, brought into connection with I K 22 28 and Mi 1 1; for this would be a different matter from citing the beginning of the book in order to show that it was a continuation. If this principle were valid, then Deuteronomy must point forward to Joshua. A new proof of the original connection of II Chronicles with Ezra Jampel thinks he has discovered (op. cit., p. 17) in the waw copulative with which the Book of Ezra begins. But as the expression wayᵉhī, etc. ("And it came to pass in the days of") begins such books as could not have been continuations of preceding ones (e.g., Est 1 1), so the simpler phrase, "And (RV 'now') in the first year," might begin a book which did continue a preceding history, since later the connective wayᵉhī ("And it came to pass") was often omitted (cf. König, Syntax, § 370, a, b). Besides, it is altogether unlikely that II Chronicles once ended with Ezr 4 23 (Jampel, p. 13); for then the Chronicler who wrote not long before the year 300 (I Ch 3 19 ff.—post-exilic genealogy of Zerubbabel) would, in spite of this fact, have concluded his book with the suspension of the building of the Temple, which occurred about 530 and is the fact with which the section ending Ezr 4 23 is concerned. (3) Credibility. The trustworthiness of the documents and memoirs which have been used in the books of Ezra-Nehemiah has been demonstrated at length, especially by Ed. Meyer (Die Entstehung des Judenthums, 1896), by whom the extreme views presented in C. C. Torrey's Composition and Historical Value of Ezra-Nehemiah are shown to be without critical foundation; but the historical value of the sections which belong to the final editors of the books has been of late underestimated. At the same time the present writer recognizes (cf. Einl., p. 282 f.) that the beginning of the building of the Temple has been pushed further back in Ezr 3 2 (contrary to Hag 1 2, 9, 2 15-17, and Zec 1 16, etc.) than was actually the case. These statements of the two prophets are too definite to admit of being misinterpreted (as by Jampel, p. 61 f.). On the other hand, it is too much to say, as Cornill does (p. 156), that the Chronicler has written Ezr ch. 1, 3 2–4 7, 24 altogether out of his own imagination. He has simply followed the historical traditions which were accepted in his days. Still less can the value of Ezr 1 be destroyed by the claim that in the year 536 no return of Ezra took place (Kosters' Het Herstel, 1894). Such claim is rendered most improbable by the statement on the Cyrus Cylinder (line 11), "I collected all their people and restored them to their dwelling-places." Further, Kosters' claim that in Hag 1 2, 12, he finds no distinction between those who remained and those who returned is an unreasonable demand for definiteness of statement. (For a consideration of Kosters' other objections cf. Sellin's Studien zur Entstehungsgeschichte der Jüdischen Gemeinde, Bd. II, 1901, p. 56 ff.)

5. Personality and Work of Ezra and Nehemiah.

The books of Ezra and Nehemiah bear the names of these two men because they were the chief figures in their narratives. Of the two, Ezra was the priest and "ready scribe," i.e., a man learned in the Scriptures (7 6, 11 f.), who came from Babylon to Jerusalem with a book of the Law in his hand (7 14, 25), in order to enforce its prescriptions. This law-book consisted of the combined principal portions of the Pentateuch, and not simply of the so-called Priest Code (against Cornill, p. 91); for we can not suppose that the Priest Code alone could at any time have been called "The law of Moses" (Ezr 7 6; Neh 8 1), or "The law of God" (Neh 8 8), or "All the commandments, ordinances, and statutes of Jehovah" (10 29). Neither is it possible that the Covenant was concluded before the basis on which it was laid existed. With this agrees also Wellhausen (Proleg., 1895, p. 415). This relation of Ezra to the Pentateuch is also indicated by echoes from Jewish and Christian antiquity (cf. the writer's Einl., p. 241 f.). When Ezra came to Jerusalem, in the 7th year of King Artaxerxes (458 B.C.), he found his chief task to be the preserving of Israel in its temptation to apostatize to other religions. He therefore prohibited mixed marriages (10 10 ff.). Later his ambition was realized, when the people pledged obedience to the Law of God (Neh 8 1 ff.).

Nehemiah, as an exile, attained to the honorable position of cupbearer to the king. Moved by patriotism to meet the political and social needs of his people, and entrusted with the office of governor by the king (in the 20th year of Artaxerxes) he carried through, in spite of all opposition from the Samaritans and other enemies, the building of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 2 12–7 5). He took an active part in securing the adoption of the Law by the people (8 9), held a great feast at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (12 27), and contended vigorously (on the occasion of a second visit in the 32d year of Artaxerxes) for the sanctity of the Temple (13 7-9), the rights of the Levites (ver. 10 ff.), the strict observance of the Sabbath (vs. 15-22), and against mixed marriages (ver. 23 ff.).

But the sequence and time of these actions of Ezra and Nehemiah have been much discussed of late. Especially have suspicions been raised as to Ezra's having worked in Jerusalem before Nehemiah, as, e.g., by A. van Hoonacker (Nouvelles études sur la restauration juive après l'exile de Babylone, 1896). Proceeding from Ezr chs. 7–10 he takes exception (a) to the fact that, according to 9 9, Ezra found the city wall completed. But this objection is without foundation; for in this verse we find Ezra saying, "God hath extended loving-kindness to us to give us a wall in Judah and in Jerusalem." The word gādēr indeed means "wall," e.g., of a vineyard, Is 5 5; but in our passage the whole manner of expression, especially through the precedence of the words "in Judah," is so qualified that it does not presuppose the completion of the city wall, while further in Ezra-Nehemiah the wall of Jerusalem is never rendered by the term gādhēr, but some 30 times by ḥōmh. (b) Further he, along with others, finds a difficulty in the fact that the struggle against mixed marriages is brought to a victorious close according to Ezr ch. 10; and yet, during Nehemiah's first and second visits (Neh 10 30, 13 23 ff.), it was necessary to deal with the same trouble again, and that in the last-named passage no reference is made to the first conflict under Ezra. But, while there can be no doubt as to the successful issue of Ezra's campaign, at the same time there are several indications that the situation was such that Ezra could not hope for an immediate and complete reform, for (α) the evil was too deep-rooted easily to yield to a first attack, and (β) not only the people generally but the "princes" themselves were involved in these marriages (Ezr 10 2); while (γ) the expression in Ezr 10 19, though it shows a promise by the people, does not necessarily involve its complete fulfilment on their part; in fact, (δ) Ezra's effort was but a natural preliminary to Nehemiah's final success (Neh 10 30). (c) He alleges that no one of the companions of Ezra mentioned in Ezr ch. 8 is named as a partaker in the building of the walls in Neh ch. 3. This is incorrect; for the same persons, Hattush (Ezr 8 2) and Hashabiah (Ezr 8 19) are mentioned in Neh 3 10, 17 (cf. Jampel, p. 124 f.). (d) The appeal to Neh 5 15, in which the former governors are criticized for selfishness, is no support for Van Hoonacker's position that Ezra could not be open to criticism and therefore must have followed rather than preceded Nehemiah; because Ezra was not a governor, while Neh 8 1, 9, show Ezra and Nehemiah to be in perfect accord. (e) Finally, inasmuch as Van Hoonacker does not venture to dispute the fact that Ezra had already attained to a conspicuous place before Nehemiah's first visit, 445 B.C. (cf. Neh 8 1 ff.), he must admit that Ezra could not at that time have been a young man. Kuenen (Gesammelte Abhandlungen, pp. 212 ff., 317 ff.) has emphasized the fact that Ezra would have been a very old man if he had made a second journey from Babylon to Jerusalem in the 7th year of Artaxerxes II. Mnemon, i.e., in 398 B.C., as Van Hoonacker's theory demands.

6. Importance of Ezra and Nehemiah.

If, finally, one were to state in a few words the significance of these two men in Israel's history, it must be said: There inhered in them indeed a strong tendency to subject all things to legal enactment and to carry out the principle of righteousness by works (Neh 5 19, 13 22, 31). These limitations, however, are characteristic of the post-prophetic stage of development to which they belonged. On the other hand, the services through which they surpass other representatives of the same era—their enthusiasm for their God and for their people and the spirit of self-sacrifice which mastered them—are worthy of all praise.

FABLE. See MYTH.

FABLES (μύθοι, 'myths'): A term confined, with one exception, to the Pastoral Epistles (I Ti 1 4, 4 7; II Ti 4 4; Tit 1 14), and used to designate speculative additions to and embellishments of the O T Law, which were urged by propagandists upon the faith and conduct of Christians (I Ti 1 4-7; cf. Tit 3 9). In I Ti 4 7 they are called "profane and old wives' fables," as having nothing in common with sacred things, and being unworthy the serious thought and belief of men; in Tit 1 14 they are termed "Jewish," as belonging to that allegorizing tendency which was evidenced in the Haggada (cf. the following phrase "commandments of men"). In general, they mark the crude beginnings of the later Gnostic speculations.

In II P 1 16 the term may perhaps refer to allegorical interpretations of gospel events which emphasized their spiritual meaning to the obscuring of their historical fact. M. W. J.

FAITH

ANALYSIS OF CONTENTS

1. In the Old Testament
2. In the Synoptic Teaching of Jesus
3. In the Fourth Gospel
4. In the Pauline Epistles
5. In the Other Epistles

This word must be studied in connection with its great allies, "belief" ("believe"), and "trust." All three are used in Scripture to describe a fundamental act or attitude of personal beings toward one another, without which fellowship, either within human relations or between the human and the Divine, would be impossible.

Although the true nature of faith is first fully discovered in the N T, we find that in the O T the complete fact is prepared for through certain important stages of experience. The three principal Heb. verbs 'āman, 'to believe,' bāṭaḥ, 'to trust,' and ḥāsāh, 'to take refuge,' occur oftener than the corresponding nouns. (1) It may be said, as we look back from our Christian vantage-ground, that faith as a conscious religious act was born when the Israelite first began to discover his relations with a personal and moral being, as his God. Apart from the great passage in Gn 15 6, none of these words occurs in any really significant way until we reach the story of Moses and the Exodus. But as soon as the prophet appears to speak for the invisible and living God, the subject of belief or trust appears. At first the question is whether the hearers will believe the prophet (Ex 4 1-9, 31, 19 9; cf. Is 53 1; II Ch 20 20). But then to believe the word of the prophet is to believe J", who speaks through him; and that deeper act becomes a believing in Him (Ex 14 31; Dt 1 32; II K 17 14). (2) Thus we pass on to the still deeper fact that God becomes the constant object of the people's trust, especially in the face of public danger. Then they are said to "take refuge" in Him (ḥāsāh, II S 22 3, 31; cf. Dt 32 37; Jg 9 15). (3) It is in the devotional literature, however, and in the great prophets that this act of direct trust in God is most often expressed, and it is there that the ground of that act is found in the faithfulness of God. The three words occur abundantly in the Psalms (27 13, 40 10, 78 22, 89 24, 119 90; 22 4, 25 2, 37 3, 5, 52 8, 84 12; 2 12, 34 8, 40 4, 71 1, 141 8), and there they often utter the sense of absolute dependence and joyous confidence in God. We meet them less often in the prophets; but in Jer and Is the circumstances called for a new emphasis on the character as well as on the power of J"; and that evoked the demand for the act of faith. When Judah's earthly resources seemed shrunken before the might of a great empire, the question of trust in the Divine Deliverer became supreme (Is 7 9, 28 16, 12 2, 26 1-7, 36 15 [‖II K 18 30]; Jer 7 1-15 [folly of misplaced trust], 17 5-7, 39 18). In the O T, then, this act of faith has not yet become a direct object of thought (cf. Is 28 16; Hab 2 4). Its vast spiritual significance could appear only when the revelation of the Divine grace on which it is directed had itself been consummated in a spiritual manner.

1. In the O T.

When we open the N T we find ourselves in a world where faith has become king among all human acts and experiences. Like other great words—Spirit, grace, love, righteousness, life, etc.—this word "faith" becomes illumined and expanded beyond all its past uses and meanings. The process begins with Christ Himself in His explicit teaching, and His practical demands. (1) He, first of all teachers, made men think directly of faith, as an act of supreme power. Thus He connects His own works of healing on several occasions with the faith of the patient (Mt 8 13, 9 2, 22, 29; Mk 5 36, 9 23, 24; Lk 17 19). He avows that He has been seeking faith "in Israel" (Mt 8 10; Mk 9 19). The extraordinary power of faith is set forth in one saying or set of sayings, which appears in different connections and forms, as if the idea were central in His mind and found various outlets (Mt 17 20; Lk 17 5, 6; Mt 21 21; Mk 11 22-24). He rebukes His disciples for lack of faith (Mt 14 27, 31; Mk 4 40, 8 17-21). (2) The demand of Jesus for faith underlies His whole teaching concerning God and concerning His own relation to the kingdom of God. For the law that we shall approach God as Father (Mt 6 4, 6-15; Mk 11 22-26),

2. In the Synoptic Teaching of Jesus.

that we shall repent and seek forgiveness (Mk 1 15, 11 23-25; Lk 7 47-50, 8 12-15, 15 17-19), as the primary condition of right relation with Him, that we shall meet all ills and the chances of life as His children (Mt 6 25-32), makes the act of trust the supreme thing. The whole work of Jesus with His disciples, as even the passages above referred to indicate, aimed at creating in them a profound and complete trust in Himself, the Messiah, the head of the kingdom of God and Savior of men. The faith which won healing was first of all faith in His own power and grace (Mk 5 36, 9 22-24).

3. In the Fourth Gospel.

It is one of the most remarkable facts of the Fourth Gospel that the verb πιστεύειν occurs in it not less than 95 times, while the noun πίστις does not occur even once. Moreover, in I Jn the noun is used only once, in the great saying of 5 4, while the verb occurs nine times. The act of faith is represented in this Gospel as occupying a very prominent place in the discussions of Jesus. It is viewed as the characteristic of the new way and is spoken of absolutely (1 7, 4 48, 53, 6 47, 64, 11 15, 14 29, 20 8). Of course in most cases an object is named, but this freely and variously. Thus, it is God as the Sender of the Christ (5 24, 12 44; cf. 14 1, 10, 11, 17 6), i.e., the faith in Christ carries with it and in it faith in God. They are inseparable objects of one act and not objects of two acts in different directions. But, again, Christ Himself is usually described as the object of faith. It may be His name (1 12, 2 23), or His spoken word (2 22, 3 12, 4 21, 50, 5 47, 8 45), or His works (10 38), or the fact that He is the Christ (11 27, 42, 6 69, 8 24, 13 19, 20 31), the one "sent" of God (5 38, 11 42, 16 27-30, 17 8, 21). But most generally it is Christ Himself in the fulness of His Divine authority and power and grace on whom faith is directed (2 11, 3 16, 18, 4 39, 7 5, 31, 38, 9 35-38, 12 42, 14 1). The results of faith are usually summed up in the words "eternal life" (3 16, 5 24, 6 40, 47, 20 31), but other descriptions occur (1 12, 3 18, 6 35, 12 36, 46). It can not be said that there is any doctrine of faith in this Gospel which is not implicit in the Synoptics. The fuller emphasis is found (a) in the prologue and chapter 20; (b) in the historian's statements regarding the relations of men to Jesus (2 11, 23, 4 39, 41, 7 5, 11 48, 12 11, 42, 20 8); (c) in the various discussions between Jesus and the educated Jews who opposed Him; (d) in the last conversations with the disciples. There is even here no formal examination of faith in a theological manner. It is not compared with other principles, as in the Epistles. But the abundant use of the verb shows that the author recognizes this as the crucial point in the relation of Christianity to Judaism, i.e., on the human side. What Christ is to temple, sacrifice, legal enactment, that faith is to the corresponding human acts which those institutions evoke. This he seems clearly to see, but he buries it in the substance of his story, without formal defense.

The words "faith" (πίστις) and "believe" (πιστεύειν) occur almost 200 times in the thirteen Pauline Epistles. The verb does not occur in Col or Phm. In contrast with the O T and with Jn the noun occurs nearly three times oftener than the verb. The great fact has been at last fully identified, and is capable of direct comparison with other ethical principles. (1) The object of faith is variously expressed.

4. In the Pauline Epistles.

It may be a rumor (I Co 11 18), a historical fact (I Th 4 14; Ro 10 9; cf. Ro 4 17), testimony to a fact (I Co 15 2 ff.; I Th 2 13; II Th 1 10; cf. II Th 2 15), the truth (II Th 2 13), the gospel (Ph 1 27), the blood of Christ (Ro 3 25). God is the object of faith simply (Ro 4 3, 17; Gal 3 6; I Th 1 8; Tit 3 8), or as He acts (Ro 4 5, 24; cf. 10 9; Col 2 12). Christ is named as the object eighteen times, twice with the verb (I Ti 1 16, 3 16), but sixteen times with the noun (Ro 3 22; Gal 2 20; Eph 1 15; Ph 1 29, etc.). Pfleiderer says truly that we nowhere read of πιστεύειν Χριστῷ as we do of πιστεύειν Θεῷ; it is equally true, and even more significant, that we do not read of πίστις Θεοῦ, as we do of πίστις Χριστοῦ. Faith in God is faith in Him as the Father of Jesus Christ, and in His redeeming mercy through Christ. Faith in Christ is faith in Him as the complete Redeemer and the absolute Lord of human souls. The cross, the atoning act of God in Christ (Ro 3 24, 25, 8 3, 32; II Co 5 19 ff.), so conditions the relations of God and man that henceforth we can neither conceive of God except as the redeeming God, nor of the cross as a mere past event, but as an act through which God so related Himself with sin and righteousness in human nature that righteousness (justification, forgiveness) became available to mankind. This faith is neither faith in a mere theory of salvation, nor is it faith in a God who is not a savior in some definite manner. The Pauline faith is fixed on God, who sent His Son as an offering for sin, and on the living Christ, who offered Himself. The Eternal God, the Creator and Lord of all, is henceforth so conditioned for man's apprehension and faith. To trust in Him is to trust in the power of that cross; to trust in that blood (Ro 3 25) is to trust in Him. (2) The effect of faith is the justification (cf. JUSTIFICATION) of the believer (Ro 1 17, 3 24-27, 4 1-25, 5 1; Gal 2 16, 3 1-29; Eph 2 8; Ph 3 9). This is the gateway to all else, the indwelling Spirit (Eph 3 16, 17), peace (Ro 5 1), sonship (Gal 3 26), etc. This is the heart of Paul's Gospel, in which the real implications of Christ's person and teaching and atoning work come to light. As the faith of Abraham was reckoned to him for righteousness, when as yet the legal system was not established, and the promise of God alone stood before him, so in Christ the legal system is abolished, and the promise of a universal grace confronts the world. He who puts his faith in God-in-Christ as the offerer of mercy is thereby at once in right relations (righteousness) toward God. God henceforth treats him as righteous in holy and loving mercy. This faith is the basis of all further fellowship between the believer and God. (3) It is natural that faith so potent and significant should gradually become a term equivalent to the gospel or the Christian religion. It contains an intellectual element. Because through faith man is justified, all that a man apprehends concerning God, Christ, humanity, becomes supremely important. These various elements coalesce more or less definitely into a system of facts, historical and spiritual, which are naturally called his "faith" (I Co 2 5, 15 1-4, 16 13; II Co 1 24; Eph 4 5; Ph 1 27; Col 1 23; I Ti 3 9, 5 8; Tit 1 13). From this element in the act of faith theology takes its rise. (4) Finally, the Pauline view of faith includes its nature and power as an ethical force comparable with love and hope, joy and peace. It is no mere technicality of an abstract religion. It describes the attitude of person to person, and hence implies both an emotional and a volitional element. It, therefore, determines conduct (Ro 6 14-23, 14 1, 22, 23; Gal 2 20, etc.), and the moral quality of that conduct is itself derived from Him who is the object of faith. He, and not a series of legal prescriptions, molds the ideal, and guides the steps of the Christian man (Ro 7, 8, 14 22, 23; I Co 6 11, 19; Gal 5 6). All Pauline moral exhortations rest on this conception.

5. In the Other Epistles.

In the other N T writings we find no such deep grasp of the new principle as in Paul, although there is nothing inconsistent with his doctrine of faith. Yet there are characteristic differences of emphasis. The Ep. of James, in the famous passage 2 14-26, seems to correct a false deduction from the Pauline doctrine. James does not deny the latter; but he insists that the principle of faith is not antinomian, since a living faith, as that of Abraham, must issue in works, and so be "made perfect," or reach its end. And this, in other words, Paul says abundantly. The Ep. to the Hebrews describes faith at length in 11 1–12 6: (1) Faith is defined as that which deals with the future (promised) and the invisible (God, Christ), and this is illustrated. (2) It is proved that faith is the real substance of O T history and also a new thing, not because created by but consummated in Christianity. (3) But we are commanded to live by faith, not by legal observances, because Jesus has appeared as its "author and perfecter." As such He has become its object (12 6). Thus it appears that on all sides the N T reveals Christ as the Person who has so appeared from God and acted for God that all other religious instruments fall away; and faith, issuing in obedience, including an eager but patient expectation, becomes the great and universal principle, filling the present with the power of the future, binding man to God.

1. Terms Denoting Family.

The term 'family,' as it occurs in the Eng. Bible, is nearly always the translation of the Heb. word מִשְׁפָּחָה, mishpāḥāh, which properly means 'clan,' although it is often used in the narrower sense of 'family.' In a few instances בַּיִת, bayith, 'house,' is rendered "family" and in a large proportion of cases in which "house" is retained the reference is to the household or family. Other terms, such as seed, "flesh," etc., are often used figuratively for family. Family relationships, especially the more remote ones, as those of uncle, 'cousin,' nephew, etc., are often expressed only generally rather than exactly, the word brother, e.g., being frequently used to cover such relations (cf. Gn 14 14, 24 48; Lv 25 25, etc.).

2. The Significance of the Family in Heb. Society.

The words "family," "house," "household," as used in the O T, do not represent exactly the same ideas as these same terms do with us. In Heb. society the mishpāḥāh was the fundamental social unit. It might be composed of a number of 'families,' in our more restricted sense of the word. It was the foundation of the clan, often equivalent to it, and as such the main constituent element of the tribe. In the more primitive conditions that lay behind Heb. society, as we find it in the O T, doubtless the 'family' was relatively less important than the clan or tribe. But with the development of a more complex type of life in Canaan, tribal and clan relations receded and the family attained to the position of prime importance. The Heb. family was made up of several groups, or units, at whose head stood one 'father,' or master. There might be several wives, each with her own set of children, also concubines with children. There might also be a larger or smaller number of servants, male and female. Some of the servants might be married and have children. It was also possible that one or more of the sons of the father might be married and living on the paternal estate still under the father's care and authority, with wife or wives under the control of the husband's mother. Within this complex it is impossible to draw the line between the family, in our sense of the term, and the mishpāḥāh or bayith of the O T. It is true that our O T evidence relates mainly to the more independent, well-to-do property owners. Doubtless, there were many small families (husband, one wife, and children) in Israel, but the larger 'house' corresponded more nearly with the ideal of the majority, especially in the earlier pre-exilic days.

3. Marriage.

The basis of the family was, of course, marriage. We are concerned here only with the facts regarding marriage as we actually find them in the O T. For theories as to the nature of the marriage relation among the primitive Semites see MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. In the O T marriage is viewed as a relation in which the husband is master, lord, owner. There may be some traces of a more primitive condition when the wife was more independent (matriarchate) or when polyandry was practised. But these lie beyond the horizon of O T history.

In the O T there is no specific word for marriage. The expressions are always concrete and relate to the actual condition. The man is the ba'al, 'master,' 'owner,' of his 'woman'; he 'takes' a woman; the wife is be'ūlah, i.e., 'under the dominion of a ba'al'; or she is 'the woman' of a man.

The marriage contract was between the husband (or his father) and the family of the bride, rather than between the two as individuals. The bride was practically purchased, the mōhar, dowry, 'purchase-money,' being paid to the father of the bride. This fact placed a restriction on polygamy. A man could have only as many wives as he could afford to pay for with a mōhar sufficient to satisfy the family of each wife. No disgrace was attached to polygamy, or to the concubinage that might exist between a master and his female slaves. Notwithstanding this commercial aspect of marriage, there is abundant evidence in the O T that the love of the young people for each other often played an important part in the preliminaries of a marriage (cf. Jacob and Rachel, Gn ch. 29; David and Michal, I S 18 20; and in general, Song of Solomon). Ancient Heb. society gave more liberty to its women than is the case in the Mohammedan East of to-day. The Law forbade the marriage of two (probably full) sisters to the same man (Lv 18 18); but the story of Jacob seems to show that actual practise was often different (or did Rachel and Leah have different mothers?). Marriage between half-brothers and sisters was allowable (Gn 20 12; II S 13 13). For further particulars on this point see MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

4. The House-father.

The head of a Heb. household was the chief personage of what was a religious as well as a social institution. The family in primitive Heb. society had a religious significance. Through it the cult of the tribal and family deities was practised and perpetuated. The house-father may well be viewed as the priest of the group of which he was the family-head. He was responsible for the religious life of his family and he was also the chief religious functionary. It was he who offered the sacrifices to the family deities, or, as later was the case, to Jehovah the national deity, on behalf of his family and their interests (cf. the cases of the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Job, etc.). This will explain such passages as Gn 31 53, 32 9, and, in part, also the reverence paid to the family sepulcher, for the family with its ancestors constituted a cultus-unit. For an example of such family sacrificial observances see I S 20 6.

To the house-father was thus due a reverence that bordered closely on the reverence due to deity (cf. the place in the Decalogue of the 5th Commandment). To dishonor a parent was a crime worthy of death (Ex 21 15, 17). Within his own domain the master's authority was well-nigh absolute. His wife, or wives, looked up to him as their lord (cf. Gn 18 12). He was the chief, the elder, the father. Even to extreme old age he retained, nominally at least, this authority (cf. the story of Jacob). These house-fathers constituted the elders of the Heb. communities, the ancient men, whose counsel and means were the basis of tribal administration and who maintained their importance long after the tribes had become little more than a convenient fiction. On the father rested the responsibility of training and instructing his household in the traditions of the family, tribe, or nation (Gn 18 19; Ex 12 26, 13 8; Dt 6 7) and to him the sons looked for their education after coming out from under the tutelage of the mother (Pr 1 8, 3 12, 4 1, 13 1, etc.). While Heb. law and custom gave such large power to the house-father, the O T is full of evidence that the Heb. families were no strangers to kindness and affection. The fathers loved their children and were loved by them (cf. the stories of Jacob and Joseph, of Jephthah, of David, etc.). Naturally, the polygamy that was probably the rule rather than the exception was the source of much discord and of many evils. But in spite of this, the Heb. family was a nursery of virtue, and often the home of a faith and piety that were a genuine anticipation of the higher ideal realized later in the Christian home.

5. The Wife and Mother.

While the wife was really bought and paid for and was thus legally the property of the husband (see § 3, above, and cf. the old form of the 10th Commandment, Ex 20 17, where the wife is a part of the "house"), the actual position of a Heb. wife was, at least in many cases, far from that of a mere slave or chattel. Her family, for instance, generally stood ready to avenge any undue ill treatment from her husband. Women of spirit and ability appear to have found no difficulty in maintaining a fairly independent position (e.g., Sarah, Rebekah, Abigail, etc.). In families where there were two or more wives, "one beloved and the other hated," the lot of the latter was doubtless hard. The Law forbade unjust discrimination against the son of the "hated" wife, if it was the first-born (Dt 21 15), but contained no provision for alleviating the lot of such a woman herself. That was a case belonging to the inner sphere where the husband was supreme. If the husband's mother was alive, the wife, or wives, were to a certain extent under her dominion even in the royal harem. She was the gebhīrāh, often mentioned in the notices of the Books of Kings and elsewhere (I K 15 13; II K 10 13; cf. I K 14 15, etc.). On the wife rested a large responsibility. Much of the manual labor was performed by the Heb. women. Grinding the meal, baking, weaving the cloth, churning, etc., all fell to the women to do. Hence the representation of the ideal wife as we find it in Pr 31 10 ff. The restrictions upon the participation by Heb. women in the social life of their times were not so many, or so severe, as is the case in Syria to-day; though women did not mingle with men as freely as is allowed in modern Western society.

To become a wife and mother was the fond desire of every Heb. woman. Not to be married was a disgrace, and to become a childless wife was equally mortifying. On the other hand, to be a mother—especially of a son—was the crowning joy of life (cf. the story of Hannah, I S 1 f., or of Rachel, Gn ch. 30). In primitive society, the greater the number of sons the greater the number of spears. The standing of a family depended on the number of its valiant men. Thus early was fostered the desire for sons, and it continued to exist among the Hebrews until the latest times. The high position and honor accorded to the Heb. mother is one of the brighter characteristics of the O T. The mother, as well as the father, was to be honored according to the Law (Ex 20 12, 21 15). The children, both boys and girls, were almost entirely under the tutelage of the mother during their earlier years, and the daughters remained so until their marriage (cf. Pr 1 8, etc.). See also MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

6. Children.

As with other peoples of comparatively simple life, childbirth among the Hebrews does not appear to have been viewed as particularly dangerous, though of course not free from pain (cf. Gn 3 16; Ex 1 19). The employment of midwives (q.v.) was common. The term rendered "birth-stool" (Ex 1 16) is no longer clearly understood. This is also the case with the expression to bear "upon the knees" (Gn 30 3, 50 23) of another. As soon as the babe was born, the navel cord was cut; then the child was washed, rubbed with salt (as is still done in Syria), and wrapped in swaddling-clothes (Ezk 16 4). The mother was considered ceremonially unclean for seven days after the birth of a boy, and for fourteen after that of a girl. She was also "to continue in the blood of her purifying" thirty-three additional days after the birth of a boy, and sixty-six after that of a girl (Lv 12 1-5). Names were given, generally at birth, either by the mother (Gn 4 1, 25, 29 32, etc.) or by the father (Gn 5 29, 16 15; Ex 2 22, etc.). The legitimacy of a child was derived from the father, not from the mother, and in case a wife was childless she welcomed the child of her husband by one of her maid-servants as if it were her own (Gn 30 1-12), and gave it its name. In later times the name appears to have been given a boy on the occasion of his circumcision (Lk 1 59, 2 21), which took place on the eighth day after birth (Gn 17 11 ff.; Ex 12 3. See CIRCUMCISION). Heb. children were generally nursed by their mothers, and were kept at the breast a long period (probably as much as two or even three years, as is the case in Syria to-day). Mother-love among the Hebrews was strong, and although girls were far less welcome than boys, we hear nothing of the practise of exposure of female infants (except its condemnation as pagan, Ezk 16 5). The weaning of a child, especially the first-born or heir, was the occasion of festivities (Gn 21 8). The first-born boy was considered sacred to J" and could be redeemed from being devoted to Him only by a redemption sacrifice (Ex 13 11 ff., 22 29, 34 19 f.). This may have had its roots in a primitive Semitic or Canaanite custom of actually sacrificing all first-born sons to deity. All the children, both boys and girls, were under the tutelage of the women of the house until the boys gradually came to be attached more closely to the men and were taught by them the knowledge of the profession from which the family gained its livelihood (different in different ages, localities, and special circumstances). The father and mother were the chief fountains of knowledge and authority (cf. Pr 1 8, etc.). In well-to-do families nurses (cf. II S 4 4) and instructors, or tutors (II K 10 1, 5), were not uncommon (cf. also the case of Nathan and Solomon, II S 12 25). Schools, as such, were not known in ancient Israel. Instruction was imparted largely within the family circle. Ancient Heb. law seems not to have recognized any period when a boy became 'of age.' So long as the father was alive and vigorous the sons were supposed to be subject to him, although a son who had set up an independent home would not be so completely under the father's rule as one who remained on the paternal estate. A daughter was the property of the father until she was married (Ex 21 7 ff.; cf. 22 16 f.; Lv 19 29). A widow or divorced woman might return to her father's house and again become his property (cf. Gn 38 11).

7. Servants and Dependents.

The servants and other dependents of a Heb. house formed no unimportant element. The servants were the property of the master or his wife (or wives), whose authority over them was nearly absolute. Female servants might be the individual property of one of the wives (e.g., Hagar, Sarah's maid, Gn 16 1 ff., or Zilpah and Bilhah, Gn 29 24, 29), who had independent authority over them (Gn 16 6, 21 8 ff.). Certain restrictions were placed upon a too severe exercise of this authority. Six years was the limit of the service of a Heb. slave, unless he chose to become a life-servant (Ex 21 2-5). If married before his term of service, his wife came in and went out free with him; but if his master had given him his wife, she and her children remained the master's (Ex 21 2-5). Similar provision was made for the rights of the woman who had been sold into slavery (Ex 21 6-11). The Law sought also to protect servants from extreme injury at the hands of the master (Ex 21 20 f., 26 f.). Furthermore, they were not to be sent away empty-handed (Dt 15 12-14, 18) and in case a servant ran away and made good his escape, he was not to be returned (Dt 23 15). Heb. servants shared in the family sacrifices and festivals (Dt 16 11, etc.). The lot of non-Heb. slaves (acquired by capture, purchase from foreigners, etc.) was less fortunate. These were more completely under the power of their owners and the Law was not so careful to protect them against abuse. They were servants for life and, as property, could be passed on as a part of the family inheritance (Lv 25 44 ff.). They were obliged to observe the requirements of Israel's religion. It was expected that male foreign slaves would be circumcised, and thus made capable of eating the Passover (Ex 12 44 f.). Toward a female captive the Law took a humane and kindly attitude (Dt 21 10-14). Besides bond-servants, a Heb. householder was likely to have a number of hired servants (see Dt 24 14), and also "strangers"—that is, foreigners who, for one reason or another, put themselves under his protection. Toward the latter the Law took a friendly attitude, seeking to guard them from undue oppression (cf. Ex 20 10, 22 21 ff.; Dt 1 16, 10 18, 14 21, etc.), though making a distinction between them and Israelites (Dt 15 1-6, 23 19).

8. Family Property.

That property belonged to the family rather than to the individual appears to have been a fundamental principle of Heb. society, though the master had undisputed control so long as he lived. The distribution of property after his death was also, at least in early times, made according to his directions. While the Law directed that the firstborn should always possess the birthright, i.e., the right to a double portion of the property, even though he were the son of the "hated" wife (Dt 21 15-17), it is likely that in actual practise there were many exceptions to this rule (cf. Ishmael and Isaac, Jacob and Esau, Solomon as David's chief heir, etc.). One son could not inherit to the exclusion of all the others. All sons of the same father were 'brothers,' even though some of the sons may have been born of harlots (cf. the case of Jephthah, Jg 11 1 ff., where might, not right, drove J. away). A special provision for the inheritance of daughters is given in Nu 27 1-11, 36 1-12. Widows, as a rule, appear to have had no special inheritance, but could, if childless, claim the right of marriage to the husband's brother (Dt 25 5-10).

The family estate or patrimony (Dt 18 8) was considered a sacred possession given by J" of old and as such was to be retained as long as possible as the possession of the same family. To the nearest heirs (kinsmen) belonged the right of redemption (cf. Ru 4 1-12; Jer 32 6 ff.). Even a king could not override this ancient principle (cf. I K 21 3 f.). The year of jubilee was designed to restore all landed property to the families that originally owned it (Lv 25 8 ff.). It is not likely that all the provisions of this law were ever actually carried out. It was due to this strong feeling regarding the family rights and the hereditary privileges of the family that the Jews took such care to preserve the family genealogies, of which we have so many examples, especially in the later literature (Priests' Code, and Ch, Ezr, Neh).

9. The Family in the N T.

No comprehensive attempt is made in the N T to regulate family life. The Jews possessed the highest and purest type of family life known in antiquity. The N T specifications seek only to bring it all more completely under the supreme principle of Christian love. FAMINE. See Palestine, § 20.

FAN, FANNER: The Heb. word (zārāh) rendered 'to fan' (Is 41 16, etc.) means literally 'to scatter.' The grain was fanned by throwing it up with the winnowing shovel and allowing the wind to blow away the chaff. The reading "fanner" in Jer 51 2 is somewhat doubtful. See also Agriculture, § 6. E. E. N.

FAR: In the expressions "far from thee," "far from me," "far be it," the word "far" represents: (1) The Heb. ḥālīlāh which expresses the idea of religious abhorrence, i.e., it would be considered a profanation to do so and so. In many cases the AV translated the same Heb. expression by "God forbid," which the RV has changed (cf. Gn 44 7, 17; Jos 22 29, 24 16; I S 12 23, 14 45, 20 2; Job 27 5). (2) The Gr. ἵλεώς σοι (Mt 16 22), 'propitious' or 'merciful to thee,' i.e., 'God be merciful to thee and avert it.' See also Forbid. E. E. N.

FARE. See Ships and Navigation, § 2.

FARE, FAREWELL. See Epistle.

FARTHING. See Money, § 9.

FASHION: Behind the occurrences of the word in the EV stands a variety of Heb. and Gr. terms. In some cases the rendering "fashion," while not always literally exact, well represents the sense of the original term and needs no comment. In the following instances the rendering calls for some explanation: In Ex 26 30, I K 6 38, Ezk 42 11 the idea is that of a 'plan' (lit., 'judgment'). In Lk 9 29 it is the 'appearance' that is meant. The word in Ja 1 11 means literally 'face'; in Mk 2 12 it is simply the adv. 'thus.' In I Co 7 31, Ph 2 8 the Gr. σχῆμα is comprehensive; 'fashion' only imperfectly expresses its meaning, which is 'the whole external arrangement,' 'the scheme.' The same word in verbal form occurs in II Co 11 13, 14, 15, where the RV renders "fashion," and in I P 1 14. The RV rendering is to be preferred in I K 5 18; Job 10 9; Ps 139 16; Is 22 11, 44 10; Ac 7 44; Ro 12 2; Ph 3 21. E. E. N.

FAST, FASTING: In the O T, tsūm, 'to abstain,' tsōm, 'abstinence from food,' are the words commonly used. In Is 58 3, 5 these are parallel to 'innāh nephesh, 'to afflict' or 'humble the soul.' The latter expression is the technical term for 'fasting' (cf. Ps 35 13, where "with fasting" is added). In the N T we have νηστεύειν, 'to abstain,' and νηστεία, 'abstinence from food.' Before special communion with J", Moses (Ex 34 28; Dt 9 9, 18) and Elijah (I K 19 8) fasted (cf. also what is said of Jesus, Mt 4 2, and of Paul, Ac 9 9); it may be considered as having been done in preparation for receiving some great revelation. Fasting was also an expression of grief over the death of friends (e.g., over Saul and Jonathan, I S 31 13; II S 1 12). Surprise is expressed that David does not fast after the death of his child (II S 12 20 ff.). Nehemiah fasted in sorrow for the condition of Jerusalem (Neh 1 4). Here, however, it expressed also the humbling of himself before God, because of sin, as in Lv 16 29, 31; Ps 35 13, 69 10, and Dn 9 3. This was preparatory to intercession for forgiveness and help, or in hope that God would be made favorable in time of especial need (I S 7 6; Is 58 3, 5; II Ch 20 3). Ahab humbled himself when Elijah threatened evil, and thus averted it from himself (I K 21 27 f.); Nineveh was similarly saved (Jon 3

5 ff.). There is no doubt that men thought that fasting had a certain magical efficacy in warding off evil or in making God favorable. The prophets, however, laid emphasis on repentance and the humbling of the heart, of which fasting was only the outward act or symbol (Jer 14 12; Jl 2 12 f.; Zec 7 5). There is a suggestion in Jer 14 12 that the act was an offering to J". Fasting also preceded difficult undertakings, in order to gain the favor of God (Est 4 16; Ezr 8 21). Before the Exile the fasting of individuals and nations was for the most part voluntary, in connection with some especial need or calamity. The only command to fast in the Law is in connection with the Day of Atonement (Lv 16 29, 31, 23 27, 29). After the Exile (Zec 8 19, 7 3, 5) four additional yearly fasts were kept on days commemorating national disasters. (See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 2, IV; cf. also Est 9 31, where weeping and fasting are connected with the Purim feast.) In connection with fasting we find the rending of garments (I K 21 27; Jl 2 13), and the use of sackcloth and ashes (Is 58 5). No work was permitted on the appointed fast-days. Ordinarily the fast was from sunrise to sunset (II S 1 12); but the Day of Atonement lasted from evening to evening. If a fast extended over several days, men abstained from food during the day only. Public fasts were proclaimed (I K 21 9; Ezr 8 21) and sanctified (Jl 1 14, 2 15). Fasting was not allowed on the Sabbath and regular feast-days. The near approach of the Messianic era would make fasting unsuitable (Zec 7 3, 5). In the N T there is evidence that fasting was common among the Jews (cf. Lk 18 12). Jesus, like the prophets, laid emphasis upon the inner meaning of the outward act (Mt 6 16, 18), and recognized that it was a sign of sorrow (Mt 9 14, 15). In Mk 9 29, Mt 17 21, and I Co 7 5 "with fasting" is a gloss. C. S. T.

The Heb. uses two words for 'feast,' ḥag (חַג) and mō'ēdh (מוֹעֵד), often rendered solemn feast.

1. Terms Used. The latter is the more comprehensive, as it conveys the idea of set time, while the former prescribes in a measure the mode of observance. Another later term, holy convocation (מִקְרָא קֹדֶשׁ), embodies the notion of form and ceremonial. The ḥag was a pilgrimage feast; the same word is used in Arabic to-day of the pilgrimage to Mecca. Originally it may have described the festal procession, or even the dance, at the shrine, and the word occurs in this sense in Ps 42 4, though 'to observe a ḥag' meant 'to visit the sanctuary' (Ex 23 14-17). In early literature no precise dating is given for any of the sacred seasons. This was partly due to the fact that the harvest varied greatly in different parts of the land, for the three great feasts were in their origin agrarian. The moon also, being the chronometer (cf. Ps 104 19), introduced an inconstant element.

2. The Sacred Calendar. The calendar of sacred seasons, according to the present form of the Pentateuch, was as follows: I. Weekly and monthly festivals. (1) Sabbaths. (2) New Moons, each with a prescribed and elaborate ritual. II. Annual festivals. (1) Passover (peṣaḥ), observed on the 14th of the first month, called Nisan, or earlier, Abib. (2) Unleavened Bread (matstsōth), beginning on the 15th of the month Abib and continuing 7 days (Ex 23 15, 34 18). (3) Weeks, or Harvest (qatsīr), or Pentecost. (4) Trumpets, or New-year's day, observed on the 1st of the 7th month. (5) The Day of Atonement, observed on the 10th of the 7th month. (6) Tabernacles, or Booths (sukkōth) or Ingathering ('āṣīph), observed on the 15th of the 7th month, originally a seven-day feast, later extended to eight days. The ritual for these seasons is given at length in Ex ch. 12; Lv chs. 16, 23; Nu chs. 28, 29; Dt. ch. 16. III. Cyclic festivals. (1) The Sabbatical Year, every 7th year to be observed, land to lie fallow, slaves to go free, debts to be released. (2) Jubilee, wherein country property reverted to the original owners and Hebrew slaves were ipso facto manumitted (Lv ch. 25). IV. Lesser festivals not prescribed in the Law. (1) Purim, celebrated on the 14th and 15th of Adar (March), in memory of the deliverance of the Jews from Haman's plot (see ESTHER, BOOK OF, § 6). (2) The Feast of the Dedication (Jn 10 22), established by Judas Maccabæus on the 25th of Chislev (Dec.–Jan.) 165 B.C., to commemorate the reconsecration of the Temple, desecrated just 3 years before by pagan sacrifices (I Mac 1 41, 64; II Mac 6 10, 11). The Feast was celebrated 8 days. Ps ch. 30 (cf. the title) was read as a part of the ritual. (3) The Feast of Rejoicing for the Law, on the completion of the annual reading of the 53 Parashas or 'Lesson-sections' of the Pentateuch, followed Tabernacles on the 23d of Tishri. (4) Fast-days: (a) for the capture of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans on the 9th of the 4th month (Jer 39 2). (b) For the burning of the city and Temple on the 7th of the 5th month (II K 25 8 ff.). The capture of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Temple by Titus, which occurred in the 4th and 5th months respectively, gave a new significance to these anniversaries. (c) For the assassination of Gedaliah in the 7th month (Jer 41 1 f.; II K 25 25; Zec 7 5). (d) For the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem on the 10th day of the 10th month (II K 25 1; Jer 52 4; cf. also Zec 8 19). (5) The Feast of Wood-offering, on the 3d of Elul (Sept.), when wood was brought and stored for the perpetual altar-fires (Jos. BJ, xvii, 3; cf. Jth 2 17; Neh 13 31). (6) Nicanor's Day, in commemoration of the victory of Judas Maccabæus over Nicanor, 160 B.C., on the 13th of Adar (March) (I Mac 7 49). (7) The Feast of the Recovered City, in memory of the recapture of the Acra on the 23d of the 2d month, 141 B.C. (I Mac 13 50-52).

Other festivals of a more local or popular character, like Sheep-shearing (I S 25 4; II S 13 23), were common at different periods.

The difficulties felt by every reader when studying the festal regulations are real and insoluble upon the theory of a nearly simultaneous origin of the entire legislation; but many obscurities disappear with the recognition that 4 (5) law codes of different dates exist in Ex–Dt and Ezk. The four Pentateuchal festal rescripts and Ezekiel's ordinal arranged chronologically are as follows: (1) Ex 34 18 ff. (J) and Ex 23 10-19; cf. 21 2-7 (Book of the Covenant [E]); (2) Dt 15 1-6, 12-18 and 16; (3) Lv 23 9-11, 14-18a, 39-43 (Holiness Code); (4) Ezk 45 18 ff. and portions of 46; (5) Lv 16 1-34, 23 4-8, 21-23, 33-38, 44; Nu chs. 28, 29 (P). Lv ch. 25 has much material common to (3) and (5). There is a noticeable advance in these five codes from simplicity to elaborateness of ceremonial. This could only be the result of a nation's growth in spiritual consciousness under the influence of spiritual and ecclesiastical leaders. The joyousness and festivity of domestic and communal gatherings are exchanged for the solemnity of holy convocations, wherein the sense of sin overshadows everything else.

3. The Festivals in the Codes.

Though bulking so largely in the legislation, the feasts are seldom mentioned in the history. The great feasts of Solomon (I K 8 65), Hezekiah (II Ch 30 23), Josiah (II K 23 21; II Ch 35), Ezra (6 19-22), Nehemiah (Neh ch. 8) when the Law was promulgated are unique and extraordinary events. The testimony of the prophets is much more impressive. The pilgrimage feasts of N. Israel with their extravagant and tumultuous ritual were revolting to Amos. Hosea describes them as a part of the very web of national life, but more a tribute to Baal than to J″ Isaiah also was acquainted with a gorgeous ritual and a festal cycle (Is chs. 1 and 29).

4. The Festivals in the History.

Legislation was the crystallization of usage, and the finished product in Nu chs. 28, 29 betrays but a few traces of its origin. Yet a comparison of early legislation and practise with various Semitic customs will reveal much of interest. Two cycles, a lunar and a solar, are combined in the Jewish Sacred Year, and two stages of national life are thereby revealed. The moon is the patron of the shepherd, as the sun is of the farmer. The latter has its seasons more accurately dated and divided, but the moon is after all the most convenient chronometer. A nomad people carried their system of New Moons, Sabbaths, and Passover over into Palestine. There they met with festal celebrations of harvest and vintage, which must have varied with locality and climatic conditions. These indigenous agricultural festivals were coordinated with the lunar feasts of a conquering race, and the former in time came to be dated accurately in terms of the latter. With this gradual assimilation a change took place in the calendar. The year probably at first was divided roughly into semi-annual periods, each marked by a celebration on its first New Moon, and began with what was afterward the 7th month, whose Full Moon festival was "the feast." The Exile introduced many changes. New-year was transferred to the Passover month (conformably to Babylonian custom). Ten days at some time must have been added to the year to raise it from a lunar (355 days) to a solar year. The old 1st month—now become the 7th—was invested with peculiar sacredness, and its New Moon, through the Feast of Trumpets, was the most honored of the 12. Days of Atonement seem once to have existed on the 1st of the 1st and 7th months respectively (Ezk 45 18, 20). These particular days, by some rectification of the calendar, necessitated probably by wrong intercalation in this process of change, fell according to later usage on the 10th; consequently, we find that on the 10th of Nisan a lamb was to be chosen, which became now the Paschal Lamb (Ex ch. 12), and on the 10th of the 7th month occurs the only Day of Atonement recognized by P On the 10th of the 7th month also, Jubilee was to be proclaimed, a provision hard to understand except on the theory that this was the old New-year's day. Ezekiel seems to have lived at the time of transition from the old to the new style. The Sabbatical year and Jubilee were but priestly extensions of the festal system, though doubtless both had some existence in early custom (Ex 21 2-7; Dt 15 1-6; Jer 34 13 f; Ezk 46 17). Certain seasons of the Sacred Year require a somewhat extended treatment.

5. Origin and Development of the Feasts.

This is the oldest of the Hebrew, if not of the Semitic, feasts. Its observance is testified to in the earliest stratum of the history (I S 20 5; II K 4 23). It is therefore remarkable that there is no mention of it in the first legislation (Ex chs. 21–23), nor in Dt. This silence seems intentional, ignoring as it does popular usage. Pagan customs and superstitions doubtless rendered the observance obnoxious to the religious leaders (cf. "days of Baalim," Hos 2 13, and the diatribe in Is 1 13, 14). Yet the New Moon is clearly recognized as an integral part of the religious calendar (II K 4 23; Am 8 5; Hosea often), and later the chief feasts were dependent for their appointment upon its determination. Ezekiel provided for New Moon feasts with elaborate sacrifices (Ezk 46 6 ff.). P (Nu 28 11 ff.) gives a precise ordinal and especially distinguishes the New Moon of the 7th month (Nu 29 1 ff.). This shows how strongly ancient usage was impressed upon the national consciousness, reasserting itself even in the strict ritual of the Priests' Code. Associated with the Sabbath, the lunar feast survived to N T times (Col 2 16).

6. New Moon.

(1) The Name. The root pāṣaḥ (פָּסַח) occurs in several passages in the sense of a peculiar limping movement which denotes a festal dance (I K 18 26), or lameness (Gn 32 31), hence peṣaḥ (פֶּסַח, Gr. πάσχα, rendered Easter in Ac 12 4 AV) has been explained as a feast celebrated with peculiar dances; cf. חָגַג, § 1, above; but its derivation from a word cognate with the Assyrian paṣāḥu, 'to propitiate,' is more probable, and we should seek its explanation therefore in the blood-rite of Ex 12 7, 22 f. The later conception and the English translation embody another notion—probably etymologically incorrect—that of the passing (leaping) over the houses of the Israelites on the night before the Exodus. Ex 12 23 is sometimes understood to mean that J″ was to pass over the threshold into the house to protect, but 12 13 evidently implies that J" passed by the blood-marked houses. (2) Theories of Origin. P. was strictly a family feast, celebrated in the household (note the exception in Dt 16 5 f.). The father presided, and the lamb always possessed a sacrificial character (Nu 9 7, 13). It preserved, therefore, the memory of clan and nomad life, and was the festival of a pastoral people. The victim was to be from the flock (or the herd, Dt 16 2; cf. Ezk 45 22). The date in the later legislation is the 14th of Nisan, the day of the full moon. There is no evidence that P. was a sacrifice of firstlings, the regulation in Ex 12 5 being that the lamb shall be a yearling. The firstling law was independent of P. P., New Moon, and Sabbath appear to belong to the same cycle of observances and, like the New Moon, P. is not mentioned in the Book of the Covenant, nor in Ex 34 18-24 (the reference in ver. 25 is incidental). A 7th day rest-period is the only moon-feast definitely recognized in this stratum of the legislation. One phase of the struggle to suppress or reconstruct the feasts of the lunar cycle appears in Dt, where P. is to be celebrated at the central sanctuary and not in the home; but later the old custom was restored (Ex 12 3 ff. [P]), and has been continued ever since. P was a night feast, and therein differed from all the others, for, according to W. R. Smith (E. Brit. s.v.), feasts were reckoned from morning to morning, but the Paschal Lamb was to be slain "between the evenings"; the family was to eat it that night, and no one was to venture forth until morning. It was a species of consecration of the entire household by a communion feast, and the Lamb being a sacrifice, deity was a participant and hence a protector. "Between the evenings" (Ex 12 6) has been variously rendered, the usual interpretation being 'between sunset and dark.' But as the feast was nocturnal, the "evenings" may be those of the 14th and 15th, or the phrase may mean in "the middle of the night." (3) Combination with Unleavened Bread. In all the codes we find somewhat extensive provision for the feast of matstsōth, or Unleavened Bread, appointed for the 15th Abib (i.e., Nisan), and to be kept 7 days. In the Book of the Covenant and in Ex 34 18-21 this feast and not P. is mentioned in the cycle of agricultural observances, and coordinated with the other two harvest feasts. In Dt we find the word "Passover" somewhat loosely applied to the whole period beginning with P itself. The worshiper returns home on the morning of the 15th Abib, and celebrates Unleavened Bread there. The 7th day of Unleavened Bread is to be kept with a solemn assembly. Here two things seem evident: (a) there has been a concession to popular feeling in giving an ecclesiastical standing to P., and (b) the feast of Unleavened Bread overshadows it. In Ezk 45 21 also, the feast is called "Passover." It is to begin on the 14th of the month and to continue 7 days with the use of unleavened bread. Sacrifices are provided for each day and a bullock for a sin-offering on the 1st day. This requirement keeps the agrarian idea prominent, while P. has given its name to the entire period. Unleavened Bread celebrated the beginning of the grain harvest. At some point in its progress, which none of the existing data enables us to fix, a sheaf of the first-fruits was to be waved before J" (Lv 23 11). This took place at the beginning of the period which 50 days later culminated in the Feast of Weeks (Pentecost in the N T). The entire 7 weeks was a festal season; probably therefore the 7 days of Unleavened Bread began a festivity which terminated with Pentecost, and this 8th day found a counterpart later in the 8th day of Tabernacles. Ezekiel omits Pentecost from his calendar, which would indicate a tendency to ignore the agrarian origin of the feasts. Undoubtedly since the old agricultural feasts were dated with reference to the moon, namely, at the full moons, P. and Unleavened Bread were brought together. Yet they are carefully distinguished, and though the name "Passover" is applied to both, it is quite clear that Unleavened Bread did not begin until the morning of the 15th. Since Unleavened Bread was a festival of first-fruits it suggested a like significance for P.; consequently, the firstling law was closely connected with that of P. The combined feast is appropriate to the spring month. The legislation calls this double feast a memorial, a "night of observances" (shimmūrīm, Ex 12 42), but this was an added idea which, however, deepened the religious significance of all the rites. (4) The Ordinal. The following passages are given in the generally accepted chronological order of the Codes: Passover, Ex 12 21-27, 34 25b (J); Dt 16 1-7; Ezk 45 21; Ex 12 1-13, 43-50; Lv 23 5; Nu 9 1-14, 28 16 (P). Unleavened Bread, Ex 13 3-10, 34 18 (J), 23 15 (E); Dt 16 3; Ezk 45 21 f.; Lv 23 9-14 (the wave-sheaf), Holiness Code (H); Lv 23 6-8; Ex 12 14-20; Nu 28 17-25 (P). Ex chs. 12 and 13 is a fundamental passage for both feasts. Certain differences in the ordinal should be noticed. (a) The month in the earlier law is called "Abib," in the later law "the first month," or "Nisan." (b) The memorial idea is found as early as the Book of the Covenant. (c) Dt brings in the new provision that P. shall be observed at the central sanctuary, and Unleavened Bread at home. (d) The Passover animal in Dt is from the flock, or the herd, and is to be boiled; in the later law it is to be from the sheep, or the goats, and must be roasted. Ezk, however, commands the use of a bullock. (e) In H there is no mention whatever of either feast, although the ceremony of the wave-sheaf may imply an original matstsōth law. (f) In Lv 23 6-8 the double feast has become one of the holy convocations with fire offerings to J" during the week. In Nu 28 17-25 an elaborate ritual appears, part of which includes a sin-offering. Thus we see that the old joyous agrarian character of the feast has disappeared, leaving but few traces behind. (5) Historical Celebration. The Samaritans have preserved in many respects the ancient features of the celebration; since it is certain that their present ritual has been kept rigidly pure from later excrescences, retaining even the ancient features of the sprinkling of blood and of eating with signs of haste which were omitted from the later Jewish ritual. In some respects they are nearer the provisions of Dt than of P, for they come together at the appointed time on the summit of Mt. Gerizim, and under the superintendence of the chief priests slay the lambs and eat them in a family meal during the night of the 14th. Their feast furnishes the most perfect example of an ancient Semitic rite. There are other notices of the celebration of P., e.g., that at Gilgal (Jos 5 10 f.), and the one mentioned in Ezr 6 19-22. The greatest celebration in pre-exilic history occurred in the 18th year of King Josiah, following the discovery of the Book of the Law (II K 23 21 ff.). II Ch ch. 35 expands this account, and is interesting as illustrating the mode of procedure in the time of the Chronicler, whose ordinal is noteworthy for being that of Dt rather than of P. In the N T, P. is several times referred to, the name of course applying to the whole period of 7 days. There are some features of the later usage important to notice: At the time of Christ, P. was a family feast, although the lamb seems to have been slain according to Levitical rules. The drinking of 4 cups of wine seems to have been prescribed. After the first cup, the eldest son asked the meaning of the rite and the father recited the Exodus history, after which Pss 113 and 114 were sung. Then followed another cup, then the feast proper, then a third cup (cf. Lk 22 20), then a fourth, after which Pss 115–118 were sung (Mt 26 30; Mk 14 26). A day of Preparation is mentioned in Mt 27 62; Mk 15 42; Lk 23 54, by which the synoptists seem to mean a preparation for the Sabbath, and it is fair to interpret Jn 19 14 as meaning that it was the preparation for the Passover Sabbath and, therefore, a great day.

8. Tabernacles.

The ordinal for the Feast of Tabernacles occurs in Ex 34 22b (J), 23 16 (E); Dt 16 13-15; Ezk 45 25; Lv 23 39-43 (H), 33-36; Nu 29 12-38 (P). In the Law it is called Ingathering ('āṣīph), and Booths (ṣukkōth). In H and Ezk it is called "the Feast." Dt and H prescribe 7 days, P adds an 8th, probably the last great day (cf. Jn 7 37 ff.), with a special ritual. T. is to be kept at the year's "revolution," t'qūphāh, Ex 34 22b), a word peculiar to this feast (cf. Is 29 1), or at the close of the year (Ex 23 16), and the Law was to be read every 7th year (Dt 31 10). Its final and definite dating was on the full moon of what was once undoubtedly the 1st month. The oldest attested historical feast of the Jewish year, it is probably described in Jg 9 27 ff., 21 19, and I S ch. 1, and antedated the Israelite occupation. Traces of its observance still survive. Fires are kindled on the slopes of Lebanon at the present day upon a date which approximately corresponds to this autumn festival. The joyous character, which in early times must have been almost bacchanalian (Is 9 3; cf. Hos 9 1-5), was never entirely lost, but prophetic and priestly agencies gradually reformed the practise and made T. the greatest of the Hebrew feasts (Zec 14 16). The Temple was dedicated at this season (I K 8 65 f.; II Ch 7 8-10; note the divergencies). Jeroboam instituted a like feast in the 8th month (I K 12 32). The celebration in Neh ch. 8 follows Lv 23 39-43. To the later extracanonical ritual belonged the lighting of candles and water libation (see Jn 7 37 ff.).

9. The Day of Atonement.

Much space is given to this fast in Lv 16 1-34, 23 26-32; Nu 29 7-11. Its germ seems to be found in Ezk 45 18-20, but no public observance can be traced prior to 444 B.C. Neh chs. 8–10 concern the 7th month of that year, but mention no such fast. The Day of A. represents, however, the culmination of the Jewish expiatory ceremonial, and the ideal expression of Israel's religion, and as such supplied the writer of Hebrews with some of his most striking typology.

In conclusion, it is important to observe that, under the transforming genius of Israel's religious teachers, these feasts became the medium of expression for the people's gratitude to J", and the memories of His grace, which quickened their sense of unworthiness. Only a narrow view would insist that a people could put no more into a form of worship than existed in the crude period of inexperienced childhood, for this would deny to growing spiritual consciousness that larger expression which maturity demands.

FAT. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, §§ 8, 10, and VAT.

FATHER, FATHERS. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 4.

FATHOM. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

FATLINGS: Cattle fattened for slaughter (cf. Lk 15 23, "fatted calf"), especially for sacrifice. In I S 15 9 the Heb. means literally 'second' (i.e., as over against firstlings), which were thought to be of better quality. Cattle were fattened by withdrawing them from the open pasture and keeping them in the stall (cf. Am 6 4). See FOOD, § 10. E. E. N.

FAVOR: "To find favor" is 'to please,' "to show favor" is 'to be pleased.' At times the Heb. has the sense of 'grace,' in the LXX. often having χάρις as its equivalent. In the N T it is 6 times the translation of χάρις. חֵן, ḥēn, and other derivatives of חָנַן are the Heb. words most frequently translated by "favor." The noun occurs commonly in the expressions "to find" or "to give favor in the eyes of" some one (of man, Gn 30 27; Ex 11 3; of God, Gn 18 3; Nu 11 11, 15). Eight other Heb. roots, implying 'kindness,' 'acceptance,' 'good-will,' 'pity,' are translated by "favor." רָצוֹן, rātsōn, 'good-will,' is used 15 times, and in passages implying perhaps more especially the help of God (Ps 5 12, 30 5, 89 17, 106 4). פָּנִים, pānīm, 'face,' is used 4 times. The adjectives "well" and "ill-favored" (Gn 29 17, 39 6, 41 2, 4, 18; Dn 1 4), referring to the personal appearance as pleasing, are translations of yāpheh, 'beautiful,' and ra', 'evil,' 'bad.' C. S. T.

FEAR: The term "fear" occurs both as expressing a common emotion and a religious experience. In the former sense, it is not distinctive. One man fears another, or he may fear dangers and harmful powers in nature (Ps 31 11, 64 1; Jer 6 25, 46 5, "terror" RV). As a religious feeling, fear assumes a great variety of forms according to the degree of vividness in which the apprehension of God's personality enters into it. The very essence of religion is a form of fear produced by the realization of the being and nature of God. "The fear of Jehovah is the beginning of wisdom" (Ps 111 10; Pr 9 10); but this is a form of emotion which in modern phraseology would more properly be called 'awe' or 'reverence.' It grows from the contemplation of what God is, and not of what He may do to one as an individual. Fear is thus tantamount to religion. Jacob swears to Laban by the "Fear of his father Isaac" (Gn 31 53), which would appear to be either a method of avoiding the use of the Divine name or a metonymic use of the name of the emotion proper before God for the name of God Himself. To fear God is to worship Him (Job 1 1); but this noble form of fear may degenerate as the true nature of God is less and less clearly understood into a paralyzing sense of terror. This is discouraged and held up as something to be overcome and expelled from the heart (Ezk 2 1; I Jn 4 18). A. C. Z.

FELIX (Φῆλιξ): Antonius Felix, a freedman of the imperial family, brother of Pallas, the favorite of Nero, was appointed procurator of Judæa at the request of the high priest Jonathan probably in 52 A.D. Though a freedman, he was given a procuratorship with military command, "an unheard-of novelty." His predecessor Cumanus (for he seems to have been procurator of Judæa) by his misgovernment left for Felix a disturbed province, which Felix in turn transmitted to Festus in a much worse condition; for "with all manner of cruelty and lust he exercised royal functions in the spirit of a slave." (Tacitus.) He was married three times, his last wife being the Jewess Drusilla, daughter of Agrippa I, whom he unscrupulously persuaded to desert her husband and further to defy Jewish law by marrying him, though he had not become a Jew. Under the severity of his régime disturbances increased; the Zealots became aggressive, a band of secret assassins known as the Sicarii terrorized Jerusalem, and a fanatical outbreak, led by an Egyptian Jew (Ac 21 38), was crushed relentlessly. During the last two years of Felix' rule, while Paul was a prisoner in Cæsarea (Ac 23 24–24 27), a conflict arose between the Jews and Syrians of that place, which was referred to Rome for decision. In the meantime Felix, after having goaded the country almost into rebellion, was recalled, but was acquitted, perhaps through the influence of Pallas. R. A. F.

FELLOW: Besides meaning 'man' ('ish, I S 29 4 AV, and 'enosh, Jg 18 25), "fellow" in the O T represents (1) 'companion' (ḥābhēr, Ps 45 7), (2) 'compatriot' ('amīth, Zec 13 7), (3) 'fellow-countryman,' 'friend' (rēa', Ex 2 13; Jg 7 13 f.; I S 14 20). In the N T often for (4) 'this man' (οὗτος, used contemptuously, e.g., Mt 26 61; Lk 22 59), (5) 'man' (ἀνήρ, e.g., the 'loafers' in the market-place, Ac 17 5), (6) 'partner' (μέτοχος, He 1 9), (7) 'comrade' (ἑταῖρος, Mt 11 16). FELLOW-DISCIPLE, -ELDER, -HELPER, -LABORER, -PRISONER, -SERVANT, -SOLDIER, -WORKER, -YOKE. See CHURCH, § 2.

FELLOWSHIP: This term represents (1) 'a deposit' (tsūmeth yādh, Lv 6 2 AV), (2) 'joint participation' (μετοχή, II Co 6 14), (3) most frequently 'communion,' 'community of possession' (κοινωνία), where the emphasis is not so much on the personal relationship as on the sphere of it; i.e., on the thing which is shared, the object of the common interest (e.g., I Co 1 9; II Co 8 4; Gal 2 9; Ph 3 10; I Jn 1 3 f.). S. D.

FELLOWSHIP WITH, TO HAVE: This phrase signifies (1) 'to be joined in alliance with' (ḥābhar, Ps 94 20), (2) 'to become partaker with' (κοινωνὸς γίνεσθαι, I Co 10 20), (3) 'to be joint partaker with' (συγκοινωνεῖν, Eph 5 11; Ph 4 14 RV; Rev 18 4). See also COMMUNION and COMMUNICATE. S. D.

FENCED, FENCED CITY. See CITY, § 3.

FERRET: One of the list of unclean animals in Lv 11 30 AV. See PALESTINE, § 24. E. E. N.

FERRY-BOAT: The one occurrence of this word (II S 19 18) rests upon a doubtful Heb. text. It is likely that a verb instead of a noun should be read meaning either "and they crossed the ford to bring over the king" or "and they did the service of bringing over the king" (cf. Bib. Heb. ed Kittel, in loc.). E. E. N.

FESTIVAL. See in general FASTS AND FEASTS.

FESTUS (Φῆστος): Porcius Festus, a member of the Porcian gens, was appointed by Nero procurator of Judæa in succession to Felix. He was apparently a man of good character, but entered on a governorship involved in difficulties, largely owing to the mismanagement of Felix. Apart from the N T and Josephus nothing is known of him. The date of his accession is important for N T chronology; since immediately upon his coming to office Paul was brought before him for trial and appealed from him to Cæsar (Ac chs. 25, 26). Some scholars assign Festus' accession to 55 or 56 A.D., following the Eusebian Chronicle, which, however, is untrustworthy, and relying also on the statement of Josephus that the influence of Pallas with Nero saved his brother Felix when the Jews appealed against him to Rome. The fact that Pallas fell into disfavor early in the reign of Nero appears also to support this date. But he may have recovered his influence, or Josephus may be in error, and thus the way is open for a later date.

Albinus succeeded Festus, after a few months' interval, not later than 62 A.D., and the governorship of Festus was short. Consequently 59 or 60 A.D. is the probable date on which his procuratorship began. R. A. F.

FETTER. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (b).

FEVER. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5 (3).

FIELD: Of the numerous terms rendered "field," the most commonly used are sādheh and sādhay, which usually designate (a) the wild uncultivated land, in contrast to that which is more thickly inhabited or worked (cf. Gn 25 27, etc.), or (b) the open country, in contrast to the enclosed city or town (cf. Dt 21 1, etc.). The same term is also used in a more restricted sense for (c) the territory belonging to a particular tribe or people (e.g., Gn 36 35; cf. 14 7 RVmg., etc.), and (d) particular localities, as "the fuller's field" (Is 7 3), etc. Other terms more rarely used are: (1) ḥūts, 'a place outside' (Job 5 10; Pr 8 26); (2) ḥelqāh, 'portion' or 'lot' (II S 14 30); (3) sḧe-dhēmāh, cultivated portions, as vineyards, etc. (Dt 32 32; Is 16 8; II K 23 4; Jer 31 40; Hab 3 17); (4) bar (Aram.), 'open country' (Dn 2 38, 4 12-32); (5) ἀγρός (Mt 6 28, etc.), with the same sense as (b) above; (6) χώρα (Jn 4 35; Ja 5 4), the same as (3) above; (7) χωρίον (Ac 1 18 f.), like (d) above. See also AGRICULTURE, §§ 2–4. E. E. N.

FIERY HEAT. See DISEASE, § 5 (3).

FIERY SERPENT: A serpent whose bite was especially painful and poisonous (Nu 21 6). See PALESTINE, § 26, and SERAPHIM.

FIG, FIG-TREE. See PALESTINE, § 23; FOOD, § 5; and DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 7 (9).

FIGHT. See WARFARE.

FIGURE: In Dt 4 16 the word translated "figure" means a 'statue' or 'image' of a deity (cf. Driver, Int. Crit. Com. in loc.). In I K 6 29 the Heb. word means 'carvings.' In Is 44 13 the idea is that of the 'build' of a man. In Ac 7 43, Rom 5 14 the Gr. is τύπος, 'type,' in the first instance, in the sense of image, in the second, used metaphorically. In He 9 9, 11 19 the original is παραβολή, 'parable,' i.e., 'similitude.' In He 9 24 the Gr. is ἀντίτυπα, 'antitypes,' which occurs also in I P 3 21 (sing.). In Lv 26 1, Nu 33 52, Pr 1 6, Ac 7 44, RV has substituted "figure" or "figured" for the less accurate renderings of the AV E. E. N.

FILLET: A ring or band about the capital of the pillars of the Tabernacle, for ornament, or perhaps of use in hanging curtains. Both the noun ḥāshūq (Ex 27 10, 11, 36 38, 38 10, etc.) and the verb ḥāsh-aq (Ex 27 17, 38 17, 28), to 'furnish with fillets,' occur. The fillets on the pillars at the door of the Tabernacle were overlaid with gold, those on the pillars of the court with silver. Some interpret "fillet" to mean 'connecting-rods,' joining the tops of pillars, from which curtains were hung. For ḥūṭ (Jer 52 21, "fillet" AV) RV gives "line." C. S. T.

FINE. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (c); SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 12; and as applied to the refining of metals see ARTISAN LIFE, § 12.

FINE FLOUR. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 12, and FOOD, § 1.

FINE LINEN: The words usually rendered "fine linen" are (a) badh, (b) shēsh, and (c) būts. Of these (a) means 'linen,' without much doubt, as it was the material of certain priestly garments; (b) and (c), on the other hand, may signify 'cotton,' not 'linen'; (b) is the older term, (c) the later. In Pr 7 16 the Heb. term is of uncertain meaning. Cf. RV. E. E. N.

FINGER: As used of God in an anthropomorphic sense, see GOD, § 2.

FINING POT. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 12.

FIR, FIR-TREE. See PALESTINE, § 21.

FIRE (for this the common Heb. word is 'ēsh = πῦρ in the N T. Two other Heb. words, 'ūr and 'ērāh, and y'qēdhah, and two Aramaic, nūr and y'qē-dha' [Dn 3 22 f., 7 11] occur a few times): "Fire" was used in both a literal and a figurative sense. (1) In a literal sense: (a) of its use for domestic purposes in processes of cooking (Ex 12 8, 9, 39; Jn 21 9), and for warmth (Is 44 16; Jer 36 22; Mk 14 54). (b) of casting (Ex 32 24), working (Is 44 12), and refining (Jer 6 29) metals, and, therefore, a symbol of purification (Mal 3 2; Mk 9 49) and testing of character (Zec 13 9; Mal 3 3; I Co 3 13). (c) For burning refuse (Ex 12 10; Lv 8 17, 9 11), and infected garments (Lv 13 52). (d) It is viewed as a destructive agency in the form of lightning (Nu 11 1, 2, 3; II K 1 10), and in war in the burning of cities or property (Jos 6 24, 7 15; Jg 9 15; I S 30 1). Hence it was a figure of war (Is 10 17, 26 11; Jer 17 27). (e) As a means of punishment of grave offenses (Lv 20 14; Jos 7 15). (f) As an important means of offering sacrifices unto J" (Ex 29 18; Lv 1 9). Fire was to be kept continuously burning on the altar of burnt-offerings (Lv 6 13), and acceptance of sacrifices was shown by the fire of J" consuming the offering (Jg 6 21; I K 18 38). It was used in human sacrifice even in Israel (II K 16 3, 17 17), though forbidden (Dt 18 10). Topheth, in the Valley of Hinnom, was the place of such sacrifices (Jer 7 31). (2) Symbolic and figurative use: (a) Fire accompanied theophanies (Gn 15 17; Ex 3 2) and was thus a symbol of God's protecting presence (Ex 13 22; Ps 78 14; Ex 40 38), of His glory (Ex 24 17; Dn 7 9), and of His wrath against sin (Dt 4 24; Jer 4 4; Am 5 6; Ps 89 46). (b) It was a symbol of the Holy Spirit (Mt 3 11; Lk 3 16; Ac 2 3). (c) Of the punishment of the wicked (Ps 68 2; Is 47 14; Jer 51 58; Mt 5 22, 13 50; cf. "eternal fire," Mt 18 8; Mk 9 48; Jude ver. 7; and "lake of fire," Rev 19 20). (d) Figuratively, sin, trouble, affliction, etc., are likened to fire, because of its destructive or purifying nature. Cf. also (b) and (d) under (1), above. C. S. T.

FIREBRAND: (1) 'ūdh, a 'bent stick' for stirring fire. In Am 4 11, Is 7 4, Zec 3 2 it is represented as almost consumed. (2) lappīdh, a 'torch,' made of a stick, with some absorbent material saturated with oil fastened on one end (Jg 15 4, 5). (3) zēq (in pl.), 'fire-missiles' (cf. Pr 26 18), or sparks, brands, as 'leaping,' or 'springing forth.' (4) mōqēdh, a 'burning mass' (Ps 102 3), a figure of J"'s judgment. C. S. T.

FIRST DAY: In the Priests' Code the first day of a festal season was considered to be specially significant (cf. Lv 23 7, 35, 39 f.; Nu 28 18). The "first day" of the week in the N T usage (Mk 16 2 and ||s; Ac 20 7; I Co 16 2) means Sunday, which, as the day of the week on which Jesus rose from the dead, came to have a special significance for Christians, and gradually supplanted the Jewish Sabbath (Saturday) as the holy day of the Christian Church. As such, it was called "the Lord's Day" (Rev 1 10; cf. Ac 20 7). E. E. N.

FIRST-FRUITS, FIRSTLINGS. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 19.

FISH, FISHING: From earliest times, fishing must have been carried on extensively in Palestine and fish must have formed a principal article of diet. Nevertheless, the references in the Bible to fish and fishing are comparatively few. Fish (dāg, dāgāh) were taken with nets, or with hooks, or by spearing. The nets used were either the drag-net (mikhmereth, Is 19 8; Hab 1 15; σαγήνη, Mt 13 47) or the casting-net (ḥerem, Ezk 26 5, etc.; ἀμφίβληστρον, Mk 1 16). The kind of net indicated by metsūdhāh (Ec 9 12) is unknown, while δίκτυον, the common term for net in the Gospels, is probably generic in meaning (see also NET). For hooks several terms occur, as ḥakkāh (Job 41 1), tsinnāh (Am 4 2), ṣīr (Am 4 2, here with the addition dūgāh, 'fishing'), and ἄγκιστρον (Mt 17 27). In Job 41 7 we have the sole O T reference to the fish-spear, tsiltsal. In the Law distinction was made between clean and unclean fish (Lv 11 9-12; Dt 14 9 f.). Of fish-worship there is no hint in the O T apart from the prohibition in the 2d Commandment. For the fish of Palestine, see PALESTINE, § 26. For their use as food, see FOOD, § 8. See also TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 4. The art. Fish EB is comprehensive and valuable. E. E. N.

FISH GATE. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

FISH POOL. See HESHBON.

FITCHES: The Heb. qetsaḥ (Is 28 25-27) appears to mean 'black cummin,' Nigella sativa, the black, bitter seeds of which were used as a condiment (see FOOD, § 4). In Ezk 4 9 the RV corrects the AV by reading "spelt" instead of "fitches." E. E. N.

FIVE. See NUMBERS, SACRED AND SYMBOLIC, and CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (c).

FLAG. See REED.

FLAGON: This is the AV rendering of the Heb. 'ăshīshāh, which means 'cakes,' especially cakes of pressed grapes (raisins). These were prized as a refreshing article of diet (II S 6 19; I Ch 16 3; Song 2 5), and were also used in the Canaanite cult-rites, so attractive to many Israelites (Hos 3 1). In Is 22 24 the Heb. is nēbhel, on which see BOTTLE. E. E. N.

FLAT NOSE. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (7).

FLAX (Heb. pesheth [but always in the pl. pishtīm] and pishtāh): In the O T the word is used comprehensively: (1) of the plant (Ex 9 31); (2) of the stalks laid out to dry (Jos 2 6); (3) of the fibers of the stalks from which linen was made (Pr 31 13; Is 19 9; Hos 2 5, 9); (4) of the cords (Jg 15 14; Ezk 40 3) or wicks (Is 42 3; cf. Mt 12 20) made of flax; and (5) of the finished product, linen, woven from flax, of which a variety of articles was made, as garments (Lv 13 47 ff.; Dt 22 11; Ezk 44 17 f.), or girdles (Jer 13 1). The plant was extensively grown in Palestine (cf. Hos 2 5, 9), and the methods of working it up into linen were well known. FLAY, FLAYING. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 16.

FLEA. See PALESTINE, § 26.

FLEECE: In Dt 18 4 gēz "fleece" means literally 'shearing,' and 'the shearing of thy sheep' means the 'wool,' the product of the annual sheep-shearing, the "first" of which was to be given to the priesthood as a part of their means of support. The quantity covered by the term "first" appears to have been left indefinite. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 19. E. E. N.

FLESH, FLESHLY: The word "flesh" in Biblical usage signifies (1) the whole animate creation on earth (e.g., Gn 6 13). (2) The soft, meaty parts of an animal or man (e.g., Lv 4 11). (3) The body, or the surface of the body (e.g., Lv 6 10; Nu 8 7). (4) Human beings (e.g., Job 34 15), often in contrast to spiritual beings (e.g., Dn 2 11), and at times, especially in Paul, with emphasis on the moral weakness of man that is so closely connected with his bodily life (e.g., Ro 6 19, 7 18; Gal 5 17). See also MAN, DOCTRINE OF, §§ 6, 7. E. E. N.

FLESH-HOOK (māzleg and mizlāg, 'hook'): A metal hook with one or more (three in I S 2 13) teeth, used for handling large pieces of flesh, especially in connection with sacrifices (I S 2 13 f.; Ex 27 3, 38 3; Nu 4 14; I Ch 28 17; II Ch 4 16). E. E. N.

FLINT: (1) ḥallāmīsh, a rocky formation of silica, common in Palestine. It was from a "rock of flint" that water flowed for Israel in the desert (Dt 8 15; Ps 114 8). Olive-trees grew on flinty soil (Dt 32 13; cf. Job 29 6). Used figuratively of firmness (Is 50 7). (2) tsar, tsōr, tsūr, used figuratively in the same way (Is 5 28; Ezk 3 9). The last term is found in Jos 5 2, 3, where we read of "knives of flint" used to perform circumcision. C. S. T.

FLOAT (Flotes AV): The rendering of raphṣōdhāth (II Ch 2 15) from a root meaning 'to bind,' and dōbhrāth (I K 5 9, rafts RV) from dābhar, 'to drive.' What is meant is that the timber was brought by sea from Phœnicia to Joppa in the form of logs. E. E. N.

The story of a universally destructive deluge in very early times is given in Gn 6 6–9 17. It is unnecessary to repeat here the familiar details.

1. Introductory. In the O T the subject is not referred to outside of Gn, as the Heb. word mabbūl, especially applied to the flood, occurs only once elsewhere (Ps 29 10), and here its reference to the flood is doubtful.

There appear to be some contradictions or discrepancies in the narrative, which affect the number of the animals taken into the ark, the duration, and the immediate cause of the deluge.

2. Literary Features of the Narrative. In Gn 6 20, 7 8, 9 (J) the distinction between clean and unclean animals is recognized, and Noah is commanded to take into the ark one pair of the latter and seven pairs of the former (7 2 [J]). The parallel account makes no such discrimination, mentioning only one pair of each species (6 19, 20, 7 14 [P]). One set of statements fixes the duration of the flood at 61 days (8 8, 10, 12 [J]); in the parallel account it lasts 365 days (7 11, 13, 14; cf. 8 3 ff. [P]). The deluge is ascribed to rain only in 7 7, 12, 8 2b (J), while in 7 11 and 8 2a (P) it was the bursting forth of the waters under the earth and those above the firmament that brought on the catastrophe.

The explanation of these discrepancies is to be found in the composite character of the narrative, which is the result of weaving together two separate documents, the early Judæan (J) and the later Priestly (P See HEXATEUCH). Both documents, however, are at one in all points not mentioned above, and especially in regard to the great purpose of the deluge: it was the judgment of God upon a depraved race, and formed the watershed between two distinct eras in the history of mankind.

3. Sources.

The Scriptural phraseology does not imply a universal deluge; although certain expressions seem to convey that idea. "All the high mountains that were under the whole heaven were covered" (7 19); it was God's purpose to "destroy all flesh wherein is the breath of life" (6 17); every living thing is to be swept away "from off the face of the ground" (7 4). It is put still more strongly in stating that the effect of the deluge was to destroy "every living creature" (7 21-23). But these expressions are to be understood, partially at least, as instances of the figure hyperbole, in which the Oriental delights (cf. Gn 41 57; Dt 2 25; I K 10 24; Lk 2 1), while, without exception, they are limited by the writer's geographical horizon, which was bounded by portions of Asia, Africa, and Europe (cf. Gn 10 and see GEOGRAPHY, § 1). If the narrative is approached from the standpoint of strict grammatical and historical exegesis, it is clear that the Scriptures themselves do not teach a universal deluge in our modern sense of the term. Consequently the acrimonious controversy between the theologians and scientists of the 18th cent. over this point was in no sense a debate over a discrepancy between science and Biblical teaching, but rather a conflict between scientific principles and a dogma incorrectly based upon Scripture.

4. Not Meant as a Universal Deluge.

The difficulties involved in the assumption of a universal deluge are now generally acknowledged by Biblical scholars. Not only would the laws of hydrostatics be violated in the accumulation of such a great mass of water, but the climate of the globe would have been changed, making it impossible for animals to exist, even in the ark. To this should be added the practical difficulty of bringing animals from distant lands and islands to the valley of the Euphrates, and housing all known species in a vessel of the size of the ark. Nevertheless the Noachian deluge might have covered the area occupied by man. At an early age the genus Homo had a limited distribution, and, as a species, might easily have been swept away. A flood universal in this respect is all that a literal exegesis of the Biblical narrative demands. But the story of such a flood can neither be verified nor disproved historically, and consequently its value must lie in the moral and spiritual lessons it is designed to teach.

5. Difficulties Involved in the Theory of a Universal Deluge.

Sir John Prestwich and Professor G. F Wright have maintained that the Noachian flood was a geological diluvion, due to the sudden submergence of the earth's surface. Professor Wright states his thesis with extreme caution, that "since man came into the world there may have been changes of land level of sufficient extent and rapidity to destroy the human race, and fairly to meet the demands of the Biblical narrative when properly interpreted."

6. A Geological Diluvion.

The geological catastrophe occurred at the close of the postglacial period. The piling up of huge masses of ice disturbed the equilibrium of the earth's surface; in consequence there was a sudden submergence. With the disappearance of the ice there followed an upheaval. Prestwich presents other evidence for these geological changes in Europe and North Africa. In 1900 Professor Wright discovered similiar evidence in Central Asia for the recent submergence of a large part of Asiatic Russia. The proofs of this theory are worthy of careful consideration, and should be examined in the literature given below.

It is to be noted, however, that some features of the Biblical narrative do not harmonize with the idea of a geological upheaval. The mountains are covered with water and reappear (7 19 ff., 8 4 ff.); as soon as the waters abate the earth assumes its former condition, for the dove brings an olive twig (8 11). To bring the length of the flood and the date of the Biblical story into harmony with the idea of a geological diluvion seems an impossibility; on the other hand, there are no a priori reasons against the possibility of such a geological catastrophe since the appearance of man on the earth.

Most peoples of antiquity had a flood legend. One notable exception were the Egyptians. Among the Greeks two traditions were current —that of the Ogygian deluge, which inundated Attica, and the story of the flood of Deucalion. The latter was probably the Babylonian account in a Hellenic mold, which later was intermixed with elements borrowed from the Biblical narrative. The Indian legend is connected with an incarnation of Bráhmâ and Vishnu. The absence of a flood legend from Egyptian folk-lore is due to the annual inundation of the Nile, which was viewed as the greatest blessing the land enjoyed. It is now known that flood legends exist all over the world. They occur in the German and Scandinavian mythologies, and are found among the Chinese, the Mexicans, the Peruvians, the Indians of N. and S. America, and the aborigines of the islands of the Pacific. The theory that all these legends are reminiscences of a universal deluge is now generally discarded. Many are modifications and adaptations of the Biblical story which has been scattered world-wide by missionaries; others are due to special local causes. F. H. Woods (HDB, s.v.) classifies these legends into three groups with respect to their origin: (1) Those which are connected with cosmogonic myths, regarding water as a creative element. (2) Highly colored traditions of some historical event, or extraordinary natural phenomenon, as the subsidence of an island or coast, the creation or destruction of an island by a volcano, a tidal wave, the inundation of a plain by the overflowing of a river, the formation of a lake, the melting of snow. (3) Flood stories, which appear to have originated in an attempt to account for some otherwise unexplained fact, as the dispersion of peoples, differences of language, the color of the skin, the existence of fossils and glaciers.

7. Ethnic Flood Legends.

The Babylonian flood story must be discussed more fully, as it closely resembles the Biblical account and furnishes the key for the interpretation of the latter. The former had long been known in the version of Berosus, but the cuneiform original was discovered in the library of Asshurbanipal (660 B.C.). The story was reduced to writing at least as early as 2000 B.C. It constitutes Canto xi of the Babylonian Gilgamesh, in which epic Parnapishtim, the Babylonian Noah, reveals the secret of immortality to Gilgamesh. The gods having decided to destroy the city of Shurippak by a flood, Ea, the Babylonian Neptune, warns Parnapishtim to "build a ship, to look after life." Then follows the description of the ship. Its dimensions are different from those of Noah's ark, but it was built in 6 stories and pitched within and without with 'bitumen' (Heb. and Bab. words are identical). Into this ship Parnapishtim brings his family, his possessions, "and all living creatures of all kinds." Then is described the storm which terrifies men and sends even the gods to the edge of the heavens cowering like dogs. The tempest continues 6 days and nights; on the morning of the 7th a calm broods on the face of the waters, but the "race of mortals" was no more and "every voice was hushed"; "all mankind had turned to clay." The ship grounds on Mt. Nisir and on the 6th day after the Babylonian hero, like Noah, sends forth birds—a dove and a swallow which return, and a raven which finds the waters abated. Like the Biblical hero, Parnapishtim offers a sacrifice return above which "the gods gathered like flies." Bel is enraged because Parnapishtim has escaped, but finally being appeased, he blesses Parnapishtim and his wife by conferring on them the gift of immortality. The points of similarity between the Bab. and Heb. stories are apparent on the surface. But what the reader misses in the former is the lofty moral earnestness and the religious motive of the Biblical story. J″ sends the deluge because the entire human race has become morally degenerate; in the Bab. account the flood is due to the caprice of the gods. The gross polytheism of the one and the lofty monotheism of the other are evident. Note the chaste anthropomorphism: "J″ smelled the sweet savor" of the sacrifice (8 21) and the offensiveness of the simile: "the gods gathered like flies about the sacrifice." Furthermore, the Noachian deluge manifests not only the judgment of God but also His grace (8 20-22; cf. Ro 3 25). Both stories refer to the same event, and embody an early Semitic tradition. That the Hebrews borrowed it directly from the Babylonians is only the view of extremists. The theory propounded by Cheyne (E. Brit, s.v.), jointly with Zimmern (EB, s.v.), that the Babylonian legend is a nature myth has not been generally accepted. An actual, extraordinary inundation of the plain of Babylonia lies at the basis of the story. There was probably an unusual amount of rain, accompanied by a hurricane from the SE., and an earthquake which produced a tidal wave or lowered the surface of the land. Such a combination of natural phenomena would be sufficient to produce a great catastrophe in Babylonia.

FLOWER: While Palestine is noted for the variety and beauty of its flowers, little is said of them in the Bible except by way of reference to them as illustrations of quickly vanishing temporal beauty and glory (Is 28 1, 4, 40 6 f.; Ja 1 10 f.; I P 1 24). In Song 2 12 and Mt 6 28 (|| Lk 12 27) there is an appreciation of their beauty. In the carving and embroidery of the Temple and Tabernacle flowers had an important place, as also in the ornamentation of the metal-work (Ex 25 31 ff., 37 17 ff.; I K 7 26, 49).

In Song 5 13 for "flowers" AV, the RV has "banks," or, more correctly, in the mg., "towers." The "flower of her age" (Gr. ὑπέρακμος) in I Co 7 36 means the age when it was customary for maidens to marry (in Greece about 20 years). In I S 2 3 the whole expression "in the flower of their age" in the Heb. means simply 'men' (cf. RVmg.). In Lv 15 24, 33 the Heb. means 'separation' and the reference is to the menstrual discharge. I. ARTICLES OF FOOD.

1. Vegetable Foods.

The soil of Palestine furnished everything the Israelites needed for their sustenance. The effect produced by the climate on the physical constitution made the vegetable foods the most important, as it does to-day. First among these were the grains, and especially wheat, ḥiṭṭa, and barley, seʿōrā. The kernels were sometimes roasted or parched, qālī' (I S 17 17, 25 18; II S 17 28); more rarely the ears were roasted at the fire (cf. Lv 2 14). The primitive way of grinding the grain was to crush it in a mortar, mᵉdhōkhāh (Nu 11 8), or maktēsh (Pr 27 22), with a pestle, 'ĕlī (Pr 27 22), making the "bruised grain" of Lv 2 14, 16, which was eaten without further preparation. Probably it is this, or porridge made from it, which is denoted by the word 'arīṣā (Nu 15 20; Ezk 44 30, "dough" EV). Generally, however, the grain was ground into meal, qemaḥ. In distinction from ordinary meal, ṣōleth or qemaḥ ṣōleth designated a very fine meal, which in later times was used with sacrifices (Lv 2 1, etc.). Meal made from barley was called, like the grains of which it was made, seʿōrīm (Nu 5 15; Ezk 4 9).

1. Grains.

The dough, bātsēq, was kneaded in a kneading-trough, mishereth. Leaven, sᵉ'or, was usually mixed only with bread that was intended to be taken on a journey. Such bread was called ḥāmēts; unleavened bread was termed mats-tsāh. The loaf was molded by the hand into the form of a disk—from which form it derived its name khikkār ('circle')—and was about the thickness of one's thumb, so that it could easily be broken (cf. Is 58 7). Bread was baked in a bake-oven, tannūr. The lumps of dough were flattened firmly against the heated wall of the oven or spread on the stone within. At times the loaves were simply placed in the hot ashes or on red-hot stones (I K 19 6, mg.), in which case care had to be taken to turn them at the proper time (cf. Hos 7 8). Such loaves, or cakes, were the so-called ash-cakes ('uggaḥ, Hos 7 8, or "cakes baken on the coals," I K 19 6). Corresponding to our pancakes were the cakes cooked in a pan, marḥesheth, well known to the Bedawin of to-day (cf. Niebuhr, Beschreibung, etc., p. 52). Possibly the same thing is meant by niqqūdhīm (cracknels AV I K 14 3). An especially thin, round cake is evidently meant by rāqīq (Ex 29 2, 23), while ḥallāh (Lv 2) refers probably to one somewhat thicker and perforated. Frequently cakes were spread with oil (Lv 2 4; Ezk 16 13), or the dough was mixed with oil (Nu 11 8; cf. Lv 2 5), or honey (Ex 16 31). In times of famine, bread was also made of beans, pōl, lentils, 'ădāshīm, millet, dōḥan, and spelt, khuṣṣemim (Ezk 4 9).

Tabûn, or Small Oven, Used in Baking. (Under View.)

As a relish with bread, vegetables and fruit were used. The leguminous vegetables, yārāq (Pr 15 17; Dt 11 10), also 'ēsebh (Gn 9 3), such as beans (II S 17 28), lentils (cf. pottage of lentils Gn 25 34), marsh-millet (Ezk 4 9), cucumbers, qishshūīm, melons, 'ăbaṭṭīḥīm, and especially garlic, shūmīm (Nu 11 5), onions, bᵉtsālīm, and leeks, ḥātsīr (Nu 11 5), were all well known. In times of stress, wild gourds, paqqūrath sādhe, prepared with meal, were used in pottage (II K 4 39 f.), also saltwort, mallūaḥ (Job 30 4). 3. Vegetables.

4. Spices. The spices were cummin, kammōn, fitches, i.e., black cummin or dill, qetsaḥ (Is 28 25; Mt 23 23), mint, ἡδύοσμον (Mt 23 23; Lk 11 42), and mustard, σίναπις (Mt 13 31, 17 20). Salt, melaḥ, was always very important. "To eat a man's salt" meant to eat of his food (Ezr 4 14). A "covenant of salt" was unbreakable; it was ratified by a meal seasoned with salt, i.e., of bread and salt, as is the custom to-day (cf. Nu 18 19; II Ch 13 5).

5. Fruits. The fruits, perī (cf. Gn 1 29), known and used were: figs, especially the early fig, bikkūrāh (Is 28 4; Jer 24 2), and the late fig, tᵉ'ēnāh (Jer 8 13, 29 17). The latter were generally dried and pressed into round or square cakes, dᵉbhēlāh (I S 25 18; II K 20 7). Grapes, 'ănābhīm and 'eshkōl 'ănābhīm (Nu 13 23 f.), were used both fresh and dried, i.e., as raisins, tsimmūqīm (I S 25 18, 30 12). They were also, like figs, pressed into cakes, dᵉbhēlīm (I S 25 18). It is uncertain whether the Israelites were acquainted with grape-honey, since the Arabic dibs, corresponding to the Heb. dᵉbhāsh, "honey" EV, is used both for the artificial fruit-honey as well as for the natural product (cf. Gn 43 11; Ezk 27 17). Olives were eaten both raw and prepared, as they are to-day. Besides these may be mentioned also the pomegranate, rimmōn (Dt 8 8; Song 4 3), the fruit of the mulberry-fig, shiqmāh (sycamore Am 7 14), which was eaten by the poor, the fruit of the date-palm, tāmār, which also was treated in the same manner as figs and grapes, the pistachio nuts, botnīm (Gn 43 11), almonds, shᵉqēdhīm (Gn 43 11), and walnuts, 'egōz (Song 6 11). The dried fruit of the carob-tree—the so-called St.-John's-bread—κεράτιον, husks EV (only in Lk 15 16), was more fit for swine than for men. The unripe husks were frequently used to give water a pleasant taste. It is a matter of debate as to whether the Israelites were acquainted with the apple. In the Hellenistic period many varieties of produce were imported from other countries—mustard, pumpkins, beans, lentils from Egypt, asparagus, horse-beans, Persian nuts, etc.

2. Animal Foods.

Next to bread and vegetables the most important food was milk, ḥālābh, both of larger and smaller cattle (Dt 32 14), especially goat's milk (Pr 27 27), which was usually kept in skins, n'ōdh (Jg 4 19). The Bedawin alone used camel's milk. As a drink the fresh milk, which in a hot climate develops a sour taste soon after milking, is most effective in quenching thirst. Among the peasantry of to-day no meal is served without this sour milk (cf. Gn 18 8). Cream, ḥem'āh, is mentioned frequently (Gn 18 8; Is 7 22, etc.), but the word means also thick milk, cheese (Pr 30 33), and probably butter. At the present day butter is made by pressing and shaking a goatskin filled with milk and hung between poles. The modern Arabs use a great deal of butter, both fresh and melted. Whether this was also the case with the Israelites in Palestine is doubtful, since they had olive-oil to take its place. It is also probable that they were acquainted with the 'sweet milk cheese,' ḥărītsē-ḥālābh (I S 17 18). The special word for cheese is gᵉbhīnāh (Job 10 10), which was in all probability prepared then as at the present. The curdled milk is first drained of its liquid, the curd is then salted and molded into lumps the size of one's hand and finally placed in the sun to dry. To-day such cheese is often mixed with water and furnishes with its somewhat sour taste a most cooling drink. 6. Milk.

By honey, dᵉbhāsh, so often mentioned in connection with milk, not only bee-honey but also fruit-honey is meant. While bee-culture was unknown to the Israelites, wild bees were abundant, as at the present time (Dt 32 13; I S 14 25 f.). The liquid honey nōpheth tsūphīm, that drips from the comb, ya'ăr or ya'ăr dᵉbhāsh (I S 14 25, 27), is mentioned many times (Ps 19 11; Pr 16 24, etc.), and is still highly prized. Honey was used with pastry (Ex 16 31) and mingled 7. Honey.

with the drink as well as eaten alone. It was a favorite food for children (Is 7 15).

8. Fish.

There are but few notices concerning fish as an article of diet (cf. Nu 11 5). In fact, little is said of them at all in the O T (cf. Jer 16 16; Ezk 47 10; Ec 9 12). But they must have been as much relished then as in the days of Jesus (Mt 7 10, 14 17, 15 34; Lk 24 42; Jn 21 9). The last two references show that they were often broiled and eaten with honey. According to Dt 14 10, Lv 11 9, fish without fins and scales were unclean and not to be eaten. It was in post-exilic times that the Jews came to use fish in large quantities. In the neighborhood of the "fish-gate" in Jerusalem there was the fish-market (Zeph 1 10; Neh 3 3, 12 39; II Ch 33 14), where sun-dried or salted fish were sold. According to Neh 13 16 they were imported by Tyrian dealers. Others came from Egypt, where cured fish constituted an important article of export. In later times the salting of fish was extensively carried on in Palestine, though the industry was learned from foreigners (cf. the name of the town Tarichеæ, 'curing-places,' from τάριχος, a 'cured fish,' at the S. end of the Sea of Galilee).

9. Reptiles and Locusts.

From the prohibition in Lv 11 29 f. it would seem that lizards, tsābh, were occasionally eaten, just as to-day in many districts the Bedawin are fond of the ḍaff, which corresponds to the tsābh, though the qualifying phrase "after its kind" in the passage cited may be intended to give the word a quite general meaning. According to Lv 11 21 f. it was allowable to eat locusts—the varieties 'arbe, ṣol'ām, ḥargōl, ḥāgābh, and gēbh being expressly mentioned. It is probable that this was a habit surviving from the earlier nomadic times, against which Dt 14 19 utters a protest without actually forbidding it.

10. The Use of Meat.

Meat has always been more rarely used as food in the Orient than with us: only on the royal table was it an article of daily diet (I K 5 3), and this was probably because of the daily offering (see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS). Otherwise animals were slaughtered for food only on festal occasions, such as the yearly pilgrimages to the Sanctuary, ḥaggīm, and the annual festivals of families or relatives, or under special circumstances, such as visits, etc. (cf. Gn 18 7; II S 12 4). The primitive style of preparing the meat was by roasting. It was not until they lived in Palestine and came under the influence of the Canaanites that the Israelites learned to boil their meat (cf. seethe AV. Ex 23 19; cf. broth, Jg 6 19; I S 2 13), and even then, in the Passover ritual, roasting—the old custom of the nomadic shepherds—was retained. The supply of meat was derived from the cattle-raising industry. Sheep were of greatest importance for this purpose (I S 25 11, 18, etc.). Lambs, kārīm (Am 6 4), up to three years old were favorites. In addition, fatted calves, m'rī' (Is 1 11), and oxen (I S 14 32) are referred to, also kids, g'dhī 'izzīm (Gn 27 9, etc.). The hindquarters, shōq (I S 9 24), thighs, yārēk, and shoulders, kāthēph (Ezk 24 4), were considered the best parts. It is evident from Gn 27 6 ff. that the women of Israel, even in early times, were skilful in preparing meat. The prohibition in Ex 23 19 shows that it was common to boil the young animals in milk, as is the custom among the Arabs to-day. Venison was somewhat rare, but found on the royal table (I K 5 3). This was due to the fact that there was no large extent of wild land, and the Israelites, moreover, were not specially fond of hunting (cf. Gn 25 27). According to Dt 14 3 ff. and Lv 11 1 ff. it was allowable to eat only animals that chew the cud and have cloven hoofs. Dt names, in addition to oxen, sheep, and goats, the hart, 'ayāl, gazel, ts'bhī, fallow deer, yaḥmūr, wild goat, 'aqqō, antelope, dīshōn, oryx, t'ō, and the zemer, probably a variety of deer or stag. Among the fowl, doves, yōnāh, and turtle-doves tōr, also quail, s'lāw (Ex 16 12 f.), were eaten, and from Is 10 14, Lk 11 12, it may be inferred that eggs also were an item of food. It was forbidden to eat any animal not duly slaughtered, e.g., such as had fallen or was torn—a prohibition probably due to the ancient prejudice regarding the shedding of blood (cf. I S 14 32 ff.; Dt 12 16, 23, etc.).

11. The Preparation of Food. Utensils.

Cooking was done by men as well as by women. The former indeed considered it their duty only to slaughter and boil or roast the meat, as the Bedawin and Fellaheen do to-day. It was the task of the women to grind the meal, bake the bread and cakes, make the cheese and butter, prepare the vegetables, etc. (cf. Gn 18 6; I S 8 13). Even women of the royal family occasionally engaged in such work (cf. II S 13 8). It was an exception for a man to prepare vegetables (cf. Gn 25 29; II K 4 38). Cooks, ṭabbaḥīm, are mentioned (I S 8 13, 9 23), but were found only in some of the more wealthy homes. Bakemeats, "baked food" (Gn 40 17, RV), refers to delicacies prepared by the cooks of the royal household. There were bakers, 'ōphīm, only in the larger towns (Hos 7 4).

The furnishings of a Hebrew kitchen were very simple. In addition to the hand-mill and bake-oven there were the vessels, kadh, which the women filled with water at the spring or well, and carried home on their shoulders (Gn 24 14). In such vessels meal and other similar things were kept (I K 17 12). Meat was boiled in pots of earthenware and of brass. Inasmuch as the manufacture of the latter had been learned from the Phœnicians (I K 7 13 f.), they were similar in form to those of Phœnicia. A number of names of such vessels, or dishes, have come down to us, but it is no longer possible to distinguish clearly among them (e.g., kīyyōr, dūdh, qallaḥath, pārūr, ṣir, tselāḥāh, ṣaph, mizrāq, kaph, I K 7 40, 50; I S 2 14; II Ch 35 13; τρύβλιον, Mk 14 20). For fruits and bakemeats there were baskets of various sorts, of which we know the names, but not their different forms (dūdh, Jer 24 2; ṣal, Gn 40 17; tene, Dt 26 2). The three-pronged forks, mazlēg, of I S 2 13 were used, not for eating, but for drawing the meat out of the pot. Knives, ma'ăkeleth, were used only for slaying the animals and cutting the meat for cooking (Gn 22 6, 10). Liquids were kept usually as they are to-day, in goat-skin "bottles," ḥēmeth (Gn 21 15), and n'ōdh (Jg 4 19); only in later times, and then rarely, were metal vessels used for this purpose.

HOUSEHOLD UTENSILS—II.

1. Sandúk, chest for clothes.
2. Kuffe, basket for carrying earth.
3. Śal, basket for fruit or vegetables.
4. Maktúf, large basket with handle.
5. Kursí, stool.
6. Kurtúli, basket with handle.
7. Sukkara and Miftáh, lock and key.
8. Ibrík má, pot for hot water.
9. Ibrík kahwe, pot for making coffee.
10. Tahûnet kahwe, coffee-mill.
11. Tunjera, copper kettle.
12. Munfah, bellows.
13. Jurn, mortar for grinding coffee.
14. Mukense, broom.
15. Mudukka, washing-pounder.
16. Dikmak, mallet.

II. Beverages.

The most common beverage, especially in towns, was water (I S 30 11; I K 19 6, 8), which was collected mainly in the cisterns (bōr) that every well-appointed house possessed (II S 17 18; Jer 38 6). These cisterns were generally made wider at the bottom so as to keep the water cooler. The opening was covered with one or more stone slabs, both to prevent accidents and to guard against a too free use of the water by others. Wells, be'ēr, furnishing "living" spring water (Gn 26 19; Nu 21 1 ff.; Jn 4 11), were rarer and most highly prized. The water of such springs was usually collected in basins that were walled up and covered over, into which one descended by steps. They were the common possession of a clan or community.

12. Water.

In the heat of the harvest time use was frequently made of a sour drink, ḥōmets (Ru 2 14), a mixture of water and wine, yayin, or some other strong drink, shēkhār. Wine was in common use, as it was produced in abundance. Both the must, i.e., "new wine," tīrōsh, and the wine proper, i.e., after its fermentation, were drunk. Whether it was customary in earlier times to mix the wine with water is questionable, and can not be proved from Is 1 22. In II Mac 15 39, and in the Mishna (Pesaḥ 7 13) there is evidence of such a custom, but it may have been due to Greek and Roman influence. There was, indeed, an old custom of 'mixing' wine, but this consisted in adding spices to strengthen it or improve its taste (Song 8 2; Is 5 22; Ps 75 9; Pr 9 5). It was usual to strain, zāqaq, the wine through a cloth, in order to free it from dregs and insects. The method of preparing the intoxicating drink, shēkhār, is unknown. According to Song 8 2 pomegranates, 'ăṣiṣ rimmōnīm, were used for the purpose. It is probable that the Israelites were also acquainted with palm-wine, pressed from soaked ripe dates. It is possible also that they were acquainted with the Egyptian barley-wine (cf. Herod. ii. 77; Pliny, HN. xiv. 29; Mishna, Pesaḥ 3 1). In the Mishna apple-wine (Terumoth 11 2) and honey-wine (Shab. 20 2) are mentioned.

13. Wine, etc.

There can be no doubt that the course of time brought with it changes in respect to the food used by the Israelites. The original simplicity of the nomadic days gradually gave way, especially among the well-to-do, under the influence of a more self-indulgent mode of life, fostered by prosperity and intercourse with the outside world. The example set by the court was not without influence (I K 5 2). The various sorts of fine pastry which are mentioned in the Law (cf. Lv ch. 2) reveal the advance made in the art of cooking. It is likely also that the painstaking care shown in the preparation of spiced wines was characteristic of the period of the Kingdom. After the Exile the Jews learned to import many new varieties of food. When the exiles returned they brought with them hens, and afterward eggs were a favorite article of food (cf. Lv 11 12). From Egypt came pickled fish, ταρίχη (see § 8, above). Egyptian beer, ζῦθος, mustard, gourds, beans, lentils were also imported from Egypt. Tyrians brought sea fish to the Jerusalem market (Neh 13 16). Finally, the use made by the people generally of Babylonian pulp, Median beer, Bithynian cheese, Persian nuts, asparagus, etc., gives clear evidence of how, with increased prosperity and contact with the outside world, a taste for more delicate foods had manifested itself among the Jews.

14. Changes in Respect to Food.

W N.

FOOL, FOOLISH, FOOLISHNESS, FOLLY: 1. In the O T these words are found mainly in the Wisdom Lit. (Job, Pr, Ec). The various original terms express many varieties of meaning which the English words only imperfectly reproduce. (1) nābhal, nebhālāh (rare in the Wisdom Lit.) signify more than mere folly. The verb means to 'despise,' 'contemn' (cf. Dt 32 15). The nābhal, then, is one who is positively bad, despising what is right, and nebhālāh is open, wilful badness (cf. Gn 34 7; Dt 22 21; Jos 7 15; Jg 19 23, 20 6, 10; II S 3 33, 13 12, 13; Ps 14 1, 53 1, 74 22; Pr 17 7, 21, 30 22; Is 32 5, 6 [cf. AV], etc.). (2) 'iweleth, 'ĕwīl, and yā'al mean simply 'folly,' 'fool,' 'foolish,' 'to be foolish.' The root idea is thought to be 'to be thick,' but this is uncertain. While frequent in Pr (1 7, 5 23, etc.), elsewhere they occur only in Nu 12 11; Job 5 2, 3; Ps 38 5, 69 5, 107 17; Is 19 11, 35 8; Jer 4 22, 5 4, 50 36; Hos 9 7, 13; Zec 11 15. (3) keṣel, kesīl, kesīlūth. The root ksl expresses the idea of 'thickness' and these terms signify 'intellectual dulness.' They are the favorite terms in Pr and Ec (cf. Pr 1 22; Ec 2 14, etc.) and are found only in Ps 49 10, 13, 85 8, 92 6, 94 8; Jer 10 8 outside of these books. (4) ṣākhal, ṣekhel, ṣiklūth, found often in Ec (1 17, 2 19, etc.), mean simply 'fool,' 'foolish,' 'folly,' i.e., 'lack of moral good sense.' (5) Of other less used terms, those from the root hālal mean 'arrogant' or even 'mad' (Ps 5 5, 73 3 [cf. RV], 75 4); those from tāphal mean literally 'insipid' (Job 1 22, 24 12; Jer 23 13; La 2 14; cf. Job 6 6). In Job 4 18 the meaning is 'error'; on Ps 73 22 cf. RV; in Pr 9 6 "foolish" means 'simple.' The frequency of the mention of such terms in Pr and Ec is due to the fact that 'wisdom' according to the view of the Wisdom Schools was not a speculative and abstract concept, but a practical one. The wise man understood how to live correctly, while the fool was ignorant, or negligent, or defiant of the rules of correct living. Since these books deal largely with the matter of practical life, setting forth the maxims in obedience to which it may be attained, it was natural that the reverse side—the fool and his foolishness—should often be spoken of by way of illustration or contrast.

2. The N T usage calls for little comment. "Fool" is perhaps too strong a term in Lk 24 25 and Eph 5 15 (cf. RV). On Ro 1 21, 10 19 also cf. RV In most other cases in the N T these terms are translations of ἀνόητος, or μωρός (with their compounds, or derivatives), of which the former meant literally 'without wit' or 'sense,' the latter 'dull,' 'sluggish,' 'stupid,' though both words were used in a more general sense.

FOOT: In addition to its literal use in numerous places, because of its position as the lowest part of the human body, "foot" is used in various figures of speech to express: (1) Subjection, from the Oriental custom of placing the foot on the vanquished (Jos 10

24; Jg 5 27; II S 22 39; Ro 16 20; I Co 15 25). (2) Possession (Jg 4 10; cf. Mt 15 30; Ac 4 35). (3) Humility, in salutation, supplication, or homage (Dt 33 3; II K 4 27; Est 8 3; Mk 5 22; Rev 1 17), as of a disciple at the feet of his teacher (Lk 10 39; Ac 22 3), or as shown in the act of washing the feet of another (Jn 11 2, 13 5). (4) Poetically, the part of the body in action is used for the man himself (Ps 25 15; Jer 18 22; Lk 1 79; Ac 5 9). Washing of feet, customary at the end of a journey, or on entering a house, was an act of courtesy to a guest. In A V kēn, the "base" of the laver, is rendered "foot" (Ex 30 18, etc.). C. S. T.

FOOTMAN. See WARFARE, § 4. For the weapons of the footman see in general ARMS AND ARMOR.

FOOTSTOOL: Twice an exact translation of kebhesh (II Ch 9 18), and of ὑποπόδιον (Ja 2 3). It is elsewhere the translation, in Dt, of the late word hădhōm, 'stool,' and in the N T of ὑποπόδιον with the addition "of the feet." The footstool is used figuratively of the earth (Is 66 1; Mt 5 35; Ac 7 49), of the Temple (La 2 1), of the Ark (Ps 99 5, 132 7; I Ch 28 2), and of enemies, in a metaphor of their conquest by the Messianic King (Ps 110 1; Mt 22 44, etc.).
C. S. T.

FORBID (in the expression "God [or the Lord] forbid"): In the O T this is the rendering of the Heb. ḥālīlāh, 'profanation,' i.e., in reference to J" (I S 24 6, 26 11; I K 21 3; I Ch 11 19). For other instances changed by RV see FAR. In the N T 'God forbid' is the translation of the Gr. μὴ γένοιτο, i.e., "let it not be." E. E. N.

FORCES. See WARFARE, §§ 3, 4.

FORD: In the O T a "ford," or place of crossing, is mentioned in connection with three rivers, the Jabbok (Gn 32 22), the Arnon (Is 16 2), and the Jordan (Jos 2 7; Jg 3 28). In antiquity bridges were almost unknown and fords were therefore of great importance. The Jordan has a large number of fords, some of which are impassable when the river is high. See also PALESTINE, § 12 (a). E. E. N.

FORECAST: The word in Dn 11 24 f. AV means 'to think,' 'plan,' or 'desire,' as is indicated in RV.
E. E. N.

FOREFATHER: This term occurs but once in the O T (Jer 11 10). The same Heb. original (in the sing.) is rendered "first father" in Is 43 27. In the N T πρόγονοι (II Ti 1 3) means 'ancestors.' See also FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, §§ 2, 4. E. E. N.

FOREHEAD: The forehead is often treated in a somewhat symbolic way, as indicative of the character or personality (e.g., "a harlot's forehead," Jer 3 3; cf. Ezk 3 8 f.). It was on the forehead of the high priest that the golden plate with its inscription "Holy to Jehovah" was placed (Ex 28 38). Marks, or signs, or names are spoken of as placed on the foreheads of the faithful (Ezk 9 4, where the mark is the Heb. letter ת in its old form X or †; Rev 7 3, 9 4, 14 1, 22 4), or of the servants of the beast (Rev 13 16, 14 9, 17 5, 20 4). E. E. N.

FOREIGNER. See GENTILES.

FOREKNOW, FOREKNOWLEDGE, FOREORDAIN. See in general ELECTION.

FOREPART: In Ac 27 41, generally for the prow of the ship. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

FORERUNNER: The rendering in He 6 20 of πρόδρομος, which is applied to Christ, who as eternal High Priest enters in our behalf into the Divine presence, thus insuring our personal approach to God. It is used also in the LXX. of Nu 13 20 and Is 28 4 for the first ripe fruits, and in Wis 12 8 for the advance guard of an army. See also JESUS CHRIST, § 4, and JOHN THE BAPTIST. M. W. J.

FORESAIL, FORESHIP: Technical terms used only in the account of Paul's voyage (Ac 27 40, 30). See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

FORESKIN. See CIRCUMCISION.

FOREST. See PALESTINE, § 21.

FOREST OF ARABIA (יַעַר בָּעֲרָב, ya'ar ba-'ărabh): A forest or thicket, probably a hiding-place for Arabian merchantmen of the tribe of the Dedanites (Is 21 13). Site unknown. The second word is translated by many "in the steppe"; by others the vowel-pointing is changed to mean "in the evening." C. S. T.

FOREST OF CARMEL. See CARMEL.

FOREST OF HARETH. See HARETH.

FOREST OF LEBANON. See LEBANON.

FORFEIT. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (c).

FORGER. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 10, and TUBAL CAIN.

FORGIVE, FORGIVENESS (also in the O T pardon, and in the N T remission): The idea of forgiveness may be viewed either as a religious or a social one. In both cases it is the annulling of a cause of estrangement, or offense, by the estranged or offended person. The principles which underlie it are viewed as the same, and the conditions are at least similar, if not absolutely identical, whether it is God's forgiveness of man or man's forgiveness of his fellow man (Mt 6 12). The thing forgiven, or to be forgiven, may be either a literal debt which is overdue (Mt 18 27) or sin looked upon as a debt (Mt 6 12, 14). It may be a personal indignity or offense, depriving one of his rightful property, or honor (Nu 14 19; Mt 18 21; Lk 17 3); or it may be a violation of moral law, whether viewed as a Divine prescription or an inherent right. The vast majority of cases of forgiveness in the Scriptures are of this latter type (Jos 24 19; Ro 4 27).

The conditions of forgiveness are repentance and reparation, or atonement; but they are not mechanically conceived, nor presented as equally indispensable in every case. In fact, neither seems to have been fulfilled when Jesus on the cross forgave His executioners. The ground for His forgiving was that they knew not what they were doing (Lk 23 34). In the parable of the prodigal son, while repentance is a condition fully met by the conduct of the offender, nothing is said of atonement, or reparation. But in the more formal treatment of the subject both atonement and repentance are made conditions (Mk 1 4; Lk 24 47; Ac 2 38), and reparation is prescribed in the law alluded to in He 9 22.

The nature of forgiveness is shown in the different forms of its effect. One of the most frequent words in the O T pictures it as the taking off, or away, of that which is forgiven, as if it were a blot, or excrescence (nāsā', Gn 50 17). Again, it is the act of covering what is forgiven, as if it were a blemish. This is strictly an O T conception (Ps 78 38), and is related to the sacrificial notion of covering sin with the blood of the expiatory victim. But it is also used in the N T (I P 4 8; Ja 5 20). A third way of speaking of forgiveness is suggestive of the conferring of a gratuity. The underlying thought here is, of course, the canceling of the payment of a debt (Lk 7 43; II Co 2 7). Still another manner of speaking puts what is forgiven into the class of things cast, or sent away. This is the most frequent, and is designated by the O T term sālaḥ (e.g., Ps 103 3) and by the N T ἀφίημι. In a single instance (Ro 4 25) forgiveness is made a passing by or overlooking of sin.

The forgiveness of sin is the specific prerogative of God Himself (Mk 2 9); and in the apostolic teaching forgiveness is secured through Jesus Christ (Eph 1 7; Col 1 14). The same was anticipated in the words of Jesus claiming the privilege for the Son of Man of forgiving sin (Mk 2 10). For unpardonable sin, see SIN. A. C. Z.

FORK: The only occurrence of this term in the EV is in I S 13 21. The Heb. here is shᵉlōsh ('three') qillᵉshōn, usually taken to mean 'a three-pronged fork' (as the root qlsh has in Aramaic the sense of 'three'). But the meaning is, after all, obscure. See Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the Books of Samuel, p. 80. See also AGRICULTURE, § 6, and FOOD, § 11. E. E. N.

FORM: I. The rendering of several Gr. words: (1) μορφή, which occurs only in Ph 2 6 f., where it is used by the Apostle of the existence form in which Christ externalizes His essential being. In His pre-existent state it is the form in which the Divine Being (θεός) externalizes Itself in the world of Spirit; in His incarnate state it is the form in which the creature (δοῦλος) externalizes itself in the world of matter; (2) εἶδος, which in Jn 5 37 ("shape" AV) and Lk 3 22 ("shape" AV) has reference to the externalization of the Divine Being to human vision, and in I Th 5 22 ("appearance" AV) refers to the outward manifestations of evil, from which the Apostle urges his readers to abstain; (3) μόρφωσις, which in Ro 2 20 refers to the essential substance of knowledge (γνῶσις) and truth (ἀλήθεια) which the Jew possessed in the Law, but which he failed to appreciate and apply; and in II Ti 3 5 to the form of godliness which the degenerate religionists predicted by the Apostle are to hold externally, but to deny in character and life; (4) τύπος, which in Ro 6 17 is used of the special form of gospel truth that had characterized the Apostle's preaching, and had been appropriated by his readers, and in Ac 23 25 ("manner" AV), less significantly, of the cast of Claudius Lysias' letter. (5) In II Ti 1 13 RV has substituted "pattern" for "form," the less accurate AV rendering of ὑποτύπωσις.

II. See also GOD, § 2, and MAN, § 2. M. W. J.

FORMER, FORMER THINGS: The expression "former things" occurs frequently in Is chs 41 ff. It refers to the Divine knowledge of history by which J" was able to set forth accurately through His prophets what was to take place. The prophet challenges the representatives of the other religions to show any such knowledge on the part of their gods. On Zech 14 8, see EAST and DEAD SEA. E. E. N.

FORNICATOR, FORNICATION. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (c), and MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, § 4.

FORSWEAR. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (b).

FORT, FORTIFY, FORTRESS: Every city in antiquity was fortified ("fenced," often, in AV) by its wall and citadel. See CITY, § 3. For the terms "fort," "fortress" (AV) the RV gives other renderings in a number of places. In II S 5 9, Jer 16 19, Ezk 33 27, RV reads "stronghold." In Is 29 3 it reads "siege-works." In Is 32 14 it renders the Heb. 'ōphel by "hill," the reference being probably to the hill on which the palace of David was built. In Is 25 12, RV reads "the high fortress of thy walls." In Mic 7 12 the Heb. is mātsōr, perhaps a textual error for mitsraim, 'Egypt,' as in RV. The "forts" referred to in II K 25 1, Jer 52 4, Ezk 4 2, etc., were the siege-forts erected by the Chaldean army during its siege of Jerusalem. E. E. N.

FORTIFIED CITY. See CITY, § 3.

FORTUNATUS (Φορτουνάτος): One of the messengers of the Corinthian Church at whose presence in Ephesus Paul rejoices, because of the reassurance which he brought concerning the attitude toward Paul of part of the Church (I Co 16 17). See also ACHAICUS and STEPHANAS. J. M. T.

FORTUNE: In Is 65 11 a doom is pronounced on those "that prepare a table unto Fortune ["for that troop" AV] and that fill up mingled wine unto Destiny." The Heb. term is godh, which was the name of an Aramaic deity, the god of good fortune (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 22 f.). The tribal name Gad was probably due to some ancient (pre-Mosaic) worship of this deity among Israel's ancestors. E. E. N.

FORTY. See NUMBERS, SIGNIFICANT AND SYMBOLIC, § 7.

FORUM. See APPIUS, MARKET OF.

FORWARD, FORWARDNESS: In the N T these words occur in AV in several places where RV gives decidedly better renderings. In II Co 8 8 Gr. σπουδή = 'zeal,' 'earnestness'; 8 10, θέλειν = 'to wish,' 'to will'; 9 2, προθυμία = 'readiness'; Gal 2 10, σπουδάζειν = 'to be earnest' or 'zealous.' E. E. N.

FOUL SPIRIT. See DEMON, DEMONOLOGY, § 3.

FOUNDATION, FOUNDATIONS: In the O T this term (nearly always the rendering of יָסַד, yāṣadh, or its derivatives) is used (1) of the walls of a building or city, for which the N T equivalent is generally θεμέλιος (I K 7 10; Ps 137 7; Lk 6 48, etc.), and (2) of God's creative act of establishing the earth, for which the N T equivalent is καταβολή (Job 38 4; Mt 13 35). Figurative applications of both of these usages are also found (Pr 10 25; Is 28 16, the principle of faith; Ro 15 20; II Ti 2 19, etc.). In Job 38 6 the Heb. is 'edhen, usually rendered 'socket,' but here used to give the sense that the foundations were sunk deep. In Is 16 7 the RV "raisin-cakes" (idolatrous offerings) is the more probable rendering. In Is 6 4, RV reads "foundations" for "posts" (AV), and in Ps 89 14, 97 2, "foundation" for "habitation" (AV). In the early period the laying of the foundations of buildings, walls, etc., was accompanied by the sacrifice of young children, whose bodies were immured in the foundation (cf. Jos 6 25; I K 16 34, and consult the report of the discoveries at Gezer in PEFQS). See also Cosmogony, § 3. E. E. N.

FOUNTAIN: I. In metaphorical usage a fountain is the emblem of any source of spiritual blessing (Jl 3 18), whether issuing in cleansing (Zec 13 1) or in refreshment and revival (Rev 7 17, 21 6). Once Jacob is called a fountain, referring to the peaceful contentment of his condition (Dt 33 28). Preeminently, however, God is the fountain of life, i.e., the source of all good (Ps 36 9; Jer 2 13, 17 13). Hence the knowledge of God is also a fountain of life (Pr 13 14).

FRIEND, FRIENDSHIP: The most common words for friend in the O T (rēa', rē'eh, mērēa') indicate acquaintanceship and intercourse of varying degrees of intimacy. In II S 15 37, 16 16; I K 4 5 the word is used probably in a somewhat technical, i.e., official, sense. Another frequently used term is 'ōhēbh (participle of 'āhabh, 'to love'), lit. 'lover,' like the Gr. φίλος (II S 19 6; II Ch 20 7; Est 5 10, 13, 6 13; Pr 14 20, 18 24, 27 6; Is 41 8; Jer 20 4, 6; Zec 13 6). In Jer 38 22 the original means 'men of my peace.' In Pr 16 28, 17 9 the Heb. term implies the existence of a bond of union, or a confidential relation. "To speak friendly" (Jg 19 3; Ru 2 13) is literally 'to speak to the heart.' In Job 19 19 "inward friend" is literally 'men of my counsel.' In the N T the word rendered "friend," except in four instances, is the common Gr. term φίλος. In Mt 20 13, 22 12, 26 50 the Gr. is ἑταῖρος, 'companion' or 'comrade.' In Ac 12 20 the statement is literally "and having persuaded Blastus"—"friend" not being in the original at all. E. E. N.

FRINGE, FRINGES: In Dt 22 12 we have an ancient law requiring Israelites to wear "fringes" (gᵉdhīlīm) upon the four corners of their garments. In Nu 15 38 f. the same law is given in an expanded form, only here the word rendered "fringes" is tsīt-sīth, which seems to have taken the place of the older word. 'Tassels' is a much more correct rendering than "fringes," since gᵉdhīlīm means something 'twisted,' and these were to be attached to the corner, not the hem, of the garment. These tassels were fastened to the garment (i.e., the outer garment or simlāh) (see Dress and Ornaments, § 3) by a cord of blue, and worn for the purpose of reminding the wearer of his obligation, as an Israelite, of loyalty to J", though the original purpose, in the time of Dt and earlier, may have been quite different. Much was made of these in later times as distinct badges of Judaism (cf. Zec 8 23). They seem to have been common in N T times (cf. Mt 9 20, 14 36, 23 5). When the Jews adopted Gentile dress, they gradually ceased wearing the tassels as part of their ordinary garb, and confined them, as now, to the tallith (an adaptation of the old simlāh, worn by men at the synagogue-service, also, in a smaller form, as an article of underwear). FROG. See Palestine, § 26, and in general Plagues.

FRONTLETS. See Phylacteries.

FROWARD: The North Eng. form of the preposition 'frōmward,' meaning 'turned from,' often with the idea of perversity. In AV it is used as adjective, noun, and adverb in the rendering of several Heb. words, which are translated in other passages by "perverse," "crooked," "false," and "wayward." All these words appear in Pr much oftener than elsewhere, referring to conduct in private and public life. ARV retains "froward" only in II S 22 27, Ps 18 26, and I P 2 18. C. S. T.

FRUIT: In the great majority of instances the words rendered "fruit" are, in the O T, pᵉrī, and, in the N T, καρπός, both words being of general significance and applied (1) to the produce of the earth and its plants, (2) to the increase of animals, including man, and, (3) figuratively, to the results or consequences of human actions, especially in the moral sphere. Other terms rendered "fruit" are: 'ēbh, 'bloom' or 'budding' (Dn 4 12, 14, 21); y'bhūl, 'result' (Dt 11 17; Hab 3 17; Hag 1 10); y'ledh, 'child' (Ex 21 22); leḥem, 'bread' (Jer 11 19); ma'ăkhal, 'eating' (Neh 9 25); m'lē'āh, 'fulness' (Dt 22 9); nōbh, nībh, and t'nūbhāh (all from nūbh, 'to grow'), meaning 'fruit,' as the result of growth (Jg 9 11; Is 27 6; La 4 9; Mal 1 12, and, figuratively, Is 57 19); t'bhū'āh, 'increase,' and often so rendered; zimrāh, meaning doubtful (Gn 43 11); kōaḥ, 'strength' (Job 31 39); γέννημα, 'product' (Mk 14 25, and ‖s; Lk 12 18; II Co 9 10), and ὀπώρα, 'ripe fruit' (Rv 18 14). See also PALESTINE, § 23, and FOOD, § 5. E. E. N.

FRYING-PAN: The translation of marḥesheth, Lv 2 7, 7 9—probably a shallow pan, whether of metal or earthenware is not certain. E. E. N.

FUEL: Little is said specifically about fuel in the Bible. It may be inferred that in ancient times, when the country was more abundantly wooded, wood was commonly used as fuel. The references to coals are generally to stones heated red hot, but at times to charcoal, which was burned in a brasier, or pan, of earthenware (Jer 36 22 ff.; Zec 12 6), and used for heating rooms, also, probably, in the smelting-furnaces, and in the priestly censers. "Coals of juniper," i.e., charcoal made from the broom shrub (used for this purpose to-day), are mentioned in Ps 120 4. For heating pots, thorn bushes of various kinds furnished a convenient fuel (Ps 58 9; Is 33 12; Ec 7 6). The dung of camels and cattle is used to-day very commonly in Palestine as fuel, but there is only one reference to this in the O T (Ezk 4 15). E. E. N.

FUGITIVE: (1) In Gn 4 12, 14, the Heb. means 'wanderer,' one who has no fixed abode. (2) In Nu 21 29 RV, Jg 12 4 the idea is that of one who has 'escaped.' (3) In II K 25 11 'deserters' are meant. (4) In Is 15 5, 43 14; Ezk 17 21, "fugitive" is the proper term. (5) In Is 16 3, 21 14 RV, 'wanderers' is a better rendering than "fugitives." E. E. N.

FURLONG: A measure of length. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

FURNACE: Several original terms are so rendered in the Bible. (1) tannūr (Aram. 'attūn, Dn 3 6 ff.), properly 'oven' (Gn 15 27; Neh 3 11, 12 38; Is 31 9); see FOOD, § 11. (2) kibhshān, a 'kiln' or 'smelting-furnace' (Gn 19 28; Ex 9 8, 10, 19 18). (3) kūr, a 'crucible,' for metal-working, often used figuratively (Pr 17 3; Dt 4 20, etc.). (4) 'ălīl (Ps 12 6) is of uncertain meaning. (5) κάμινος (Mt 13 42, etc.), a term of comprehensive meaning, signifying various kinds of furnaces. E. E. N.

FURNITURE: In all instances save one the Heb. term rendered "furniture" is k'lī, a word of general import. In Gn 31 34, "furniture" AV, the Heb. kar is more correctly rendered "saddle" (so RV). A camel's saddle, or saddle litter, is a basket-like affair, provided with cushions inside, and covered with an awning. It is used by women when traveling by camels. Such a saddle is to be distinguished from the pack-saddle, used to hold the burdens loaded on camels. E. E. N.

FURROW. See AGRICULTURE, § 4.

FURY. See GOD, § 2.

G

GAAL, gê'al (גַּעַל, ga'al): A son of Ebed, who organized a revolt of the Shechemites against Abimelech (Jg 9 26-41). Whether Gaal was an Israelite or Canaanite (probably the latter), and whether he acted as a patriot or a demagogue aiming to set up his own personal authority in the place of that of Abimelech, are questions on which the story does not furnish sufficient material for definite answers. A. C. Z.

GAASH, gê'ash (גָּעַשׁ, gā'ash): The name of a hill north of which Joshua was buried (Jos 24 30; Jg 2 9). The brooks (or 'brook valleys') of Gaash are also mentioned (II S 23 30). For location see TIMNATH-SERAH. E. E. N.

GABRIEL, gê'bri-el. See ANGEL, § 4.

GAD (גָּד, gādh), 'fortune': I. 1. A son of Jacob; see TRIBES, §§ 2–4. 2. A prophet who advised, or admonished, David, first, when as an outlaw he was passing from place to place in his efforts to elude Saul's search (I S 22 5), and again, when the king took the census (II S 24 11 ff.; I Ch 21 9 ff.). Together with Nathan he further assisted David in the arrangements of the Levitical musical service (II Ch 29 25), and wrote a record of some portion at least of the great king's reign (I Ch 29 29).

II. That there was a form of Canaanitish idolatry adopted by some Hebrews, in which a fortune-god was worshiped under the name of Gad, is attested by Isaiah (65 11); ARVmg. "Gad." The name of this fortune-god appears also in such compounds as Baal-gad (Jos 11 17, 12 7, 13 5) and Migdal-gad (Jos 15 37). It is probable that in Leah's naming of her maid's son "Gad" (Gn 30 11) there is a trace of the worship of this deity. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 23. A. C. Z.

GAD, VALLEY OF (נַחַל הַגָּד, naḥal ha-gādh, II S 24 5), 'torrent valley [wady] of Gad': The valley of the Arnon, the boundary between Moab and Gad (cf. Dt 2 36; Jos 13 9). In II S 24 5 read, with LXX. (Lucian), Wellhausen, and Driver: "And they began from Aroer, from the city toward Gad." C. S. T.

GADARENES, gad″a-rînz′ See GERASENES.

GADDI, gād′dai (גַּדִּי, gaddī): One of the spies (Nu 13 11). E. E. N.

GADDIEL, gad′i-el (גַּדִּיאֵל, gaddī'ēl), 'Fortune is God': One of the spies (Nu 13 10). E. E. N.

GADI, gê′dai (גָּדִי, gādhī): The father of King Menahem (II K 15 14, 17). E. E. N.

GAHAM, gê′ham (גַּחַם, gaḥam): Probably an Aramæan clan-name, connected genealogically with Nahor (Gn 22 24). E. E. N.

GAHAR, gê′hār (גָּחַר, gaḥar): The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 47; Neh 7 49). E. E. N.

GAI, gê′ai (גַּיְא, gay'), 'valley': The name of a place in Philistia (I S 17 52, "the valley" AV). The true reading is "Gath" (cf. RVmg. and the latter half of the verse). C. S. T.

GAIUS, gê′us (Γάϊος): 1. A traveling companion of Paul (Ac 19 29), possibly identical with Gaius of Derbe (Ac 20 4). 2. One of the two persons in Corinth whom Paul himself had baptized in addition to the household of Stephanas (I Co 1 14; see CRISPUS). 3. The person to whom III Jn is addressed. 4. Gaius "my host" (Ro 16 23). If Ro ch. 16 was written from Corinth, he is possibly to be identified with 2. J. M. T.

GALAL, gê′lal (גָּלָל, gālāl): The name of two post-exilic Levites (1. I Ch 9 15. 2. I Ch 9 16; Neh 11 17). E. E. N.

ANALYSIS OF CONTENTS

6. Bearing of Epistle on Paul's Work

The Epistle to the Galatians belongs to the group of practically undisputed letters of Paul (see CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE, § 1). In this group it holds a place of special importance because of the peculiarly large autobiographical element it possesses, which brings it into significant relation to the record of the Book of Acts.

1. Introductory.

It was written on the receipt of unexpected and disturbing news of a threatened defection of the readers from the Gospel preached to them by the Apostle (1 6 f., 3 1-4, 4 13-16, 5 7-9). The defection, while it was occasioned by teachings which aroused in the readers a spirit of pride and vainglory that stimulated them to feelings of jealousy and hostility within their own circle (5 13, 15, 26; cf. 5 6, 20, 6 1-5), practically united them in an attack upon the authority of Paul's apostleship as underlying the Gospel which he had preached (1 11-17, 2 6-10), and involved them in beliefs vitally different from those proclaimed to them, and consequently fatal to their Christian life (1 6 f., 3 1, 4 8-11, 19, 5 1-4). It was apparently written on a journey, and not from a city center (1 1 f.). The information on which it was based bears all the marks of having come to the Apostle not through general rumor, nor through official correspondence, but through a personal messenger (cf. 1 6-10, 3 1-5, 4 12-20, 5 1-15, 6 11-13). It was produced under the pressure of strong feeling (cf. 1 6-8, 11-17, 20, 3 1-5, 4 11-16, 19 f., 5 2-4, 11 f., 6 11 f. Note in contrast to Paul's other letters the absence from the greeting of any thanksgiving for the readers' spiritual life).

2. Circumstances of Writing.

At the same time, the order of its thought is simple. After the formal address (1 1-5), in which he seems to forecast the claim he is to make for himself (ver. 1), and the rebuke he is to administer to the churches (ver. 4), the Apostle passes at once to a consideration of the situation (1 6-10).

3. Order of Contents.

He states in language the plainness of which can not be misunderstood his astonished disappointment at the unreasonable and alarming course the readers are pursuing (vs. 6, 7a) and his unhesitating anathema upon the false teachers who were responsible for it (vs. 7b-9), justifying the solemnity of his condemnation by the disinterested motive involved in the language (ver. 10).

With this said, he takes up the personal element in the controversy and presents, in a detailed review of his life from his conversion to the period of the Jerusalem Council, a vindication of his apostolic authority (1 11–2 21). He begins this vindication with a solemn statement of the origin of his Gospel—that it had not come from man but from God (1 11 f.). In proof of this he calls to their mind the bitter zeal of his Jewish life (1 13 f.), in order that they might understand the significance of the change which had come over him in his conversion—a change which was due to nothing short of a Divine agency, and had for its purpose nothing less than the entrusting to him of this Gospel which he preached (1 15, 16a).

To this subjective experience he adds a statement of objective facts, showing not merely his independence of the Jerusalem Apostles subsequent to his conversion (1 16b-24), but the acknowledgment which these same Apostles made of the equality of his apostleship at the time of the Jerusalem Council (2 1-10)—an equality of which he was conscious enough to rebuke Peter himself, the head of that apostolic circle, for conduct inconsistent with the principles they all confessed (2 11-14). These facts gave evidence that his Gospel was of Divine and not of human origin; since with a human gospel he would have had no expectation of such action on the part of the other Apostles, and no justification for such action on his own part.

The circumstances in which this equality was acknowledged and this rebuke administered were all the more significant for Paul's argument, because the question before the Jerusalem Council had been the observance of the ceremonial law by the Gentile converts, as necessary to their admission into the Christian brotherhood—the very same matter as was being urged by the false teachers in Galatia (2 1 f.). As to this question Paul had had a conference with the Apostles at the time of the Council, and had taken strong ground against the compulsion of these converts to such observance (2 3-5), and had won the Apostles to his view (2 3, 6 f., 9 f.).

Peter's inconsistency had also to do with this same question. After his acknowledgment of Paul's position at the Council—that nothing should be required of the Gentiles as a condition of salvation and, therefore, of church-membership, beyond faith in Jesus Christ (cf. Ac 15 7b-11), he had so turned against the Gentile converts at Antioch as practically to deny them Christian fellowship, because of their unceremonial observances (2 11-13). In his rebuke of this Apostle, which, of course, we do not have here fully reproduced, Paul presents the principle of justification by faith in such a way as to show that Peter could not be logically true to it and act as he had done (2 15-21). This closes the personal discussion of the situation and leads the way to the more purely doctrinal discussion (chs. 3 and 4).

This discussion is opened with a renewed statement of his astonished disappointment at the course the readers are pursuing (3 1-4), in which he confronts them with the inconsistency it showed with all their previous experience (vs. 3, 4a), though he hints at the hope that this experience may yet assert itself (ver. 4b).

He then proceeds to place before them the mutually exclusive principles of the Gospel of faith, which they had received and accepted, and the gospel of works, which they were now following (3 5–4 31). He reminds them (1) that Abraham, to whom the false teachers harked back, as the father of circumcision and the representative of the covenant of the Messianic promises, was justified not by works, but by trust in God; so that they who lived by faith were the true children of Abraham, and the real recipients of the promises (3 6-9); for they who live by works must keep the whole Law, and this has never been possible in the sight of God, since the only basis on which God ever justifies man is faith and the Law is not something toward which faith can be exercised (3 10-12). (2) That Christ had redeemed man from the penalty consequent upon his failure to keep the Law, in order that, instead of the fruitlessness of works, man might receive the promised blessings through faith (3 13 f.). (3) That, if it be claimed that the promises to Abraham were superseded by the Mosaic Law (3 15-17), it must be remembered (a) that the promises were of the nature of a covenant (3 15 f.); so that the Law, though subsequent to them, could not annul them (3 17 f.)—in fact, if it could, it would invalidate the very principle on which they were given, which was one of free promise received in trust, and not of earned reward for obedience to law (3 18) and (b) that the Law was given, not to supersede the promises, but by showing man his inability to keep its commands to bring him, through a consciousness of his spiritual helplessness, to faith in Christ (3 19 f.); so that the Law makes possible a realization of the promises through bringing man to an appreciation of the need of faith (3 21-29).

This presentation of the relation of the principles of faith and works is then illustrated from the position of an heir under the Roman law (4 1-7). This brings the Apostle to still another statement of his disappointment at the readers' present course (4 8-20), in which he recalls to them his enthusiasm for his Gospel, and their personal attachment to himself when he first preached to them (4 13-16), appealing to them through an allegorical presentation of the superiority of the covenant of the promise to appreciate the blessings which belonged to them through faith (4 21-31).

Upon this follows the practical portion of the Epistle, beginning with an exhortation to stand fast in their liberty from the bondage of the Law (5 1-12), and then proceeding, through an elaboration of what this idea of liberty should mean to their living (5 13-26), to a group of admonitions regarding their fellowship and service within the Christian brotherhood (6 1-10), closing with a final restatement of the Apostle's position (6 11-15), and the benedictory remarks (6 16-18).

4. Composition and Location of the Churches.

The churches to which this burning remonstrance was addressed must have had a definite Jewish element within their membership in order to give the false teachers a point of contact for their ceremonial propaganda; although the previous nature-religion of the Gentile majority, through its ascetic tendencies, had left them open to the legalism it enjoined (4 8-10).

Where in Asia Minor these churches were located has been a question of much debate—the accepted view, up to recent times, being that they belonged to that northern portion of the large Roman province of Galatia known as Galatia proper. As long ago, however, as the close of the 18th cent. it was suggested that they may have been the churches of Paul's first mission tour, since those were within the Galatian province. See Map of the Pauline World.

In the last decade this suggestion has gained in favor, largely through its strong advocacy by Ramsay (1893), and is now the widely accepted opinion of scholars. It has many arguments in its favor—chiefly (1) that it allows one of Paul's most important letters to go to churches whose founding is given us in detail in Ac, and whose situation near Syria not only opened them to just such a Jewish propaganda as this letter contests, but makes such an agitation almost inevitable, in view of the fact that it was the Gentile success of Paul's first mission among these churches which caused in Antioch the outbreak of the whole controversy (cf. Ac 15 1 ff.). No mention is made in Ac of the founding of churches in Galatia proper; while such churches as may have been there in Paul's time must have been too remote from Syria to be in vital contact with any such specifically Jewish movement as this crusade for ceremonialism. (2) That it will account for several references in the letter which otherwise would be obscure, e.g., Paul's repeated mention of Barnabas (2 1, 9, 13), who had been with him on his first mission tour only (cf. Ac ch. 13 f., 15 36-41), Paul's reference to his reception by the readers as an angel ('messenger') of God (4 14; cf. Ac 14 11-14), Paul's complaint that, though he is charged with preaching circumcision, he is still persecuted by those who advocate this rite (5 11; cf. Ac 16 1-3), the attention Paul calls to the marks of Jesus, which he bears branded on his body (6 17; cf. Ac 14 19 f.).

With this location of the churches it would seem that the Epistle must have been written as late as the latter part of Paul's second mission tour; since he evidently had visited the leaders at least twice before sending them the letter. (Note the difference in the attitude of the readers in 4 13-15 and 1 9, implying two visits.) It has been assigned, accordingly, to the time of Paul's first visit to Corinth, when the Thessalonian Epistles were written (Zahn), and even as late as to the time of his return visit to Antioch in Syria, between his second and third mission tours (Ramsay).

5. Date.

Apart, however, from the fact that it was written while the Apostle was on a journey, accompanied by traveling companions, and not while he was in some city center, the guest of the local church (see above, § 2), it is clear from the general similarity of the situation in Corinth when II Co was written to the situation in Galatia (see CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE, § 13, and above, § 2), that the absence of all warning in II Co (especially chs. 10–13) to the doctrinal possibilities of the Judaizing movement can not be adequately explained, if Paul had already experienced the severity of the Galatian defection.

If one reads Paul's appeal in II Co 11 2-4, where he says "If he that cometh preacheth another Jesus, whom we did not preach, or if ye receive a different spirit, which ye did not receive, or a different gospel, which ye did not accept, ye do well to bear with him," one will receive the impression that it is almost devoid of any suspicion of the doctrinal possibilities of the movement. In fact, it is not much beyond what he had said in I Co 3 11, where he reminds his readers, as he had reminded Apollos and himself, that no man's work would abide, unless it was founded on Jesus Christ and the gospel truth which He had revealed. It is something very different when he says in Gal 1 8, "Though we or an angel from heaven should preach unto you any gospel other than that which we preached unto you, let him be anathema." It is hard to explain such mildness to the Corinthians, if he had gone through the bitterness of such an experience as he had with the Galatians. And it is equally clear if, at the time I Co was written, circumcision was before the people in any way whatever (as it would appear to have been from I Co 7 18 f.), that it is impossible to understand why no hint was made regarding its doctrinal significance, if Paul had behind him as he wrote the great truths brought out by the Galatian controversy. The reference which Paul makes to circumcision in I Co 7 18 f. is purely general. "Was any man called being circumcised? let him not become uncircumcised. Hath any been called in uncircumcision? let him not be circumcised. Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing; but the keeping of the commandments of God." It is simply a statement of the duty of contentment with one's condition. It is another thing, however, when he uses much this same expression in Gal 5 6 and 6 15; for he will have the Galatians understand that circumcision has been put before them as a substitute for Christ. "Behold I Paul say unto you, that, if ye receive circumcision, Christ will profit you nothing. Yea, I testify again to every man that receiveth circumcision, that he is a debtor to do the whole law" (5 2 f.; cf. also 6 12-14). It is difficult to account for the light and easy treatment of circumcision with the Corinthians, if he had already been taught by the Galatians the fatal significance it could have in the life of the soul. All this is confirmed by the fact that, although there was no Judaizing movement at all in Rome, the Epistle to that church shows that the doctrinal impressions of the Galatian discussion were still strong in Paul's mind when he wrote that letter. (Note the doctrinal treatment of circumcision in Ro 2 25-29, 4 9-17, which would be quite natural, if Galatians had just preceded Romans.) It is but reasonable to suppose that these impressions must have been equally strong when Paul wrote to the Corinthians, if Gal had just preceded the letter to them. Recognizing the fact of development in Paul's formulating of his doctrinal ideas and the continuity of thought involved in such development, Epistles so similar in doctrinal thought as Ro and Gal are not likely to have been separated by Epistles so dissimilar to either as I and II Co.

Taking all things into consideration, the writing of Gal is best assigned to that part of Paul's journey from Ephesus to Corinth which he spent possibly in Epirus (cf. Ro 15 19), after his last letter to the Corinthian church—or to the fall of 56 A.D.

6. Bearing of Epistle on Paul's Work.

The early apostolic Church was wholly Jewish in its membership. It was, therefore, naturally Jewish in the spirit of its worship and its thought, and Jewish in the purpose of its evangel. It considered the religion of Jesus as the vital outcome of Judaism, to which, in form, it still belonged, and which it aimed simply to reform up to this new standard of the Gospel. Theoretically this was right, but practically it involved the spirit of the old exclusivism by which all Gentilism was to come into the new religion by way of Judaism. Consequently when Paul appeared with his commission to the Gentiles the Church accepted him, not foreseeing what his work implied (cf. Ac 9 26-29). The startling results of his first mission tour, however, made this vividly real, and the controversy regarding the admission of Gentiles without circumcision became a necessary issue (cf. Ac 14 25–15 1, 3-5).

This controversy was joined first at Antioch, carried up to Jerusalem for decision, and settled there by compromise (Ac 15 1-21)—the principle of salvation by faith being admitted, but the racial lines and prejudices of Judaism being recognized (Ac 15 7-11). But being a compromise, it did not settle the dispute—in fact, accepting as it did a duality of life and thought inside the Church, it made further dispute inevitable, and rendered certain that, within the regions near Jerusalem and Syria in which Paul's Gentile work was being carried on, this dispute would become a Judaizing propaganda against his ministry. It is to contest this propaganda that Gal was written—showing us the first stage in the practical working out of the religious dualism within the Apostolic Church. (See CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE, § 13.)

GALILEE, SEA OF (also called Lake Gennesaret [Lk 5 1, originally Γεννησάρ, I Mac 11 67], and Sea of Tiberias [Jn 6 1, 21 1]; in the O T Sea of Chinnereth [Nu 34 11; Jos 13 27] and Chinneroth [Jos 12 3]. In I K 15 20 [Cinneroth AV] the term is evidently used of the plain of Gennesaret, and not of the sea): The largest fresh-water lake of Palestine, being 13 m. from N. to S. and somewhat less than 7 m. from E. to W., at its widest part. Its shape is in general that of an irregular pear, its depth less than 200 ft. and its surface 681 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean. The river Jordan enters it at the extreme NE. and issues from it at the extreme SW., at a point much lower, as shown by the cataract-like aspect of the water at this point. It constitutes a bright, light-blue body of water, which on account of the low level is generally warmer than similar bodies in other parts of the world. Its temperature ranges from 69° on the surface to 59° at a depth of 65 ft. and lower. It is located in a volcanic region, the mountains on the E. and the country on the N. being full of lava formations and basalt rocks. The hot springs at Tiberias, which always have been and are to the present day famous for their medicinal qualities, and the frequent earthquakes show that the voleanic forces in this region are not yet exhausted.

GALEED, gal'ę-ed (גַּלְעֵד, gal'ēdh), 'witness-pile': The name given by Jacob to a pile of stones, raised as a "witness" to the compact between himself and Laban (Gn 31 47, 48). Apparently intended as an explanation of the word Gilead (cf. the witness-altar of Jos 22 34). C. S. T.

GALILEE, GALILEAN. See PALESTINE, § 36.

The scenery about the lake does not lack in variety, as the sky-line never runs on a dead level for any distance, but either rises, as in the E., with the steep mountains, or sinks to the very level of the shore, as in the NW., where the water imperceptibly passes into the plain of Gennesaret, and thence slopes up to the hills of Galilee. The only feature needed to put it on an equality with the most beautiful landscape in the world is that of thick woods on at least a portion of the highlands around.

The waters of the lake are noted for abundant fish. The industry of fishing was accordingly one of the most stable resources of the country round about. Clear evidences of this are to be found in the names of the cities Bethsaida ('house of fish') at the N. end of the lake, and Tarichœa (from ταριχεύειν, 'to cure for purposes of preservation') at the S. end. Several varieties of Galilean fish were regarded as choice, and it was claimed that they were the same as those found in the waters of the Nile. See PALESTINE, § 26. Jesus called His disciples from among those engaged in this industry. He also made use in His parables of the methods of fishermen (Mt 13 47, 48).

Another feature of the Sea of Galilee is its susceptibility to sudden storms. These are occasioned partly by its lying so much lower than the surrounding table-land (a fact that creates a difference of temperature and consequent disturbances in the atmosphere), and partly by the rushing of gusts of wind down the Jordan valley from the heights of Hermon. The event recorded in Mt 8 24 is no extraordinary case. Those who ply boats on the lake are obliged to exercise great care to avoid peril from such storms.

The shores of the Sea of Galilee as well as the lake itself were the scenes of many of the most remarkable events recorded in the Gospels, such as the feeding of the 5,000 (Mt 14 13 and ||s).

GALL: Two different conceptions are represented by the words which EV translates "gall." (a) merōrāh, or merērāh, lit. 'bitterness' (Job 13 26; Dt 32 32), is used for the bile (Job 16 13), the human gall-bladder (Job 20 25), and the venom of serpents (Job 20 14). (b) rō'sh, the name of a quick-growing weed (Hos 10 4, "hemlock"), which bore berries (Dt 32 32) and was coupled with wormwood (q.v.), as a type of bitterness (Dt 29 18; La 3 19; Am 6 12). Hence the word is twice used for the 'poison' of serpents (Dt 32 33; Job 20 16). The plant indicated is probably the poppy, which grows abundantly in Palestine, and whose capsules might well give rise to the name rō'sh ('head'). The "water of gall" (Jer 8 14, 9 15, 23 15) was apparently a decoction of poppy-heads, rather than the opium drug itself. In the N T, "gall" (χολή) seems to indicate rō'sh, especially in Mt 27 34, which is influenced by Ps 69 21. Many scholars however, explain χολή as signifying in Hellenistic usage any kind of bitter liquid, including myrrh (cf. Mk 15 23).

L. G. L.

GALLANT SHIP: An expression found in Is 33 21 where the prophet, in comparing the New Jerusalem to a great city, naturally used illustrations drawn from the large commercial cities on the Nile or Euphrates with their well-appointed ships and boats (see also SHIPS AND NAVIGATION). The Heb. word rendered "gallant" is 'addīr, 'large,' 'mighty,' 'glorious.'

E. E. N.

GALLERY: (1) In Song 7 6 this is AV rendering of rahaṭ, a word of uncertain meaning, for which RV gives "tresses." (2) For other occurrences see TEMPLE, § 25.

E. E. N.

GALLEY. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

GALLIM, gal'im (גַּלִּים, gallīm), 'stone heaps': A place in Benjamin, the home of Paltiel, Michal's second husband (I S 25 44), also mentioned in Is 10 30 as not far from Gibeah of Saul. The name may be only a shortened form of Gilgal. Site uncertain.

E. E. N.

GALLIO, gal'i-o, Γαλλίων: The adopted name of Marcus Annæus Novatus, son of M. Annæus Seneca of Cordova in Spain, brother of the philosopher L. Annæus Seneca, and uncle of the poet Lucan. He was a man of fine character and culture, was proconsul of Achaia during Paul's first visit to Corinth (after 49 A.D.), and fell a victim to Nero's cruelty in 66 A.D. His decision in Acts was significant, because, if Paul's preaching concerned Jewish religious belief and practise—as Gallio evidently thought it did—it showed that he as Roman governor would not interfere, and that in other respects he saw nothing in it that conflicted with Roman law (Ac 18 12-17).

GALLOWS. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (a).

GAMALIEL, ga-mê'li-el (גַּמְלִיאֵל, gamlī'ēl, Gr. Γαμαλιήλ), 'reward of God': 1. A son of Pedahzur, a prince of Manasseh (Nu 1 10, 2 20, etc.), in charge of a section of the census in the wilderness (Nu 10 23). 2. A rabbi in the Apostolic Age (to be distinguished from a later one of the same name), a grandson of the renowned Hillel, a student of Greek literature and a leader of the liberal school of Pharisees. According to Ac 22 3, Paul was a student under him. G. is also noted for the counsel which moved the Sanhedrin not to molest the first preachers of Christianity (Ac 5 34 ff.). An untrustworthy Christian tradition (Clem. Recog., I, 65) represents him as a convert to the new faith. By the Jews he was regarded as the first of the seven great 'Rabbans' (preeminent rabbis).

A. C. Z.

GAMMADIM, gam'a-dim (גַּמָּדִים, gammādhīm): The context in Ezk 27 11 seems to require that this word should be interpreted as the name of a people. The ARV "valorous men" has little to commend it. No satisfactory identification has yet been suggested. Evidently a people near Tyre was meant, possibly the Kumidi of the Amarna letters.

E. E. N.

GAMUL, gê'mul (גָּמוּל, gāmūl): The ancestral head of the 22d course of priests (I Ch 24 17).

GARDEN. See EDEN, and PALESTINE, § 23.

GARDENS, THE KINGS'. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

GAREB, gê'reb (גָּרֵב, gārēbh): I. One of David's chiefs (II S 23 38; I Ch 11 40), said to be a member of the Ithrite family of Kiriath-jearim (cf. I Ch 2 53). It is probable, however, that the Heb. text should be vocalized so as to read "the Jattirite," i.e., an inhabitant of Jattir (cf. I S 30 27). II. An unidentified hill near Jerusalem (Jer 31 39).

L. G. L.

GARLANDS: The rendering of the Gr. στέμματα, which occurs but once in the N T (Ac 14 13). The reference is to the wreaths used in heathen sacrifices. They were ordinarily made of the leaves and flowers of such trees or plants as were most acceptable to the divinity to whom the sacrifice was to be offered. If the phrase ταύρους καὶ στέμματα is a hendiadys for ταύρους ἐστεμμένους, then they are to be understood as adorning only the victims; otherwise they may have been intended for the ministering priests and such temporary altars as they may have planned to erect, if, as is probable, the sacrifice was to be offered before the gates of the city, or the house, within which were the acclaimed divinities, and thus apart from the temple building itself. In fact, as the custom was to place them on the statue of the divinity before sacrificing to it, they may have been intended even for the Apostles themselves. See also DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8. M. W. J.

GARLIC. See FOOD, § 3, and PALESTINE, § 23.

GARMENT. See in general DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, and PRIESTHOOD, § 9 b.

GARMITE, gār'mait (גַּרְמִי, garmī): A gentilic name found only in I Ch 4 19. Its significance is unknown. E. E. N.

GARRISON: The proper Heb. term for 'garrison' is matstsābh (fem. matstsābhāh, in I S 14 12), which is so rendered in both RV and AV (I S 13 23, 14 1, 4, 6, 11, 15; II S 23 14). In other passages, where the Heb. is nᵉtsībh, 'pillar,' or 'governor' (I S 10 5, 13 3 f.; II S 8 6, 14; I Ch 11 16, 18 13; II Ch 17 2), RV has retained the AV rendering "garrison," which should be changed, probably, to 'governor' (except in I Ch 11 16). In Ezk 26 11 "pillars" RV, and in II Co 11 32 "guarded" RV, are the correct renderings. E. E. N.

GASHMU, gash'miu. See GESHEM.

GATAM, gê'tam (גָּעְתָּם, ga'tām): A "duke," i.e., 'chief,' of Edom (Gn 36 11, 16). E. E. N.

GATE. See CITY, § 3; WISE MEN; TEMPLE, § 8; and JERUSALEM, passim.

GATH (גַּת, gath), 'wine-press'; gentilic, Gittite (II S 6 10): One of the five cities of the Philistines (II S 1 20). It is first mentioned as a place where Anakim were still living at the time of Joshua (Jos 11 22). The Ark of the Covenant was held here for a time (I S 5 8). It is also known as the residence of two Philistines, i.e., Goliath, the gigantic champion whom David slew (I S 17 4 ff.), and Achish, its king, with whom David later took refuge (I S 21 10 ff.). Still later, David captured and reduced it to subjection (II S 8 1; cf. I Ch 18 1). Rehoboam fortified it (II Ch 11 8); but in the days of Uzziah it appears to have regained its status as an independent Philistine city (II Ch 26 6). In the wars of Syria against Judah, it was seized by Hazael as a preliminary step to an attack on Jerusalem (II K 12 17). From Am 6 2 it has been inferred that it was taken by Sargon in 711. Its name is to be recognized as the Gintu Asdudim of that monarch's inscription (cf. Schrader, COT, II, p. 143). In the Onom. Sac. it is located 5 Roman m. from Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin) in the direction of Diospolis (Lydda), which would point to the modern Dikkerin, a village with ancient ruins that might possibly be those of a city like Gath. But according to modern explorers a more probable site is Tell-es Safiyeh, 10 m. SE. of Ekron and 10 m. E. of Ashdod (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, pp. 194–195). See Map I, C 9. A. C. Z.

GATHERED TO ONE'S FATHERS. See BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, §§ 3–6, and ESCHATOLOGY, § 17 f.).

GATH-HEPHER, gath-hî'fẹr (גַּת הַחֵפֶר, gath ha-ḥēpher): The residence of Jonah, son of Amittai (Jos 19 13; II K 14 25), by mistake made into Gittah-hepher in AV of Jos 19 13. The modern site is El-Meshed, about 3 m. NE. of Nazareth and 2 m. SW of Sepphoris, where a tomb of the prophet Jonah is shown. Map IV, C 7. A. C. Z.

GATH-RIMMON, -rim'ọn (גַּת רִמּוֹן, gath rimmōn). 1. A Levitical city situated in the territory of Dan (Jos 19 45, 21 24). Its exact site is not identifiable, but it must have lain near and somewhat E. of Joppa. 2. Another Levitical Gath-rimmon is mentioned in Jos 21 25 as in the half-tribe of Manasseh; but in I Ch 6 69 the corresponding description reads "Bileam" and "Gath-rimmon" and is probably a textual corruption of this form (possibly Ibleam). A. C. Z.

GAULANITIS, gō"a-nai'tis (Γαυλανῖτις, the modern Jaulan): One of the provinces in the tetrarchy of Philip (Lk 3 1; cf. Jos. Ant. VIII, 1), bounded by the Jordan on the W., the Jarmuk on the S., and the Hermon on the N., with an uncertain line on the E., perhaps the river 'Allan (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 541, and Schumacher, The Jaulan (1888). See also GOLAN. A. C. Z.

GAZA, gê'za (עַזָּה, 'azzāh), also Azzah (Dt 2 23 AV), gentilic, Gazites and Gazathites (Jos 13 3 AV): The southernmost of the five principal cities of the Philistines (II K 18 8), and in general a conventional territorial limit in the S., e.g., of the country of the Canaanites (Gn 10 19 [J]), of the conquest of Joshua (Jos 10 41), of the realm of the Avvim (Dt 2 23) and of the empire of Solomon (I K 4 24). Map II, A 2. It was an important city as early as the days of Rameses II, in whose lists its name occurs (Rec. of the Past, 2d ser., VI, pp. 27, 41). In the distribution of the land by Joshua it was assigned to Judah (Jos 15 47), but never possessed. It was fortified, for it had gates (Jg 16 3), and possessed a temple of Dagon (Jg 16 23 ff.). Its location on the high-road between Egypt and Mesopotamia brought it into relations with the Assyrians. Tiglath-pileser III subjugated its king Hanno in 734. It rebelled, but was again conquered by Sennacherib (701) and Esarhaddon (676); cf. Schrader, COT, I, pp. 91, 149, 247. A. C. Z.

GAZELLE. See PALESTINE, § 24, and FOOD, § 10.

GAZER, gê'zẹr. See GEZER.

GAZEZ, gê'zez (גָּזֵז, gāzēz): The name of two individuals, both Calebites (I Ch 2 46), though there may be a textual error in the verse. E. E. N.

GAZZAM, gaz'ụm (גַּזָּם, gazzām): The "sons of Gazzam" were a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 48; Neh 7 51). E. E. N.

GEAR. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

GEBA, gî'bạ (גֶּבַע, geba', in pause gāba', whence the AV Gaba), 'hill': 1. A Levitical city on the N. border of Benjamin (Jos 21 17; cf. II K 23 8, "from Geba to Beer-sheba"), and on the opposite side of the valley from Michmash (I S 14 5). It is to be distinguished from the neighboring Gibeah (Is 10 29); but the similarity of the names (without vowel-points gb', gb'h) has caused some confusion in the Heb. text. (See the marginal notes on Jg 20 10, 33 ARV, and I S 13 16 AV. In these passages the AV rendering is preferable.) See GIBEAH, 2. In II S 5 25 "Geba" should be "Gibeon" (so LXX., I Ch 14 16, and Is 28 21). Geba is certainly the modern Jeba', a small village conspicuously situated on the S. side of the Wâdy es-Suweinît, opposite Michmash. Map III, F 5. 2 (Γαιβαί, Jth 3 10). Probably Jeba', a village 4 m. NE. of Samaria. Map III, F 3. L. G. L.

GEBAL, gî'bal (גְּבָל, gebhal): 1. The Heb. name of the very ancient Phœnician city Byblus, situated on the coast 20 m. N. of Beirut. The O T locates the land of the Gebalites, or Giblites, correctly near Lebanon (Jos 13 5). Gebal furnished stone-masons for Solomon. (Instead of "stone-squarers" AV read "Gebalites" RV, I K 5 18.) According to Ezk 27 9 it was the headquarters of shipbuilders. In cuneiform literature it is known as Gubal, or Gubli. 2. The northern portion of Edom which is now known as Jebâl (Ps 83 7). J. A. K.

GEBER, gî'bẹr (גֶּבֶר, gebher), 'man,' 'mighty man': One of twelve officers of Solomon in charge of his commissariat (I K 4 19). His district, E. of the Jordan and S. of those mentioned in vs. 13 and 14, was somewhere between the Jabbok and the Arnon. C. S. T.

GEBIM, gî'bim (גֵּבִים, gēbhīm), 'cisterns': A place between Madmenah and Nob, and not far N. of Jerusalem (Is 10 31). Not identified. E. E. N.

GECKO. See PALESTINE, § 26.

GEDALIAH, ged"a-lai'ā (גְּדַלְיָהוּ, gᵉdhalyāhū), 'J" is great': 1. A son of Ahikam and grandson of Shaphan, the secretary of King Josiah, appointed by Nebuchadrezzar as governor of those left in the land after the fall of Jerusalem (II K 25 22 f.), and assassinated by Ishmael (Jer 41 18). 2. One of the sons of Jeduthun (I Ch 25 3, 9). 3. A son of Hezekiah and grandfather of Zephaniah (Zeph 1 1). 4. A son of Pashhur, a ruler who consigned Jeremiah to prison (Jer 38 1). 5. A priest who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 18). A. C. Z.

GEDER, gî'dẹr (גֶּדֶר, gedher), 'wall': A Canaanite royal city, the same as Beth-gader (Jos 12 13). Site unknown. Gederite, an inhabitant of Geder (I Ch 27 28). E. E. N.

GEDERAH, gẹ-dî'rā (גְּדֵרָה, gᵉdhērāh), 'a walled place' (usually 'a sheepfold'): A town in the lowlands of Judah (Jos 15 36). See Map II, D 1. Identification uncertain. The inhabitants were called Gederathites (I Ch 12 4). See also RV at I Ch 4 23. E. E. N.

GEDEROTH, gẹ-dî'roth (גְּדֵרוֹת, gᵉdhērōth), 'walled places' (or 'sheepfolds'): A town of Judah (Jos 15 41; II Ch 28 18). See Map II, C 1. Identification uncertain. E. E. N.

GEDEROTHAIM, gẹ-dî"ro-thê'im (גְּדֵרֹתַיִם, gᵉdhērōthayim), 'place of enclosures': One of 14 towns in the Shephelah of Judah (Jos 15 36). Perhaps an error through dittography for the preceding name Gederah, as there are 14 without it. LXX. translates "its enclosures." C. S. T.

GEDOR, gî'dōr (גְּדוֹר, gᵉdhōr), 'wall': I. 1. A Benjamite ancestor of Saul (I Ch 8 31, 9 37). 2. A family in Judah (I Ch 4 4, 18. See II, 1). II. 1. A town in Judah, now Jedur (Jos 15 58), Map II, E 2. 2. The home of Jeroham, in Benjamin (I Ch 12 7), possibly the same as 1. 3. For "Gedor" (I Ch 4 39), read with LXX. "Gerar," a town of Simeon in the extreme S. of Judah. Map II, A 3. C. S. T.

GE-HARASHIM, gî"ha-rê'shim (גֵּיא חֲרָשִׁים, gē' ḥărāshīm), 'valley of the smiths'; "valley of Charashim" (I Ch 4 14 AV): In Neh 11 35 the same Heb. term is rendered "valley of craftsmen." The words are not free from suspicion, but as they stand they mean that in a certain valley near Lod and Ono were the works of a gild of smiths. E. E. N.

GEHAZI, gẹ-hê'zai (גֵּיחֲזִי, gēḥăzī), 'valley of vision': The servant of the prophet Elisha, II K chs. 4–8. In ch. 4 G. appears in a favorable light, sympathetic with the Shunamite woman, because she was childless (ver. 14), and at the same time jealous of his master's honor (ver. 27). But in ch. 5 he is described as covetous and untruthful, and as punished with the leprosy of Naaman. After this we are surprised to find him, in 8 4 f., talking freely with the king of Israel, to whom he is recounting the deeds of Elisha (as though the prophet were then dead). The stories have evidently been gathered from different sources, and no attempt has been made to render them perfectly harmonious. See also ELISHA. E. E. N.

GEHENNA. See JERUSALEM, § 6, and ESCHATOLOGY, § 30.

GELILOTH, gę-lai'leth (גְּלִילוֹת, gᵉlīlōth), 'circles,' i.e., 'stone circles' or, more broadly, 'districts': A place in the boundary of Benjamin (Jos 18 17) called Gilgal in 15 7. It was between Jerusalem and the Jordan, not far from the ascent of Adummim (q.v.), but is still unidentified.

E. E. N.

GEMALLI, gę-mal'ai (גְּמַלִּי, gᵉmallī): One of the twelve spies (Nu 13 12). E. E. N.

GEMARIAH, gem''a-rai'ā (גְּמַרְיָה, gᵉmaryāh), 'J" accomplishes': 1. A noble of Judah, in the days of Jehoiakim, apparently somewhat favorably disposed toward Jeremiah (Jer 36 10-12, 25). 2. A son of Hilkiah, sent to Babylon by Zedekiah and the bearer of a letter from Jeremiah to the Jewish captives there (Jer 29 3). E. E. N.

GEMS: This term is found only in Pr 26 8 ERV where the Heb. is 'ebhen, 'stone.' While a jewel or precious stone may be meant, and would make good sense, both AV and ARV correctly render the word "stone," avoiding all inferences. E. E. N.

6. The Levitical and Priestly Genealogies

Zeal in establishing and recording genealogies is promoted by anything which connects privilege with the establishment of descent. For example, the remarkable genealogical records of the Arabs, which in many respects are a most suggestive parallel study to that of the Jewish genealogies, appear to owe their character and extent to the method introduced by the Calif Omar I of distributing the spoil taken from the infidels so that certain classes of the believers and their children received a larger share than other Arabs. In the circumstances of the Exile and the Return we find a sufficient cause, if not for the creation, yet certainly for great extension of genealogical zeal among the Jews. So long as the Jews were in their own land, actual possession of the patrimony and discharge of the duties connected therewith may frequently have served as sufficient proof of the inclusion of the owners in the Jewish nation; but divorced from their land they needed other proofs of their descent, if, in the Exile, they were to look forward to, or at the Return were to claim with confidence reinstatement in what were then to rank as the full privileges of Jews by descent. Thus we find Ezekiel, at the beginning of the Exile, making allusion to written registers, when he says of the false prophets that "they shall not be in the council of my [J"s] people, or be written in the writing [register, mg.] of the house of Israel, neither shall they enter into the land of Israel" (Ezk 13 9). And in the list of those who returned from the Exile we find certain families mentioned who were unable to show 'their fathers' houses and their pedigrees' (zar'ām, Neh 7 61). What loss of privilege befell these secular families is not specified, but of certain priestly families in like case it is related that "these sought their register among those who were reckoned by genealogy,[1] but it was not found: therefore were they deemed polluted and put from the priesthood. And the governor ['Tirshatha'] said unto them that they should not eat of the most holy things [i.e., exercise the privileges of priests; cf., e.g., Nu 18 9-11] till there stood up a priest with Urim and Thummim" (Neh 7 64-65), i.e., till the doubt left by the defectiveness of the family register could be determined by the sacred lot. The exclusive policy of Ezra, involving as it did the illegitimacy of marriages between Jews and those who were not Jews, must also have stimulated genealogical research and record. This cause, too, or anything corresponding to it, was absent in earlier times, for intermarriages had then been recognized and frequent.

1. Reasons for Genealogical Records.

We can scarcely be wrong, then, in concluding that genealogies were kept much more regularly after the Exile than before. Indeed, if we ask how early and how direct is the evidence for genealogies, in particular for uninterrupted genealogies of individuals, recorded in writing before the Exile, it must be admitted that it is relatively late and indirect. The laws of Dt 23 2-8 (7th cent. B.C.) perhaps presuppose, and would certainly require for their satisfactory fulfilment, such records; while the narrative of the census in II S ch 24, and such allusions as those in Ex 32 32, Jer 22 30 may point, if not to actual genealogical records, to records from which genealogies might be constructed.

2. Genealogical Records Before the Exile.

A certain form of genealogical knowledge was in any case doubtless prevalent in early Israel. It must be remembered that by their social organization the Israelites consisted of a number of tribes, these tribes of a number of clans, these clans of a number of houses or families, the family even being a more complex group than the family (in its more restricted sense of a man, his wife, and their children) is with us. Thus when we read in a relatively early passage (Jos 7 16, 17 JE) that "Joshua brought Israel near by their tribes; and the tribe of Judah was taken. And he brought near the family ('clan') of Judah; and he took the family of Zerahites; and he brought near the family of the Zerahites, man by man; and Zabdi was taken: and he brought near his household, man by man; and Achan, the son of Carmi, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, was taken,"[2] we can see that Judah was one of many tribes constituting Israel, Zerah one of many clans constituting Judah, Zabdi one of many families constituting Zerah, and Achan, himself the father of a family, one of many individuals belonging to different families (in our restricted sense of the term) that constituted the family of Zabdi (cf. also I S 10 21). Now we may well believe that in early Israel a man could commonly have given the name of his family, clan, or tribe, and moreover many or all of the families that constituted his clan, and of the clans that made up his tribe. And early records of the names of these tribal divisions may well have been kept in records made for various purposes. But this is a very different matter from genealogies of individuals carried upward through many generations.

[1] The verb rendered "reckoned by genealogy" (hithyāhēsh) and the noun from which it is formed (yāḥash, Neh 7 5 only) are confined to the books of Ch, Ezr, and Neh. The origin and primitive meaning of these words are obscure and their sense is to be determined entirely from the passages where they occur (I Ch 4 33, 5 1, 7, 17, 7 5, 7, 9, 40, 9 1, 22; II Ch 12 15, 31 16, 17, 19; Ezr 2 62 = Neh 7 64; Ezr 8 1, 3; Neh 7 5).

Whatever we may infer as to early periods, it is certain that of the genealogical material preserved in the O T by far the greater part is found in works of post-exilic origin—in the Priestly Code (P), in Ch, Ezr, Neh. In pre-exilic writings it is rare to find an individual identified more closely than by reference to his father: in some cases, especially in the Book of Jeremiah, the name of the grandfather is also given; but it is altogether exceptional (and probably due to the kingly position of the last-named ancestor) that the prophet Zephaniah's ancestors are given (Zeph 1 1) to the fourth generation before him. Contrast with this the lengthy genealogies with which Ezra (Ezr 7 1), Tobit (To 1 1), and Judith (Jth 8 1) are provided. But though the genealogical material is found mainly in the later literature, much of it relates to far earlier periods; the genealogies of P end with the Mosaic Age, those of I Ch chs. 1–9 (mainly, if not exclusively, apart from interpolated sections) are apparently intended [1] not to descend below the age of David (cf. 4 31, 7 2). If, then, these genealogies are throughout genuine, the custom of carefully registering tribal, clan, and family divisions and, in some cases, lengthy lines of the descent of individuals must have been widely prevalent far earlier than the direct evidence would suggest. There thus emerge important questions: with what degree of trustworthiness should the O T genealogies be credited? Are many or any of them artificial constructions resting less on fact than on imagination and theory? Or are the genealogies, even when genuine and accurate tables of relations, referred to the correct period?

Before attempting to give the very brief answers, which will alone be possible here, to these questions, it will be well to consider the language of the genealogies. For we shall thus see that a number of the O T genealogies are not intended to be and consequently must not be criticized as tables showing the descent of individuals; they are modes of describing the relations between tribes, clans, families, and places. It is not always easy to decide to which type particular genealogies were originally intended to belong; again, it is not improbable that descriptions once intended in the one sense came to be taken in the other. But these difficulties will be lessened if we approach the genealogies by a study of certain linguistic usages of the Hebrews, and, in particular, two: (1) Terms of kinship, more particularly the term 'son,' are used to cover other relations than those occasioned by physical descent. What we should term membership in a gild is in Hebrew 'sonship'; a member of the gild of the perfumers is a "son of the apothecaries" (cf. Neh 3 8 AV; RV paraphrastically "one of the perfumers"); members of prophetic societies, or gilds of porters, are respectively "sons of the prophets," or "children [sons] of the porters" (Ezr 2 42); the Jews as exiled are termed collectively hag-gōlāh, 'the company of exiles' (Ezk 1 1; Jer 28 6; Ezr 10 8, etc.), or b'nê hag-gōlāh, "children of the captivity" (Ezr 4 1; etc.). Nor is this usage to be explained by the descent of calling, or profession, from father to son; for this would not explain why a single perfumer is a son of the perfumers (plural), nor such a closely allied phrase as 'sons of the troop' ("men of the army," II Ch 25 13 RV), with which we may compare the expression "sons of the caravans" in the Aramaic of Palmyra, or even the N T "sons of the bride-chamber." Various other relations are also expressed by the term 'son'; hostages are 'sons of pledges' (II K 14 14), valiant men 'sons of might' (II S 2 7); cf. the N T "sons of thunder." All these expressions, it must be observed, occur in ordinary prose. 'Son' is also used with geographical terms: Ezekiel (16 26, 28, 23 17) terms "Egyptians," "Assyrians," and "Babylonians" respectively 'sons of Egypt,' 'sons of Assyria,' and 'sons of Babylon.' Joel (3 6) terms those whose home was Jerusalem "children [sons] of Jerusalem"; "children [sons] of the province" are the exiles who returned and settled in the province of Judah (Ezr 2 1). So, in poetry it is true, "rams of the breed of Bashan" (Dt 32 14) are in Hebrew idiom 'sons of Bashan.' Towns or villages dependent on another are its 'daughters' (cf. "Heshbon and in all the towns [daughters mg.] thereof," Nu 21 25). Is the case different when an ethnographical takes the place of a geographical term? Did the expression 'sons' ("children" RV) of Esau, Heth, Lot, Manasseh, Israel, etc., mean the actual children or, at least, the lineal descendants of individuals named Esau, Heth, etc.? Certainly in later times the Jews treated their descent from the patriarchs literally enough. This is not the place to examine in detail the validity of the claim, but it must be pointed out that such an inference can not be safely drawn from the term "sons of Israel," for this is ambiguous; it may mean persons physically descended from an individual named Israel, or persons belonging to the people so named. That the latter usage occurs is obvious in one case; for we can not sharply distinguish the use of this term "sons" in "sons of Manasseh" and "children [sons] of the half-tribe of Manasseh" (I Ch 5 23), yet in the latter case "sons" can only mean 'members' of the half-tribe. (2) The second linguistic use needing to be kept in mind is the frequent personification of a whole group of people, so that the whole is spoken of, or represented as speaking, as an individual. As illustrations it may suffice to cite: "And the Egyptians [Heb. Egypt] said, Let me flee" (Ex 14 25; RV paraphrastically, as often, "Let us flee"); "and the men of Israel said unto the Hivites, Peradventure ye [Heb. thou] dwell among us" (Jos 9 7): "The children of Joseph spake unto Joshua, saying, Why hast thou given me but one inheritance, seeing I am a great people" (Jos 17 14; cf. further Nu 20 14-21, 21 1-3; Jg 1 3; Gn 34 30). 3. Significance of the Terms Used.

We may now examine some instances of genealogies which clearly describe geographical and ethnographical relations. And first, Gn ch. 10: The RV rather obscures the obvious meaning by transliterating certain names which it elsewhere translates: so "Mizraim" (ver. 6) is regularly elsewhere rendered "Egypt," "Cush" commonly by "Ethiopia," "Asshur" (ver. 22) by "Assyria." If we substitute the familiar for these entirely exceptional English equivalents of the Hebrew words, Gn 10 6, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18 runs thus: "And the sons of Ham: Ethiopia and Egypt and Put and Canaan. And Egypt begat Ludim, and Anamim, and Lehabim, and Naphtuhim, and Pathrusim, and Casluhim, and Caphtorim. And Canaan begat Sidon, his first-born, and Heth and the Jebusite and the Amorite and the Arvadite and the Zemarite and the Hamathite." The meaning of all this is clear; the terms 'sons' and 'to beget' are used metaphorically; and what is stated is that one of the three great divisions of the inhabitants of the world known to the Hebrews included as its subdivisions Ethiopians, Egyptians, Putites, and Canaanites; and in those subdivisions the inhabitants and subjects of Egypt included Ludites (all the terms in ver. 13 are plurals in Hebrew), the inhabitants of Upper Egypt (Pathros) and Caphtor and others; the Canaanites included the Phœnicians (who are intended by Sidon, which, being regarded as the most ancient settlement in Canaan, is described metaphorically as Canaan's "first-born"), Hittites, Jebusites, inhabitants of Arvad and Hamath (in N. Syria), and others. The compiler of Gn ch. 10, like the compilers of the Arabic genealogies, may have held the theory, which would, however, conflict no less with the facts of the growth of nations given in the Bible than with the findings of modern historical and scientific research, that each nation consisted exclusively of descendants from a common ancestor, and again that all allied nations were descended from another common though more remote ancestor, but this is not directly stated in the chapter; the genealogy supplies no links between terms so wide as Egypt and Canaan on the one hand and terms so relatively limited as Caphtor and Sidon on the other. The value of the genealogy lies in the light it casts on the geographical distribution and, to some extent, on the political relations of nations at the periods to which its several parts belong.

4. Geographical and Ethnological Relations Expressed Genealogically.

The metaphorical language of Gn ch. 10 is relatively simple; 'sons' are obviously subdivisions of the ethnographic groups that rank as 'fathers.' Elsewhere it is often more elaborate and sometimes more ambiguous. For example, in I Ch 2 18 f., 50-55 we read that Caleb married Azubah, and, after her death, Ephrath; that the first-born of the second marriage was Hur and the sons of Hur, Shobal, Salma, and Hareph, were fathers respectively of Kiriath-jearim, Beth-lehem, and Beth-gader, and that the families of Beth-lehem were Ithrites, Putites, and others. The presence of names of well-known districts and towns (Ephrath, Beth-lehem, Kiriath-jearim) at once indicate that the terms 'son,' 'father,' 'marry,' 'beget' are used metaphorically. In detail there is room for some difference of interpretation, but the general drift of the genealogical statement is clear—the clan Caleb first settled in the district of Azubah and was there subdivided into certain clans (Jesher, Shobab, and Ardon); subsequently Azubah passed out of the possession of the clan which then settled in Ephrath—the district which included Beth-lehem (Mic ch. 5 ff.; Gn 35 19); during the occupation of Ephrath a main subdivision of the clan was called Hur, and was again subdivided into divisions named Shobal, Salma, and Hareph, who inhabited the towns Kiriath-jearim, Beth-lehem, and Beth-gader respectively—the Shobalites of Beth-lehem being split up into the families of Ithrites, Putites, and others. Here, as in Gn ch. 10, 'sons,' 'grandsons,' 'great-grandsons,' represent the divisions, subdivisions, and further subdivisions of an ethnic group: but here 'son' or 'wife' may also represent the town or district inhabited.

Facts remain facts, and literal descriptions of the same facts, if true, must agree whatever their age or origin; but metaphorical descriptions of the same fact may vary largely according to the taste of the writer. A relation which one may describe as that of father and son, another may prefer to describe as that of husband and wife. Further, in the course of centuries tribal divisions and tribal relations vary. A tribe may increase and it may fall at one time into, say, five, at another into ten main divisions; or the reverse may happen; or, again, a once independent tribe, or clan, through diminution may become incorporated with another, or a particular subdivision of a tribe may become so important as to form a new independent tribe; or, once more, a clan which occupied a particular district may move to another. Then in the metaphorical language of these genealogies it will be said, in the first case, that X (=the tribe) had five sons, but at a later or earlier period, as the case may be, it will be said with equal correctness that he had ten; in the next case X and Y will be at one time described as brothers, at another as father and son. The last case may be variously expressed. As above, in the case of Caleb, X being the clan, Y and Z the districts, X may be said first to marry Y and then Z, or at one time X may be father of Y, at another of Z; or again X may be first son of Y and then son of Z. In spite of frequent textual corruption and not infrequent ambiguity of the metaphorical terms, up to a certain point the geographical and ethnographical genealogies of the O T may be understood, once the general method is appreciated; but if it be disregarded and the names taken to represent individuals and the terms to be literal description of fact, then various genealogies being compared will simply bristle with contradictions and difficulties. For example, in I Ch 7 6, Benjamin is said to have three, in I Ch 8 1 f., and Nu 26 38 five, and in Gn 46 21 ten sons; in Gn 46 21 Gera is a son of Benjamin and brother of Bela, in I Ch 8 7 a grandson of Benjamin, and a son of Bela; similarly Ard and Naaman are sons of Benjamin in Gn, but of Bela in Nu 26 40. According to Nu 26 29-32 Manasseh's son, Machir, had by his son Gilead (a district!) six grandsons—Iezer, Helek, Asriel, Shechem, Shemida, and Hepher; but in Jos 17 1, 12 the six grandsons of Machir become sons of Manasseh and younger brothers of Machir. The real difficulty in such cases is to determine the periods to which the several descriptions apply; there is seldom reason to doubt that such descriptions are genuine descriptions of fact.

The Book of Genesis is articulated by a succession of interrelated genealogies—of heaven and earth, 1–2 4a; of Adam, ch. 5; of Noah, 6 9 f.; of the sons of Noah, ch. 10; of Shem, 11 10-26; of Terah, 11 27, 32; of Ishmael, 25 12-16; of Isaac, 25 19 f.; of Esau, ch. 36; of Jacob, 35 22b-26, 37 2. The character and value of these must in the main be determined by wider considerations than those that fall under the present subject. However, the first of the foregoing genealogies is obviously metaphorical and so, as we have seen, is the fourth. On the other hand, in some cases it is clearly the intention of the writer that we should think of individuals; the twelve 'sons' of Ishmael are expressly said to be twelve princes (25 6; cf. 17 20). Whether he be right or wrong, the list has value; for it preserves the names of actual Ishmaelite clans, even though the 'sons' of Ishmael thus named may as individuals be nothing more than an inference from an incorrect theory of the origin of clans and tribes. As the genealogies present twelve 'sons' of Ishmael, so they present twelve 'sons' of Israel; and these 'sons' again, whether they ever had existence as individuals or not, are the twelve tribes of Israel, though it must be added that the twelve 'sons' of Israel, as tribes of Israel, are not an entirely fixed and permanent quantity; for the twelve sometimes includes and sometimes excludes Levi, sometimes makes of Joseph a single tribe and sometimes two — Ephraim and Manasseh. In Gn ch. 36 there can be little doubt that we are dealing with clans and their relations, and not with individuals. The earlier genealogies of Genesis are, in part, of yet a third type; they tabulate neither clans nor individual men, but mythical names and matter.

5. The Lists in I Chronicles.

Turning to the early chapters of I Ch, we find that the main purpose here also is to present the names of the tribes and their subdivisions at a time when each 'son' is a clan numbering many individuals; so most clearly and exclusively in the case of Issachar (7 1-5), Manasseh (7 14 ff.), Asher (7 30 ff.). In these cases the genealogies given seldom exceed three or four, and, of course, in no way correspond to the number of generations between an individual common ancestor and the numbers given. But interspersed in these chapters are lengthy genealogies of individuals—of the ancestors of a certain Elishama (2 34-41); of the descendants of David (ch. 3); of the ancestors to the 8th preceding generation of a certain Beerah, described as contemporary with Tiglath-pileser (8th cent. B.C.) (5 4-6); of certain priests and Levites (ch. 6); of the descendants of Saul to the 12th generation (8 33-40 = 9 39-44). With these we reach the final point to be considered —the trustworthiness of genealogies of pre-exilic individuals. As already stated, evidence that such genealogies were recorded in early times is scanty. Of the genealogies just enumerated, that of David down to the Exile is certainly genuine, but could, of course, have been compiled at a late period from the books of Kings. It is difficult to prove the authenticity of any of the rest, and some of them contain features which create suspicion. Freest from suspicious features is the genealogy of Saul. On the other hand, the priestly and Levitical genealogies are so full of suspicious features that they may safely be treated as not genuine. They contain, certainly, some names of actual persons gleaned from earlier sources, but also many 'dummies,' mere names that represent no actual persons in the periods implied, and as a whole they seek to establish lines of descent that must be regarded as historically unproved and improbable, in some cases even demonstrably wrong. The genealogies of I Ch ch. 6, for example, present a series of features which are known to be characteristic of post-exilic names, but which are entirely different from those that mark groups of well-attested early names. Thus the same name recurs in the same genealogy, implying the custom of naming children from ancestors, yet this custom, as Jewish, can not be clearly traced beyond the 5th cent. B.C. Names compounded with the Divine name Yah(weh) form a highly suspicious proportion of the whole; the formations of the names are those most frequent in late and least frequent in early times; some of the names are frequent in later, but otherwise unattested in the earlier periods. An indication that these genealogies could not in all cases be, even if real, complete is found in the wide difference in the number of genealogies that separate contemporaries from a common ancestor.

6. The Levitical and Priestly Genealogies.

Finally, reasons for the invention of these genealogies are to be found in the history of the priesthood, and particularly in the movement powerfully started by Ezekiel (Ezk ch. 44), which illegitimized certain priests and their descendants, and confined the priesthood to a single line, and required all servants of the Temple to be Levites and not, as heretofore, aliens.

The basis of fact in the Levitical genealogies, as in the genealogies of the other tribes, is to be found in the names of the Levitical divisions; but from the narratives we can see that the divisions no more remained constant in Levi than in other tribes. In Nu 26 58 the primary divisions of Levi are five—the Libnites, the Hebronites, the Mahlites, the Mushites, and the Korahites (gentiles formed from Libnah, Hebron—names of places—and Mahli, Mushi [Moses], and Korah); elsewhere (Nu 26 57; I Ch ch. 6, etc.) they are three—Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, 'sons' of Levi, while Mahli and Mushi become 'sons' of Merari, Hebron of Kohath, Libni sometimes a 'son' of Gershon (Nu 3 18; I Ch 6 17), sometimes of Merari (I Ch 6 29), and Korah, a great-grandson of Levi (Nu 16 1; I Ch 6 37 f.). Worthless as genealogies of individuals, these tables nevertheless contain many valuable clues alike to late Jewish theory and to the actual origin and history of the priestly and Levitical orders, but it is impossible to follow them further here.

The first book of the O T was called by the Jews בְּרֵאשִׁית, bᵉrē'shīth ('in the beginning'), from its first word. The word Genesis is Greek (γένεσις), meaning 'generation,' or 'origin,' and was the title given to the book in the Greek version of the O T (the LXX.), whence it passed to the Latin and other versions.

1. The Name.

Gn is constructed on a simple though somewhat artificial outline, being divided into ten unequal parts, each introduced by the formula, "These are the generations of." The first one of these, now found at 2 4a, probably originally stood before 1 1. According to these headings the scheme of the book is: (1) The "generations" of the heavens and earth (1 1–4 26). (2) Of Adam (5 1–6 8). (3) Of Noah (6 9–9 29). (4) Of the sons of Noah (10 1–11 9). (5) Of Shem (11 10-26). (6) Of Terah (Abraham) (11 27–25 11). (7) Of Ishmael (25 11-18). (8) Of Isaac (25 19–35 29). (9) Of Esau (ch. 36). (10) Of Jacob (chs. 37–50). All the material in 1 1–11 26 may be called the primeval history, and that in 11 27–50 may be termed patriarchal history. The plan of the writer was, evidently, to connect the history of Israel with the larger history of mankind, and the method followed was that of continually passing from a wider to a narrower field, until at last the history of Jacob-Israel was reached. Thus he passed from the Universe (ch. 1) to Mankind (Adam); from Mankind to the line of Noah; from the Sons of Noah to one line, Shem; from all the Shemites to the line of Terah-Abraham; from all of Abraham's line to that of Isaac; and from the story of Jacob and Esau (the line of Isaac) to that of Jacob alone, for Israel and Jacob were equivalent terms.

2. Outline.

When the contents of Gn are closely examined, it becomes evident that the unity of the book is only superficial. It is in reality composite in structure, the result of combining three narratives originally separate and each complete in itself. The evidence for this is given in part in the article HEXATEUCH (q.v.). The outline given above (§ 2) is that of P, the latest document, which was adopted by the compiler as the basis for his large composite work (Gn–Jos). An analysis of P in Gn will be found under HEXATEUCH, § 27, and need not be repeated here.

3. Critical Analysis.

Of the two older documents (J and E), J began with creation and passed gradually to the story of Israel's ancestors, a method later imitated by P. Since no certain trace of E is found before ch. 15, it is probable that E began with Abraham. From ch. 20 onward J and E can be traced as parallel narratives dealing with the same ancient traditions, and in much the same way. The narrative of J can be traced with comparatively little difficulty because of its consistent use of the name Jehovah for God and, as far as ch. 20, by means of its easy, flowing narrative style. After ch. 20 the analysis is more difficult, not only because there are now three interwoven narratives instead of two, but because, on the one hand, two of these (E and P) use 'God' instead of 'Jehovah,' and, on the other, the style of E is much more nearly that of J. The places most difficult to analyze are those where J and E are closely interwoven. In such sections the style and contents of the two documents are often so similar that a sure analysis is impossible.

4. Contents of J and E.

The analysis exhibited below is mainly that of Dr. Driver in his recent commentary on Genesis, 2d ed. (1904). This is but one of many analyses made by careful scholars in modern times. While all agree in the main, some have ventured to distinguish between the documents much more minutely (cf. e.g., the analysis in Carpenter-Harford, The Comp. of the Hexateuch, p. 509 ff.). In this analysis such passages as should be assigned probably to the various editors of this literature in the long course of its transmission have not been specially designated.

In the foregoing analysis of JE and that of P given in HEXATEUCH, § 27, all the material in Gn is accounted for, except ch. 14, which seems to have been a separate composition, found at hand by an editor, or compiler, and inserted in its present position.

5. Comparison of the Documents in Gn.

Reading the narratives for the sake of comparison, certain distinctive characteristics of each will reveal themselves. In P we have a carefully planned, systematic narrative, arranged according to an exact chronological scheme, with a view to the progress of history toward a certain well-defined end. The writer of P was profoundly convinced that the goal of human history was Israel, the theocratic people, with its holy institutions, and in Gn we have that part of P's history in which the preliminary unfolding of that Divine purpose is revealed. Thus the Sabbath is founded at creation; commands concerning food are given from the beginning (1 29 f., 9 3 ff.); emphasis is placed upon circumcision as the sign of the covenant (ch. 17); God is known to the primeval world as 'God' ('El) simply, to the patriarchs as 'God Almighty' ('El Shaddai) (17 1; cf. 28 3, 35 11), to be later known to Israel as Jehovah (see Ex 6 2). In P there is no mention of sacrifice or priesthood in the primeval, or in the patriarchal, world, for these came only later with the founding of Israel's institutions by Moses. The theological conceptions of P are advanced. God is great, infinite, transcendent, and while He reveals Himself, there is no hint of any external means (as by a vision or angel). All that is said is simply, "God said unto" this or that one. Furthermore, there is comparatively little in P that savors of a close touch with popular tradition, or seems to have been drawn from popular story. All is exact, carefully planned and worked out, the result of much thought and even research (cf. the genealogies of Ishmael, or Esau, the geographical material in ch. 10, the table in ch. 5, or the chronological scheme into which the events are fitted). In both J and E, on the other hand, the narrative is of a much more popular character. It shows itself to have been drawn quite directly from the popular tradition. The stories are told in a vivid, realistic way, designed to interest and attract the listener or reader. In these stories there is no connected chronology—in fact, there is no chronology at all. In religious and moral character the material in J and E varies greatly. Much of most ancient and primitive material has been preserved, or still lingers in these stories along with more advanced and refined religious or moral conceptions (e.g., in the stories of paradise, of the visit of the three angels to Abraham, or of Jacob at Peniel).

6. Sources of the Material in Gn.

In considering the sources whence the writers of the documents in Gn drew their material a distinction must be made between the ultimate origin of the material and its condition when the authors J, E, or P made use of it. In both J and E we have evidently quite a collection of ancient tradition. Close examination of J will reveal the fact that behind the collection, as we find it in that document, there were earlier and smaller collections which were at hand and used by the author of J. It is altogether probable that quite a process of collection, and even editing, is to be posited before the composition of J. The ultimate sources of Gn were separate traditions, each having its specific occasion and independent history before being taken in hand, altered, and adjusted to a place in a group of more or less easily connected traditions. Doubtless the homes of many of these traditions were the various holy places, or sanctuaries, which figure in them, as Beersheba, Hebron, Beth-el, or Shechem. Some of them may have been originally Canaanite, and later transformed by the Hebrews. Some may have related originally to the movements of tribes, retold later as the experiences of individuals (e.g., chs. 34 and 38). The fragments of ancient poetry (4 24 f., 25 23, 27 27 ff., etc.) may well in some instances at least be much older than the narrative in which they are embedded, and their original reference may have been to different circumstances. None of the material in 1 1–11 25 is specifically Israelite, and its formal elements at least must have been derived by the Israelites from the larger Semitic world of which they were a part, and to which they were very closely related. We now find all this vivid material collected, edited, and arranged according to one ruling purpose—a national-religious purpose—to show how Israel originated as the people of J″ It was along these lines that the ancient document J was constructed and, though dealing exclusively with patriarchal stories, this was also the method followed by the writer of E.

As to the sources of P, while it is evident that this work is planned much along the same lines as J, it is just as evident that the author was not interested especially in merely reproducing popular tradition. His creation and flood stories, his comprehensive chronology, his interest in ceremonial prescriptions, his careful array of facts of a geographical, ethnological, and genealogical character, together with his advanced theological conceptions, all reveal reflection, study, and calculation—in other words, the careful working over of ancient material from certain well-defined points of view. Consequently, in regard to P, the question of sources is comparatively unimportant. P presupposes acquaintance on the part of his readers with the general body of popular tradition. It was the purpose of the author, as a scholar and theologian, to lift those elements of ancient tradition to the high level of a delineation of the lofty, supreme purpose of God, the One Maker of heaven and earth, manifested in the creation of His covenant people Israel.

7. Historical Value of Gn.

In the light of modern science and of recent archeological discovery the historical value of Gn chs. 1–11 is no longer an open question. We can not go to Gn ch. 1 for our cosmogony, or our geology. We can not go to Gn chs. 2–3 for the literal facts of the origin of man, or of evil. Neither can we go to 4 17 ff. for exact knowledge of the origin of early civilization, nor does the story of Babel really account for the origin of the diverse languages. We must judge the material or formal elements of all these narratives precisely as we do the very similar matter found in abundance all over the ancient world. The case is somewhat different with the contents of chs. 12–50. Here, to a large extent, we are dealing with traditions centering for the most part about places in the land actually occupied by Israel and about persons considered to be the actual forefathers of the nation. Such traditions might easily be greatly elaborated and embellished in the course of transmission, until finally committed to writing, and it is exceedingly difficult to determine what is to be considered the historical kernel and what the later elaboration. That a great part of the substratum of the traditions in Gn is historical seems to be a reasonable position.

8. Religious Value of Gn.

The question of the religious value of Gn is, in great measure, distinct from that of its historical value. The Hebrews belonged to a world full of all kinds of mythological legends, and of all grades and varieties of theistic conceptions. It was certainly no small matter that they were able to face that world and make use of many of its theories and yet triumph over its religious deficiencies in the interests of a pure, spiritual, ethical, and monotheistic faith. It is just such a victory of Israel's religion that we find in Gn, and of that victory the Book of Gn itself is an incontestable witness. The book is everywhere instinct with this vital faith. Whether the writers are dealing with the ancient Babylonian cosmogony (as in ch. 1) or with the old legend of Jacob wrestling with an angel (the original significance of which must remain unknown), it is the same earnest religious feeling and purpose that are manifested. It is Israel's religion, the post-Mosaic religion of Israel, that we find in Gn. And it is in what Gn tells us, and seeks to teach, of the character and progress of this religion in that ancient world that we are to find its highest value and may discern its inspiration.

LITERATURE: The literature on Genesis is enormous. The following commentaries will be found most serviceable: Dillmann, Driver, and Gunkel, 2d ed. Dods in Expositor's Bible is very suggestive along religious lines. See also LITERATURE under HEXATEUCH.

E. E. N.

GENNESARET, gen-nes'a-ret, LAKE OF. See GALILEE, SEA OF.

GENNESARET, LAND OF. See PALESTINE, § 10.

GENTILES (gōy, pl. gōyīm, and ἔθνος, pl. ἔθνη, 'people,' nation, nations): Since the Israelites looked upon themselves as a "peculiar people" (Ex 19 5 AV), the "chosen" (Is 43 20) nation, they considered other nations to be on a lower level and less privileged than themselves. These conceptions are disclosed, in the O T, especially in the post-exilic writings, and are found frequently in the Apocrypha and Apocalyptic Literature, and in the literature of later Judaism. The term heathen, common in the AV, conveys this idea, but the RV has rightly preferred the more impartial rendering "nations." In N T times, the Jew divided mankind into three classes, Jews, Greeks (Ἕλληνες, made to include Romans, thus meaning the civilized peoples of the Roman Empire, often rendered "Gentiles" AV), and barbarians (the uncivilized, Ac 28 4; Ro 1 14; I Co 14 11). The terms uncircumcised, uncircumcision were also used, sometimes with deep meaning, to designate those who had no share or lot with Israel in her peculiar privileges (Gn 17 4; Jg 14 3, 15 8; I S 31 4; Gn 34 14; Ac 11 3; etc.). Besides these general terms there are several special terms, which show the attitude of Israelites toward foreigners who lived among them. Two of these, gēr (generally sojourner RV, but stranger AV, once alien, Ex 18 3 AV) and tōshābh (also sojourner RV), express the nearer relationship, while zār (stranger) and nēkhār or nokhrī (stranger, strange woman, etc., sometimes alien) designate the more remote. The gēr (pl. gērīm) or tōshābh was one who put himself under the protection of Israel and of J", Israel's God, who submitted to many of the requirements of Israel's law, and was entitled to certain privileges not accorded to the "stranger" (zār or nēkhār). In the earliest code the gēr was given the benefit of the Sabbath rest, and it was recommended that he be treated kindly (Ex 20 10, 22 21, 23 9, 12). In the Code of Dt the same kindly spirit prevails, the gēr being classed with the Levite, the fatherless, and the widow (Dt 14 21, 29, 16 11, 26 11-13), and guaranteed the same just judgment as was the right of the Israelite himself (24 14, 17, 19-21, 27 19). At the same time Dt 14 21 permits the Israelite to give to a gēr meat that he himself was not to eat, because the animal had "died of itself." In the Holiness Code it is presumed that the gēr offered sacrifices to J" (Lv 17 8, 22 18); he is required to observe various ceremonial and other requirements (Lv 17 10 ff., 18 26, 20 2, 24 16, 22); he is to be treated kindly (19 10; etc.). On the other hand, if a rich gēr acquires a Heb. slave by purchase, the latter can be redeemed at once (Lv 25 47). In P, while the gēr is supposed to offer sacrifice to J" (Nu 15 14 ff.), he must be circumcised in order to partake of the Passover (Ex 12 19, 48 f.; Nu 9 14), by which act he becomes an Israelite. The status of the tōshābh was exactly that of the gēr, the two terms being synonymous.

The status of the nēkhār (or nokhrī) was based on the idea that he had (or desired) no cultus-fellowship with Israel. His real allegiance was to another people and another deity. Hence even the humane Code of Dt does not extend the privileges of the year of release to the nokhrī, and permits the exaction of usury from him (Dt 15 3, 23 20). No nokhrī could be king (Dt 17 15), and in P he is stringently forbidden to partake of the Passover (Ex 12 43). In Ezk 44 7-9 he is forbidden to enter the sanctuary. The "strange" wives against whom Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezr 10 2 ff.; Neh 13 26 f.) protested and the "strange" women against whom the wise men warned the heedless (Pr 2 16; etc.) were foreigners. The zār was not necessarily of foreign blood. The term is used at times of class distinctions within Israel, as, e.g., of the non-priestly vs. the priestly (Ex 29 33; Lv 22 12; etc.). In the same way the term is applied to the "strange" woman as one outside the pale of respectable society (Pr 2 16, 5 3; etc.). But it was often used of foreigners as people entirely different from, or even hostile to, Israel (Is 1 7; Ezk 11 9; etc.). In the post-exilic and N T times the distinction between the Israelite and the non-Israelite was emphasized in the scrupulous abstinence on the part of loyal Jews from all familiar, unrestrained fellowship with Gentiles, like eating with them, etc. (Ac 11 3; Gal 2 12). Another striking evidence of the same prejudice was the demarcation of a portion of the Temple court as the "court of the Gentiles," beyond whose bounds no foreigner could pass without incurring the death penalty (see TEMPLE, § 32, and cf. Ac 21 28). Notwithstanding this, the way of entrance into Judaism from without was always open. Proselytes (προσήλυτοι) were numerous and zealously sought for (Mt 23 15). These corresponded to the O T gērīm who had received circumcision, without the local and political allegiance natural to the O T times. Strictly speaking, there was but one class of proselytes, as the so-called 'proselytes of the gate' mentioned by Josephus (in the N T, "devout" men, who "feared God," Ac 10 2; etc.) were not proselytes proper, but merely Gentiles favorably disposed toward the Jewish faith, who attended synagogue services, and were willing to impose on themselves some of the Jewish rules of life (cf. Nowack, Heb. Arch., I, p. 339 f. See also PROSELYTES). The occasional occurrence in the N T of "sojourner" (Heb 11 9; I P 2 11) or "alien" (Heb 11 34) is but a figurative echo of O T usage, and not especially significant. See also NETHINIM and SLAVERY.

1. Geography in General.

The ancient Orient gave no consistent and interested study to the surface of the earth. While the aspect of the heavens attracted the Babylonians, and a considerable amount of correct information was secured, making up a crude science of astronomy, knowledge of places upon the earth was regarded as of secondary importance. Especially is this true of the Hebrews in the earlier stages of their history. Their contact with the world outside of their own territory was not like that of the Phœnicians, motived by aggressive commercialism, but occasioned by initiative from without, and was for the most part indirect. Their knowledge of the world was thus not the same from one age to another, but increased with each generation.

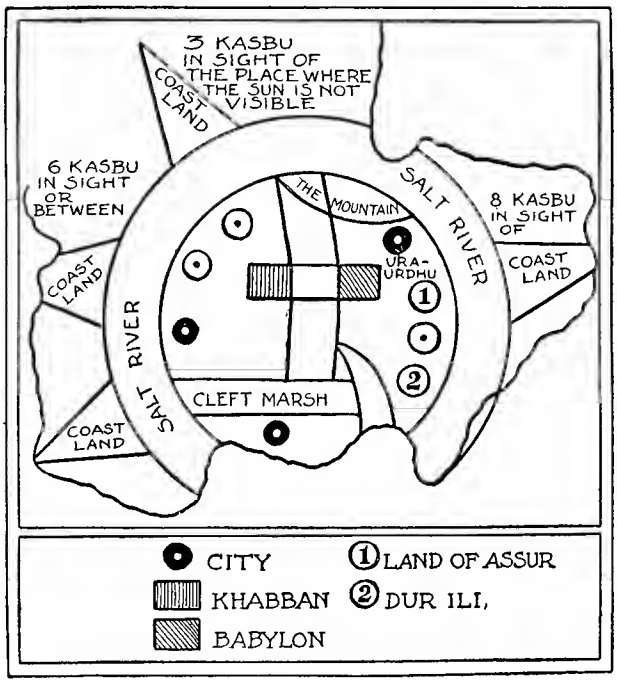
2. Form and Size of the Earth. As to the form of the visible earth, the Jews held that it was circular, and surrounded by water, which extended as far as where the dome of heaven, like an inverted bowl, rests on it (Job 26 10; Pr 8 27). The surface of the earth was believed to be generally plain, but studded with mountains, and broken by rivers and lakes. It was vast beyond the power of man to measure or compute (Job 28 5, 38 18); but yet it was limited within certain boundaries which were definitely known to exist (Dt 28 64; Job 28 24; Jer 10 13; Ps 2 8). The center of it was the Holy City, Jerusalem (Ezk 5 5; "navel of the earth" LXX.). Around this central point the nations of the earth were arranged as described in Gn ch. 10.

3. Points of the Compass. Within the circle of the known earth the Hebrews were accustomed to distinguish four and only four directions in the horizon (cardinal points), and four winds to correspond with these (Jer 49 36; Ezk 37 9; Zec 6 5; Dn 8 8). The designation of these directions was made according to three different systems: (1) The first of these took the rising sun as its fixed point, and by placing the observer face to face with it named the East 'front' (qedhem), the West 'behind' ('aḥărōn), the North 'the left hand' (s'mō'l), and the South 'the right hand' (yāmin, tēmān) (see also EAST). (2) The second system was based on the daily apparent motion of the sun; hence the East was "the rising of the sun" (mizraḥ), the West the "going down" of the sun (m'bō' hasshemesh, Ps 50 1; Mal 1 11), the North the region of darkness (tsāphōn), and the South the region of light or brightness (dārōm). (3) The third was descriptive of the character of the place relatively to the center of Palestine. The West and South were designated respectively from the fact that the former was limited by the sea (yām, miyyām, yammāh), and the latter was the arid or dry quarter (negebh, from obs. nāgabh). There do not seem to be corresponding terms for North and East in this system.



EARLY BABYLONIAN MAP OF THE WORLD.

A map of the world as it was known in "the late Babylonian period" (Sayce would substitute "early" for "late") has been recently published in the 22d vol. of the Cuneiform Texts from Babylonian Tablets in the British Museum, Plate 28, and is reproduced here by permission. It is said to be by a tourist of the age, is accompanied by explantory text, and throws a flood of light on the subject. For a popular account by Sayce, cf. Exp. Times, Nov., 1906, p. 68 ff.

4. The Land of Israel. The center of geographical knowledge was the Holy City. About it three irregular circles might be drawn, indicating geographical knowledge according to its degree of definiteness. The innermost of these would contain the Holy Land. But even of this territory all knowledge was predominantly practical, and not distinct enough to leave its traces in the form of maps or minute descriptions.[1] The name given to the land varies according as it is viewed as the residence of certain peoples—the land of Canaan (Gn 11 31), the land of the Hebrews (Gn 40 15), the land of Israel (I S 13 19); or as possessed of sacred associations — the "holy land" (Zec 2 12), the "pleasant land" (Zec 7 14), the "glorious land" (Dn 11 16), the "land of J"" (Hos 9 3), "the land which J" sware to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob" (Gn 50 24), and "the land of promise" (He 11 9).

5. The Ideal Limits of the Land. The ideal limits of this land the Hebrews found in the empire achieved and maintained for a brief period under David and Solomon (I K 4 21, 9 26). Roughly speaking, it was bounded on the N. by the range of Lebanon, on the S. by the wilderness of Paran, on the W by the Mediterrancan, and on the E. by the Arabian desert. Its length was designated in the phrase "from Dan to Beersheba" (I S 3 10, 24 15; etc.). The subdivision of it among the tribes was probably not a fixed one, though certain ideal boundaries were held in mind for each tribe, as dating from the Mosaic age (Nu 32 33-42, 34 2-12; Jos chs. 15, 16, 17).

6. Natural Features. Four districts were specifically distinguished (Dt 1 7), as the "Arabah," or Jordan Valley, the "Shephelah," or lowland along the western coast, the "Negeb," or South country, and the seashore. To these the hill-country of Ephraim and the hill-country of Judah might be added (Jos 17 15, 21 11). More particularly, the Valley of Lebanon (Jos 11 17, 12 7, later called Cœle-Syria), lying between Lebanon, "that goodly mountain" (Dt 3 25), and the Antilebanon ranges, was the northern section of the land. Mt. Hermon, the southernmost summit in the group, was the most conspicuous of the mountains. Other mountains which secured a fixed place in the popular geography were Mt. Naphtali (Jos 20 7), Mt. Tabor (Jos 19 22; Jg 8 18), Mt. Gilboa (I S 31 1 f.), Mt. Carmel (I K 18 19 ff.; Is 35 2), Mts. Ebal and Gerizim (Dt ch. 27), and, in the outer rim of the country, the mountains of Bashan (Ps 68 15; Is 2 13), Mt. Gilead (Dt 3 12), Mt. Nebo, and Mt. Pisgah (Abarim, Dt 32 49).

7. Plains and Rivers and Seas.

Chief among the lowlands of the country were the Valley of Jezreel (Jos 17 16; Jg 6 33), the Plain of Sharon (Is 33 9), the Lowland ("Vale" AV) or Shephelah (Jos 10 40), the Valley of Sorek (Jg 16 4), the Plain of Jordan (Gn 13 10), which is in the vicinity of Jericho, and was also called the Valley of Jericho (Dt 34 3), and its extension beyond the Dead Sea, the Valley of Salt (II S 8 13). Besides the Mediterranean, called "the Sea" par excellence (Nu 34 5), the Dead Sea (also called the "Sea of the Arabah," "the Salt Sea" Dt 3 17, and the "East Sea" Ezk 47 18), the Sea of Chinneroth (Jos 12 3), or Chinnereth (Nu 34 11), later called the Lake, or Sea, of Gennesaret, Galilee, or Tiberias, were noted. Of rivers, the principal one was the Jordan, constituting, as it does, the chief line of division between the E. and W parts of the country. But besides this great river, others were familiar, such as the Shihor-libnath (Jos 19 26), the Kishon (Jg 5 21; I K 18 40), the River of Egypt (Gn 15 18); and on the E. of the Jordan, the Jarmuk, the Jabbok, and the Arnon.

8. Adjacent Foreign Countries.

From the earliest days the relations of the Hebrews with the outside world brought them into direct touch with Phœnicia, although mention is made only of its cities Tyre, Sidon, Arvad, etc. To the E. of Phœnicia lay the great stretch of land known as Aram (Syria), extending to the Euphrates. The Euphrates itself, together with the Tigris (Hiddeqel), was familiar as the territory of Asshur, Nineveh, and Babylon, gradually recognized as having an internal unity under the name of Mesopotamia ('Aram-Naharaim). To the E. and the SE. of the land of Israel lay Moab, with its cities of Kir and Ar (Is 15 1), the territory of Ammon, and Edom (also called Mt. Seir, together with Mt. Hor [Nu 20 23], one of its conspicuous summits), with Ezion-geber and Elath (I K 9 26; Dt 2 8), its ports, and Bozrah and Sela (Is 34 6), its principal cities. To the W. of Edom the Wilderness of Paran, gradually passing into the Wilderness of Shur (Gn 21 21; Ex 15 23), stretched as far as the border of Egypt. Further S. was the peninsula of Sinai, with the mountain from which it takes its name, though this mountain is but a single peak in the range called Horeb (Ex 3 1). Still more remote, and almost lost in the dim distance, was the land of Sheba (1 K 10 1), and Ophir so far away that its exact location has been made the subject of conjectures (Arabia, India, Africa?).

9. Egypt and Africa.

In the intermediate zone between the Holy Land and the remoter world the most prominent country to the Israelite's view was Egypt. Its whole length to Syene ("from Migdol to Syene," Ezk 29 10, 30 6, RVmg.) was more or less familiar ground throughout the whole of the Biblical period. S. of Syene lay Ethiopia (or Cush; cf. II K 19 9) and Seba. To the W of Egypt the whole coast of Africa was comprehended under the one great name of Libya (Jer 46 9, "Put," q.v.).

10. The Uttermost Parts.

To the eye of the Hebrew, at least before the Exile, the circle within which the inhabited earth is fixed was one with a radius of approximately 1,000 miles. The furthest countries known in any sense were: to the E., Persia, Media, Elam (Pāraṣ, Mādhay, and 'Ēlām) and Susiana; to the N., Armenia to the Caucasus, and the regions of Asia Minor, as far as the Black Sea ("Magog," "Togarmah," "Ararat," and "Gomer"); to the W., Cyprus, the coasts of Greece, the Archipelago, Ionia, and Libya ("Elisha," "Javan," "Kittim," "Caphtor," and "Lubim"); and to the S., Ethiopia, Yemen, Hadramaut, E. Arabia ("Cush," "Phut," "Seba," "Hazarmaveth," "Ophir," "Raamah" EV).

11. Growth of Geographical Knowledge.

The foregoing stands in general for geographical ideas in the O T as a whole. Naturally, these are not equally full and clear in all the periods of the history. They develop from cruder and vaguer notions. Events such as the wars of David, the commercial enterprises of Solomon, the Babylonian Exile, and contact with the Greek world vastly enlarged and clarified them. In the N T geographical ideas coalesce with those of Græco-Roman science. Nothing approaching a systematic presentation is given anywhere, but the accounts of the missionary journeys of Paul furnish materials for the identification of Biblical ideas with those of the best authorities outside (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 1896). See also ASIA MINOR, etc., and cf. Francis Brown in EB, article Geography.

GERA, gī'rą (גֵּרָא, gērā'): The ancestral name of one of the clans of Benjamin (Gn 46 21). In the list in I Ch 8 3 ff. one or more Geras are mentioned as subdivisions of the clan of Bela of the tribe Benjamin. The fact that both Ehud (Jg 3 15) and Shimei (II S 16 5, etc.) are called "sons" of Gera also indicates that Gera was one of the ancient clans of Benjamin.

It is commonly identified with Umm el-Jerâr, on the deep torrent-valley Jurf el-Jerâr (Gn 26 17). Map II, A 3. But according to Gn ch. 20, it lay between Kadesh and Shur, and Trumbull (Kadesh-Barnea, p. 61 ff.) identifies it with the Wâdy Jerûr, GERASA, jẹ-rê'sa, GERASENES, ger'a-sênz (Γερασηνοί, Mk 5 1; Lk 8 26, 37; Gergesenes Lk 8 26 mg., Gadarenes Lk 8 26 mg., Mt 8 28. The Revisers' reading in Mk is undoubtedly correct, being supported by the best MSS., and is adopted by recent editors. That of Lk is more doubtful, but "Gerasenes" is better supported than "Gergesenes." In Mt "Gadarenes" is to be preferred to the "Western" reading "Gerasenes"): Undoubtedly the textual difficulty is complicated by a geographical one. According to the narrative the scene is laid on the E. shore of the Lake of Galilee, where a cliff rises abruptly from the Lake. But this will not suit either of the cities which at first sight are suggested by the readings in the Gospels. Though there were several places called Gerasa, none is known on the E. shore of the Lake, and the famous city of that name lay two full days' journey to the SE. The ancient Gerasa, modern Jerāsh, was in Gilead, or Peræa, a little N. of the Jabbok, and its ruins to-day are among the most magnificent in Syria. It was a Hellenistic town, founded possibly by Alexander the Great, and after varied fortunes it enjoyed in the time of Christ much prosperity, as one of the cities of the Decapolis, and a center of Greek culture and religion. More is to be said for the identification of the Gerasa of the Gospels with Gadara, since the "country of the Gadarenes" (ἡ Γαδαρῖτις, Jos. BJ, III, 10 10) was a political district extending to the SE. shore of the Lake, with Gadara as its capital. This city was 6 m. from the Lake, finely situated in a fertile region, with beautiful views over the Jordan Valley, Galilee, and the Lake. Some of the most famous literary men of the 1st cent. belonged to Gadara; and the ruins of its theaters, temples, baths, and mausoleum show how close was the contact of Galilee with the luxurious culture of the Greeks. At the same time though the Decapolis, especially the country stretching to the Lake, was so completely pagan that herds of swine would occasion no horror to the common people, yet the distance of Gadara from the Lake is too great to allow of any identification. On the other hand, the identification of the city mentioned in the Gospels with a place now called Kersa, Gersa, or Kursi, first made by Dr. Thompson, is almost certain. It lies at the mouth of the Wâdy Samak, about the middle of the E. shore, where a cliff covered by ruins rises sheer above the beach, with numerous tombs in the vicinity. Origen and Eusebius knew of a village on the E. of the Lake, which they called Gergesa. But this is probably the same as Kersa, from which the adjectives Gergesenes and Gerasenes would be derived, the latter form having been suggested perhaps by the similarity in sound to the well-known Gerasa. The reading "Gadarenes" in Mt may have been a gloss by the editor of the Gospel, to whom the reading "Gerasenes" was inexplicable. R. A. F.

GERGESENES, gẹr''gẹ-sînz' See GERASA.

GERIZIM, ger'i-zim. See PALESTINE, § 7 (d).

GERSHOM, gẹr'shọm (גֵּרְשֹׁם, gērshōm): 1. A son of Levi (Gershom in I Ch 6 16 ff. and 15 7 ff., but elsewhere Gershon). His descendants constituted the priestly family of the Gershonites. On account of the disproportionate importance which they are given, both in the description of their service and in the distribution of Levitical cities, it is probable that they were a branch of the priesthood directly descending from Gershon, the son of Moses, and that their ancestor's name is included among the sons of Levi by a conventional genealogical connection. 2. The eldest son of Moses and Zipporah (Ex 2 22), and the ancestor of Jonathan, the priest of the idolatrous sanctuary at Dan (Jg 18 30). 3. A son of Phinehas, or at least the head of a branch of the priestly family of Phinehas (Ezr 8 2). GERUTH-CHIMHAM, gî'rūth-kim'ham. See CHIMHAM.

GESHAN, gî'shan (גֵּישָׁן, gēshān; in AV Gesham, except in ed. of 1611): A descendant of Caleb (I Ch 2 47). C. S. T.

GESHEM, gî'shem (גֶּשֶׁם, geshem, Neh 2 19, 6 1 f., written Gashmu 6 6): He is called "the Arabian." He joined with Sanballat and Tobiah in opposing Nehemiah, when rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem. C. S. T.

GESHUR, gî'shūr, GESHURITE, gẹ-shū'rait: 1. See ARAM, § 4 (2). 2. Geshur in the S. of Palestine. In Jos 13 2 Geshurites are named in connection with Philistines, and in I S 27 8 (Heb. text) David is said to have warred against the Geshurites, where evidently a southern tribe is meant. If the Heb. text of I S 27 8 is correct, we have evidence of a southern Geshur (omitted in LXX. B), of which nothing more is known. Possibly Absalom's mother was from this Geshur, not from the northern one. E. E. N.

GETHER, gî'thẹr. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

GETHSEMANE, geth-sem'a-nẹ: A garden across the Kidron (Jn 18 1), a resort for Jesus and His disciples (Mk 14 32; Mt 26 36; Lk 22 39). The name means 'oil-press,' one probably being in the enclosure. The traditional site, if not authentic, is at least near the original place, lying on the W slope of the Mt. of Olives, about 50 yards beyond the Kidron. R. A. F

GEUEL, giū'el (גְּאוּאֵל, gᵉ'ū'ēl), 'majesty of God': One of the spies (Nu 13 15). E. E. N.

GEZER, gî'zẹr (גֶּזֶר, gezer), also Gazer AV (II S 5 25; I Ch 14 16), gentilic Girzites (II S 27 8), Gizrites RVmg., Gezrites AV, Gerzites AVmg. (the variants are probably due to textual corruptions): An ancient city named in the Amarna tablets (c. 1400 B.C.) as in alliance with Ashkalon, Lachish, and Jerusalem. At the time of the Israelite conquest it had a king of its own, whom Joshua defeated, and put to death (Jos 10 33, 12 12). It was assigned to Ephraim as a Levitical city (Jos 16 3, 21 21), but was not subjugated by Israel. It passed into the possession of Solomon, as the dowry of his Egyptian wife (I K 9 16). It figures largely in the Maccabæan wars, under the name Gazara (I Mac 4 15, etc.). Its modern site Tell-Jezer (see Map III, D 5) has been made the scene of some of the most successful excavations in Palestine (cf. Clermont-Ganneau, Arch. Res. in Palestine, II, 257, and Stewart Macalister, Reports in PEFQ, 1904–06, and Excavations in Gezer, 1907). A. C. Z.

GHOST: An old English term, which, apart from the expression "Holy Ghost," occurs only in the phrase "to give up the ghost" (Job 11 20; Jer 15 9, etc.), which is used as the equivalent of 'to die' (Mt 27 50; Jn 19 30, "spirit" RV). A. C. Z.

GHOST, HOLY. See Holy Spirit.

GIAH, gai'ā (גַּיְחָ, gīaḥ): Apparently a place near Gibeon (II S 2 24). The text of this verse is doubtful, and the name "Giah" may be due to a transcriptional error. E. E. N.

GIANT, GIANTS: Four Heb. words are so rendered: (1) gibbōr (Job 16 14), which means simply a physically strong and courageous man. (2) rᵉphā-'īm ("Rephaim" RV), the name of a part of the pre-Canaanite inhabitants of Palestine (Dt 2 11, 20, 3 11, 13; Jos 12 4, 13 12, 15 8, 17 15, 18 16). See Rephaim. (3) rāphāh, possibly a proper name and, if so, the father of a race of giants in SW. Palestine. The word may, however, mean 'giant.' In any case, the passages in which it occurs indicate that in historic times there were remnants of a race of gigantic men in SW. Palestine (II S 21 16-22. The ‖ in I Ch 20 4-8 reads rāpha', which may be a mistake or a simple variant for rāphāh, or it may show that the original reading for both texts was rᵉphā'īm). See also Anak. (4) nᵉphīlīm, a term of unknown etymology, probably well rendered by "giants" (AV). See Nephilim. E. E. N.

GIANTS, VALLEY OF. See Rephaim.

GIBBAR, gib'ār (גִּבָּר, gibbār): A district of Judah (Ezr 2 20). Probably a mistake for Gibeon (cf. Neh 7 25). E. E. N.

GIBBETHON, gib'ē-thon (גִּבְּתוֹן, gibbᵉthōn), 'mound,' 'height': A Danite and Levitical city of refuge (Jos 21 23). It was a frontier Philistine city toward Ephraim and was besieged by Nadab, who was slain here by his general, Baasha, who conspired against him (I K 15 27). Twenty-five years later it was in the possession of the Philistines. Exact site unknown, but see Map III, E 5. C. S. T.

GIBEA, gib'ē-ā. See Gibeah.

GIBEAH, gib'ē-ā (גִּבְעָה, gibh'āh, and גֶּבַע, gebha', Geba EV), 'hill': 1. A town of Judah (Jos 15 57; I Ch 2 49). Site unknown. 2. Geba of Benjamin, a town on the N. border of Benjamin. Map III, F 5 (Jos 18 24; I S 13 2 f., 16, 14 2, 5, 16; I K 15 22; II K 23 8; I Ch 6 60, 8 6; II Ch 16 6; Neh 7 30, 11 31, 12 29; Is 10 29; Zec 14 10). Though similarity of the spelling has led to confusion with Gibeah of Saul, such passages as Jos 18 24, 28 and Is 10 29 clearly show that these two names did not refer to the same place. See Geba. 3. Gibeah of Saul. A town a few m. S. of Geba, identified with the ruins Talêl-el-fûl, about midway between Ramah (Map III, F 5) and Jerusalem. It was famous in Israel's tradition as the scene of the shameful deed and its bloody vengeance recorded in Jg chs. 19 and 20 (cf. Hos 9 9, 10 9). It was the home of Saul and his headquarters while king, and here seven of his sons were executed and exposed to satisfy the vengeance of the Gibeonites (II S 21 6). It was also the home of Ittai, one of David's heroes (II S 23 29), and of Micaiah, the mother of Abijah, King of Judah (II Ch 13 2). In II S 6 3 f. read "hill" with RV.

GIBEATH, gib'ē-ath, GIBEATHITE, gib'ē-ath-ait. See GIBEAH, 2.

GIBEON, gib'ē-ŏn (גִּבְעוֹן, gibh'ōn): An ancient Hivite city (Jos 9 3, 17), which was apparently the head of a league or confederacy, the other cities being Chephirah, Beeroth, Kiriath-jearim (ver. 17). By a stratagem it secured terms of peace with Israel under Joshua, and persisted as a non-Israelitish community as late as the days of David (II S 2 12). In spite of the discovery of their ruse, Joshua kept the compact with the Gibeonites, driving an alliance of Amorite kings from before the city (Jos 10 10, 12). In the civil war following the death of Saul, Abner and Joab, representing Ishbosheth and David respectively, met with their armies in its neighborhood (by "the pool," II S 2 12), but avoided a battle for a time by selecting twelve champions on each side to settle their differences (cf. HELKATH-HAZZURIM). In this affair mention is made of the Wilderness of G., but such a region can not be identified. Later, the place was the scene of a battle between David and the Philistines (II S 5 25, here "Geba," but in I Ch 14 16 "Gibeon"). Here, too, "at the great stone" Joab slew Amasa (II S 20 8). Saul rashly put to death many of the Gibeonites; but the survivors were given satisfaction by David through the delivery of seven from among Saul's descendants into their hands to be put to death (II S 21 1 ff.). G. was appointed a priestly city by Joshua (Jos 21 17) and had a "great high place," at which Solomon offered his first sacrifice as king (I K 3 4; cf. also I K 9 2). According to I Ch 21 20 even the tabernacle was for a time erected here. It was the residence of Hananiah the prophet (Jer 28 1). Some of its inhabitants took part in the rebuilding of Jerusalem (Neh 3 7). The Valley of Gibeon (Is 28 21) refers to Geba, where J" triumphed through David (II S 5 22 ff. = I Ch 14 13 ff.). GIBLITE, gib'lait. See GEBAL.

GIDDALTI, gid-dal'tai (גִּדַּלְתִּי, giddaltī): A musician, the ancestral head of the 22d division of the choir of the Second Temple (I Ch 25 4, 29).

E. E. N.

GIDDEL, gid'del (גִּדֵּל, giddēl): 1. The ancestral head of one of the subdivisions of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 47; Neh 7 49). 2. The ancestral head of one of the subdivisions of Solomon's servants (Ezr 2 56; Neh 7 58). E. E. N.

GIDEON, gid'ē-ŏn (גִּדְעוֹן, gidh'ōn), 'hewer,' or 'feller': A son of Joash, of the Manassite family of Abiezer, also called Jerubbaal (Jg 6 32), and Jerubbesheth (II S 11 21), a native of Ophrah and one of the Judges of Israel (Jg chs. 6–8).

The story of G. (Jg chs. 6–8) is the result of combining separate accounts not altogether harmonious. The main thread of one story can be found in 6 2-6a, 11-24, 33 f., 7 1, 9-11, 13-15, 16-20 (the parts in which pitchers and torches are spoken of), 21, 22b, 8 4-21. The main thread of another version is found in 6 25-32, 35, 7 2-8, 16-20 (the parts in which trumpets are spoken of), 22a, 23-25, 8 1-3. Of the other parts of the narrative, some sections as 6 1, 7-10, 8 33-35 are probably editorial. The first story is the simpler and more objective, and gives probably the more accurate account of Gideon's victory over the Midianite hordes. In this old story great emphasis is laid on Gideon's valor (6 12, 14, 8 21, etc.), on his faith in J", coupled with bold reliance on his own resources, and on his military skill. There is here no reference to the religious condition as corrupt and disloyal to J" In the other narrative miracle plays a prominent part, and far less is accredited to Gideon's own initiative and ability. In both, however, it is J" who gives the victory.

This signal deliverance from their enemies led the people of central Israel to offer Gideon a crown, the first recorded movement toward monarchy in Israel. Loyalty to the old tribal constitution led him to refuse, although for the rest of his life he was practically king in that section of Israel. His home town became the center of a somewhat inferior type of worship of J", and the ephod (q.v.) he made was the object of idolatrous reverence. He lived on a large scale, having an extensive harem and many children. The evil results of this departure from the primitive Israelite simplicity showed themselves in the career of his son Abimelech (q.v.). E. E. N.

GIDEONI, gid"ē-ō'nai (גִּדְעֹנִי, gidh'ōnī): The father of Abidan (Nu 1 11, 2 22, etc.). E. E. N.

GIDOM, gai'dŏm (גִּדְעֹם, gidh'ōm): A place mentioned in Jg 20 45, otherwise unknown. E. E. N.

GIER EAGLE. See PALESTINE, § 25.

GIFT: The giving of gifts, or presents, in ancient times was not usually from disinterested motives. Some return, in service or otherwise, was expected, or some obligation was thereby recognized, or confessed. Consequently 'gifts' played an important part in the ordinary life of the times, and the terms "gift," or "present," in the English Bible should not be interpreted exactly according to Western standards. When the Heb. term is minḥāh ('gift,' or "present" AV) and is used in a political sense, the ARV renders it by "tribute." The 'gift' one gave for a bride was more a purchase price than a present. "Gift" is also used a number of times in the sense of 'bribe' (Ex 23 8, etc.). Finally, "gift" is used in the sense of an offering, i.e., to God, or for His service (cf. Ex 28 38, etc.), or to false gods (Ezk 16 33).

1. O T Usage.

In the N T the word is used with few exceptions in a religious sense. Where the Gr. is δῶρον, it generally stands for an offering, either a sacrifice (Mt 5 23), or of money (e.g., Lk 21 1; He 5 1; cf. also Mk 7 11, RV); where δόμα is used, the idea is the bestowment of benefits because of affection (cf. Mt 7 11; Eph 4 8; Ph 4 17). In other cases (Gr. δωρεά, or δώρημα) it is used of the new life in Christ (Jn 4 10; Ro 5 15, etc.), or more specially of the gift of the Holy Spirit (Ac 2 38, etc.). Finally, the special dispensations or graces of the Spirit are called "gifts," χαρίσματα, μερισμοί (e.g., Ro 12 6; I Co 12 4 ff.; He 24, etc.) See also SACRIFICE, § 18, CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (b), and CHURCH, §§ 5–7.

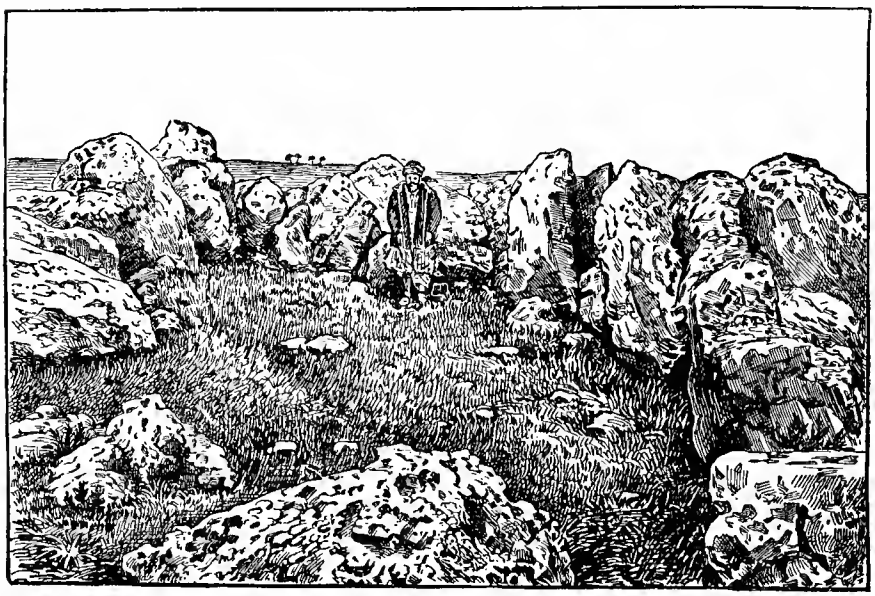
GILALAI, gil'a-lai (גִּלָּלַי, gilălay): A post-exilic musician (Neh 12 36). E. E. N.

GILBOA, gil-bō'a (גִּלְבֹּעַ, gilbōa'): A collective name for a hilly district (about 1,700 ft. above the sea at its highest point) located in the neighborhood of Shunem, Jezreel, and Bethshean, renowned as the battle-field on which the Israelites pitched their camp in Saul's last campaign against the Philistines (I S 28 4, 31 1; II S 1 21), and as the scene of the death of Saul. Map I, E 6. See PALESTINE, § 8. A. C. Z.

GILEAD, gil'ę-ad (גִּלְעָד, gil'ādh), 'rough': I. 1. A son of Machir and grandson of Manasseh, eponym of a clan (Gileadites, Nu 26 29, 30; Jos 17 1). 2. The father of Jephthah (Jg 11 1). 3. A son of Michael, a Gadite (I Ch 5 14).

II. 1. A city (Jg 10 17) near Mizpah (Hos 6 8). Gileadite (Jg 11 1) may mean an inhabitant of this city (cf. also JABESH-GILEAD). 2. The name of a somewhat loosely defined district E. of the Jordan. In its largest extent it is identified with the whole country S. of Hermon (Gn 37 25; Jos 22 9 ff.; II S 2 9; II K 10 33; Am 1 3; Ezk 47 18). In a narrower sense, it is one of the three sections of the E. Jordan country, the other two being Bashan and Moab (Dt 3 10; Jos 13 11; II K 10 33). In a still narrower sense, G. was bounded on the N. by Bashan and Geshur, or, conventionally, by the river Jarmuk, on the S. by a line drawn from the N. end of the Dead Sea eastward just S. of Heshbon (this portion of the district was more anciently called Jazer [q.v.], Nu 32 1), on the W. naturally by the Jordan, and on the E. by the wilderness (Jos 13 11, 13). In the allotment of the territory by Joshua, G. was assigned to the half-tribe of Manasseh and Gad, with a boundary between the two, shifting from the Jabbok (Dt 3 16; Jos 12 2) to a line drawn NE. and SW. from the S. end of the sea of Chinnereth, through Mahanaim. The N. part of the district was given to Manasseh, and the S. to Gad (but, according to I Ch 5 11, 16, Gad extended as far N. as Bashan). G. is, generally speaking, a mass of low mountains ranging in height from 1,500 to 2,500 ft. above the sea-level. It abounds in beautiful scenery and, though presenting a rugged and barren aspect from a distance, turns out on nearer approach to be pleasing and measurably fertile. It was famed as the home land of Jephthah (Jg 11 1), and of Elijah (I K 17 1); also for its rich pasturage (Mic 7 14; I Ch 5 16 mg.), on account of which it was chosen by the tribes to whom it was assigned (Nu 32 1). It was also known for its rich balsam (Jer 8 22, 46 11; see BALM OF GILEAD). A. C. Z.



Supposed Stone Circle at Bethel (see GILGAL, def. 1).

GILEAD, BALM OF. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, IV (1).

GILEAD, MOUNT: Strictly speaking, this term signifies the mountain range in the district of Gilead (Gn 31 21 ff.), but is applied in Jg 7 3 to a summit which projects into the valley of Jezreel. This may mean: (1) That the same name was somehow given independently to two separate mountainous districts on the two sides of the Jordan; (2) that there was a connection between the E. and W. sides, the possessions of the tribe of Naphtali reaching over to the E. side, thus extending the name over the hills in the neighborhood of Jezreel; (3) that the text was originally different, admitting of the application of the name to the region E. of the Jordan (cf. Moore on Jg 1 1); or (4) that Mt. Gilead is a textual corruption for Mt. Gilboa. The last supposition is the best solution of the difficulty. A. C. Z.

GILGAL, gil'gal (גִּלְגָּל, gilgal), 'circle of stones,' from gālal, 'to roll'; but Jos 5 9 f. derives it from the secondary meaning 'roll away': A name of places designated by a sacred circle of stones. The Heb. always has the article except in Jos 5 9, 12 23. 1. A place E. of Jericho, between that city and the Jordan (Jos 4 19). Map III, G 5. It was the first encampment of Israel W. of the river (Jos 5 10), where they set up 12 stones taken from the river-bed (Jos 4 20). According to Jos 5 2-9 the men of Israel were circumcised here. Josephus and others identified G. with what is now the modern Tell jeljūl, a mound with the ruins of a stone cloister or church. Conder in 1873–75 and 1880 found here the name Birket Jiljuliyeh. Joshua maintained a standing camp at G. during the earlier period of the conquest of Canaan (Jos 9 6, 10 6 ff., 14 6; Jg 2 1; cf. Mic 6 5). Perhaps the "quarries," or graven images, of Jg 3 19 are to be in some way connected or identified with this Gilgal. It was a religious and military center in the time of Samuel and Saul (I S 10 8, 11 14 f., 13 7 f., 12, 15, 15 12, 21, 33). Judah received David at G. on his return after the death of Absalom (II S 19 15 [16], 40 [41]). At Gilgal was a frequented sanctuary in the 8th cent. (Hos 4 15, 9 15, 12 11 [12]; Am 4 4, 5 5). Samuel visited a G. with Bethel and Mizpah (I S 7 16). The prophets may have referred to the G. in the Jordan Valley, but, as Bethel and Mizpah are on the central range of hills, the Gilgal visited by Samuel was near Bethel and identical with the following. 2. The modern village Jiljilia, on a hill lying between Bethel, Shechem, and Samaria. Map III, F 4. Here there was a school of the prophets (II K 4 38), connected with Elijah and Elisha. The order in II K 2 1-7, Gilgal, Bethel, Jericho, is evidence that this G. is to be found in the hill-country rather than in the Jordan Valley. 3. A place associated with Mt. Gerizim and Mt. Ebal (Dt 11 30), if not the G. of 1, then the Juleijil just E. of Mt. Gerizim. Map III, F 3. 4. A place mentioned in Jos 12 23 as in Sharon, unless we are to read, with LXX., "Galilee." 5. A place on the border between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15 7), over against Adummim (cf. Map II, G 1) = Geliloth (Jos 18 17); cf. Beth-gilgal (Neh 12 29), a place near Jerusalem. This last G. may be the same as 1. C. S. T.

GILOH, gai'lō (גִּלֹה, gīlōh): A town of Judah (Jos 15 51), the home of Ahithophel, the Gilonite (I S 15 12). The identification on Map II, E 2 is probable, but not certain. E. E. N.

GLAD TIDINGS: To "bring glad (or good) tidings" (Lk 2 10) is the rendering of the Greek verb εὐαγγελίζεσθαι (used in LXX. for Heb. bāsar in such passages as Is 40 9, 52 7, etc.). This verb is more frequently translated "to preach" or "to preach the gospel." See also GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 1. E. E. N.

GLASS: The rendering of zekhōkhith (Job 28 17), where the poet compares wisdom to the pure glass. In Dt 33 19 Zebulun and Issachar are promised "the hidden treasures of the sand." Targum Pseudo-Jonathan interprets this as meaning that "from the sand they will produce mirrors and vessels of glass." A legend tells of a pavement of glass in the palace of Solomon. Undoubtedly the ancient Hebrews were acquainted with glass, as its manufacture runs back to an extremely early age. Glass beads of remote antiquity have been discovered in the excavations at Gezer. The Egyptians manufactured glass at an early period. We have a lion's head of opaque blue glass with the name of Nuantef IV, of the 11th dynasty; a bead of glass bearing the name of Queen Ha't-sepsut; and a green opaque jar of Thothmes III. The Phœnicians learned the art probably from the Egyptians; they used glass beads for bartering with rude African tribes. The Romans executed works of great beauty in this material. In the N T we read of the "sea of glass like unto crystal" (Rev 4 6), and the golden streets of the New Jerusalem are "as it were of transparent glass" (Rev 21 18, 21). The force of the comparison lies in the transparency of the glass. The crystal (Job 28 17; Ezk 1 22) is the translucent rock-crystal, which was well known to the ancients. The glass of antiquity was opaque, hence the transparency of it is emphasized when it is compared to crystal. The terms mar'āh (Ex 38 8) and gillāyōn (Is 3 23), rendered "glass" AV, refer to mirrors made of polished metal commonly used in antiquity. J. A. K.

GLORY: The generic idea in the Heb. and Gr. terms rendered by "glory" is that of 'excellency,' or 'preeminence.' In some ('addereth, Zec 11 3; hādhār, Ps 90 16, etc.), it is a matter of adornment; in others (hōdh, Job 39 20, etc.; ts'bhī, Is 13 19, etc.; tiph'ereth, Is 10 12, etc.; ṭōhar, Ps 89 44 ["brightness" RV]) it is 'beauty'; in a third class the distinctive idea is 'preciousness,' or 'rarity'

1. Original Terms.

(y'qār, Dn 2 37, etc.); in a fourth, and by far the most numerous, class of passages in the O T, the specific thought is that of 'honor' (kābhōdh, 'weight,' Gn 45 13; Ex 2 37, etc.). In the N T the conception of glory is primarily visual, that of a halo of light (δόξα). This conception was moreover taken over from the O T through the LXX., in which δόξα is the usual rendering of kābhōdh. The Gr. κλέος (I P 2 20) is rather 'praise' than "glory."

These variations blend in two distinct uses, a general and a more specific. The former is the application of the term to human conditions, including the idea of glory as external pomp. The kings and prominent characters of public and social life display such glory in their appearance among men (Is 8 7; Mt 6 29; Ps 45 13). With this is naturally associated intellectual preeminence (Est 5 11). It includes, further, the conception of honor in the esteem of men, hence it is synonymous with reputation (I Ch 16 24; Ps 96 3), or anything for the possession of which one may be proud, or admire and defer to another. Even inanimate objects are in this sense endowed with glory (cf. "the glory of Lebanon," Is 35 2, 60 13; "the glory of the celestial bodies," etc., I Co 15 40, 41). Poetically, when glory is attributed to God, speaking of His distinctive character, it may thus become equivalent to the word 'self' (Gn 49 6, "honor" AV; Ps 57 8).

2. The More General Use of the Term.

The specific meaning of the term is associated with the name of J", and grows out of the fact that when glory is attributed to God, it is sometimes in the general sense above defined, and sometimes in a more special sense. In the former, common in the Pss, God's glory is the revelation of His preeminence, calling for awe and admiration, whether conceived as external splendor or inward power (Ps 19 1, "the heavens declare the glory of God," 66 2, 96 3, 7). In its specific sense, the glory of J" is conceived of as a physical phenomenon accompanying the revelation of His presence. This usage appears uniformly in Ezk and in the Hexateuch (P).

3. Specific Use: the Glory of J"

The representations of God's physical glory found in these two places differ in some respects. The glory of J" as seen by Ezekiel (1 27 f., etc.) is a definite shape with color: "as the appearance of fire, As the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain, so was the appearance of the brightness round about." This is associated with a vision. In a true sense the description is apocalyptic. As such, it may be an actual theophany or a literary expedient to express a revelation received by the prophet in a subconscious form. In either case, the reality of the revelation will depend not on its external form, but on the fact that God wished to, and did, make His will known to the prophet. In neither case, however, was the glory visible to the physical eye of any one but the prophet himself.

4. Glory of J"; a Physical Appearance.

The glory of J" as described in P is a brightness of undefined form. "Devouring fire" is the nearest approach to a description given (Ex 24 17). This all the people were able to see (Ex 16 17). It manifested itself in the Tent of Meeting (Ex 40 34, 35; Lv 9 23; Nu 14 10, 16 19, 42, 20 6) and filled the Temple at its dedication (II Ch 7 1 ff.). There are two possible explanations of the literary relationship of the conceptions of Ezk and P. Either P describes a theophany in the form of a dazzling light, which served as a basis and preparation for Ezekiel's more definite vision, or Ezekiel's vision is an apocalypse, which paved the way for the idea of the more constant and broadly perceptible halo implied in P. General critical considerations favor the second alternative. Again, upon the basis of the unity of these two pictures of physical glory (Ezk and P), the question will next arise whether the physical as a whole is older than the general and metaphorical conception. Though the former may seem more primitive, the facts leave practically no ground for this view. The conception of a specific glory in material form could arise much easier after than before the greatness and splendor of God had been fully appreciated.

An intermediate conception of the glory of J" appears in Ex 33 18-22. That here the reference is to something different from the physical glory appears from Moses' earnest petition for a vision of God's glory. He could not have asked for a glimpse of that which he could have seen by visiting the Tent of Meeting. Therefore, in the answer to the petition, the glory is identified with the person of God Himself. "It shall come to pass while my glory passeth by" is explained by "until I have passed by" (Ex 33 22).

5. Glory in Ex 33 18 ff.

The terms glorify and glorious, while frequently used in the O T and the N T, occur in their ordinary cognate meanings and involve nothing which has not been covered in the foregoing discussion of the primary term glory.

GNOSTICISM: The beginnings of Gnosticism can not be traced or ascribed to any one person, place, or time. This much only is clear, that Gnostic "tendencies" had been cropping out here and there throughout the Orient long prior to the rise of any definite leader or system. The fact is Gnosticism was but one of the variegated products of the gradual intermingling of the old faiths and philosophies under the tolerant rule of Rome. The movement, however, did not become aggressive and missionary until after the advent of Christianity. The zeal of the early Christians and their radiant hopes intensified the "general thirst for religion," and there sprang up here and there a peculiar eclectic, syncretic religion, which in due time came to be known as Gnosticism. The word "Gnosis" (γνῶσις) is used by Paul (I Co 1 5, 8 1, 7, 10, 11, 13 8; II Co 2 14, 4 6, 6 6, 8 7, 10 5, 11 6; Ro 2 20, 11 33, 15 14; Ph 3 8; Col 2 3) without any essentially sinister import. The same is true of certain other words (αἰών, βαθύς, μυστήριον, πλήρωμα, σοφία, τέλειος), which eventually became technical terms with the Gnostics, and were thereafter more or less offensive to the Christians. This does not prove the absence of Gnosticism in the regions where Paul was laboring, but only that the Gnostics as such had not yet invaded and menaced the Christian fellowship.

Gnosticism was an eclectic, philosophico-mystic religion, which drew its constituent elements from the current disintegrating systems of religion and philosophy, while at the same time it freely appropriated the apostolic teaching and absorbed something of the virile faith and zeal of youthful Christianity. The result of such a commingling and combining of the old faiths and the new was Gnosticism in one or another of its manifold forms.

2. Constituent Elements.

The earliest traces of the Gnostic temper recorded in the N T literature are found in the story of Simon Magus (Ac 8 9 f.). Simon's chief claim, it is true, was to the possession of magical power, but such an assumption was not wholly foreign to historic Gnosticism, and besides, in this instance, it seems to have rested back upon premises entirely germane to the Gnostic philosophy. Simon himself may never have been or become a Gnostic, but his adherents with a smattering of Christian truth were destined to develop in that direction (see SIMON MAGUS).

3. Simon Magus.

The chief information concerning the contact between Christianity and nascent Gnosticism in N T times comes to us through five groups of documents: Paul's Epistle to the Colossians, the Pastorals, II P and Jude, Rev, I, II, and III Jn, and the Ignatius and Polycarp epistles. It need not be assumed that some specific form of Gnosticism was present in each or indeed in many of the communities covered by these documents. But Gnostic tendencies were everywhere emerging, which foreshadowed the coming struggle. Many of the elements in the future Gnostic systems were causing irritation, especially to the churches of Asia Minor, and the Apostles and other leaders recognized them as foreign and even hostile to the Christian faith, and uttered their words of warning.

4. N T Sources.

It is clear from a study of the Colossian Epistle that the Christian communities of the Lycus valley were being troubled by self-appointed teachers, whose doctrines arose through an intermingling of current Jewish and Christian and even pagan elements. The essentially Gnostic notes are found in the pretentious philosophy, angel-worship, and ascetic requirements referred to in ch. 2. And the emphasis which Paul in this Epistle puts upon the headship of Christ (1 15 ff.) leaves us to infer that this central Christian doctrine was suffering serious reduction at the hands of these precocious theologians. Here surely was soil from which the later Gnostic systems may easily have sprung.

The situation reflected in the Pastorals is still more advanced. From such passages as I Ti 1 3 f., 4 1 f., 6 3 f.; II Ti 1 13 f., 2 14 f., 3 1 f., 4 3 f.; Tit 1 10 f., 2 1 f., 3 9 f., it is evident that the Christian communities of Ephesus and Crete were much perturbed. False teaching of various kinds and degrees was rife among them. Certain men, among whom were Hymenæus and Philetus, had crept into the churches and created a crisis. Some of them were of the circumcision and assumed to be teachers of the Law. But many views widely aberrant from the common Jewish and Christian faith were stealthily taught. Here again we have a pretentious philosophy, a specious cosmology, a mild Docetism, a practical asceticism, and perhaps also libertinism, and a tinge of simony. Most of these are constituent elements in one or another of the later Gnostic systems.

In Jude and II P there is an advance over the situation described in the Pastorals, in that these "false teachers" have got well entrenched in the churches, or at least in certain Syrian and Asian communions (cf. Jude 1 3 f.; II P 2 1 f., 3 2 f.). And they have perhaps also advanced farther in their divergence from the common Christian conception of the unique and central position of Christ. But their teaching is still inchoate, and they are without commanding leadership. Of course these "false prophets" were aberrant from the common faith in varying degrees, some being wholly unconscious of their divergence. There were among them charlatans and rogues, but there were doubtless also those who were seeking for the truth and for the lofty pathway of the Christian life. It is plain that we have here the germs of Gnosticism, which needed only time and occasion to put forth and bud and blossom.

In the Johannine writings the "Gnostic temper and teaching" are shown to be even more wide-spread and perhaps more self-conscious and antichristian. The churches at Ephesus and Pergamum are commended for having rejected those who claimed to be apostles, and then they are warned against the "Nicolaitans," who seem to be crystallizing into a sect. In Thyatira the "woman Jezebel, who calleth herself a prophetess," has secured a following, which professes to "know the deep things of Satan," and observes and practises things contrary to the Christian faith. In Smyrna and Philadelphia the churches are greatly troubled by those professing to be Jews, "but are of the synagogue of Satan" (Rev chs. 2 and 3). It is in I and II Jn, however, that the main advance and divergences are marked. From such passages as I Jn 1 8, 2 18 f., 4 1-3; II Jn 7 f., it is plain that the cardinal doctrine of the Christian faith has been called in question. Plainly the crisis has come, the climax has been reached, and the breach must be made. The "false prophets who have gone out into the world" must not be allowed to return and bring back "this teaching," and lead the brethren astray. The familiar tone of these Epistles indicates an intimate knowledge of the inner life of the Christian communions to which they are addressed. The author saw the "tendencies" in the teaching which he so vigorously condemns and repudiates; and he foresaw whereunto it would grow. Evidently the churches were not aware of the great danger which threatened them, else the warning need not have been reiterated again and again.

The Ignatian epistles combat two heretical tendencies. The one was a false conception of the person of Christ, which questioned the reality of His earthly physical life, and seems to have been especially rife in Ephesus, Tralleis, and Smyrna. The other was a disposition on the part of some in the churches of Magnesia and Philadelphia to relapse into "Judaism," which meant "the keeping of the Law," the observance of the Sabbath to the neglect of the Lord's Day, the exploiting of "antiquated fables," the living "apart from Christ," and similar errors. The Docetism which Ignatius combats is essentially the same as that denounced so vigorously in the Johannine epistles, and the stress placed upon the reality of the human, physical nature of Christ is likewise the same.

5. The Evidence of the Ignatian Epistles.

Our examination of the five groups of documents, with reference to the origin and progress of Gnosticism, leads us to infer: (1) That there was a wide-spread and increasing Gnostic tendency, especially in Asia Minor, during the closing decades of the 1st cent.; (2) that Gnostic views of religion and life were filtering into the churches, and provoking increasing resentment on the part of the leaders; (3) that these advanced ideas came in the first instance and in large measure from, or through, the Jewish environment of the churches; (4) that the advocates of this fuller Christian Gnosis were for the most part unconscious of any actual departure from the true faith; (5) that they were, however, children of their own age, and had become eclectic in philosophy and religion, and especially in ideas concerning revelation and redemption; (6) that the common allegorical method and habit of interpreting the Scriptures, whether Jewish or pagan, were responsible for many, if not most, of the Gnostic vagaries; (7) that the emphasis upon "knowledge" tended to discount faith, and led to arrogance and want of charity and of brotherly love; (8) that the dualistic philosophy of the day, together with the allegorical method, fairly accounts for the Docetic view of the person of Christ, so common to the Gnostics; (9) that the ascetic principles and practises of the Gnostics were the heritage which they shared with the men of their day; and, finally, (10) that Gnosticism was but a common distemper of the times, which gradually penetrated into the churches, and aroused the leaders to a vigorous and ofttimes ill-tempered resistance.

7. The Christian Idea of God

The fundamental subject of the Bible is God. The first book in the canonical order opens with announcements about God as the Creator of the Universe. The last book closes with words of Him, in and through whom God brings the history of man to its consummation. The Bible is, therefore, regarded by all Christians as containing the revelation of God, and of the duties and the destiny which that revelation necessarily brings to every human being.

Before summarizing the doctrine of God in the O T we must recognize some principles and methods which seem to characterize the course of the revelation.

The historic revelation began with a group of Semitic tribes afterward known as Israel, who already possessed religious beliefs and practises resembling those of cognate tribes. In the midst of these the new religion took shape through Moses, and only gradually and, in some cases, after long labor succeeded in extending or correcting them. There is much discussion among scholars on two vital points: (1) The degree of extra-Israelitish approaches to monotheism, and (2) the origin of the name and worship of Yāhweh (Jehovah, q.v.) (cf. L. B. Paton in Biblical World, 1906). It is clear that the O T recognizes affinities with earlier conceptions of God, for inter alia we find: (a) the God of whom Moses teaches is the God of their fathers (Ex 3 4, 15, 6 3); (b) Melchizedek was priest of 'Ēl 'Elyōn, 'God Most High' (Gn 14 18 ff.); (c) even J″ is known to other tribes before Moses receives his revelation (Ex 3 18). Recent knowledge of Babylonian and Egyptian religions makes it clear that something more had been attained by some races than a simple monolatry. But it was not true ethical monotheism, and therefore perished. The god was still attached to some astral body (as Sin to the moon), or to some great natural phenomenon (some believe that J″ may have been the name of a thunder-god). That which distinguishes the movement in Israel may be set forth as follows: (1) Moses had an experience of the presence and power of God deeper and purer than any man before him. (2) This experience, or voice, of God fitted him to become the leader of a group of tribes out of Egyptian bondage, in a manner which they ever after recognized as the act of God (Ex 15 13, 20 2; Am 3 1; Hos 13 4, etc.). (3) The name of J″ received an interpretation which released it from all mere physical association (Ex 3 13 f.), made it the name of a supreme and living personality and attracted to itself the truth in older names (El, Elohim, El Shaddai [God Almighty], Adonai; see article Divine Names, EB, III, 3320–3331). (4) The covenant between Israel and J″, founded under Moses, was founded on His righteousness and grace, His good will, and on their continued trust and obedience toward Him as their only God. (5) That covenant (see COVENANT, § 3) required of the people complete trust in God and obedience to His will. Hence the rise of that great system of Law in which the will of God was formally announced (Smend, 41 ff.). All these elements were present in the religion of Israel from the time of Moses, and formed the conditions under which heathen beliefs and practises were gradually cast out and a true monotheism was established.

1. Pre-Mosaic Beliefs and Practises.

2. Erroneous Beliefs and Heathen Practises.

Though signs are found, as said above, that some races had lofty conceptions of their gods, yet the Semitic tribes immediately related to Israel, as well as the Canaanites among whom they settled, as a rule practised idolatry of a profuse kind, while some reached what has been called 'monolatry' (a tribe owning allegiance to one god as its god). The worship of J″ was begun under Moses amid such beliefs and practises. From the first, three things stood firm and clear whenever a prophet spoke: (1) That J″ is alone Lord of Israel, (2) that He loathes idolatry, and (3) that He has a fixed will (or character) and demands the same of His people. From these vital centers the life and light spread. It is natural to find that in belief and practise Israel continued many things whose inconsistency with the worship of the living God was only gradually and painfully discovered. Students of the O T are laboriously striving to trace out the long and tortuous path through racial, political, economic, as well as intellectual and moral, changes, by which from age to age the self-revelation of God was accomplished. (A) In the matter of belief, for example, we find that the Israelites long retained the habit of thinking of their God as if He were a human being (anthropomorphism), not only as to the possession of moral and intellectual characteristics (e.g., mercy, grace, patience, long-suffering, loving-kindness) and limitations (e.g., His fury, jealousy, hate, vengeance, wrath), but even of physical organs (e.g., His back, face, finger, foot, form, hand, heart, mouth, and voice). See also the poetic expressions "pinions" (feathers AV) and "wings" (Ps 91 4). So gradual and laborious was the removal of these ideas that scholars are in doubt as to when they can be said to have died out. They naturally passed from a literal to a symbolic use, as when even we speak of the heart or the mind of God; and it may well be that for the nobler spirits in Israel this anthropomorphism in its grosser forms ceased at a much earlier date than for the mass of the people. (B) In the matter of religious practise: (1) Some practises, as idolatry, polytheism, human sacrifice, sensual ceremonies, were utterly condemned from the beginning of the worship of J″ That they survived, or intruded themselves at later periods, in no wise proves that they were not felt to be condemned by the inward nature of J″ worship. It began to make and mark its distinctiveness at the very start, or it could never have done so later. (2) Some practises, as circumcision, sacrifice, feasts, purification, perhaps the Sabbath, which were already in use, or were taken over in Canaan, were gradually changed in form and meaning. Hence we may well expect to find, as we do, that the use and value of these are found to alter from one stage to another, as the growing revelation of God flung its light upon them. (3) Other practises, as the observation of sacred places, stones, trees, animals, etc., continued for a while without explicit condemnation, but were found to be inconsistent with the worship of J″, when His self-revelation had become more familiar to the general thought of the people.

3. Periods and Instruments of Revelation.

In the study of the growth of the knowledge of God in Israel, it is necessary to pay attention alike to the main periods of the people's history and the instruments of revelation. (1) For it was always in connection with their changing economic, social, and political circumstances that the light of that knowledge increased. The settlement in Canaan brought contact with more highly civilized peoples, new forms of worship, new customs. And these brought at once stimulus and temptation. The rise of the kingship ushered in a new era in which great strides were made alike in national unity and intelligence, and in the need for that prophetic instruction through which henceforth the knowledge of God grew more definite, more spiritual, more awful. Contact with the great empires of the East (Assyria, Babylon, Persia) evoked tremendous changes in which the nation's life seemed to be utterly quenched. The long and terrible struggle was made the occasion of sublime revelations of God by Amos, Hosea, Isaiah (chs. 1–39), Jeremiah, etc. The Exile was midnight for the nation, but dawn for the Church of Israel. Out of it the people of J″ came with such clear knowledge of the living God as no human mind had ever possessed (Ezekiel, Isaiah [chs. 40–66], the collection of the Psalms, etc.). (2) The instruments of revelation were (a) institutions of religious and political life (the covenant, sacrifice, priesthood, temple, law, the judgeship, kingship, etc.); (b) events in history (famine and poverty, wealth and power, war and victory, defeat and exile). These institutions and events were not peculiar to Israel. All peoples, small and great, have had them. That which made them channels and occasions of revelation was the work of the prophets (see PROPHECY). Under their teaching, spread over many centuries, the people were held to their faith in J″ and were taught to see in Him the Lord of their life, the faithful, merciful, omnipotent, righteous, and invisible King, not of Israel only, but, at last, of all nations.

The name by which the O T doctrine of God is known is monotheism. It is nowhere set forth in a formal manner. It is the general view of God, which is gained from a survey of the whole literature. It is implied in the earliest teachings; it is made explicit in the latest. It begins in the conviction of that covenant relationship between J″ and Israel; it culminates in the spiritual experience of many psalms and the Messianic prophecies of second Isaiah. When we bring the various elements together we have as a result that doctrine of God out of which the Christian is historically derived. The following references are given merely as illustrations, for which many parallels are in the O T (1) There is but one God, Jehovah of Israel (Jer 10 6-10; Is 42 8). He alone is the living God (Jer 4 2, 10 10); the idols are dead things (Is 44 9-17). (2) The living God is the Creator of all things (Gn 1 1 ff.; Is 42 5, 45 18; Ps 104; Pr 8 22-29), Himself eternal (Ps 90 2; Is 44 6, 48 12). (3) He is, therefore, the Ruler of all nations, as well as of the universe (Job chs. 38–39; Pss 8, 19; Am 9 7; Is 19 25, 45 1-13, 18). He is omnipresent (Ps 139), omnipotent (Is 43 6, 45 9, 50 2 f., 64 1-4), omniscient (Job 34 21 ff.; Dn 2 20-22; Pr 8 22-31; I S 16 7). (4) Among the moral attributes of God we find His holiness (see Holiness and cf. the expression Holy One of Israel, especially frequent in Isaiah), supreme and all-inclusive (Ex 15 11; Is 5 16, 57 15; Lv 11 44 f.), His righteousness, which appears in His just dealings with men, rewarding each according to his works (Gn 18 25; Ps 18 25 ff.; Is 42 21, 45 24); as righteous, He is also faithful to His covenant word and therefore to His people (Dt 4 30 f., 7 9; Hos 2 18 f.; Ps 43 3; Is 40 8); from His very righteousness and faithfulness comes His mercy. He is full of compassion, of unlimited kindness (Dt 7 8; Ex 34 6; Is 40 1; Ps 103). (5) One of the most remarkable elements in the monotheism of Israel is that J″ is God of the future. This religion arose from His promises, which became more wonderful in their scope and character as the national tragedy deepened. The Messianic is an essential element in monotheism; without it God is not a fully spiritual being and His attributes are shorn of their absolute nature. Hence the Messianic element in all the varied meanings and forms of that great hope is always a reflection of the character, as well as a revelation of the authority, power, and purpose of J″ before the faith of His people (cf. the spirit of the King in Ps 72 with that of Ps 103, or the spirit of Is ch. 53 with that of Is ch. 41) (see Messiah; Prophecy).

4. The Resulting Monotheism.

When we pass to the N T we find ourselves in a new world made for us by a new religion. The change is due to the creative personality of Jesus Christ. It was as rapid as it was great, and yet it passed through certain well-defined stages. And, as in the O T, the full N T doctrine of God is not gained from any one stage, not even from the oral teaching of Jesus, but is the effect of the whole revealing process therein described. (1) It began with the appearing of Jesus (identified by John the Baptist, Mk 1 1-8) as the Messiah. He avoided the title because of its current misinterpretations, but He accepted it (Mt 8 29, 14 33) when His personality and work had opened the eyes of men to the truth. He at once elucidated and fulfilled the true meaning of Messiahship by (a) the energy of His personal will, authority, power (Mk 1 21-28, 3 13, 4 41, 6 1-6, etc.), which overawed the people and even awoke dread among His disciples at certain crises (Mk 5 17, 10 32; Lk 5 8, 26); (b) the sublimity and finality of His teaching about God and man. He spoke with convincing and original authority (Mt 7 28 f., 13 54; Mk 1 22, 6 2, 11 18); (c) the emphasis on His relationship to God as the Son to the Father, especially when compared with His assurances that all men must call God their Father (Mt 5 44 f., 6 9, 18, 11 25-27; cf. Jn 5 18, 10 24-39). This emphasis was no mere formal claim to His own share in a general human relationship. It was the foundation in His own consciousness for the demand that men come to Him, believe in Him, follow Him, obey Him, as the condition of their right relationship with God (Mt 7 21-27, 10 32 f., 37-39, 11 25-30, 12 50, 16 27, 17 5, 9, 18 5 f., 10, 21 33-45). It is of course prominent and explicit in the Fourth Gospel; (d) the exercise of His authority to forgive the sins of individual persons (Mk 2 1-12); (e) His description of the kingdom of God (or of heaven) as both present and future, established here and fulfilled there, which may have led His disciples to misunderstand the course of coming events, but made all the more clear and impressive His consciousness as Master of life eternal (Mt 5 3, 10 [ἐστιν], 13 37 f.; Lk 17 20 f.; Mk 10 17-21, 24-31; cf. Jn, passim); (f) His view of His own death as no mere disaster and close of His active ministry, but as the supreme act whose full personal and, therefore, moral significance must henceforth condition the relations of God and man (Mk 10 45, 14 22-25). In all these self-expressions there moved a consciousness of a new type, not that of prophetism nor of private saintliness, a consciousness which all through seemed to act and speak and reveal itself as if veiled, restrained, as if only preparing the field and itself for its full scope. (2) All this, as the N T tells the story, would have remained unapprehended and fruitless, save as a baffling and pathetic mystery in one man's picture of humanity and of the inscrutable Divine, but for (a) the resurrection (Lk 24 5-7, 19-27; Jn 20 8 f.; Ac 1 2-4, 3 26, 13 29-37, 17 31; Ro 1 4; I Co 15 3-8, 20; I P 1 3) and (b) the gift of the Holy Spirit (see Holy Spirit). In these events the inner nature, source, and meaning of His consciousness became fully revealed. And through the change which the whole of these facts and events wrought in the relations of those men toward God the human consciousness broke into a new era, a new universe, and a new, sublime, and luminous knowledge of God. For it was God who had sent His Son and His Spirit, and He stood revealed in the whole redeeming work which was thus done before the eyes and upon the hearts of men.

5. In the N T.

Only a brief summary of the main features in the new doctrine of God can be given here. Those Jewish monotheists were surprised out of their pure monotheism into a new way of conceiving and worshiping God. (1) We find them rendering worship and ascribing Divine titles and glory to Jesus Christ as Lord (Jn 20 28; Ro 16 27; I Co 1 2, 16 22-24; II Co 12 8; Rev 1 4 f.), and in prayers and ascriptions of praise His name is continually used along with the name of God the Father. And, indeed, as God acts through Christ on man, worship is given to God through Christ (Ro 5 11; Jude ver 25; He 13 20). (2) The supreme blessings of the soul are said to be derived from all three names, Father, Son, and Spirit: grace (Ro 1 7, 15 15; I Co 15 10, 16 23; II Co 6 1, 13 14), peace (Eph 6 23; Ro 8 6; Gal 5 22), life (Ro 6 23, 8 2; I Jn 5 11 f.), love (Ro 5 5, 8 35, 39; Eph 3 14-19; I Jn 4 10-13). (3) In many passages all three names are used in a coordination and interchange of powers and attributes which were new and startling to the whole world—both of Jew and Gentile (Mt 28 19; Ro 5 5 f., 8 1-17, 15 30; I Co 2 10-16, 6 19 f.; II Co 13 14; Gal 5 16-24; Ti 3 4-7; Jn 14 16, 26, 15 26; I Jn 3 23 f., 4 2 f.). Although in certain passages the relations of Christ to God and to the universe are discussed, or abruptly stated (Ph 2 5-11; Eph ch. 1; Col ch. 1), we do not find in the N T an elaborated theory or doctrine of the Trinity. What we find is a community of individuals to whom has come the very indwelling of God, whose open conscious fellowship with Him has resulted from the person and work of Jesus Christ and the gift of the Spirit of God. This new and highest, and indeed final, type of human experience is realized in their faith, worship, love, and obedience, directed toward the three names Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, as three coordinate, living, Divine sources of mercy, righteousness, love, life eternal. And yet they worship and serve one God. Monotheism had evidently passed into a remarkable and new form (I Co 8 4-6; I Ti 1 12-17; II Ti 1 8-10, 14).

6. Apostolic Theology.

Christian men were forced to think out the implications of this whole situation. (1) The redemption wrought by Christ, the revelation of the will, power, wisdom, purpose, holiness, and love of God were now too clear, too glorious, too real, to admit of doubt on the part of those who had passed into life and light. Using every hint in the apostolic records, they gradually worked out various theories regarding the ultimate significance and relations of the three names. The Trinity of historical experience was there, given once for all in the very origin and nature of the Christian life. Its explanation resulted in various forms of Trinitarian doctrine. This is not the place to recount them. Sufficient to say that the instinct of the Church has ever been to reject any theory of the Divine nature and the three names which, by reaction, weakens faith in the reality of the Atonement, the act of Divine redemption on the Cross; or in the permanent relation of the Father and the Son to the earthly life of man through the Spirit; or in the reality of the immediate and personal revelation of God the Father in these events, facts, and experiences. Since what we may call realistic Trinitarianism is the essential, or typical, view of God given in the N T, some form of theoretic Trinitarianism has always characterized the doctrine of the Church as a whole. (2) The N T doctrine of God retains all the highest O T conceptions of Him, as the Creator and Lord of Nature (Mt 5 34 f., 6 26, 31; Ac 7 48-50, 17 24-28; Ro 1 20, 11 33-36; Col 1 15-19; Jn 1 1-4); holy and righteous (the whole teaching of Jesus rests on the idea that God is of an inflexible justice and holiness, as well as mercy, in His rule and judgment of men) (Mt 5 3-10, 6 33, 11 21-24, 13 41-43, 24 45-51; cf. Ro 1 17, 2 5-16, 3 21-30, Jn 3 10); almighty and all-wise (Mt 19 26, 25 31-46, 28 18-20; Jn 10 27-29; Ro 11 33; I Co 2 10 f.; I Ti 1 17); merciful and gracious (Mt 5 7, 45, 6 14 f., 7 11, 11 25 f., 29 f.); but the N T contains the supreme revelation of His character as holy love, for which indeed a noun seems to have been coined, ἀγάπη (Mt 5 43-48; Jn 3 16; I Jn 4 7-13; Ro 5 5, 8, 8 35-39; Eph 2 4, 3 17-19). It is in the fellowship of this God thus revealed as Father of Jesus Christ the Redeemer, and as indwelling Spirit, that those hearts of apostolic men reached a combined fervor of love and moral clearness, in peace and hope and power, which are accepted wherever the gospel goes as the very essence of the Supreme Good itself.

7. The Christian Idea of God.

LITERATURE: The literature is immense, and relevant discussions of this topic occur in many kinds of works on Biblical History and Theology, in all works concerning Christ, Pauline and Johannine Doctrine, and in all the Systems of Christian Doctrine and its History. GOD, CHILDREN OF. See GOD, SONS AND DAUGHTERS OF (3).

GOD, SON OF. See JESUS CHRIST, § 14 (b).

GOD, SONS AND DAUGHTERS OF: A phrase used in whole or in part with various meanings. (1) In Gn 6 1, Job 1 6, 2 1 the expression "sons of God" refers to the heavenly spirits who minister about the throne (cf. I K 22 19 ff.; Is 6 2 ff.) and make up the court of the Supreme Ruler. The passage Gn 6 1 stands practically alone in the O T in its conception of the possibility of union between spiritual beings and the daughters of men. It may be a fragment of Semitic mythology, which the writer in Gn (J) saw fit to make use of (see GENESIS, § 4 ff.). (2) The expressions "my sons" and "my daughters" in Is 43 6 refer to the exiled Israelites, who are to be restored to their land through Cyrus. This passage was evidently in Paul's mind in II Co 6 18, where he uses it of Christians in distinction from unbelievers (II Co 6 18). (3) In the O T 'my sons' ("children" in EV) is frequently applied by the prophets in the name of J" to Israel as the people of J" (Is 1 2, etc.). This expression reappears in the N T in the more spiritual sense of those who truly recognize God as their Father and seek to do His will (Mt 5 9, 45, etc. [υἱοί]; Ro 8 16 f., etc. [τέκνα]). E. E. N.

GOD FORBID. See FORBID.

GODHEAD: Of the three Greek words represented by this term that in Ac 17 29 (τὸ θεῖον) is more literally rendered 'the divine'; but in classical usage it is the exact equivalent of 'God.' It is therefore chosen by Paul as the more philosophical designation of God in this address, designed to recall to the minds of his hearers a conception more exalted than that associated with their pantheon. The other two terms (θειότης and θεότης) differ from each other precisely as 'divinity' and 'deity' in English. In Ro 1 20 ("divinity" RV) the Apostle has in mind the quality of God; in Col 2 9 His inner essence or personality. For classical parallels for Ac 17 29 cf. Plato, Phædr. 246 D; for Ro 1 20, cf. Plut. Cur Pythia nunc nomeddat, etc., 8; and for Col 2 9 cf. Plut. De defec. Orac., and Lucian, Icarom., 9. A. C. Z.

GODLESS: This word occurs only in RV, rendering a Hebrew term (ḥānēph), which means 'profane' (Job 8 13, 13 16, 15 34, etc.; Pr 11 9; Is 33 14, "hypocrite" AV). The original is derived from a root denoting 'that which cuts itself off (from God) and is rejected.' The idea of hypocrisy is attached to the word in later Mishnaic usage. A. C. Z.

GODLINESS: A strictly N T term, its root idea being 'reverence,' or more specifically, 'the loving fear of God' (I Ti 2 2; II Ti 3 5; II P 3 11; cf. Eus. Præp. Ev., 1, 3). Godly is used in the O T as equivalent to 'merciful' (Ps 4 3, 32 6), and once to what has a 'special relation to God' ('from God,' Mal 2 15). In the N T it renders both the adjective 'godly' (εὐσεβής) and the general conception of being specifically 'related to God' (II Co 1 12; I Ti 1 4). Hence "after a godly sort" (II Co 7 9, "after a godly manner" AV) means, strictly, 'according to the will of God,' or 'in a way suitable in relations with God.' A. C. Z.

GODS. See in general GREEK AND ROMAN IDOLATRY, and SEMITIC RELIGION.

GOING, GOINGS, GOINGS FORTH, or OUT, GOING UP: The verb 'go' represents a large number of different words in the Heb. or Gr. originals. In most cases the interpretation involves no difficulty. One or two special usages call for remark. "Goings forth" is used frequently of the boundary of a district (Nu 34 5, etc.). "Going up" in the AV is frequently much better rendered in the RV by "ascent" (Jos 15 7, etc.). E. E. N.

GOLAN (גּוֹלָן, gōlān): A city of refuge (Dt 4 43; Jos 20 8, 21 17) in the territory assigned to the half-tribe of Manasseh. Both a town, Golan, and a district, Gaulanitis, were known to Josephus (Ant. XIII, 15 3; XVII, 8 1). The latter is called by the Arabs Jaulān. It was one of the provinces in the tetrarchy of Philip, bounded by the Jordan on the W., by the Jarmuk on the S., and by Mt. Hermon on the N. The E. boundary was formed perhaps by the river 'Allan (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 541, and Schumacher, The Jaulan). Perhaps the name was applied, first, to a city and later to the district round about; etymologically, however, the root, meaning 'circuit,' would point to the opposite conclusion. Site uncertain. G. GOLD. See METALS, § 1.

GOLDEN CITY: A term applied to Babylon in Is 14 4 (but cf. alternative reading in mg.). E. E. N.

GOLDSMITH. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 10 (b).

GOLGOTHA. See JERUSALEM, § 45.

GOLIATH, go-lai'ath (גָּלְיָת, golyāth): A Philistine giant ("six cubits and a span," or over eleven feet in height) slain, according to I S 17 4 ff., by David. In II S 21 19, however, he is said to have been slain by Elhanan the Bethlehemite in single combat. In I Ch 20 5 the explanation is given that Elhanan slew [not Goliath but] Lachmi, the brother of Goliath, who is also represented as a giant, and even described in the same terms as Goliath. A. C. Z.

GOMORRAH, go-mōr'ā. See SODOM AND GOMORRAH.

GOOD, GOOD WORKS: There is nothing peculiar in the use of the term 'good' in the Bible. In the O T it nearly always stands for the Heb. ṭōbh (adj.), ṭūbh (subst.), or yāṭabh (vb. 'to do good'), all of which are significant of 'good' in a comprehensive sense, easily applied (1) to material or physical good, or (2) to moral good. In most cases the English reader should have no difficulty in making the distinction. In the N T 'good' is in most cases the rendering of the Gr. adjectives ἀγαθός or καλός, the former nearly always in a moral or spiritual sense, the latter often in a material or esthetic sense. Both adjectives frequently occur in the expression "good works" with almost equivalent meaning—καλός, however, generally retaining something of its fundamental esthetic coloring. The following additional instances call for comment: In Mic 7 2 the word ḥāsīdh means 'full of love,' 'kindly.' In Ec 5 11 "good" AV = "advantage" RV In Dt 2 4, 4 15; Jos 23 11, 'good' renders the adv. mᵉōdh, 'very,' 'very much'; in Jer 13 10 it renders a verb meaning 'to succeed,' and then 'be fit for.' In Job 15 3 the Heb. means 'to be of no profit'; in Jer 18 4 it means 'as it was right in the eyes of the potter'; in Gn 24 12 "send me good success" stands for 'cause (it, i.e., success) to meet (i.e., happen),' while in Jos 1 8 "good success" means thou shalt 'deal wisely.' In I Co 15 33 the Gr. is χρηστός, lit. 'useful' or 'kind'; here used in a sense akin to 'morally refined.' In Gn 46 29 "good while" means 'again,' or 'still more,' and in Ac 18 18 it means 'a (sufficient) number of days.' In Ro 16 18 "good words" means 'courteous, pleasant speech calculated to disarm suspicion.' Practically, "the good" are contrasted with "the evil" (e.g., Mt 5 45), but nowhere is a strict definition of "the good" given. That which is in harmony with recognized ethical standards or with the spirit and teachings of the gospel is 'good' (ἀγαθός or καλός). Good works are the natural fruit of good hearts (Mt

7 17). God alone is absolutely good, and only through a true perception of Jesus' relation to God can one know how to call Him good (Mk 10 18 and ||s). See also JUSTIFICATION. E. E. N.

GOODLY APPAREL. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 5.

GOODMAN: In Pr 7 19 the meaning is 'husband' ("the man" RV). The woman appears purposely to refrain from saying 'my husband.' 'Goodman' was once frequently used in the sense of 'head of the house.' In the N T the Gr. term is οἰκοδεσπότης, i.e., 'master, or head of the house' (Mt 20 11, etc.; cf. RV). E. E. N.

GOODNESS: In most cases this word is the accurate rendering of the original terms. In the O T the terms ṭōbh and ṭūbh are comprehensive. God's goodness is manifest in the blessings He bestows on His servants, i.e., the good things of life, and also the more spiritual blessings of forgiveness and love (e.g., Ex 33 19, cf, 34 6). The word ḥeṣedh often translated "goodness" in AV (e.g., Ex 34 6) is much better rendered by "mercy" or "loving-kindness" (so RV). In the N T in Ro 2 4, 11 22, the Gr. χρηστός, χρηστότης, signify 'kindness' (cf. Eph 2 7), or 'benignity,' not 'goodness in the abstract.' See GOOD, GOOD WORKS. E. E. N.

GOOD PLEASURE, GOOD WILL: In the N T εὐδοκία usually refers to God's 'good will,' either in the sense of His delight or satisfaction (II Th 1 11) or of His sovereign purpose or will (cf. Mt 11 26; Eph 1 5, 9; Ph 2 13). The passage that has occasioned most comment is Lk 2 14. Here for "good will toward men" (AV) RV reads "among men in whom he is well pleased" ('men of [His] good will'). The RV is based on the reading εὐδοκίας (genitive) found in the best MSS. The AV is based on the nominative. The sense is practically the same in either case. εὔνοια, in Eph 6 7, means 'good disposition' or 'intent.' E. E. N.

GOODS: The EVV use this word to render a variety of Heb. and Gr. terms: (1) 'ōn, 'strength,' 'ability' (Job 20 10 AV); (2) ḥayīl, 'strength,' 'vigor,' 'power' (Nu 31 9); (3) ṭōbh, 'good' (in a general sense) (Dt 28 11 AV; Ec 5 11); (4) m'lā'khāh, 'work,' 'business' (Ex 22 8, 11); (5) nikṣīn, 'riches' (Ezr 6 8, 7 26); (6) qinyān, 'acquisition' (Ezk 38 12 f.); (7) r'khūsh, 'that which is gathered' (Gn 14 11-21, 31 18 AV, 46 6; Nu 16 32, 35 3 AV; II Ch 21 14 AV; Ezr 1 4, 6). The same term is often rendered "substance." (8) k'bhūddāh, 'weighty material' (Jg 18 21); (9) τα ἀγαθά (Lk 12 18 f.); (10) οὐσία, 'substance' (Lk 15 12 AV); (11) τὰ σκεύη, 'vessels,' 'implements' (Mt 12 29; Mk 3 27; Lk 16 31); (12) τὰ ὑπάρχοντα, 'possessions' (Mt 24 17 AV, 25 14; Lk 11 21, 16 1, 19 8; I Co 13 3; He 10 34 AV); (13) ὁ βίος, 'the means of living' (I Jn 3 17); (14) ὕπαρξις, 'substance' (Ac 2 45); (15) τὰ σά, 'thy (things)' (Lk 6 30); (16) πλουτεῖν, 'to be wealthy,' "increased with goods" (Rev 3 17 AV; cf. RV.) E. E. N.

GOPHER WOOD. See PALESTINE, § 21.

GORE (Ex 21 32). See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (c).

GOSHEN (גֹּשֶׁן, gōshen): 1. A district in Egypt in which Jacob and his family were placed (Gn 45 10, 46 28, 47 27, 50 8 [all J]; Ex 19 26 [P]). It was noted for its adaptation to pastoral life and regarded as in general unsuitable for agriculture, perhaps because of its distance from the Nile and the difficulty of irrigation. But that it must have been cultivated to some extent appears from Nu 11 5. The LXX. renders Gn 45 10 Γέσεμ Ἀραβίας, intimating that G. was located in the nomos (political division) Arabia; and names Heroopolis (ἡρώων πόλις, Gn 46 28) ostensibly as its capital. The site of the city has been identified as the modern Tell-Mashkūta in the Wādy Tumilat, and excavated by Naville (The Store City of Pithom, 1888), but, according to the geographer Ptolemais, the nomos Arabia had Phacussa for its capital. This would identify G. with Keṣem (Egyptian, Pa Sept—'home of [the god] Sept'), modern Seft-Henna, which is somewhat NW of Pithom. The difficulty has been solved by Steindorff's suggestion in *PRE*³, art. Gosen, that the capital of the nomos may have been changed from one city to the other, as was frequently the case in the subdivisions of Egypt. G., therefore, as a district was undoubtedly in the E. portion of Egypt, and N. of the southern point of the Delta. 2. A district in the Negeb and the Shephelah (Jos 10 41, 11 16); but an extension of the Goshen in Egypt may be meant. 3. A city in Judah (Jos 15 51). I. GOSPEL (εὐαγγέλιον, 'good tidings'; AS, godspell; OHG, gotspel ='God-story'): The N T term for the contents of the message given by Jesus Christ to the world.

1. Usage of the Term.

In the statements which Matthew gives of Jesus' early preaching in Galilee (4 23, 9 35), and which he records in Jesus' eschatological address (24 14), the phrase "gospel of the kingdom" shows that the term is to be understood in its primary meaning of 'good tidings' (as in the RV of Ro 10 16 and Rev 14 6). The Matthew phrase is an elaboration of the simple term "gospel" which Mark has in the title of his narrative (1 1), in his record of Jesus' initiatory preaching (1 14 f.) and of His later teaching (8 35, 10 29, 13 10, 14 9). This term, when used by Mark in connection with the primitive idea of κηρύσσειν (1 14 f., 13 10, 14 9), is undoubtedly intended to be understood in its primary sense, as by Matthew; but when used in such connections as in 1 1, 8 35, 10 29 is presented in its more technical meaning of a 'formulated message.' In this Mark shows, as he does elsewhere (e.g., 1 4), a tendency to introduce into his narrative, primitive though it is, phraseology borrowed from the developed thought of the Apostolic preaching. It is in this technical sense that the term is to be understood in Peter's council speech (Ac 15 7), and in Paul's farewell at Miletus (20 24)—the only instances in which Lk uses the word in either of his writings. For it he substitutes in his Gospel the cognate verb (εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, 'to announce good news'), using it mostly in connections where to his mind the primary idea of heralding the good news is present (e.g., 3 18, 4 18, 7 22; cf. Mt ‖). Such connections are also clear in certain Acts passages (e.g., 8 12, 25). At the same time, when the verb is used in connection with objective truths, or distinctive messages, there is an evident technical meaning, which is most apparent in Ac, where it seems to represent the formulated Apostolic preaching (e.g., 5 42, 11 20, 14 15, 17 18). It is quite natural, therefore, that in the Epistles both noun and verb should appear almost constantly in their technical meanings (e.g. [εὐαγγέλιον], Ro 1 16, 15 16; I Co 9 23; II Co 9 13, 11 4; Gal 1 6 f., 2 5, 7, 14; Col 1 5, 23; II Th 1 8; II Ti 1 8; I Pe 4 17; [εὐαγγελίζεσθαι], Ro 1 15; I Co 9 16, 18; Gal 1, 16, 23; I P 4 6), and that there should be meanings developed beyond this, as (a) of the distinctively Pauline gospel (e.g. [εὐαγγέλιον], Ro 2 16, 16 25; II Co 4 3; Gal 1 11, 2 2, 7; I Th 1 5; II Th 2 14; I Ti 1 11; II Ti 2 8b; [εὐαγγελίζεσθαι], I Co 15 1 f.; Gal 1 8 f., 11—which throw light on the peculiarly Pauline meaning to be given to such passages as Gal 2 5, 14; Eph 1 13, 3 6, 8, 6 19; Ph 1 27; Col 1 23); (b) of the general gospel, in the administrative sense of the dispensation, or the service characteristic of gospel times (e.g. [εὐαγγέλιον], Ro 1 1, 9; I Co 9 12, 14; Ph 1 5, 7, 12, 16; Phm ver. 13); (c) of the gospel in a written form ([εὐαγγέλιον], Rev 14 6). The solitary passage I Th 3 6 shows how generally in the N T the early literary usage of the word had disappeared. The foregoing induction of the usage of the term 'gospel' makes clear the sense in which it is applied to the canonical narratives of the ministry of Jesus, and leads the way to the following consideration of the process by which the message and mission of Jesus came into written form, the literary peculiarities of the form to which it came, and the characterization of Jesus which this form presents.

II. Gospels: Behind the written gospel narratives stood the oral tradition of Jesus' life and teachings. This had its origin in the reports which were spread abroad concerning Him, while His ministry was yet in progress, and crystallized into the testimony regarding Him which followed upon that ministry's completion. The formal expression of this testimony was in the Apostolic preaching, the basis of which was the story of Jesus, as culminating in His death and resurrection (cf. Ac 2 22-32, 10 36-41, 13 23-31, 17 18).

2. The Process from Oral Tradition to Written Gospels.

Naturally, this oral record of the ministry of Jesus was more or less fragmentary. It did not record all there was to record. It dwelt on certain parts of His life, certain phases of His teaching. This was as true of the formal Apostolic preaching as it was of the informal reminiscences of the disciples. Naturally also, as the gospel generation aged, this oral and fragmentary character of its record was felt to be imperfect, and created the desire to have in more permanent and completed form what it had preserved of the past. As a result, these oral records came to be committed to writing, at first fragmentary (cf. Lk 1 1 f.), then more collected, until there were evolved the gospel narratives, as we have them in the N T (cf. Lk 1 2-4). This process was at no time strictly historical. The motive of the disciples in their oral reminiscences and of the Apostles in their formal preaching was not so much to make a record of the past as to make an impression on the present. (Cf. Lk 1 4, where Theophilus is approached as one who had been favorably impressed with the religion of Jesus; cf. also Jn 20 30 f.) Their motive was primarily evangelistic. In fact, however much their experience of Jesus' personal self may have made them lovingly retain in their memory the things He had said and done, it was on the future rather than the past that they dwelt; for He had left them with the promise of a personal return to earth to consummate His work. For this return they themselves waited with keen expectancy, and against its coming they sought to win the world to a faith in their Lord (cf. I Th 1 9 f.; Ac 17 30 f.).

Our Gospels are not thus so much the records of history as they are the impressions of experience. They are not formal biographies; they are characterizations of a personality. That we have four Gospels, therefore, is not due to repeated efforts to give an accurate narrative of the life and teaching of Jesus, but to the individual desire with each writer to present this wondrous personality in a way to meet the special evangelistic needs which confronted him individually in his own particular work. Consequently, we are not surprised to find these Gospels differing greatly among themselves. Matthew presents this personality from the view-point of fulfilled prophecy, to appeal to Jewish minds. Mark presents it from the point of the Apostolic preaching outside of Jewish circles, to meet the Gentile mind. Luke, more nearly than any of the others, presents it from the point of investigated facts, to influence the mind of a cultured man of rank. John, most of all, presents it from the point of a meditated experience, to meet the needs of troubled faith. And yet, in spite of these wide differences, there is a necessary community among the Gospels, from the common subject they present—and especially among the first three Gospels, from the fact that they present this subject in a common way, going over the same portion of the Ministry and with the same general outline of events. For this reason they are called the Synoptic Gospels.

3. Literary Character of the Gospels.

The literary interrelations of these Synoptic Gospels become thus naturally a particular question, constituting what is known as the Synoptic Problem. This problem presents itself in the following way: Upon close investigation of their material, it becomes evident that there are significant identities among these Gospels, and also significant differences. How can these identities and differences be accounted for at one and the same time? The significance of the identities lies not merely in the fact that these Gospels give the same general outline of narrative, filled in with the same general incidents, but in the fact that these same general incidents are placed before us in what is generally the same order —at times even when this order is unchronological (e.g., the Baptist's imprisonment, which is narrated in connection with Jesus' third teaching tour [Mk 6 17-20; Mt 14 3-5], though it occurred much earlier), and that they are given frequently in what are identical words (e.g., the parenthetic introduction to Jesus' remark to the palsied man [Mk 2 10; Mt 9 6; Lk 5 24], the marked identities in which can not be accidental). On the other hand, the significance of the differences lies not merely in the fact that these Gospels give their narratives generally in differing words, phrases, and form of incidents, but in the fact that whole portions of the general narrative are omitted by some (e.g., the Nativity by Mark, the North Galilean Ministry by Luke), or presented with confusing variations by all (e.g., the post-resurrection appearances), also that the order of whole parts of the general narrative is at times disarranged (e.g., the Sermon on the Mount, placed early by Mt, when it was really later, as by Lk).

4. Interrelations of the First Three Gospels. Synoptic Problem.

To meet this problem three general theories have been suggested: (1) The Successive Dependence Theory—that one of the Gospels was the original and was used by one of the others, and these two by the third. This accounts for the resemblances, on the basis of copying, but fails to account for the strangeness of the differences. (2) The Oral Theory — that all three Gospels drew from the common source of oral tradition. This must account for the differences, on the basis of the natural variation of tradition; but it fails to account for the significance of the identities. (3) The Documentary Theory—that all three Gospels are dependent on one or more underlying documents. This would seem to account for the resemblances, on the basis of a community of documents, and also for the differences, on the basis of one or more combinations of them.

5. Solutions of the Problem.

It is in the direction of this last theory that critical scholarship has moved, though it has held it in different forms: (a) The Single-Document Form—that there was a basal written Gospel, from which each of the authors of the three canonical Gospels drew his material in his own individual way, the general view being that this Gospel was in the Aramaic language. This, however, finds it so difficult to account for the significant differences of the narratives that it is forced to assume that this basal Gospel went through several recensions, a separate one of which lay at the basis of each of the canonical Gospels (cf. Schmiedel, art. Gospels in EB), which is virtually abandoning the problem to the impenetrable fogs of a lost and undiscoverable literature. (b) The Multiple-Document Form—that there was a general collection of fragmentary documents, from combinations of which the authors of the three canonical Gospels wrote their narratives in their individual ways. This might seem to have been Luke's process, but more probably he did not so much compile the written narratives, which existed in his day, as correct them by recourse to oral testimony, and, whatever he may have done, the agreements among the canonical narratives are too minute to have arisen from accidental combinations of such occasional writings. (c) The Two-Document Form—that there were at the basis of the canonical Gospels two documents—a narrative of the events of Jesus' ministry and a collection of His sayings. In general, this last is the form which is in most acceptance among scholars to-day, largely because it seems to account for the peculiar character both of the agreements and the differences among the canonical Gospels disclosed by more detailed study of their narratives. Such study shows that there is not merely a certain portion of the narrative which is common to all three Gospels (the Triple Tradition), a certain portion which is common to but two—Mt and Mk, or Mt and Lk, or Mk and Lk (the Double Traditions), and a certain portion which is peculiar to each (the Single Traditions); but that the resemblances in the Triple Tradition appear most strikingly in the parallels which contain the discourses of Jesus, while the resemblances in those portions of the Double Tradition between Mt and Lk which contain the discourses of Jesus are much more detailed and close than those in the discourse parallels of the Triple Tradition. This would seem to indicate that there was a document containing discourses of Jesus behind the three Gospels, standing more conspicuously behind Mt and Lk than behind Mk. Further, detailed study shows that the Triple Tradition is made up of both incidents and discourses and that the Double Traditions, of which Mk is a part, are made up largely of incidents; it would, therefore, seem that there was room for another document, giving the events of Jesus' ministry, which Mk most nearly represents.

The attempt to identify these two basal documents is not equally easy. As to the first, its identification with Mk, substantially in the form in which this Gospel now exists, is universally admitted, though it is being much more generally recognized that the old emphasis placed upon Mk's strict historical sequence of narrative can not be maintained—that the element of grouping enters even into his arrangement of material, and that it is a question as to just how far his narrative is primary —i.e., derived wholly from the Petrine reminiscences —or is itself a composite document, dependent on other sources (see MARK, GOSPEL OF). As to the second, its identification presents peculiar difficulties. The older view has been that it was to be identified with the Logia referred to by Papias as having been written by Matthew in Aramaic (Eus. HE, III, 39), and that it consisted of the discourses of Jesus, gathered together and furnished with more or less historical setting. The growing query, however, as to how far this definitely traditioned writing of Matthew, which from the time of Irenæus was spoken of as a Gospel, could be confined to a collection of discourses, has brought scholars gradually to the confession of less knowledge regarding the origin of this second Synoptic source, and has replaced the definite symbol Λ (Logia), with which it had been designated, by the more general symbol Q (Quelle, 'source'). While there is thus less certainty regarding its origin, it is still universally recognized that its character was that of a collection of discourses, rather than of an ordered narrative and that, while it may itself have been composite, it is not only earlier than the Mk source, but is not resolvable into its component parts. In fact, it is not generally agreed that it can be reconstructed from the Gospels which we have (see MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF). As to the interrelation of the other two Gospels, scholars are almost unanimously agreed that Lk made no use of Mt, though inquiry of sources so characterized his work (see LUKE, GOSPEL OF).

In brief, then, the generally accepted Synoptic theory is that there was a collection of the discourses, or teachings, of Jesus, which lay at the basis of at least two of the Gospels (Mt and Lk)—perhaps of all, besides which Mt and Lk evidently used Mk, making its order and language fundamental to their own. The material from these two sources Mt treated in a topical way, and Lk in a chronological way, giving it a characteristic literary setting, both of them adding to it items from other sources, oral and written, peculiar to themselves (e.g., the Nativity Stories [Mt and Lk], the Genealogies [Mt and Lk], the details of the last journey to Jerusalem [Lk], the arraignment of the Pharisees [Mt], and the Ascension [Lk]). The Documentary Theory is thus not an exclusively documentary theory, but calls to its aid both the oral and the dependence theories and has in this breadth its distinctive superiority over the others.

6. Outline of Composite Narrative.

The composite narrative presented by these three Gospels is briefly as follows: Following the introductory material given by Mt and Lk (Genealogies [Mt 1 1-17; Lk 3 23-38], Annunciation and Birth of Baptist and of Jesus [Mt 1 18-25; Lk 1 5-38, 57-80, 2 1-20], Early Years of Jesus [Mt 2 13-15, 19-23; Lk 2 39-52]) is a preliminary narrative, consisting of a description of the ministry of the Baptist, culminating in the induction of Jesus into His public ministry, through His Baptism and Temptation (Mk 1 1-13, and ||s). There then follows a record of Jesus' ministry in Galilee, beginning with a visit to His home in Nazareth, where His claims are rejected, and from which place He withdraws to Capernaum (Mk 1 14 f., and ||s; Lk 4 16-31, and ||s), where He formally attaches to Himself a discipleship, and makes the place a center from which His work is carried on (Mk 1 16-34, and ||s). As far as this work is represented as following any distinctive method it is that of preaching tours through the surrounding country, with a return to the home city. The Gospels unite in recording such a tour soon after His coming to Capernaum (Mk 1 35-39, and ||s). It was confined, apparently, to the villages of the immediate neighborhood and was of short duration, being followed by a considerable period of activity in Capernaum itself, which excited increasingly the hostility of the Scribes and Pharisees (Mk 1 40–2 28 [3 1-6 (?)], 3 7-12, and ||s). There is given then, in evident preparation for a more extended tour, the formal choosing of the Twelve (Mk 3 13-19a, and ||s), with its accompanying discourse (the Sermon on the Mount [Mt 5 1–8 1, and ||]). This is followed by one or two selected incidents from the tour (Lk 7 1-50, and ||), leading up to the incident of the healing of the blind and dumb demoniac on the return to Capernaum (Mk 3 19b-30, and ||s). This is presented as significant in its arousal of popular enthusiasm to an open acclaim of Jesus as the Messianic Son of David and the meeting of this claim by the Scribes and Pharisees with the countercharge of Beelzebub (Mt 12 22-24; Mk 3 22; Lk 11 14 f.), the outcome of which conflict was a tendency among His hearers to separate into receptive and hostile groups (Mk 3 31-35; Mt 12 38-50; Lk 11 16, 24-26, 29-32, 8 19-21). There is then given an account of a day of parable teaching by the seaside at Capernaum (Mk 4 1-34, and ||s), by which method Jesus is represented as having sought to encourage this grouping tendency of His hearers (Mk 4 10-12, and ||s). Following this is the account of a departure of Jesus and His disciples across the lake and a short sojourn in the Gentile region of Gerasa, from which He returned to a further activity at Capernaum and a second visit to Nazareth, where His claims were again presented and again rejected (Mk 4 35–6 6a, and ||s). A third teaching tour is then recorded, which seems to have issued in a sending out of the Twelve on a more extended mission, while Jesus continued His restricted work (Mk 6 6b-13, and ||s). Upon the return of the Twelve, Jesus, hearing of the death of the Baptist, departed with them into the less populated regions across the lake, where they were followed by the multitude, which He miraculously fed (Mk 6 30-46, and ||s). The narrative then brings Jesus back to Capernaum, which place He left with His disciples for a ministry of some extent in the regions of Tyre and Sidon, and the Decapolis (Mk 6 47-56, 7 24–8 26, and ||s), toward the close of which period He made His first announcement to His disciples of His coming Passion, and, in the company of the three with whom He was most intimate, was transfigured (Mk 8 27–9 13, and ||s). After the account of a short ministry at Capernaum the Gospels unite in representing Jesus as having finally departed from Galilee for Jerusalem (Mk 10 1, and ||s), Lk recording, in connection with the journey, an extended ministry of teaching (chs. 10–18). There then follows the narrative of Jesus' final ministry in Jerusalem (Mk 11 1–14 1 f., 10 f., and ||s), culminating in the Passover with His disciples (Mk 14 12-31, and ||s), the Passion in Gethsemane (Mk 14 32-42, and ||s), the Betrayal by Judas (Mk 14 43-52, and ||s), the Trial before the Sanhedrin and Pilate (Mk 14 53-15 20, and ||s), the Crucifixion and the Resurrection (Mk 15 21–16 8, and ||s). There is then given an account of Jesus' appearances to His disciples after His Resurrection, Matthew confining his narrative to those which took place in Galilee (28 16-20), Luke to those in the neighborhood of Jerusalem (24 13-43), Mark, his Gospel ending as it does with the 8th verse, giving no account of them. The general narrative is then closed with an account of the Ascension, given alone by Luke (24 44-53).

The characterization of Jesus presented by this narrative is one of strong and irresistible impressiveness.

Announced by angels and supernaturally born, He comes into the world bearing upon Himself all the marks of the unseen universe, and, though little is said of His childhood, and we become really acquainted with Him as He enters upon His public work, we realize, from such record as is given, that His consciousness of Himself is of one who stands separate from those around Him in His communion with God, that it is this consciousness of His spiritual isolation among men that brings Him to a consciousness of His Divine mission in the world, that it is in this consciousness that He comes to His baptism as the symbol of His public consecration to His work, and that it is to test this consciousness that the Spirit drives Him into the wilderness to His temptation.

It is on this understanding of Himself and His work that He enters upon His public ministry, and it is because of Himself and His work so understood that He challenges at once the ceremonialism of the Pharisees and Scribes. He takes up from the beginning an attitude of judgment with reference to the ceremonial Law—ignoring it when it symbolized and developed separation between man and God and between man and his fellow man, and observing it in full when it symbolized and effected their communion—and at the same time directs His ministry toward the ceremonially unchurched, calling to His discipleship the tax-gatherer, and making clear that it was for the sinner that His ministry of helpfulness was intended. Inevitably this confronts Him with a hostility from the Scribes and Pharisees, and sets in motion two tendencies among His hearers —the one of criticism under the influence of this opposition, the other of sympathy under the power of His personality. To encourage this sympathy, and with the necessary accompaniment of strengthening the criticism, He adopts the parable in His teaching and makes an ever-increasingly clear statement of the personal relationships with Himself which His discipleship demanded.

In such a consciousness of Himself and His work, and in such assertion of them against the materialism around Him, He carries on in Galilee and the surrounding regions His ministry of healing and of revelation of the sin of man and of the love of God. From the beginning, however, this consciousness of Himself and His work makes clear to Him that His ministry must not only involve hostility from the materialism of Judaism, but an inevitable development of this hostility into an open persecution of Himself which can only end in His death.

As His Galilean work comes to its close this conviction of His ministry's outcome becomes increasingly strong, and under its influence He turns His face toward Jerusalem, where must be brought to final issue the conflict between the ceremonialism of the nation and His spiritual mission to the world. There He casts aside all reserve; face to face with His enemies He makes plain His Messianic claims, and shows with unmistakable clearness the national consequence of their rejection, while He gathers closer to Himself His disciples and, as far as it was possible to their unaroused conceptions, prepares them for the result. With the calmness of this great consciousness of all He was in Himself and of all His mission meant for the world, He comes to His Passion and His death. From the beginning He had shown the personal relations to Himself which His discipleship involved. Increasingly He had laid emphasis upon that faith without which that discipleship could not issue in acceptance with God, and now as the end came in His death it was this same personal relationship between Himself and His disciples that gave it all its significance as the only way to that forgiveness of sin and reforming of life which was the object of all He had come to do.

To some conception of this personal element in salvation the disciples apparently came through the instruction given them by Jesus during the period of His presence with them after the Resurrection, though it is clear that their final comprehension of it came from that understanding of His redemptive relation to them which gradually resulted from their maturing spiritual experience. This conception of Jesus is what lies before us, then, in these Gospels—the conception of a man among men, possessed of all the qualities of humanity, its frailties of body, its sympathies of heart, its powers of mind, but lacking that one common element of sinfulness, not only in the manifestations of life, but in the consciousness of soul, that marked Him out as separated from them all and gave Him thus the isolated right beyond any mere Messianic meaning to the title "Son of God."

GOURD. See FOOD, § 3; PALESTINE, § 23.

GO TO: An expression, now obsolete, found eleven times in AV. It corresponds to our modern hortatory 'come,' which RV gives instead in Gn 11 3-7, 38 16; Ec 2 1; Ja 4 13, 5 1. In other cases RV omits it as an unnecessary addition (Jg 7 3; II K 5 5; Jer 18 11; Is 5 5). E. E. N.

GOVERNMENT, GOVERNMENTS: The term "government" in Is 9 6 means properly 'princely' or 'royal authority.' On II P 2 10 cf. RV. On I Co 12 28, and for the organization of the early Church, see CHURCH, § 7. For the different forms of government in ancient Israel, see ISRAEL. E. E. N.

GOVERNOR: In the O T the one word that properly means 'governor' is peḥāh, used chiefly in the documents of the Persian period (Ezr, Neh, Hag, Mal). It signifies (in the Bible) both the 'satrap,' or 'governor,' of one of the main subdivisions of the Persian Empire (e.g., Ezr 5 3, Tattenai, who was satrap of the region W of the Euphrates), or the governor of a subdivision of a satrapy (e.g., Judah, of which Nehemiah was "governor"; cf. Neh 5 14). In both cases the appointment was made directly by the king. The functions of the governors of the smaller provinces were administrative and civil rather than military. The word "Tirshatha" (Ezr 2 63, etc., AV) is a Persian term, the equivalent of peḥāh. Other O T terms rendered "governor" are expressive of leadership, or authority, but are not of technical significance.

In the N T Pilate is called "governor" of Judæa, Felix and Festus of all Palestine, with their headquarters at Cæsarea. The Gr. term is ἡγεμών, standing for the Latin 'procurator,' i.e., a governor of a far town, or unruly country, appointed directly by the emperor, and who was only partially subordinate to the Imperial legate of the province, to which his district belonged. Such 'governors' were usually of equestrian rank, Felix, a freedman, being an exception to this rule (see Schürer, I, i, pp. 43–48). Quirinus ("Cyrenius," Lk 2 2) was an Imperial legate, not a procurator, of the large Province of Syria. On II Co 11 32 see ARETAS. On Ja 3 4 cf. RV. In Gal 4 2 "steward" ("governor" AV) is the overseer of the household. E. E. N.

GOZAN, gō'zan, גּוֹזָן, gōzān: A district on the river Habor in Mesopotamia, conquered by Asshurdan of Assyria c. 760 B.C. (Schrader, KAT,[3] p. 48). It was one of the provinces of the Assyrian Empire to which the captives of N. Israel were deported in 722 B.C. (II K 17 6, 18 11, 19 12; I Ch 5 26; Is 37 12). E. E. N.

GRACE: The rendering of two Heb. (ḥēn, tᵉḥinnāh) and two Gr. (χάρις, εὐπρέπεια) words. I. General: In the main, two leading ideas are represented by the Eng. term: (1) The objective idea of 'outward grace,' or 'beauty,' and (2) the subjective idea of 'personal kindness,' or 'favor.' In the O T the former is represented, with two exceptions, in all the passages in which RV retains the term "grace," the Heb. being ḥēn (Ps 45 2, 84 11; Pr 1 9, 3 22, 4 9, 22 11; Zec 4 7, 12 10). In the excepted passages (Ezr 9 8; Pr 3 34) the latter is represented, the Heb. being in Ezr tᵉḥinnāh, and in Pr ḥēn. In the passages where AV rendered ḥēn by "grace," RV has substituted "favor" (Gn 6 8, etc.; Ex 33 12, etc.; Nu 32 5; Jg 6 17; Ru 2 2, 10; I S 1 18, etc.; II S 14 22; Est 2 17; Jer 31 2). In the N T the term "grace" is abundantly used, both ideas being represented, and the term receiving a large development along the line of the latter. Practically but one Gr. word (χάρις) is employed throughout, the exception being the passage Ja 1 11, where εὐπρέπεια might have been better rendered 'beauty' or 'shapeliness.' II. Particular: In the N T usage of the term we have the objective idea in such passages as Lk 4 22 and Col 4 6. The subjective idea, in general, is found in Lk 2 52 "favor" EVV; Eph 4 29. This idea is enlarged, however, in the direction of emphasizing the undeserved nature of the kindness, or favor, shown (e.g., Lk 1 30), but more specifically, as characterizing the favor shown by God in His redemptive work (e.g., Ro 4 4, 16, where χάρις is contrasted with ὀφείλημα, 11 6, where the contrast is with ἐξ ἔργων, and Eph 2 8, where the contrast is with ἐξ ὑμῶν; cf. also II Co 8 9). Naturally, from this Gospel use of the term, we have a further enlargement in the direction of designating the spiritual force exerted by God upon those who are receptive to His work (e.g., Jn 1 16; Ac 11 23; II Co 6 1, 9 14, 12 9; I Ti 1 14; II Ti 2 1; He 4 16), which is further broadened out to include the special gifts of life by which God renders men capable of His service (e.g., Ro 1 5; Gal 2 9; I Co 1 4, 3 10; Ph 1 7). The combination of these two usages is seen conspicuously in such a passage as I Co 15 10 (cf. also II Co 9 8). So the word is used of the results of this Divine energizing—generally, as representing the state and condition of spiritual life into which its recipients come (e.g., II P 3 18; cf. also Ro 5 2), or, specifically, as designating some particular phase of spiritual life, brought to manifestation in them (e.g., Ac 13 43; II Co 8 1-7, 19). In Col 3 16 the reference may be generally to this state of Christian grace, or, specifically, to that phase of it which might be better rendered 'thankfulness.' (For the use in the N T of χάρις to designate 'thanks' cf. Lk 17 9; I Co 10 30; II Co 9 15.)

Viewed in the light of this special Gospel meaning, grace finds its source in God's love to man. Paul tells the Ephesians in that characteristically soteriological letter which he wrote them that God being rich in mercy, because of the great love wherewith He loved them, even when they were dead in their trespasses, made them alive with Christ, and then adds, as a brief summary of that statement, "by grace have ye been saved" (2 4 f.; cf. Jn 3 16; Ro 5 8; II Th 2 16). As to its content, it consists in providing for man a plan of salvation with which it is possible for him to fall in. In this same Epistle the Apostle says, "By grace have ye been saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God" (2 8), in which he characterizes the way in which they have been redeemed as one not based upon their own righteousness, a condition they could never fulfil, but upon the gracious provision of God, made effective, subjectively, by that faith in Christ which it was always possible for them to exercise, if they would (Jn 5 40, 6 37). As to its process, it does no violence to the human spirit, but works upon it, negatively, in devitalizing those impulses and forces which make it easy for the will to move away from God and, positively, in vitalizing those which make it easy for the will to move toward God. "With fear and trembling," Paul wrote to the Philippians, "work out the salvation you have received from God, for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do" (2 13; cf. I Co 15 10; He 13 21). Naturally, therefore, when it has been admitted by the receptive soul within itself, its energizing establishes a condition of that soul which most properly is termed a state of grace, and which can be increased in its effectiveness by the soul's own cooperation (II P 3 18), or destroyed by its resistance (II Co 6 1). GRACE, MERCY, AND PEACE. See EPISTLE.

GRACIOUS: This word is the rendering of (1) the Heb. noun ḥēn, 'grace,' in the construct form, e.g., 'a woman of grace,' "gracious woman" (Pr 11 16); "words of grace" (Ec 10 12). (2) Of ḥānan, in the sense of 'charming,' 'winning' (Jer 22 23 AV; but "to be pitied" RV, and "how wilt thou groan" ERVmg.). (3) Generally of ḥānan and ḥannūn, 'gracious,' always of God, to designate His exercise of mercy. (4) Of ṭōbh, 'good' (Hos 14 2 AV; cf. RV). (5) Of χάριτος (Lk 4 22 AV, but "of grace" RV). (6) Of χρηστός, 'serviceable,' 'useful' (I P 2 3). A. C. Z.

GRAPE, GRAPES, WILD GRAPES. See in general VINES AND VINTAGE.

GRASS: The word "grass" is used in a somewhat comprehensive sense in the EVV. It is the rendering of four Heb. and one Gr. terms. (1) Of deshe' (e.g., Gn 1 11), the 'fresh,' 'tender grass.' (2) Of ḥātsīr, apparently of grass when in full growth (I K 18 5, etc.). (3) Of yereq, the 'green' grass (Nu 22 4).

(4) Of 'ēsebh, which signifies the herb that bears seed, i.e., grain (cf. Gn 1 11, 29), but is used in quite a general sense, including grasses, both those that bear grain and those that are suitable only for fodder, herbs, and vegetables. (5) Of χόρτος, which may mean either green grass (cf. Mk 6 39, etc.) or the blade of grain (Mt 13 26). E. E. N.

GREECE: Ancient Greece was bounded on the N. by Macedonia and Illyria, on the E. by the Ægean Sea, and on the W. by the Ionian Sea.

1. Natural Features. Its greatest length from Mt. Olympus to Cape Matapan was about 250 m., but it varied greatly in width. G. fell naturally into three great divisions: Northern (Epirus and Thessaly), Central, and the Peloponnesus—the peninsula S. of the Isthmus. To this continental Greece must be added many islands in the Ægean and Ionian seas, as well as numerous colonies in Asia Minor, Thrace, the Black Sea region, Sicily, S. Italy, France, and N. Africa, for much of Greece's influence on the world came through these islands and colonies. The Greeks themselves called their country Hellas—originally a small territory in S. Thessaly—and they spoke of themselves as Hellenes. The name Greeks (Græci) came to us through the Romans, who heard the name Γραικοί in S. Italy, whither it had come from Illyria.

G. is so covered by ramifications of mountains that but little of its surface is left for plains and valleys.

2. Influence of the Natural Features on the National Character. These mountains are the distinctive features of the inland landscape; they were also mythological centers, where gods held intercourse with men. The national character was molded in great measure by the mountains. Being mountainous, Greece is also very rocky, and in earliest times the Greeks utilized their rocks to build city walls (Cyclopean walls). Therefore the stones of Greece had a great influence on the national institutions. They not only promoted city life by insuring the safety of the dwellers within the city walls, but, being chiefly marble, they made Greek architecture and sculpture possible. Again, mountains are natural barriers, which protect against invasion, while large rivers are means of transit, facilitating interstate commerce and intellectual intercourse. But since the rivers of Greece were not large enough to subserve this end, land traffic between towns and between the land-locked mountain valleys was difficult. Nature herself ordained that Greece should be socially and politically disunited, and it was primarily because of its mountains that Greece never became a united state. But the great extent of the seacoast and the easy accessibility from the sea to any part of the interior counteracted the difficulties of transit by land. The coast-line is deeply indented with bays and inlets, affording safe harbors. Therefore the determining element in Greek geography was, not the mountains, but the sea, which the Greeks thought of as a bridge, or means of passage. The many promontories served as points from which the mariner might begin his voyage, passing readily from island to island, till Asia was reached, and hence Greek colonization began with Asia. In a similar way foreign merchants, attracted chiefly by the purple-fish, settled first on the promontories, which became centers of foreign religious worship and civilization. All Greek colonies were situated on the sea; intercommunication was by the sea, which was necessary not only for commerce, but for the transmission of ideas and for progress in general. The dwellers in inland cities were conservative, rustic, courageous, full of endurance, sterile of imagination, hostile to innovations, narrow in their sympathies and ideas, tenacious of ancient habits. The dwellers in the sea-towns were progressive, tolerant, active, eager for gain, ready for change, innovation, revolution, daring at sea, full of imagination, fickle in character, given to pomp and luxury, open to refining influences, delicate in taste and intellectual sympathy.

As the configuration of Greece kept the country disunited and perpetuated separate autonomy, so the smallest town was an autonomous unit; even small islands contained two or three separate states, hostile to one another. These autonomous city-states formed the basis of politico-philosophical speculation. But still the Greeks were united for social, religious, recreative, intellectual, and esthetical purposes. And being at once mountaineers and mariners they had access to a mass of social and political experience. Their national games brought the conservative of the interior into close touch with the radical of the sea-town, and the meeting stimulated the observant faculties, and the vagaries of both sections were thereby modified. Greece was also the meeting-place of the nations. Ideas and movements emanating from the Orient passed through Greece, where they were assimilated and then recast in the Greek intellectual mold, ere they were passed on to the West.

Except in the few alluvial plains the soil of Greece is poor, necessitating careful agriculture, a fact which always produces a sturdy race, but this thinness of soil led the Greeks of an early period to abandon agriculture for maritime pursuits; Greece never produced enough grain to supply her needs, and imported grain at an early period.

3. The Greek Mind. The most striking characteristics of the Greek mind—that is, of Hellenism—were: the variety of its aptitudes, its graceful versatility, its vivacity and penetrating keenness, its balanced development of diverse faculties, its reason tempered with imagination, sentiment with intelligence, passion with reflection; it was supple, subtle, astute, wily, adaptable. The Greek thought with acuteness, and imagined with brilliancy; his mind was incapable of entertaining the vague, the obscure, or indefinable. Yet his conceptions were moderate and within bounds, and hence his gods were not monsters, but anthropomorphic. The Greek was social; he sought out his fellow man, both to receive from him and to give to him; he was fond of gossip and chat; he possessed a great experience of life (seen even in the Epos); he was eminently curious and inquisitive, in the best sense, about the enigmas of the world, and for that reason he propounded all the great problems and inaugurated all the correct methods. The characteristic excellences of Greek literature are plastic neatness of conception, limpidity, transparency, even in abstruse matters, such as metaphysics. The Greeks copied nothing slavishly. They did employ models, but they recast them and put upon them the imprint of their own individuality and liberty. In their temperament the Greeks were eternally youthful and gay, though ever sensitive to the miseries of life. They fixed their thoughts on the ideals of youth and beauty; the poetry of life characterized all their writings, and modern pessimism was unknown to them. J. R. S. S.

Idolatry (εἰδωλολατρεία, from εἴδωλον and λατρεία) is, in general, 'worship of idols.' But εἴδωλον means primarily 'a form' or 'shadow,' hence a 'fantom,' Il. V, 451; Od. IV, 296; 'a reflection in water,' Aristotle, Divin. in Somn. 2 12; 'an imagination,' or 'fantasy,' Plato, Phæd. 66c; Herod. I, 51; then, 'a likeness (or image) of a god' (II Ch 17 12 LXX.). In O T usage, many different words ('āwen, 'wickedness,' or 'deceit,' 'ĕlīl, 'nothingness,' miphletseth, 'shameful thing,' ṣemel, 'image,' 'ātzābh [from a root meaning to 'cut off,' and then 'to portray'], a 'representation of deity,' and gillūlīm, possibly 'things of stone,' used of idols in a contemptuous sense) convey the idea of an idol; idolatry being described as the act or custom of worshiping ('ābhadh, 'to serve,' and predominantly, shāḥāh, 'to bow down,' Aram. ṣ'ghadh) idols. Idolatry may thus be (1) the worship of images, made to represent gods, or of images pure and simple (Ex 20 4 f.; Ps 115 4; Hos 8 4); (2) the worship of those gods themselves (polytheism, Ps 96 5; I Co 8 1 ff.); or (3) the setting up of anything beside God Himself in the supreme place as an object of affection or authority over one's life (e.g., "coveteousness," Col 3 5).

1. Idolatry in General.

2. Earliest Cult: Imageless.

Temple images in human form (anthropomorphism) did not appear until comparatively late in the development of the human race in the Mediterranean basin, and, in the earliest phase of Mediterranean religion known to us, the cult of the gods was aniconic. In this period, which goes back to 7000 B.C., and continued for millennia thereafter, the most realistic impersonation of the godhead was the living tree, in which the divine life was manifested by the leaves and foliage, and for age on age the whispering of the leaves and the soughing of the wind through the tree, or bush, were regarded as the actual voice of God (cf. II S 5 24; Gen 3 8). The tree was the permanent manifestation of divine life, and continued to be such even after the extinction of life in the tree. For, like the tree, the gods of early mankind were mortal, because the gods were deified men (cf. the Cretan Zeus, Adonis, and Tammuz).

3. Sacred Wooden and Stone Pillars.

The tree-trunk, though no longer living, continued to be the indwelling-place of God. Thus the tree shaded off into the tree-pillar, the wooden column, and ultimately into the stone column (bætylus). The living tree might transfer the divine presence and essence to a pillar or a stone by means of a special rite of ritual invocation consisting of charms and incantations, and through the pillar or stone the divine presence could pass into the priest or worshiper. This possession of the divine presence by the pillar or the stone was not permanent. The spirit of God might depart from the pillar or stone, in which case they became merely sacred objects, i.e., idols. Thus the earliest stage of religious evolution in prehistoric Greece known to us (in great measure from Evans' excavations in Crete, JHS, 1901, 99 ff., though by no means wholly so) was a dual cult of tree and pillar (stone, dolmen, menhir). A Mycenæan shrine exhibits the sacred tree with spreading boughs, enclosed by walls and lintels, while the sacred pillar stands in front of the shrine. We have also scenes in the ritual of this cult, e.g., the ritual watering of trees. While the palm-, pine-, cypress-, and the plane-tree were all sacred, yet the fig-tree was traditionally the most sacred. Beneath it the Cretan Zeus was suckled by the goat Amalthia, and beneath the Ficus Ruminalis Romulus and Remus were suckled by a wolf. The sacred stones were set up beneath the sacred tree. Such a stone was called a βαίτυλος by the Greeks, and beth'ēl (cf. Jacob's bætylic pillar, Gn 28 16) by the Semites (cf. also the menhirs of Druidical worship). Though the earliest cult objects were trees, pillars, sacred stones, yet we find that symbolical objects—such as the double ax—might also stand for the visible impersonation of the Divinity, and thus become an object of worship, the aniconic image of God, the material form or indwelling-place of the Divinity, just as were the aniconic images of wood or stone. The cult of the double ax explains the Cretan Labyrinthos, as simply the House of the Double Ax (λαβρυς = πέλεκος), i.e., the prehistoric palace itself at Knossos. As time went on, other bætyli of meteoric origin came to be cult objects, or the indwelling-place of God. Indeed, Baetylos was the son of Ouranos, i.e., 'sky-fallen' (cf. Zeus Kappotas), and to the very end of antiquity "Diana of the Ephesians" was a half-aniconic meteorite "that fell down from Jupiter" (Ac 19 35). In classical times the old sacred tree-trunks, often supposed to have been washed ashore (thus avowing the introduction of the cult from foreign parts), and stones, usually of meteoric origin, were called ξόανα, and these ξόανα continued to be the real cult object even after man could create such Divine works as Phidias' chryselephantine statue of Athene. Even sepulchral stelæ were the bætylic habitations, or indwelling-places, of the ghosts of the deceased. Throughout this centuries-long prehistoric period the idols of mankind remained aniconic, even though in the minds of the worshipers God was thought of in the human form, and that, too, long before they began to depict God in the shape of cult images.

4. Idols Proper.

The transition to anthropomorphism may be clearly traced in scenes in which the aniconic impersonation of the godhead appears side by side with the anthropomorphized conception of the Deity—a duality which was a compromise between the idea of the aniconic habitation and that of the Deity pictorially delineated in human form. Henceforth the anthropomorphized figure of the Deity usurped the place of the aniconic pillar, bætylic stone, or double ax. At first the pillar, or dead tree-trunk, was indented at the top, or at either side, to represent the head of the god. The next step was to round off this square head, and to carve upon it rude suggestions of eyes, nose, and mouth. The third step was to indicate the arms by mere protuberances at the shoulder. The fourth step was to outline the pendent and closely clinging arms by deep vertical incisions at either side of the tree-trunk, while the part of the tree-trunk below the lower extremities of the rude arms remained for centuries in the unchanged form of the sacred tree-trunk, or pillar. The fifth step was to make the toes protrude from the tree-trunk, which for the time being was thought of as representing a gown, stiffly falling and without folds. The sixth step was to indicate the legs, still clinging closely together. It required many ages to separate the legs, and to make the image stand squarely on both feet, and it required other ages to make the image stand on one foot, without any weight on the other disengaged foot.

5. Contact with Biblical Ideas.

Among the Greeks and Romans of the classic period such Divine images were made to conform to the highest ideals of art. This development found its culmination in the masterpieces of Phidias and Praxiteles. One must beware, on the other hand, of imagining that they were believed to be gods. They were regarded simply as the indwelling-place of divinities. On the other hand, the use of such images tended in the popular mind toward lowering ideas of deity. Accordingly philosophers like Heraclitus, Xenophanes, and Empedocles satirized the worship of gods through images. Zeno declared that neither temples nor idols befitted the gods. Later controversy with Christianity, however, drove other philosophers to take the opposite ground of justifying the ancient cultus (Plotinus, Ennead, IV, 3 11; Porphyry, in Euseb. Præp. Ev. 8:7). When Hellenism was carried by the Macedonian conquest into Palestine, its idolatrous forms were a chief stumbling-block to the Hebrew mind, by nature unanalytic, by training entirely unaccustomed, and by statute forbidden, to represent the godhead in any visible form. Every image was a token of creature worship, and a violation of the second commandment of the Decalogue. Even the Roman eagle which Herod had put on the Temple was regarded by the Jews as an insult to their religious beliefs (Jos. Ant. XVII, 6 2; BJ. I, 33 2). Accordingly, in the N T idolatry is not merely the worship of images, or of gods through images, but also polytheism.

6. Græco-Roman Polytheism in the N T.

Whenever, as in the experience of Paul at Ephesus (q.v.) (Ac 19 23 ff.), or at Athens (Ac 17 16-31), a Christian of Jewish antecedents faced the polytheistic cult, he could not, in the nature of the case, distinguish between the worship of images (statues) as such and the deities represented by them. To him, therefore, the community in which this took place was "full of idols" (Ac 17 16, "wholly given to idolatry" AV). The unknown God (Ac 17 23) easily served as the inchoate figure out of which the Apostle was able to mold for them the conception of the only true God. Although such objects of worship are called gods by Paul (I Co 8 5), as well as by their own worshipers (Ac 14 11), it is only for the sake of convenience that the term is applied to them by the Christian thinker (cf. Gal 4 8). For the Apostles eagerly seized the opportunity offered at Lystra to denounce the whole system as "vain things" (Ac 14 15, "vanities" AV). On this occasion the special deities brought into view were Jupiter and Mercury, the first as the supreme god of the Olympian mythology, being identified with Barnabas, who in all probability was physically the more stately and imposing of the two Apostles, and the second, the spokesman and messenger of the gods, with Paul, who was the leader in the preaching of the new religion. Mention of a mythological name without connotations of worship is also made in Ac 28 11, where the Twin Brothers (Castor and Pollux AV; Dioscuri RVmg.) are spoken of. These were believed to be sons of Jupiter and Leda. Castor was regarded especially as the horse-tamer, and Pollux as the patron of boxing. They are distinguished for intense brotherly love for each other. They were also regarded as manifesting themselves in the phosphorescent light seen in the wake of vessels on the sea. They are alluded to as furnishing the name of the vessel on which Paul sailed from Melita to Puteoli. Another member of the Græco-Roman pantheon alluded to, but not as an object of worship, is the Python of Ac 16 16 RVmg. ("a spirit of divination," AV and RV text). According to the mythology, Python was the dragon that guarded the oracle of Delphi, dwelling in the caves of Mt. Parnassus. Apollo slew it and took possession of the oracle. Hence oracular utterances were ascribed to a pythonic spirit or demon.

GRIND, GRINDING. See MILL.

GRINDERS: In Ec 12 3 the Heb. term tōḥănōth is a fem. participle plural, meaning 'the grinding (women).' Women were accustomed to grind the meal in the Hebrew home, often accompanying their work with song (cf. ver. 4). The expression is used here probably in a figurative way for the molar teeth, apt to fall out in old age. E. E. N.

GROSS: "Waxed gross" is the translation in Mt 13 15; Ac 28 27 of the Gr. παχύνειν ('to make thick' or 'fat'). The N T passages are both quotations (after the LXX.) of Is 6 9, where the Heb. has a similar meaning. The same expression is found elsewhere in the O T (Dt 32 15; Neh 9 25; Jer 5 28), always meaning that prosperity had rendered the people so satisfied that they cared nothing for the higher moral or spiritual ideals. E. E. N.

GROUND: In most cases this word renders 'ădhāmāh (generally meaning 'cultivated ground,' e.g., Gn 2 5), or 'erets, 'earth,' or γῆ, 'earth,' or 'ground.' Other terms so rendered are: (1) ḥelqāh, 'portion' (II S 23 12 AV); (2) ḥārīsh, 'plowing' (I S 8 12); (3) 'āphār, 'dust,' or 'soil' (Job 14 8); (4) sādheh, 'open country,' 'field' (Gn 33 19; Jos 24 32; I S 14 25; I Ch 11 13 AV); (5) ἔδαφος, 'bottom,' 'base' (Ac 22 7); (6) ἐδραίωμα, 'stay,' 'support' (I Ti 3 15); (7) χώρα, 'place' (Lk 12 16); (8) χωρίον, dim. of (7) (Jn 4 5); (9) ἀγρός, 'field' (Lk 14 18 AV); (10) χαμαί, adv., 'to the ground' (Jn 9 6, 18 6). In Lk 19 44 "ground" does not represent a separate Gr. word, but is involved in the verb ἐδαφίζειν, from ἔδαφος; see (5), above. E. E. N.

GROVE. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 11.

GUARD: The rendering of several Heb. and Gr. terms: (1) ṭabbāḥ, 'slaughterer,' used only of three foreigners (Potiphar in Gn 37 36, etc.; Nebuzaradan in II K 25 8, etc., and Jer 39 9, etc., and Arioch in Dn 2 14). The Heb. term is perhaps not an exact reproduction of the Egyptian or Babylonian originals, though the 'chief of the slayers' (i.e., 'sacrificers') may well have been an official who stood very near the king and was entrusted with the duty of guarding his body. (2) rūts, 'runner,' used of Hebrews themselves in I and II K and II Ch. These 'runners,' or trusted foot-soldiers, stood close to the king and performed various functions. Their 'chief' was doubtless an officer of rank. That they were a 'body-guard' in the strictest sense is not certain. David, e.g., had a special guard of foreigners (Cherethites and Pelethites; cf. II S 20 23, 23 23, where mishma'ath, not rūts, is used). (3) mishmār, 'watch' (Neh 4 22 f.; Ezk 38 7). (4) On Ac 28 16; Ph 1 13, see PRÆTORIUM. (5) The κουστωδία, "guard" RV, "watch" AV of Mt 27 65 f., is somewhat difficult to explain. It may refer to the Temple guard that under a Roman officer kept charge of the high-priestly vestments (see Jos. Ant. XV, 11 4). (6) In Mk 6 27 σπεκουλάτωρ, a Roman military term, means here probably one of the officers at hand ready for any duty the king might demand. E. E. N.

GUARDIANS. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 6.

GUDGODAH, gud-gō'dā (גֻּדְגֹּדָה gudhgōdhāh): A station on Israel's march from Kadesh to Moab, probably somewhere in Edom (Dt 10 7). E. E. N.

GUEST, GUEST-CHAMBER: (1) The rendering of the Heb. qerū'īm, 'invited ones' in I K 1 41, 49; Pr 9 18; Zeph 1 7. (2) Present participle of ἀνακεῖσθαι, 'to recline at table' (Mt 22 10 f.). (3) Aor. infin. of καταλύειν, 'to lodge' (Lk 19 7 AV, "gone in to lodge" RV). (See HOSPITALITY.) The larger houses had a guest-chamber (Mk 14 14; Lk 22 11; I S 9 22, "parlor" AV). C. S. T.

GUILE: In general this word conveys the same meaning in Biblical usage as elsewhere (Ex 21 14; Ps 34 13; Jn 1 47), i.e., the quality, or act, of concealing one's true intention and producing a misleading impression. It is named as something to be deprecated and avoided, except in II Co 12 16, where it is used in a good sense. A. C. Z.

GUILT, GUILTINESS, GUILTY: (1) These words in most cases render derivatives of the root 'shm (verb: 'to be [or feel] guilty'; noun: 'guilt' ["guiltiness" Gn 26 10]; adjective: 'guilty'). In AV the word "trespass" is frequently used to render these terms, also "desolate" (Is 24 6; Hos 13 16), "faulty" (II S 14 13), and "offend" (Jer 2 3). (2) The Heb. rāshā', 'wicked,' 'godless,' is also so rendered (Nu 5 31; Ps 109 7, "condemned" AV). (3) ἔνοχος, 'held in,' 'subject to,' 'liable' (Mk 3 29, "in danger of" AV, 14 64 and ‖, "guilty" RV; I Co 11 27; Ja 2 10). (4) On Mt 23 18 and Ro 3 19 cf. RV E. E. N.

GUILTLESS: This word renders: (1) the Heb. nāqāh (vb.) and nāqī (adj.), the root idea being 'to empty' (as a vessel, by pouring out its contents), and hence 'to cleanse,' or purify (Nu 3 22; Jos 2 19 f., "quit" AV; II S 3 28, 14 9). (2) ἀναίτιος, 'free from legal blame,' from a negative and αἰτία, 'legal cause for complaint' (Mt 12 5, 7, "blameless" AV). E E. N.

GULF. See ESCHATOLOGY, § 38.

GUNI, gū'nī (גּוּנִי, gūnī): 1. The ancestral head of the clan of Gunites, of the tribe of Naphtali (Gn 46 24; Nu 26 48; I Ch 7 13). 2. The head of a Gadite family (I Ch 5 15). E. E. N.

GUR, gūr (גּוּר, gūr), ASCENT OF: A place near Ibleam where Ahaziah, King of Judah, was wounded (II K 9 27). Site unknown. E. E. N.

GUR-BAAL, -bē'al (גּוּר בַּעַל, gūr ba'al), 'dwelling of Baal': An unidentified place, probably somewhere in Edom, inhabited by Arabians (II Ch 26 7). The true reading may be tur-baal, 'rock of Baal,' as suggested by MSS. of the LXX. and the Vulgate. E. E. N.

GUTTER: 1. The word raḥaṭ, so translated in Gn 30 38, 41, is much better rendered "trough" as in Ex 2 16. The watering-troughs for the flocks are meant. 2. In II S 5 8 RV has "watercourse" for "gutter" AV. The text of the verse is corrupt and the sense impossible to make out. It is not known what is meant here by the term tsinnōr. HAAHASHTARI, hê″a-hash′ta-rai (הָאַחַשְׁתָּרִי, hā'ăḥashtārī): A descendant of Judah (I Ch 4 6). E. E. N.

HABAIAH, hab-ê′yā (חֲבָיָה, ḥăbhāyāh), 'J″ hides': The ancestral head of a priestly family whose members could not establish their genealogy (Ezr 2 61, called Hobaiah in Neh 7 63). E. E. N.

HABAKKUK, ha-bak′ŭk (חֲבַקּוּק, ḥăbhaqqūq), either from ḥābaq, 'to embrace,' or cognate with Assyr. ḥambuḳûḳu, the name of a plant (Delitzsch, Prolog. 84): A prophet of Judah, probably a resident of Jerusalem.

1. The Prophet. All that is known of him is to be found in the book which bears his name. In the apocryphal book of Bel and the Dragon he is said to have been of the tribe of Levi. One rabbinical legend identifies him with the son of the Shunammite widow whom Elisha restored to life (II K 4 16). Another makes him the sentinel referred to in Is 21 6. But these items and others are purely legendary and untrustworthy. The Book of Habakkuk ("the burden which Habakkuk the prophet did see") is mainly concerned with the menace to the national existence of Israel presented by the rapid development of the Chaldean power.

2. Contents of the Book. Its three chapters present the thought of the reality and greatness of this danger. In the first, the prophet expresses his personal distress upon realizing the condition of things. The thought is cast into the form of a complaint to J″ (1 2-4), to which J″ is represented as making the reply that the Chaldeans are raised up by Himself (1 5-11). The prophet responds with a declaration of his satisfaction; for if this is the case, it can mean no permanent evil, and the explanation must be found in the sin of Judah, which demands a visitation of judgment (1 12-27). The second chapter opens with the preliminaries of a new vision (2 1-3), proceeds to a description of the Chaldean's greed and violence (2 4-8), records three woes against him because of his "evil gain" (vs. 9-11), because he "buildeth a town with blood and establisheth a city by iniquity" (vs. 12-14), and because he "giveth his neighbor drink" (vs. 15-17), and ends with a denunciation of the vanity of his idolatry (2 18-20). The third chapter, entitled "A prayer of Habakkuk," is a psalm of praise to J″ and of confidence in His purpose to deliver His people (3 1-19).

3. Literary Form. The literary form of Habakkuk is striking, if not unique, among the prophetic books. The prophet casts his thought into a dramatic representation, with J″ and himself as the speakers. And both in conception and expression the result is highly poetic. In ch. 3 especially there are a lofty tone and a rhythmic flow quite up to the standard of the best Hebrew poctry.

4. Unity. The chief question raised by the book in its present form is that of its unity. There are in the main three critical theories regarding the book, based upon a division of it into three sections: (1) That of those who believe that the three parts belong to three different settings and authors, of which only the first is traceable to Habakkuk (Kuenen). (2) That of those who hold that the first and second parts are a single composition by Habakkuk, but that the third is a later production. And (3) that of those who assign the whole to Habakkuk. The reasons for dividing the book into three separate sections are not very strong, and its advocates are constrained to admit that they can only establish a high degree of probability. The reasons for detaching ch. 3 and ascribing it to a later date are: the lack of a definite setting for it, such as the rest of the book reflects, and a certain difference of style and temper. In the first two chapters Habakkuk addresses God as an individual; in the third he puts a prayer in the mouth of the people. Moreover, in form and content there are strong resemblances between ch. 3 and some exilic psalms, leading to the conclusion that this poem is excerpted from an exilic liturgical collection and attached to the prophecy of Habakkuk (Wellhausen, Nowack, Cornill, Cheyne). Of these considerations the last offers the greatest cogency and pertinence. The alleged lack of definite setting is a purely negative condition on which no conclusion can be based. Upon the whole, the reasons for doubting the integrity of the book have not commanded universal consent, and many of the most competent scholars (Ewald, König, Sinker, Kirkpatrick, and Von Orelli) believe in its unity, while many others declare in favor of the verdict 'not proven' (Driver, G. A. Smith).

5. The Text. The condition of the Hebrew text of Habakkuk is not satisfactory; in fact, in many places it is hopelessly corrupt.

6. The Date. The date of the production has been generally fixed between 625 and 600 B.C. This was the period of the rapid progress of the Babylonians toward supreme power under Nebopolassar and his more illustrious son Nebuchadrezzar. The Chaldeans had captured Nineveh in 607. In 604 they had overwhelmingly defeated the Egyptian army led by Pharaoh Necho at Carchemish (Jer 46 2). From that day onward it was only a question of time as to when they should become complete masters of Western Asia. Though they did not actually invade Judæa until the year 601, it is not improbable that the prophecy of Habakkuk was uttered in view of their certain coming somewhat before that year.

HABITATION: The rendering of a number of Heb. and Gr. terms. (1) zᵉbhūl, 'dwelling' (cf. Zebulun, Gn 30 20) (II Ch 6 2; Is 63 15; Hab 3 11; Ps 49 14, "dwelling" AV). (2) ṭīrāh, 'encampment' (Ps 69 25 AV). (3) shebheth (inf. construct of yāshabh, 'to seat oneself,' 'to dwell') (Ps 33 14; Jer 9 6; Ob ver. 3). (4) mōshābh (also from yāshabh) (Gn 36 43; Lv 13 46 AV; Ps 107 4 RV, etc.). (5) mākhōn (from kūn, 'to be upright,' 'firm,' or 'fixed'), a 'place,' or 'foundation' (Ps 89 14, 97 2; cf. RV). (6) mᵉkhūrāh, 'descent,' or 'origin' (Ezk 29 14 AV; cf. RV). (7) mᵉkhērāh, of uncertain meaning (Gn 49 5 AV, "swords" RV). (8) mā'ōn and mᵉ'ōnāh, 'dwelling' (Dt 26 15; II Ch 30 27, etc.; I Ch 4 41 AV, "Meunim" RV). (9) shākhan, 'to dwell,' and mishkhān, 'dwelling-place' (Dt 12 5; II Ch 29 6, etc.; Ps 132 5 AV, "tabernacles" RV). (10) nāweh (frequently in the pl. nᵉ'ōth), the feeding- and resting-place of the flocks, hence 'pastures,' 'folds' and then, of men, 'dwelling,' etc. (Ex 15 13, etc.; Job 5 24, and Jer 25 37 AV, "fold" RV; Ps 79 7, and Pr 24 15, "dwelling-place" AV; Jer 9 10, 50 19, and Am 1 1 AV, "pastures" RV; Ps 83 12, "houses" AV). On Ex 15 2 cf. RV (11) ἔπαυλις (Ac 1 20, the Gr. rendering of (2), above). (12) ὀκηνή, 'tent,' Lk 16 9, "tabernacles" RV. (13) κατοικία (Ac 17 26), οἰκητήριον (II Co 5 2, "house" AV; Jude ver. 6), κατοικητήριον (Eph 2 22; Rev 18 22), all derived from οἰκία, 'house.' E. E. N.

HABOR, hē'bōr (חָבוֹר, ḥābhōr): A tributary of the Euphrates, on whose banks some Israelites, deported during the reign of Hoshea, were settled by Sargon (722–705 B.C.) (II K 17 6, 18 11; I Ch 5 26). Others had been taken to the same region by Tiglath-pileser III (745–727). The stream is identified with the Ḥabur of the Assyrians (COT, II, p. 267) and the Chaboras of classic literature (not to be confused with Chebar, q.v.). A. C. Z.

HACALIAH, hac''a-lai'ā (חֲכַלְיָה, ḥăkhalyāh, Hachaliah AV): The father of Nehemiah (Neh 1 1, 10 1). E. E. N.

HACHILAH, ha-cai'lā or hac'i-lā (חֲכִילָה, ḥăkhīlāh): A hill near the wilderness of Jeshimon, in the wilderness of Ziph (I S 23 19, 26 1 ff.). Exact location unknown. E. E. N.

HACHMONI, hac-mō'nai or hac'mo-nai (חַכְמֹנִי, ḥakhmōnī), 'the wise': The father of Jehiel (I Ch 27 32). E. E. N.

HACHMONITE, hac'mo-nait (חַכְמֹנִי, ḥakhmōnī): In I Ch 11 11 Jashobeam, one of David's heroes, is said to be "the son of a Hachmonite." In the ‖ II S 23 8 the word is "Tahchemonite," which is probably an error for "Hachmonite." See JASHOBEAM. E. E. N.

HADAD, hē'dad (הֲדַד, hădhadh), name of an Aramæan god: 1. An early king of Edom, son of Bedad (Gn 36 35 f.; I Ch 1 46 f.), who smote Midian in the field of Moab. His city was Avith. 2. The last in the list of the kings of Edom (I Ch 1 50 f. = Hadar, Gn 36 39). He was perhaps slain with his family by Joab, captain of David's host (I K 11 15). His city was Pau. 3. An Edomite of royal line, perhaps grandson of 2. He escaped from Joab to Egypt, and received favors from Pharaoh. After the death of Joab and David, and probably toward the end of Solomon's reign, he returned to Edom and troubled Israel (I K 11 14 ff.). C. S. T.

HADADEZER, had''ad-ī'zẹr (הֲדַדְעֶזֶר, hădhadh-'ezer), 'Hadad is help': A king of Zobah, near Damascus (II S 8 3-12; I K 11 23 = Hadarezer, II S 10 16, 19; I Ch 18 3 ff., 19 16, 19). After his defeat by David, the Syrians of Damascus came to aid him, and were defeated and made tributary. At another time he joined the Ammonites and Syrians against David (II S 10 16), and was defeated at Helam. II S 8 3 and 10 15 f. suggest that he was ruler over an extended Aramaic kingdom, but this is uncertain. C. S. T.

HADADRIMMON, hē''dad-rim'ọn (הֲדַדְרִמּוֹן, hădhadhrimmōn, compounded of two names of divinities, Zech 12 11): The name, according to Jerome, of Maximianopolis, the modern Rummâne, near Megiddo, where Israel lamented the death of King Josiah. Nowack, Handkom. ad loc., and others find here the name of a god (Adonis?) whose death is lamented. Cf. W. R. Smith, *Religion of the Semites*², 411. C. S. T.

HADES, hē'dîz. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§17–21, 34.

HADID, hē'did (חָדִיד, ḥādhīdh): An ancient site not mentioned in the pre-exilic books (but found on Egyptian inscriptions of the 16th cent. B.C.), though recolonized by post-exilic Jews (Ezr 2 33 = Neh 7 37, 11 34) and later fortified by Simon Maccabæus (I Mac 12 38; here called Adida). See Map III, D 5. E. E. N.

HADLAI, had'lê-ai or had'lê (חַדְלַי, ḥadhlay): The father of Amasa (II Ch 28 12). E. E. N.

HADORAM, ha-dō'ram (הֲדוֹרָם, hădhōrām), 'the beloved of the High One': The son of Tou (Toi II S 8 9 f.), King of Hamath, sent to King David by his father on a congratulatory embassy on the occasion of his victory over Hadadezer (I Ch 18 10). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11, and ADONIRAM. A. C. Z.

HADRACH, had'rac or hē'drac (חַדְרָךְ, ḥadhrākh): Only in Zec 9 1, as the name of a land against which a prophetic burden is declared. The context determines the region to be a portion of Syria and its capital, Damascus. It is associated with Hamath, Tyre, and Sidon. It was the same as the Assyr. Ḥatarikka or Ḥatarakka (cf. COT, II, p. 453). A. C. Z.

HAGAB, hē'gab (חָגָב, ḥāgābh), 'grasshopper': The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 46). E. E. N.

HAGABA, HAGABAH, hag'a-ba, hag'a-bā (חֲגָבָא, חֲגָבָה, ḥăgābhā', ḥăgābhāh, variant forms of Hagab): The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 45 = Neh 7 48). E. E. N.

HAGAR, hē'gar (הָגָר, hāgār, Agar AV, in N T), meaning uncertain; the root means possibly 'to flee'; cf. the Arab. Hegira, the 'flight' of Mohammed: The name of Sarai's handmaid, the mother of Ishmael. The story of H. is told both in J and E, with some additions in P. The story in J (Gn 16 1b, 2, 4-14) relates how the childless Sarai gave H., her Egyptian (mitsrīth) handmaid, to Abram, hoping thereby to obtain children. But the insolence of H. offended Sarai, who treated her so harshly that she fled to the desert. Here an angel appeared to her near a well and comforted her by the promise that her seed should be very numerous, told her to name the child soon to be born Ishmael, and indicated beforehand his character. In gratitude she named the well Beer-lahai-roi (q.v.). In obedience to the angel, she returned to Sarai (16 9, which may be editorial, to harmonize J with E). In E (Gn 21 9-21) the story follows much the same fundamental outline. Ishmael, a child still quite young (cf. vs. 14 ff.), playing about on the occasion of the feast celebrating the weaning of Isaac, aroused Sarai's jealousy, who demanded the expulsion of the "bondwoman" H. and her child. Abraham, loath to consent, does this only in obedience to a Divine command. With a bit of provision H. was sent away the next morning into the wilderness. Here she and the child were saved from dying of thirst by an angel of God, who showed her a well and also promised that her son should be the father of a great nation.

The additions of P (Gn 16 3, 15) are chronological notices fitting the stories into P's chronological scheme.

The two accounts of J and E are so similar in their main points that it seems probable that they are but variant forms of the same original tradition, the basis of which is to be sought in early (and now unknown) tribal movements, which resulted in the formation of closely related tribal groups (Isaac, Ishmael). H. is called an "Egyptian," but the adjective mitsrith may possibly refer to Mutsri—a N. Arabian locality. H. (viewed as a tribe) may also have some connection with the E. Jordan Hagrites, or Hagarenes (I Ch 5 10, 19-21; Ps 83 6). The story as now found in Gn emphasizes the Divine selection of and special providence over Isaac (Israel), and at the same time reveals a broad sympathy for other tribes (Ishmael), for whom there is also a place in the same providential care.

Both Jewish and Mohammedan speculations have indulged in many fancies concerning H. (cf. Ryle in HDB s.v.). Even Paul does not hesitate to allegorize (in rabbinical fashion) the story for an illustration in his argument in Galatians (4 21-31).

HAGARENES, hē''gar-înz' or hag'a-rînz. See HAGRI.

HAGGAI, hag'ga-ai (חַגַּי, ḥaggay), 'festal': One of the two prophets of the Return under Zerubbabel. The date of his prophetic ministry is definitely given by himself as the second year of Darius (Hystaspes), i.e., 520 B.C.

1. The Prophet. There was a belief in the early Christian Church that he had predicted the Return and was quite young when it took place. From Hag 2 3, however, it has been inferred that he had seen the First Temple in his youth, and was very old when he took part in the erection and dedication of the Second.

2. The Name Haggai. The name Haggai is usually rendered as an adjective meaning 'festal,' with the conjecture that it was given him because of his birth on some festal occasion or day. Others, however, consider it the contraction of Ḥaggiyah, which was the name of a Levitical family (I Ch 6 29), and still others that of Haggariah ('J" girds,' though such a name does not occur), just as Zaccai (Zacchæus) is a short form of Zachariah. The supposition that the name is a symbolical title, like Malachi, ascribed to the author of the book originally published as an anonymous work, because all his prophecies were uttered on festal occasions (Andrée), has not commended itself.

3. The Book: Contents. The Book of Haggai consists of four prophetic discourses, each of which is distinctly dated. The first (1 2-11) was given on the first day of the sixth month and was intended to stir the people to rebuild the Temple. It opens with a denunciation of their indifference to its ruined condition, as contrasted with their own ceiled houses (1 1-6). It contains also the specific command, "Go up to the mountain and bring wood and build the house," which is enforced by the statement that the drought and the plagues from which the people were suffering were sent to them because of their neglect of God's house (vs. 7-11). This discourse is followed by a brief narrative telling how Zerubbabel and Joshua obeyed the command (vs. 12-15). The second discourse (2 2-9), delivered on the 20th of the 7th month, is a note of encouragement to those who were disappointed with the outcome of labor and sacrifice. It holds out the bright prospect of greater glory for the Second Temple than had been enjoyed by the First. "The precious things of all nations shall come and I will fill this house with glory, saith Jehovah of hosts." The third discourse (2 11-19), dated the 20th of the 9th month, gives an explanation of the uncleanness of the people and a promise of blessing. The fourth discourse (2 21-23), dated four days later, rebukes the detractors of Zerubbabel and encourages him personally.

4. Critical Questions. These discourses were probably delivered in a more elaborate and extended form and are reported in substance only. The genuineness of the fourth discourse has been questioned, but on grounds regarded utterly insufficient even by some most rigid critics. The style of the prophet has been characterized as tame and prosaic, but it is so only as compared with that of the most vivid Biblical writers.

HAGGI, hag'gai (חַגִּי, ḥaggī), 'my feast': The ancestral head of one of the clans of Gad, the Haggites (Gn 46 16; Nu 26 15). E. E. N.

HAGGIAH, hag-gai'ā (חַגִּיָּה, ḥaggīyāh), 'J" is my feast': A Levite (I Ch 6 30). E. E. N.

HAGRI, hag'rai (הַגְרִי, ḥagrī): 1. The father of Mibhar, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 38, Haggeri AV), but probably more correctly given in II S 23 36 as "the Gadite." 2. Jaziz, the Hagrite, superintendent of David's flocks (I Ch 27 30, 31, Hagarite AV). Both 1 and 2 may be explained by 3. 3. The Hagrites (I Ch 5 10, 19, 20, Hagarites AV; also Hagarenes, Ps 83 6, but RVmg. "Hagrites"), the name of a tribe with which the Reubenites waged war and from which they took spoils. Following the suggestion furnished by the name, the tribe was later derived by Jewish writers from Hagar. A similar, probably cognate, name appears in the list of Tiglath-pileser III (COT, II, 32), and it is certain that such a tribe flourished in northern Arabia. A. C. Z.

HAIR: Among the Hebrews black hair was common (Song 4 1, 5 11), and a luxuriant growth was considered a mark of beauty. Men wore their hair trimmed (Ezk 44 20), but not shaven, and the beard was carefully dressed. A few had long hair (Absalom, II S 14 26), which might be braided (Samson, Jg 16 13, 19). Women wore the hair long (Song 4 1; I Co 11 15), but fastened in some way, often in artistic locks and coils (II K 9 30; Is 3 24). Baldness was a disgrace (II K 2 23; Is 3 24). Shaving the head was a sign of mourning (Jer 7 29; Am 8 10), which was forbidden in later times (Dt 14 1), as were also certain forms of cutting the hair (Lv 19 27; Ezk 44 20). In connection with the Nazirite vow, the hair was allowed to grow until the vow was accomplished (Nu 6 2, 5), when it was cut off and burned (Nu 6 18; cf. Ac 18 18, 21 24). The expression "a hairy man" in II K 1 8 does not refer to the prophet's person, but to his mantle, which in all likelihood consisted of undressed skin (cf. Gn 25 25; Zech 13 4). C. S. T.

HAKKATAN, hak'a-tan (הַקָּטָן, ha-qāṭān), 'the little one': The father of Johanan (Ezr 8 12). E. E. N.

HAKKOZ, hak'koz (הַקּוֹץ, ha-qōts), 'the thorn' (?): 1. The head of a family of Judah (I Ch 4 8). 2. The ancestral head of the seventh course of priests (I Ch 24 10; Ezr 2 61; Neh 3 4, 21, 7 63, Coz AV). E. E. N.

HAKUPHA, ha-kiū'fa (חֲקוּפָא, ḥăqūphā'): The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 51 = Neh 7 53). E. E. N.

HALAH, hê'lā (חֲלַח, ḥălaḥ): Sargon, after he had captured Samaria, transported the captive Israelites to Halah, and to the Habor, the river of Gozan, and to the cities of the Medes (II K 17 6, 18 11). There are several views as to the location of Halah. (a) It has been identified with the Calachene of Strabo, a plain of N. Assyria, which lies to the E. of the Tigris. (b) Others regard it as the Hebrew name of Chalkitis in Mesopotamia, near the river Chaboras. A cuneiform inscription mentions a territory, Ḥalaḥḥa, near Haran. This points to the same region as Chalkitis. (c) The LXX. regards Halah as the name of a river of Gozan. The second view of its location is the most probable. J. A. K.

HALAK, hê'lak (הָהָר הָחָלָק, hāhār heḥālāq), 'the smooth (bare) mountain': In Jos 11 17, 12 7 it is given as the southern limit of Joshua's conquest. It has been identified with the white cliffs 8 m. S. of the Dead Sea, and also with Jebel Madara, SW of the pass on the road between Petra and Hebron. C. S. T.

HALHUL, hal'hul (חַלְחוּל, ḥalḥūl): A town in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15 58). It is the modern Ḥalḥûl, a well-situated village 4 m. N. of Hebron, on a hill just E. of the road to Jerusalem. A spring, rock tombs, and old walls are near at hand. Map II, E 2. C. S. T.

HALI, hê'lai (חֲלִי, ḥălī): A town on the border of Asher (Jos 19 25). Map IV, C 5. Identification uncertain. E. E. N.

HALL. See HOUSE, § 6 (f), and PRÆTORIUM.

HALLELUJAH, hal"ę-lū'ya, literally, 'Praise Jah': A liturgical ejaculation frequent in the last part of the Psalter. It occurs at the opening of eleven Psalms (106, 111, 112, 113, 117, 135, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150), and at the close of thirteen (104, 105, 106, 113, 115, 116, 117, 135, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150). In all these cases it is probably not an integral part of the Psalms, but rather a traditional acclamation used with them. From its occurrence the group Pss 113–118 was known as the Hallel (or Egyptian Hallelujah), which was regularly used at the celebration of the Passover, doubtless being the hymn sung at the institution of the Lord's Supper (Mt 26 30). Another Hallel (the Greek or Great Hallelujah) included more or less of the group Pss 146–150, and part of it was sometimes added to the foregoing. In the N T the word occurs only in Rev 19 1-6 in the Greek form Alleluia, which has been extensively adopted in Christian liturgies and hymns. W. S. P.

HALLOHESH, ha-lō'hesh (הַלּוֹחֵשׁ, ha-lōḥēsh, Halohesh AV), 'the whisperer': The ancestral head of a post-exilic family (Neh 3 12, 10 24). E. E. N.

HALLOW, HALLOWED THINGS: The Heb. terms so rendered are all connected with the root קָדַשׁ, qādhash, which meant primarily 'separation' or 'placing apart' and (in its different forms) is most commonly rendered "holy," "be holy," "holiness," etc. A "hallowed thing" was thus something set apart from ordinary to a sacred use. To "hallow" a person or thing was to withdraw him, or it, from common occupations, or uses, to those of a sacred character (cf. Ex 20 11, 29 1; I S 21 4, etc.). God's name is to be "hallowed" in that it is not to be treated as common, but with all due reverence (Mt 6 9; Lk 11 2). See also HOLY. E. E. N.

HALT. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (8).

HAM (חָם, ḥām): I. The younger son of Noah (Gn 9 24). The name has been derived from chem or keme (Egyptian for 'black'). Ebers (Aegypten, I, p. 55) makes it refer to the color of the soil. Others derive it from a Semitic (Late Heb.) root, ḥūm, 'hot,' relating the patriarch to the peoples of the warm southern countries in general. The later derivation seems better founded (cf. PRE 3, article Aegypten). See also ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 10.

II. 1. Poetically, Ham denotes Egypt ("land of Ham," Ps 105 23, 27, 106 22, also "tents of Ham," Ps 78 51 ["tabernacles" AV], for the dwellings of the Egyptians). 2. A place where Chedorlaomer is said to have defeated the Zuzim (Gn 14 5); but since these are the same as the Zamzummim, who dwelt in the territory known as Ammon, it is safe to infer that Ham here stands for Ammon. A. C. Z.

HAMAN, hē'mən (הָמָן, hāmān), etymology doubtful: The prime minister and favorite of Ahasuerus (Xerxes, 485–464 B.C.). He is one of the chief personalities in the story of Esther (3 1 ff.), and is represented as the great enemy of the Jews. He is also called an Agagite (Est 3 1, 10, etc. = Amalekite; cf. I S 15 8) in the Hebrew text, but a Bugæan (in 9 24, a Macedonian) in the LXX. There may be a suggestion in this of the enmity of the Macedonians for the Jews in the later age. In the feast of Purim the hanging of an effigy of Haman was a feature. See also ESTHER, § 6. A. C. Z.

HAMATH, hē'math (חֲמָת, ḥămāth): A district, to be distinguished from "Hamath the great" (q.v.), lying on the SW. slope of Hermon, reaching at least as far as the Jordan to the W., and forming the boundary of Palestine and Israel to the NE. (Nu 34 8; I K 8 65; II K 14 25; Ezk 47 16; Am 6 14). In the 10th cent. B.C. it was an Aramæan kingdom, whose ruler Tou, though not joining in the league against Israel, became tributary to David (II S 8 9 ff.; cf. I Ch 18 9). As the frontier of a rival people, its control was always aimed at by the powerful kings of Israel (II Ch 8 4; II K 14 28). See Winckler in KAT 3, 182, 231 f., and Oriental. Forschungen, III, Heft 3 (1905). J. F. McC.

HAMATH (the Great), HAMATHITE, hē'math, hē'math-ait. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

HAMATH-ZOBAH, -zō'bā (חֲמַת צוֹבָה, ḥămath tsōbhāh), 'fortress of Zoba': A place in Syria conquered by Solomon (II Ch 8 3), near Hamath and Tadmor. C. S. T.

HAMMATH, ham'ath (חַמַּת, ḥammath), 'hot spring': I. The father of the house of Rechab (I Ch 2 55). II. A town of Naphtali (Jos 19 35), probably the well-known hot springs S. of Tiberias, the Gr. Emmaus, the modern Ḥâmmâm (Jos. Ant. XVIII, 2 3, Ἀμμαθούς) = possibly Hammoth-dor (Jos 21 32), and Hammon (I Ch 6 76 [61]). C. S. T.

HAMMEAH, TOWER OF. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

HAMMEDATHA, ham''mē-dē'thə (הַמְּדָתָא, ham-mᵉdhāthā'): The father of Haman (Est 3 1, etc.). E. E. N.

HAMMELECH, ham'ē-lec (הַמֶּלֶךְ, ha-melekh), 'the king': So in Jer 36 26, 38 6 (AV), but RV reads simply "the king." E. E. N.

HAMMER: The rendering of several Heb. words. (1) maqqebheth, the hammer used by the carpenter or stone-mason (I K 6 7; Jer 10 4), or the smith (Is 44 12). It is also used of the mallet by which tent-pins were driven into the ground (Jg 4 21). (2) halmūth, of uncertain meaning, the instrument used by Jael to slay Sisera (Jg 5 26; cf. Moore in Int. Crit. Com. ad loc.). (3) paṭṭīsh, the large hammer of the smith (Is 41 7; Jer 23 29), used figuratively of Babylon, or Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 50 23). (4) kēlappōth (pl.), probably a cutting implement like an ax, not a hammer (Ps 74 6). E. E. N.

HAMMIPHKAD, ham-mif'kad, GATE OF. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

HAMMOLECHETH, ham-mol'ē-keth (הַמֹּלֶכֶת, ha-mōlekheth, Hammoleketh AV): Apparently a Manassite clan closely connected with the Gileadites E. of the Jordan (I Ch 7 18). E. E. N.

HAMMON, ham'ən (חַמּוֹן, ḥammōn), 'hot spring': 1. A border town of Asher (Jos 19 28), near Kanah, and therefore not far from Tyre. Unidentified. Evidence of a sanctuary of Baal Hamman has been found in two inscriptions at Khirbet Ummel-'Amud, S. of Tyre. 2. A Gershonite Levitical city in Naphtali (I Ch 6 76 [61]) = Hammoth-dor (Jos 21 32), and possibly Hammath (Jos 19 35). C. S. T.

HAMMOTH-DOR, ham'əth-dōr'' (חַמּוֹת דֹּאר, ḥammōth dō'r): A Levitical city of Naphtali (Jos 21 32), apparently the same as Hammath (Jos 19 35) and Hammon (I Ch 6 76). Map IV, E 7. See also HAMMATH. E. E. N.

HAMMUEL, ham'mu-el (חַמּוּאֵל, ḥammū'ēl, Hamuel AV): The ancestral head of a Simeonite clan (I Ch 4 26). E. E. N.

HAMONAH, ha-mō'nā (הֲמוֹנָה, hămōnāh, Hammonah AV), 'multitude': The symbolic name for a city near the place where the armies of Gog were to meet their fate (Ezk 39 11, 15). It is not likely that any actual city is referred to. E. E. N.

HAMON-GOG, hē'mon-gəg'' (הֲמוֹן גּוֹג, hămōn gōg), 'the multitude of Gog': A valley, described quite specifically as "the valley of them that pass through on the east of the [Dead] sea" (Ezk 39 11 ff.). It is likely that some actual valley, a thoroughfare between the regions E. and W of the Jordan, is meant. The prophet uses it symbolically. It is to be filled with the dead bodies (of the hosts of Gog) and passage through it will thereby be blocked. The AV reading in ver. 11, "stop the noses," has no basis in the Heb. E. E. N.

HAMOR, hē'mōr (חֲמוֹר, ḥămōr), 'ass': The name of a Hivite, "the father of Shechem," who along with his son was slain by the sons of Jacob for the wrong done their sister Dinah (Gn 34 2 ff.). Some maintain that under the guise of an incident in the life of two families, the story has embalmed an episode in the tribal relations of Israel with a Canaanite tribe, Hamor (a totem-clan, whose symbol was the ass). Another view identifies the sons of Hamor, the Hamorites, with the Amorites.
A. C. Z.

HAMRAN, ham'rən. See HEMDAN.

HAMUEL, ham'yu-el or hə-miū'el. See HAMMUEL.

HAMUL, hē'mul (חֲמוּל, ḥāmūl), 'pitied': The ancestral head of one of the clans of Judah, the Hamulites (Gn 46 12; Nu 26 21). E. E. N.

HAMUTAL, hē-mū'tal (חֲמוּטַל, ḥămūṭal): The wife of Josiah and mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, kings of Judah (II K 23 31, 24 18; Jer 52 1).
E. E. N.

HANAMEL, han'ə-mel (חֲנַמְאֵל, ḥănam'ēl, Hanameel AV): The cousin of Jeremiah from whom the prophet purchased an ancestral field, according to the law of redemption (Lv 25 25), in the faith that after God's judgment had been visited on Jerusalem the land would again be inhabited (Jer 32 7 ff.). The notice of the transfer of the deed is of archeological interest. E. E. N.

HANAN, hē'nən (חָנָן, ḥānān), 'gracious': 1. A Benjamite chief (I Ch 8 23). 2. A descendant of Saul (I Ch 8 38, 9 44). 3. One of David's mighty men (I Ch 11 43). 4. The head of a family of the Nethinim, who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 46; Neh 7 49). 5. One who assisted Ezra in explaining the Law (Neh 8 7), perhaps the same as Neh 10 10 [11]. 6. One of the four treasurers in charge of the tithes (Neh 13 13). 7, 8. Two who "sealed the covenant" (Neh 10 22 [23], 26 [27]). 9. A son of Igdaliah, and a "man of God" (prophet), whose sons had a cell in the Temple at Jerusalem (Jer 35 4). C. S. T.

HANANEL, TOWER OF. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

HANANI, hə-nē'nai (חֲנָנִי, ḥănānī), 'gracious': 1. A seer, father of Jehu (I K 16 1, 7; II Ch 19 2, 20 34), who rebuked Asa for relying on Syria, and was cast into prison. 2. A 'brother,' or kinsman, of Nehemiah, who brought news of the fate of Jerusalem to Susa (Neh 1 2), and later was over the city gatekeepers in Jerusalem (Neh 7 2). 3. A chief musician who took part in the dedication of the wall at Jerusalem (Neh 12 36). 4. A priest who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 20). 5. A musician, son of Heman, in David's service (I Ch 25 4, 25).
C. S. T.

HANANIAH, han"ə-nai'ā (חֲנַנְיָהוּ, ḥănanyāhū, חֲנַנְיָה, ḥănanyāh), 'J" is gracious': Fourteen persons bearing this name are mentioned in the O T. 1. An officer under Uzziah (II Ch 26 11). 2. The father of Zedekiah, prince of Judah (Jer 36 12). 3. A prophet who publicly opposed Jeremiah's policy and contradicted his declarations regarding the outcome of the siege of Jerusalem. In his reply Jeremiah predicted the speedy death of H. (Jer ch. 28). 4. The grandfather of Irijah (Jer 37 13). 5. One of Daniel's three companions (Dn 1 6 ff., 2 17 ff.). 6. A Hemanite musician (I Ch 25 4, 23). 7. A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 24). 8. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 19, 21). 9. One of the "sons of Bebai" who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 28). 10. A perfumer of Jerusalem who helped repair the wall (Neh 3 8). 11. A son of Shelemiah who helped repair the wall (Neh 3 30). 12. An officer under Nehemiah (Neh 7 2). 13. A representative of a family of the same name who signed the covenant (Neh 10 23). 14. A priest (Neh 12 12, 41). E. E. N.

HAND (יָד, yādh) (figurative use): While "hand" is one of the anthropomorphic expressions which abound in the O T, its figurative use is not confined to Divine actions and expressions. A language which possesses few abstract terms is compelled to use objective words for the wide range of ideas that come with changed conditions and growing civilization. Even in the Assyrian, îdu means 'strength' and in the Hebrew, phrases like "strengthen the hand" readily pass into those in which the hand itself is a synonym for power: "none of the men of might have found their hands" (Ps 76 5). In Jos 8 20 "power" is 'hands' in the Hebrew; cf. also Lv 5 7, 11, where "means" is literally 'hands.' It is also rendered "dominion" (II S 8 3; I Ch 18 3). Closely connected with this use are the phrases in which the Lord's hand is spoken of; it is "heavy" in chastisement (I S 5 6); it is strong to deliver (Ex 13 3, 14, 16); it is not "short" (Nu 11 23); it is "stretched out"; it seizes upon the prophet in inspiration (Is 8 11); even its "shadow" may be spoken of (Is 49 2). Other figurative uses are more akin to its physical meaning, as "side" (I S 4 18), 'direction' ("coast," Nu 24 24), special 'place' (Dt 23 12; Nu 2 17). The Heb. word may also mean a "monument" (I S 15 12), a share (Gn 47 24), or parts of objects, like an axletree and supports.

Many prepositional phrases occur which are rendered literally into English, like "under the hand" (Gn 41 35). Certain other Heb. words are rendered idiomatically by "hand" in various combinations in the AV, which are now obsolete or rare. There is also a wide range of emotional experiences in which the hand plays a large part—the hand that is waved in defiance, or pointed in scorn, that is raised in blessing, or extended for an oath, or that is laid upon the neophyte when inducted into his duties, speaks where the voice is unheard, or has ceased forever. The narrative and poetic sections of the O T owe their dramatic power in no small degree to this. "A hand upon the throne of Jah" (Ex 17 16 mg.) has all the significance of a gage of battle, and is as well an appeal that fears not to bring J" Himself into the fray. The priest who enters on his functions must have his 'hands filled,' Eng. "be consecrated" (Ex 29 9; Jg 17 5)—whether with sacrificial portions, or priestly emblems, or the dignity of the office is uncertain. Though the second may have been the early method of consecration, the technical usage of later days probably saw in the term only the last meaning. Washing hands in innocency, real or assumed, was a practised rite, and ministration to a leader could be symbolized by the phrase "pour water on the hands" (II K 3 11). But "clean hands" and a "pure heart" are correlative terms by which the citizen of Zion is distinguished from those who have not shrunk from touching the unclean thing (Ps 24 4). For the late Jewish expression 'defile the hands' see O T CANON, § 8 ff. A. S. C.

HANDBREATH. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

HANDKERCHIEF: The word so rendered, σουδάριον (Ac 19 12), is a Lat. word, sudarium (from sudor, 'sweat'), signifying a cloth for wiping off perspiration, or for similar purposes. The same word is rendered "napkin" (Lk 19 20; Jn 11 44, 20 7). The word rendered aprons (σιμικίνθια) in the same passage (Ac 19 12) is also a Lat. word, semicinctium (a 'half-girdle,' from semi, 'half,' and cingere, 'to bind'), meaning a 'small girdle' and then applied to a cloth worn over the clothing to protect it and fastened, or girded, about the waist. In Gn 3 7 the Heb. word rendered "aprons" means 'girdle,' on which see DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 1. E. E. N.

HANDMAID. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 7; MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, § 3; and SLAVERY, § 2.

HANDSTAVES: The Heb. word maqqēl, often rendered "staff" ("staves"; cf. I S 17 40, 42), is found in Ezk 39 9 joined with 'hand,' maqqēl yādh, 'staff of the hand' (the sing. for the plural), denoting one of the many kinds of weapons used by the hosts of Gog. Probably the simplest sort of weapon, such as clubs, is meant, though possibly the goads, or sticks, used for driving the animals may be intended (so A. B. Davidson in Camb. Bible, Ezekiel). E. E. N.

HANDWRITING (χειρόγραφον): The literal rendering (in Col 2 14 AV) of a term used in the sense of a 'written obligation,' as a 'note,' 'bond,' etc. Here Paul uses it of the Law, as though it were a note, or bond, indicative of an infinite debt. E. E. N.

HANES, hē'nîz (חָנֵס, ḥānēṣ): An Egyptian city, mentioned with Zoan (Is 30 4), giving perhaps the limits of the Egyptian kingdom. If so, it may be Heracleopolis magna (Coptic Hnês, Gr. Ἀννσις, Herod. 2 137) in middle Egypt, between the Nile and Fayûm, the ruins Ahnâs el Medîna. The texts and versions of Is 30 4 f. vary, and the meaning is obscure. Some think that Hanes is for Taphanhes on the NE. frontier of Egypt, near Zoan, which would give two cities near Palestine. C. S. T.

HANG, HANGING. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3.

HANGING, HANGINGS. See TABERNACLE, § 3.

HANNAH, han'ā (חַנָּה, ḥannāh), 'grace': One of the two wives of Elkanah and the mother of Samuel, the prophet. In the rather late narrative (I S chs. 1–2; see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF) H. is represented as a pious woman, but unhappy because of her childlessness. Samuel was born in answer to her prayer and devoted by his mother to the service of J" Afterward she became the mother of five other children (I S 2 21).

For the Song of Hannah see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. According to the LXX. the Song was inserted after 1 28a, while 1 28b with 2 11a read, "And she left him there before the Lord and returned to Ramathaim." E. E. N.

HANNATHON, han'na-thon (חַנָּתוֹן, ḥannāthōn): A place on the N. border of Zebulon (Jos 19 14); perhaps the modern Kefr 'Anân, a little E. of Ramah, Map IV, D 6. C. S. T.

HANNIEL, han'ni-el (חַנִיאֵל, ḥannī'ēl), 'God is grace,' or 'pity': 1. A "prince" of Manasseh (Nu 34 23). 2. The head of a family of Asher (I Ch 7 39, Haniel AV). E. E. N.

HANOCH, hē'noc (חֲנוֹךְ, ḥănōkh): 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Midian (Gn 25 4; I Ch 1 33, Henoch AV) (see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11). 2. The ancestral head of a clan of Reuben, the Hanochites (Gn 46 9; Nu 26 5, etc.). For the significance of the name, see ENOCH. On I Ch 1 3 (AV) cf. RV E. E. N.

HANUN, hē'nun (חָנוּן, ḥānūn), 'pitied': 1. The son of Nahash, King of Ammon. His insolent treatment of the messengers of David brought on a war in which the Ammonites lost their independence (I S 10 1 ff.; I Ch 19 1 ff.). 2, 3. The name of two persons who assisted in the work on the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 13, 30). E. E. N.

HAPHARAIM, haf"a-rē'im (חֲפָרַיִם, ḥăphārayim, Haphraim AV): A town on the border of Issachar (Jos 19 19), not yet certainly identified. E. E. N.

HAPPIZZEZ, hap'piz-ez (הַפִּצֵּץ, ha-pītstsēts, Aphses AV): The ancestral head of the 18th course of priests (I Ch 24 15). E. E. N.

HARA, hē'ra (הָרָא, hārā'): A section of the Assyrian Kingdom, to which the Israelites from Samaria were deported (I Ch 5 26). The corresponding account in II K 17 6, 18 11 reads "in the cities of the Medes," for which the LXX. has "in the mountains of the Medes" (הָרֵי מָדַי, hārē mādai). The LXX. is to be preferred, and would account for הרא (I Ch 5 26). C. S. T.

HARADAH, ha-rē'dā or har'a-dā (חֲרָדָה, ḥărādhāh): A station on the wilderness route between Sinai and Kadesh (Nu 33 24). Site unknown. E. E. N.

HARAN, hē'ran (הָרָן, hārān): 1. A son of Terah and brother of Abraham. He was the father of Lot, of Milcah, the wife of his uncle Nahor, and of Iscah. He is represented as dying before his father Terah (Gn 11 26 f., 31 [P], 28 f. [J]). Probably behind these individual names tribal or clan relations are signified. 2. A Levite (I Ch 23 9). E. E. N.

HARAN (חָרָן, ḥārān, in N T Χαρράν, Charran AV): I. A city of Mesopotamia situated on the Bêlikh about 60 m. above its confluence with the Euphrates. It was a junction-point on the great trade-route from Nineveh to Carchemish (see Map of Ancient Semitic World), and was a place of great commercial importance (cf. Ezk 27 23). It was also a chief seat of the worship of the moon-god Sin, and is frequently mentioned in the Assyr. inscriptions (cf. II K 19 12; Is 37 12). It maintained its importance to quite recent times (13th cent.), its ancient paganism continuing until the 11th cent. It was at or near H. that the family of Abram made their home after their migration from Ur, another great center of moon-worship (Gn 11 31 f., 12 4 f., 27 43, 28 10, 29 4). A range of mounds on both sides of the river is all that remains of the ancient city.

II. A son of Caleb (I Ch 2 46). E. E. N.

HARARITE, hê'ra-rait (הָרָרִי, hărārī), 'the mountaineer' (or 'the man from Harar'?): A designation of two of David's heroes. 1. Shammah (II S 23 11, 33; I Ch 11 34, where "Shagee" perhaps= Shammah). 2. Ahiam (II S 23 33; I Ch 11 35). It is possible that in I Ch 11 34 "Hararite" refers to Jonathan. E. E. N.

HARBONA, HARBONAH, hār-bō'na, hār-bō'nā. See Chamberlains, The Seven.

HARD SAYING, HARD SENTENCES. See Proverbs.

HARDEN (THE HEART): In the O T this expression occurs mainly in the story of the plagues (Ex chs. 7–10), or in reference to the rebellious spirit often manifested by Israel (cf. II K 17 14; Neh 9 16 ff.; Ps 95 8; Jer 7 26). The Heb. terms used are derivatives of three roots differing in meaning: (1) ḥāzaq, 'to be stable,' 'strong' ('to do a thing,' or 'to resist,' etc.), frequently found in the causative form with J" as the subject (cf. Ex 4 21, 9 12, 10 20, 27, 11 10, 14 4, 8, 17; Jos 11 20). Though the most of such passages belong to the later strands of the narratives, the same idea is found also in the early writers J and E. They did not think of this "hardening" as a capricious or arbitrary proceeding on God's part. It was rather a step in His sovereign process of judgment on those who had already incurred the Divine displeasure by first "hardening" their own hearts (cf. Ex 7 13, 22, 8 19, 9 35). There is no instance in the Bible of God "hardening" the heart of an innocent man simply to arbitrarily punish him. (2) kābhēdh, 'to be heavy,' with the idea of 'stubbornness' most prominent (cf. Ex 7 14, 8 15, 32, 9 7, 34, 10 1; I S 6 6). (3) qāshāh, 'to be (or make) hard,' figuratively applied to a moral disposition unresponsive to discipline or appeal (cf. Ex 7 3; Dt 2 30, and the reff. in Neh, etc., noted above). (4) 'āmats, 'to be strong' (Dt 15 7; II Ch 36 13).

In the N T we have echoes of the O T expressions, with no specific difference of conception (cf. Mk 3 5, 8 17; Jn 12 40; Ac 19 9, etc.). Paul's words (Ro 9 18) are not to be understood as taking absolutely no account of moral responsibility (see Sanday on Romans 9 18 in Int. Crit. Com.). E. E. N.

HARE. See Palestine, § 24.

HAREPH, hê'ref. See Hariph.

HARETH, hê'reth. See Hereth.

HARHAIAH, hār-hê'yā (הַרְהַיָּה, ḥarḥăyāh): The father of Uzziel (Neh 3 8). E. E. N.

HARHAS, hār'has (חַרְחַס, ḥarḥaṣ): The grandfather of Shallum, the husband of Huldah the prophetess (II K 22 14; Hasrah in II Ch 34 22). E. E. N.

HARHUR, hār'hūr (חַרְחוּר, ḥarḥūr), 'fever' (?): The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 51; Neh 7 53). E. E. N.

HARIM, hê'rim (חָרִים and חָרֵם, ḥārīm, 'dedicated,' or 'devoted': 1. The ancestral name of a large post-exilic family (Ezr 2 32, 10 31; Neh 3 11, 7 35, 10 27). Like other names in the list this may also be the name of the place where these returned Jews lived, though it is not yet identified. 2. The ancestral head of the third course of priests (I Ch 24 8), i.e., of the large priestly family called by this name (Ezr 2 39, 10 21; Neh 7 42, 10 5). 3. An individual belonging to 1 or 2 (Neh 12 15). E. E. N.

HARIPH, hê'rif (חָרִיף, ḥārīph, Hareph I Ch 2 51): 1. The "father of Beth-gader" in a Calebite genealogy (I Ch 25 1). The names here are place-names, by which movements of population are indicated, and probably the reference is to the town elsewhere called Haruph (I Ch 12 5). 2. A post-exilic family, or community, apparently living at Haruph, or Hariph (Neh 7 24, 10 19). In Ezr 2 18 Jorah instead of Hariph occurs. E. E. N.

HARLOT: Prostitution was a deeply rooted and widely practised evil in the ancient Semitic world. There was not only common prostitution for hire but religious prostitution, in which the votaries were attached to a temple or shrine, and gave themselves in this way to the service of deity, a practise closely connected with the deification of the reproductive forces of nature. In the O T the technical term for a religious prostitute (קְדֵשָׁה, qᵉdhēshāh) occurs but seldom (Gn 38 21 f.; Dt 23 17; Hos 4 14). The more general term for common harlotry (זָנָה, zānāh) (often rendered in AV by whore, whoredom, etc.) is used in both senses. In the O T legislation there are no specific statutes against common prostitution, except in Lv 19 29, due probably to the somewhat lower standard of morality. Against religious prostitution the attitude was much more positive. Not only were the priestly families to keep clear of such practises (Lv 21 7, 9, 14; Dt 23 18), but the many prohibitions and warnings directly against the practise of the Canaanite religion by Israelites, characterizing it as harlotry, are due, at least in part, to the degrading nature of such worship (cf. Ex 34 15; Hos 1 2, 4 12 ff.; Ezk 16 23 ff. etc.). In the prophetic period, and later, many voices were raised against common prostitution (cf. Gn 34 21; Hos 4 11; Pr 6 26, etc.). Children by such illegitimate connections could be brought up in the father's house (cf. Jg 11 1 f.). See Crimes and Punishments, § 2 (c), and Marriage and Divorce, § 4. E. E. N.

HAR-MAGEDON, hār″-ma-ged′ŏn (Ἁρμαγεδών) (Rev 16 16, Armageddon AV, Ar-Magedon RVmg.): An apocalyptic symbol for the site of the final conflict between the forces of good and evil. Its explanation depends on the form of the underlying Hebrew. Hippolytus is supposed to have read something like "Valley of Megiddo," with allusion to Zec 12 11 (cf. Lagarde, Analecta, 1858, p. 27, n. 18). Origen's (Eus. Onom. Sacr. ed. Lagarde, p. 187) reading was 'Ar-Miqqedem ('the plain before'). Luther's marginal gloss is based on the N T, but derives the word from ḥerem, 'curse.' Gunkel (Schöpf. u. Chaos, 1894) elaborates Hommel's suggestion that the Hebrew was har mo'ēdh ('mount of testimony'), and connects it with the Babylonian notion of a world-conflict on some mountain height. But, according to the commonly accepted view, Har-Magedon is simply a Greek transliteration of the Hebrew for 'mountain of Megiddo.' This does not occur in the O T, but the plain of Megiddo was proverbially the scene of decisive contests (Zec 12 11; Jg 5 19; II K 9 27, 23 29), and Gunkel's theory may be correct in so far as it accounts for a change, under Babylonian influence, of 'the plain of Megiddo' into 'a mountain of Megiddo.' HARNEPHER, hār′nē-fẽr (הַרְנֵפֶר, harnepher): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 36). E. E. N.

HARNESS: The AV rendering of shiryōn in I K 22 34. See Arms and Armor, § 9.

HAROD, hē′rŏd (הָרֹד, ḥărōdh): 1. The spring of Harod was the place where Gideon's army encamped before his night attack on the Midianites (Jg 7 1). It is now identified with 'Ain Jâlud, at the foot of Mt. Gilboa, at the W end of the valley Jezreel (see Map IV, D 8). 2. Shammoth, the Harodite, one of David's captains (II S 23 25; in I Ch 11 27 Harorite, which is clearly an error). J. A. K.

HAROEH, hă-rō′e or har′o-ĭ (הָרֹאֵה, hārō'eh), 'the seer': The name of a small clan or, possibly, of a place, in the genealogy of the Calebites descended from Hur (I Ch 2 52). Perhaps the name here is a mistake for Reaiah (cf. 4 2). E. E. N.

HARORITE, hē′ro-rīt. See Harodite.

HAROSHETH, hă-rō′shĕth (חֲרֹשֶׁת, ḥărōsheth): The headquarters of Sisera, the general of Jabin's forces (Jg 4 2, 13, 16). It is usually identified with el-Ḥarithiyeh, near the Kishon at the W. end of the Plain of Esdraelon. It is situated at the narrowest point of the defile, commanding the entrance to the plain (see Map IV, B 7). J. A. K.

HARP, HARPER. See Music and Musical Instruments, § 3.

HARROW. See Agriculture, § 4.

HARSHA, hār′shă (חַרְשָׁא, ḥarshā'), 'deaf': The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 52; Neh 7 54). E. E. N.

HARSITH, hār′sĭth, THE GATE. See Jerusalem, § 32.

HART. See Food, § 10, and Palestine, § 24.

HARUM, hē′rŭm (הָרֻם, hārūm): The ancestral head of a family of Judah (I Ch 4 8). E. E. N.

HARUMAPH, hă-rū′măf (חֲרוּמָף, ḥărūmaph), 'with pierced nose' (?): The father of Jedaiah (Neh 3 10). E. E. N.

HARUPHITE, hă-rū′fīt (חֲרֻפִי, ḥărūphī): In I Ch 12 5 Shephatiah is called 'the Haruphite,' i.e., he belonged to Haruph. See Hariph. E. E. N.

HARUZ, hē′rŭz (חָרוּץ, ḥārūts): The father of Meshullemeth, wife of King Manasseh (II K 21 19). E. E. N.

HARVEST. See Agriculture, §§ 6, 7, and Palestine, §§ 17–20.

HASADIAH, has″ă-dăi′ă (חַסַדְיָה, ḥăṣadhyāh), 'J" is kind': A son of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 20). E. E. N.

HASENUAH, has″ē-nū′ă. See Hassenuah.

HASHABIAH, hash″ă-băi′ă (חֲשַׁבְיָה, חֲשַׁבְיָהוּ, ḥăshabhyāh[ū]), 'J" has taken account': 1. Two Levites of the sons of Merari (I Ch 6 45 [30], 9 14; Neh 11 15). 2. A son of Jeduthun (I Ch 25 3, 19). 3. A Hebronite (I Ch 26 30). 4. The ruler of the Levites (I Ch 27 17). 5. A chief Levite under King Josiah (II Ch 35 9). 6. A Levite who returned with Ezra (Ezr 8 19). 7. One of twelve priests entrusted with the holy vessels (Ezr 8 24 =Neh 12 24). 8. One who helped repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 17) and sealed the covenant (10 11 [12]). 9. A Levite (11 22). 10. A priest (Neh 12 21). C. S. T.

HASHABNAH, hă-shab′nā (חַשַׁבְנָה, ḥăshabhnāh): The head of a post-exilic family (Neh 10 25). E. E. N.

HASHABNEIAH, hash″ăb-nē-ăi′ă (חַשַׁבְנְיָה, ḥăshabhnᵉyāh, Hashabniah AV), 'J" has thought of me': 1. The father of Hattush (Neh 3 10). 2. A Levite (Neh 9 5). E. E. N.

HASHBADDANAH, hash-băd′ă-nā (חַשְׁבַּדָּנָה, ḥashbaddānāh, Hashbadana AV): A scribe or priest (Neh 8 4). E. E. N.

HASHEM, hē′shĕm. See Jashen.

HASHMONAH, hash-mō′nā (חַשְׁמֹנָה, ḥashmōnāh): A station on the wilderness route (Nu 33 29 f.), not yet identified. E. E. N.

HASHUB, hē′shŭb. See Hasshub.

HASHUBAH, hă-shū′bā (חַשֻּׁבָה, ḥăshūbhāh): A son of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 20). E. E. N.

HASHUM, hē′shŭm (חָשֻׁם, ḥāshūm): 1. The ancestral head of a large post-exilic family also possibly the home of the family, as well as its representative men (Ezr 2 19, 10 33; Neh 7 22, 10 18). 2. A priest or scribe (Neh 8 4). E. E. N.

HASHUPHA, hă-shū′fă. See Hasupha.

HASIDÆANS, has″ĭ-dĭ′ănz or -dē′ănz. See Pharisees, § 3.

HASMONEANS, has″mo-nĭ′ănz or -nē′ănz. See Maccabees.

HASRAH, haz'rā or has'rā. See HARHAS.

HASSENAAH, has''ę-nê'ā (הַסְּנָאָה, ha-ṣᵉnā'āh): The "sons of H." repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 3). The name is peculiar, but as yet there is no satisfactory explanation (cf. Cheyne in EB s.v.). See also SENAAH. E. E. N.

HASSENUAH, has''ę-niū'ā (הַסְּנֻאָה, ha-ṣᵉnū'āh, Hasenuah and Senuah AV): Apparently a Benjamite clan-name (I Ch 9 7; Neh 11 9). See SENAAH. E. E. N.

HASSHUB, hash'ʊb (חַשּׁוּב, ḥashshūbh), 'thought of' (i.e., by God): 1. Apparently the ancestral head of a subdivision of Merarite Levites (I Ch 9 14; Neh 11 15). 2. The name of several individuals (Neh 3 11, 23, 10 23). E. E. N.

HASSOPHERETH, has''o-fî'reth. See SOPHERETH.

HASTY FRUIT: This expression is found in Is 28 4 AV. For the correct rendering see RV. E. E. N.

HASUPHA, ha-sū'fa (חֲשׂוּפָא, ḥăsūphā', Hashupha AV): The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 43 = Neh 7 46). E. E. N.

HAT: The Aramaic original, כַּרְבְּלָא, karbᵉlā' (Dn 3 21), is rare and occurs but once in the O T, and while "hat" (AV) conveys a wrong idea of its meaning, the RV rendering "tunic" is not certain. 'Turban' would seem to be nearer the correct meaning. See DRESS, § 8. E. E. N.

HATACH, hê'tac. See HATHACH.

HATE OF GOD. See GOD, § 2.

HATHACH, hê'thac (הֲתָךְ, hăthākh, Hatach AV): A eunuch at the court of Ahasuerus (Est 4 5 ff.). E. E. N.

HATHATH, hê'thath (הֲתָת, ḥăthath): A son of Othniel (I Ch 4 13). E. E. N.

HATIPHA, ha-tai'fa or hat'i-fa (חֲטִיפָא, ḥāṭīphā'), 'snatched away': The ancestral head of one of the subdivisions of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 54 = Neh 7 56). E. E. N.

HATITA, ha-tai'ta or hat'i-ta (חֲטִיטָא, ḥāṭīṭā'): The ancestral head of one of the subdivisions of the porters, or doorkeepers, of the Second Temple (Ezr 2 42 = Neh 7 45). E. E. N.

HATTIL, hat'il (הַטִּיל, ḥaṭṭīl): The ancestral head of one of the subdivisions of "Solomon's servants" (Ezr 2 57 = Neh 7 59). E. E. N.

HATTUSH, hat'ʊsh (חַטּוּשׁ, ḥaṭṭūsh): 1. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 22). The same person is probably referred to in Ezr 8 2, though the texts of Ch and Ezr are not quite harmonious. 2. A priest (Neh 10 4, 12 2). 3. One of those who helped in building the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 10). E. E. N.

HAURAN, hau''rān' or hō'ran (חַוְרָן, hawrān), 'hollow land': The fertile basin, now practically treeless, about 50 m. square and 2,000 ft. above sea-level, SE. of Mt. Hermon, between Jaulān and the Lejá (sometimes considered a part of the Hauran). In the Bible the name is found only in Ezk 47 16, 18 as marking the ideal border of Canaan on the E. The modern Arabs call essentially the same district el-Ḥaurân. The name occurs also in the ancient inscriptions of Assyria. In Græco-Roman times the same region was known as Auranitis, which was bounded on the N. by Trachonitis, and on the NW by Gaulanitis and Batanæa, all included in the kingdom of Herod the Great. Upon his death they fell to Philip (Lk 3 1). Troglodytes, doubtless, once occupied the rocky E. portion. G. L. R.

HAVEN: In the 'blessing of Jacob' (Gn 49 13) Zebulon is represented as dwelling at the "haven" of the sea and becoming a "haven" for ships. The Heb. ḥōph, however, means no more than 'shore' or 'beach,' and is so rendered where it occurs elsewhere (Dt 1 7; Jos 9 1; Jg 5 17 [AV]; Jer 47 7; Ezk 25 16). It is the proximity of Zebulon to the Mediterranean coast and to the Phœnicians with their maritime commerce that is implied. In Ps 107 30 the word māḥōz may mean 'city' rather than 'haven,' but this is not certain. On Ac 27 12 see FAIR HAVENS. E. E. N.

HAVENS, FAIR. See FAIR HAVENS.

HAVE TO DO WITH: In all instances but one this phrase is the rendering of idiomatic questions which read literally, 'What is there to you [sing. or pl.] and to me [or some other person],' i.e., what community of interest or what relationship can be supposed to exist between the two parties, a negative answer being implied (Jos 22 24; Jg 11 12; II S 16 10; I K 17 18; Mt 8 29, 27 19; Mk 1 24; Jn 2 4). In He 4 13 the literal reading is: 'with whom is our account' (or reckoning, λόγος), referring to man's accountability to God. E. E. N.

HAVILAH, hav'i-lā. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

HAVVOTH-JAIR, hê''voth-jê'ir (חַוֹּת יָאִיר, ḥawwōth yā'ir): A group of trans-Jordanic towns, or villages, conquered by the Manassite clan Jair (Nu 32 41, spoken of as an individual in Jg 10 4). The term ḥawwōth originally signifying a group of Bedawin tents, was later applied even to fortified cities (I K 4 13). Their number varies, Dt 3 4–60, Jg 10 4–30. The two traditions, one locating them in Gilead (I K 4 13), the other in Bashan (Dt 3 14), are not mutually exclusive; the former includes the latter. J. A. K.

HAWK. See PALESTINE, § 25.

HAY: The terms so rendered (ḥātsīr, Pr 27 25; Is 15 6 AV, and χόρτος, I Co 3 12) are very general in meaning, signifying grass or the early blade of grains, such as barley, rye, etc. See also PALESTINE, § 22. E. E. N.

HAZAEL, hê'za-el or haz'a-el (חֲזָאֵל, ḥăzā'ēl), 'God sees,' Assyr. Hazailu: A king of Damascus, c. 850 B.C. He had been singled out by Elijah to succeed Ben-hadad II, and when sent by that king to Elisha to inquire the issue of a sickness, he was told by the prophet that he would murder his master and inflict distress on the people of Israel. Though disclaiming the character which these words ascribe to him, he committed the crime upon the first opportunity. He was engaged in war against Israel during the reigns of Jehu and Jehoahaz (II K 10 32, 33, 13 22). He was succeeded by Ben-hadad III. Hazael is named in the inscription of Shalmaneser II as one of those whose territories he had invaded A. C. Z.

HAZAIAH, ha-zê'yā (חֲזָיָה, ḥăzāyāh), 'J" hath seen': The head of a post-exilic family (Neh 11 5) E. E. N.

HAZAR-ADDAR, hê"zār-ad'dār. See ADDAR.

HAZAR-ENAN, hê"zār-ê'nan (חֲצַר עֵינָן, ḥătsar 'ēnān), HAZAR-ENON, -ê'non (עֵינוֹן ", ח, ḥ. 'ēnōn), 'enclosure of the fountains': The (ideal) border of the land of Israel in the priestly theory of Israel (Nu 34 9 f.; Ezk 47 17, 48 1). No proposed identification seems satisfactory. E. E. N

HAZAR-GADDAH, hê"zār-gad'ā (חֲצַר גַּדָּה, ḥătsar gaddāh): A city in the S. of Judah (Jos 15 27). Site unknown. E. E. N.

HAZAR-HATTICON, hê"zār-hat'i-con. See HAZER-HATTICON.

HAZARMAVETH, hê"zār-mê'veth (חֲצַרְמָוֶת, ḥătsarmāweth): An Arabian clan, descended from Joktan (Gn 10 26; I Ch 1 20). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11. E. E. N.

HAZAR-SHUAL, hê"zār-shū'al (חֲצַר שׁוּעָל, ḥătsar shū'āl): A town in the S. of Judah near Beer-sheba (Jos 15 28), assigned also to Simeon (Jos 19 3; I Ch 4 28). It was reoccupied in post-exilic days (Neh 11 27). Not yet certainly identified. E. E. N.

HAZAR-SUSAH, HAZARSUSIM, hê"zār-sū'sā, -sū'sim ([סוּסִים] חֲצַר סוּסָה, ḥătsar ṣūṣāh [or -īm]), 'village of horses': A town in SW Judah occupied by Simeonites (Jos 19 5; I Ch 4 31). It may have had some connection with the commerce in horses carried on by Solomon (I K 10 28 f.). Site unknown. See also BETH-MARCABOTH. E. E. N.

HAZAZON - TAMAR, haz " a - zon - tê ' mar (חֲצָצֹן תָּמָר, ḥatsătsōn tāmār, Hazezon-tamar AV), 'Hazazon of the palm': A place identified with En-gedi (q.v.) in II Ch 20 2. But this does not well suit the other notice in Gn 14 7, which seems to demand a location farther S. That En-gedi was famous for its palm-trees seems well attested (Jos. Ant. IX, 1 2), and the notice in II Ch 20 2 is probably correct. But there may have been another town of the same name, possibly the Tamar in the S. of Judah, to which Gn 14 7 refers. See TAMAR. E. E. N.

HAZEL. See PALESTINE, § 21.

HAZELELPONI, haz"ę-lel-pō'nai. See HAZZELELPONI.

HAZER-HATTICON, hê"zęr-hat'i-con (חָצֵר הַתִּיכֹן, ḥātsēr hattīkhōn, Hazar-hatticon AV), 'the middle village': A place on the (ideal) N. border of the land of Israel (Ezk 47 16). It is probable that the original reading was Hazar-enon (q.v.). E. E. N.

HAZERIM, ha-zî'rim (חֲצֵרִים, ḥătsērīm), 'villages': This term, found in Dt 2 23 AV (cf. RV), refers to the original inhabitants of the coast region W. of Judah, who were expelled from their rude villages by the Philistine invaders. E. E. N.

HAZEROTH, ha-zî'roth (חֲצֵרוֹת, ḥătsērōth): One of the encampments of the Israelites between Sinai and Kadesh. In the list of stations it is situated between Kibroth-hattaavah and Rithmah (Nu 33 17 f.). It has been questionably identified with 'Ain el-Ḥadra, which lies 40 m. NE. of Jebel Mûsa, toward the head of the Gulf of 'Aḳabah. J. A. K.

HAZEZON - TAMAR, haz"ę-zon - tê'mar. See HAZAZON-TAMAR.

HAZIEL, hê'zi-el (חֲזִיאֵל, ḥăzī'ēl), 'God sees': A Gershonite Levite (I Ch 23 9). E. E. N.

HAZO, hê'zō (חָזוֹ, ḥăzō): An Aramæan clan, counted among the descendants of Nahor (Gn 22 22). Perhaps the Ḥazû in N. Arabia of the Assyrian inscriptions. E. E. N.

HAZOR, hê'zōr (חָצוֹר, ḥātsōr): 1. The capital of Jabin's kingdom (Jos 11 1), possibly at Jebel Ḥadkîreh W of the waters of Merom. Map IV, D 5. 2, 3. Two towns in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15 23, 25). The site of the first is unknown. The second is also called Kerioth-hezron (q.v.). 4. A Benjamite town (Neh 11 33), probably the ruin Ḥazzur, 4 m. NW of Jerusalem. Map II, F 1. 5. An unknown locality, mentioned in connection with Kedar (Jer 49 28 ff.). L. G. L.

HAZOR-HADATTAH, hê"zōr - ha - dat'ā (חָצוֹר חֲדַתָּה, ḥātsōr ḥădhattāh, Hazor Haddatah AV), 'new town': A place in the S. of Judah (Jos 15 25). Site unknown. The text here may contain an error. E. E. N.

HAZZELELPONI, haz"ę-lel-pō'nai (הַצְּלֶלְפּוֹנִי, hatstselelpōnī, Hazelelponi AV): A female name in the genealogy of Judah (I Ch 4 3). C. S. T.

HEAD: While nearly all the instances in which the word 'head' occurs in the Bible are self-explanatory, a few specimens of idiomatic usage may be noted. (1) "Heads" of "fathers' houses," or of the people or of tribes, etc., is a non-technical way of designating chieftains, princes, elders, etc. (2) To say that blood was "upon the head" of any one was to charge him with responsibility for the death of some one (cf. Jos 2 19; II S 1 16). (3) To say that any one 'lifted up' his head meant that he asserted himself in pride or power, etc. (cf. Jg 8 28; Ps 83 2, etc.). (4) To 'lift up' another's head was to exalt him to a station of power, etc. (cf. Gn 40 20; II K 25 27). E. E. N.

HEADBAND. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8.

HEADTIRE. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8.

HEAL, HEALING. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 7, and, in general, MIRACLES.

HEALING, GIFTS OF. See CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 7.

HEALTH: This Eng. word once had a much broader meaning than it now has. In the O T we find it representing: (1) 'ărūkhāh (from 'ārakh, 'to be long'), primarily meaning the new flesh that gradually forms in the case of a wound, then healing, or health (Is 58 8; Jer 8 22, 30 17, 33 6). (2) marp'ē and riph'ūth (both from rāph'ā, 'to heal'), 'healing.' (Pr 4 22, 12 18, 13 17, 16 24; Jer 8 15, and Pr 3 8) (3) In Ps 42 11, 43 5, 67 2 the Heb. means 'salvation,' 'help,' or 'safety,' and is so rendered in RV. (4) In II S 20 9 the Heb. is shālōm, the ordinary salutation (lit. 'Is there peace?' or 'Is it well with you?'). In Ac 27 34 cf. RV for the correct rendering. E. E. N.

HEAP, HEAPS: In Jg 15 16 the Heb. contains a play on words, the terms for 'ass,' 'heap,' and the verb 'to heap up' all being quite alike in sound. The RV rendering is probably not quite correct. We should read, "With the jaw-bone of an ass I have heaped them in heaps." On Jg 31 21, cf. RV. E. E. N.

HEAR, HEARING. See PROPHECY, § 6.

HEART. See MAN, DOCTRINE OF, § 8, and GOD, § 2.

HEART, DISEASES OF. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5 (7).

HEARTH: A word which occurs in the AV seven times; the RV retains "hearth" in only one of these passages, Is 30 14, and uses it in three additional ones. Several Heb. words are thus translated. (1) 'āḥ (Jer 36 22 f.) is correctly translated in RV brazier, which was used to warm the winter-room. The modern brazier is made of burnt clay, and, filled with coals, is placed in a hollow in the center of the room. When the coals are burned out, a wooden frame is placed over the brazier and on this a rug, to keep in the warmth. (2) kiyyōr (Zec 12 6 RV), a pan of fire, for domestic use, perhaps similar to (1). (3) mōqēdh (Ps 102 3 [4] RV), 'firebrand' (cf. Is 33 14, "burnings"). (4) yāqūdh (Is 30 14), 'fire burning on the hearth.' (5) mōqᵉdhāh (Lv 6 9 [2] RV), the hearth ('place of burning') on top of the altar, translated by some 'fire-wood.' (6) har'ēl = 'ăr'ēl (Ezk 43 15 f. RV; cf. Is 29 ff. RVmg.), "altar hearth," the upper portion of the altar on which the offerings were burned. See also ARIEL. Gn 18 6 is correctly translated (RV) "make cakes," omitting "on the hearth." C. S. T.

HEAT OF THE DAY. See TIME, § 1.

HEATH: There is no heath in Palestine or in the deserts near by. The plant referred to in Jer 17 6, 48 6 is thought to be a variety of juniper, with small scale-like leaves close to the stem, and consequently called 'arʿār ('naked'). E. E. N.

HEATHEN. See GENTILES.

HEAVE, HEAVE-OFFERING. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING, § 17.

HEAVEN (in the O T generally expressed by shāmayim; in the N T by οὐρανός, pl. -οί): The Biblical conception of heaven may be viewed either as a cosmological or as a religious one. These two, however, were not entirely separate and unrelated. It is because the cosmological notion was what it was that the religious conception was an outgrowth from it.

1. Twofold Interest.

Cosmologically, heaven is either one of the two great divisions of the universe (Gn 1 1) or one of the three (heaven, earth, and the waters under the earth, Ex 20 4). Usage, however, is not exact, and the twofold division of the universe, in the first case, as well as the threefold in the second, is made for the sake of presenting the idea of the universe exhaustively rather than for the sake of showing its parts analytically. A more fixed cosmological notion is given in the identification of heaven with the firmament, which was conceived in the form of an inverted bowl resting upon the earth and keeping the waters above separated from the waters under the earth. Besides this function, heaven, or the firmament, was viewed as the place in which the sun, the moon, and the stars were fixed (Ezk 32 7 f.; Gn 1 14 ff.; Mt 24 29). In this sense heaven is the sky (Mt 16 2). Whether heaven was considered by the Biblical writers as a simple vault with several divisions or stories is a disputed question. As a matter of fact, the conception is not the same through all the stages of Biblical cosmology. There is no clear trace of more than one heaven in the earlier Hebrew thought. By "heaven of heavens" (Dt 10 14; I K 8 27; Ps 148 4) is meant probably 'the height of heaven.' The word shāmayim is itself a plural form. Yet, as both the Babylonian and Persian cosmologies recognize seven heavens, and as the apocalyptic literature unmistakably presents this conception (Slav. En.; Asc. Is., etc.), it is no longer doubted that later Biblical thought adopted this idea. Yet there is no evidence of a belief in more than three heavens (cf. Paul's reference to the "third heaven," II Co 12 2; also cf. "all the heavens," Eph 4 10).

2. Cosmological Conception.

The religious conception of heaven is built altogether upon the fact that heaven is above. What is above is higher in dignity and worth than what is beneath. Hence heaven was viewed as the abode of God (I K 8 30). The prohibition of the making of images of God deepened and intensified this thought, and in the days of the restoration from the Exile the distinctive name of God became "God of Heaven" (Ezr 1 2, 5 10; Neh 1 4, 5). Meanwhile the same feeling which led to the disuse of the proper name Jehovah and the substitution for it of 'ădhōnay, 'Lord,' worked toward the exclusion of the word 'God' from the language of life and the substitution of 'heaven' for it, the LXX. furnishing the connecting-link in the transition. At the opening of the N T period "Kingdom of God" and "Kingdom of Heaven" were already synonymous and interchangeable (cf. KINGDOM OF GOD).

3. Religious Conception.

Besides the person of God, other superhuman beings, such as angels, are thought to dwell in heaven (Mk 12 25; Mt 18 10; Lk 2 13); also the Messiah and all preexistent beings, even the Torah and a prototype of the sanctuary are found there (He 9 23). Finally, the redeemed are to be gathered in heaven (II Co ch. 5; Jn 14 2 f.; cf. I Th 4 16 f.). It is there that Jesus has gone (I P 3 22), and it is thence that the Holy Spirit comes (I P 1 12). Heaven is, therefore, in general, the abode of the blest. But, at least in apocalyptic literature, suffering was not excluded from a certain portion of it. Slav. En. (7 2) represents the second heaven as the place where the fallen angels were held in prison in misery (cf. also Tests. of the Twelve Patr.), and the fifth heaven is inhabited by the Crigori, who are sad and silent on account of sympathy with their fallen brethren in the second heaven.

4. The Abode or Dwelling-Place of God and Other Beings.

In the N T the idea of heaven is very much spiritualized. At times it appears indeed as nothing more than a symbol of the state of ideal perfection (Eph 1 3, 2 6). When it is called paradise, for instance (Lk 23 43), it is in order to present the innocence of the Garden of Eden as restored in the final sinless condition of true believers. Hence the many characterizations of the heavenly life as the reward of the believer (Mt 5 12; Col 1 5; I P 1 4). Heaven is also regarded as lasting forever (Ps 89 29; cf. also Jer 33 25 of the sun and stars as everlasting). But such representations express the thought of the relative permanency of the celestial as compared with the terrestrial.

5. Spiritual Heaven.

In all the eschatological representations the renovation of the whole creation includes also the passing away of the heavens as they exist and the creation of new heavens (II P 3 10, 13; Rev 21 1 ff.). As they now stand, they are blemished by the moral imperfection of man, and must give place to substitutes which are absolutely free from sin. All these representations of heaven are conventional and pertain to the form rather than to the essence of religious teaching. Hence the perplexities that sometimes appear in the effort to make a full and consistent picture to the mind of the realities of heaven, either in the cosmological or in the eschatological sphere, must be relegated to the region where the figure is transcended by the reality. HEBREW ARCHEOLOGY: According to the literal meaning of the word, there would be included under archeology (ἀρχαιολογία, antiquitates) all that is known of the life and history of the Hebrews. In this sense, however, the word is no longer used. It has come rather to designate a historical discipline, which has for its subject-matter the scientific presentation of the specific natural and social conditions of the Hebrews.

1. Meaning of the Term.

So understood, archeology was given no attention either in ancient or in medieval times. At the most, all one can say is that contributions were made to it of a purely formal kind by Eusebius and Epiphanius. The former gave a list of the names of places mentioned in the O T, with the identification of the localities, in his work Περὶ τῶν τοπικῶν ὀνομάτων τῶν ἐν τῇ θείᾳ γραφῇ (Jerome translated it under the title, De Situ et Nominibus Locorum Hebraicorum Liber, commonly called Onomasticon). Epiphanius, in the second part of his writing, Περὶ μέτρων καὶ σταθμῶν, treated of Biblical measures and weights. From the Middle Ages we get only itineraries and reports of pilgrimages.

2. Neglected in Ancient and Mediæval Times.

With the closing years of the 16th cent., however, there began to be a decided activity in this department. After Sigonius had treated the subject of sacred antiquities in his De Republica Hebræorum (1583), Arias Montanus discussed the same subject in the Apparatus, Tom. iii, of the Antwerp Polyglot (1593). One of the first to cite Greek and Roman parallels and even Rabbinical literature was Cunæus. More abundant and more exact in this direction was the Moses and Aaron (1616) of Goodwin. Numerous treatises on individual branches of archeology followed. The most successful of these was the De Jure Naturali et Gentium of Selden. Biblical geography and natural history, however, received a noticeable impulse from Bochart, Reland, Celsius, and others. Most of the writings which appeared before the middle of the 18th cent. are collected in the Thesaurus Antiquitatum Sacrarum of Blasius Ugolinus, 1744–69 (34 vols., folio). But the most of these works lack true historical method. It was impossible for them to secure the right insight into the subject, because of their adoption of the typology of the Reformers, in accordance with which all ceremonies are to be explained preeminently as types and shadows of Christ.

3. Revival of Interest in 16th Cent.

A new impulse, however, was given to archeological science by Spencer (De Legibus Hebræorum, 1675). To be sure, many of his results are erroneous, his citation of proofs often arbitrary, and his interpretation still under the influence of typology. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that he smoothed the way for historical investigation in this field of study, recognizing and stating the problem of the origin of the legislation, and through his free attitude toward the cultus of the O T making a historical solution of the problem possible. Up to his time, all that was kindred to Hebrew cultus among the heathen was considered as simply imitation of the Biblical. The views of Spencer were opposed by Witsius in his Ægyptiaca, and by Lund in his Antiquitates. But neither of these scholars was able to master the historical task which Spencer had placed before himself, and, therefore, contributed nothing to the real knowledge of the subject. Starting with the fundamental assumption of the old method of interpretation, that Christ is to be found typically everywhere throughout the O T, their chief concern was to show that Israel's antiquities were rooted in mystery and that in them was an ever-present typical reference to Christ. Lund, in particular, carried this typical interpretation to the extreme, and thereby closed the way to the historical understanding of the subject. More fruitful were the labors undertaken in the fields of geography and natural history, which of course remained exempt from the dominion of this typology. Here belong, above all, the works of Bochart (Geographia Sacra, 1646, and Hierozoicon, 1663), and of Reland (Palestina, 1714).

4. Influence of Spencer and Others.

5. Influence of Rationalism.

The rationalism which prevailed in the 18th cent. exerted a stimulating influence on archeological studies in so far as the interest in dogma faded, and it was sought to give due weight to the facts themselves. Up to this time Israel had been looked upon only as incidentally addressed in the revelation intended for all mankind, and so it was scarcely possible to arouse any considerable interest in the national phases of Israel's history. The effort was now made, however, to understand Israel as one of the Semitic peoples.

6. Modern Research.

Under the stimulus of this new conception special attention was given to the study of the private and political life of Israel, and scholars sought to make use of the observations of numerous travelers in the Orient for a better understanding of Israelitic antiquities. Special interest was manifested in the sphere of the geography and topography of Palestine. Men like Hasselquist, Seetzen, Burckhardt, Van der Velde, Robinson and his traveling companion Eli Smith, Tobler, De Luynes, Wetzstein, and others, broke the spell of tradition and cleared the way for an untrammeled investigation in the realm of historical geography and topography. With due regard to the connection between the natural features of the land and its political history, Ritter, the renowned geographer, made good use of all the available material on the geography of Palestine. In more recent years, systematic researches in Palestine have been undertaken through accurate measurements, excavations, etc. In these enterprises England (The Palestine Exploration Fund, 1865), America (The Palestine Exploration Society, 1871), and Germany (Deutsche Palaestina-Verein, 1877) have been the principal participants. Among the investigations which relate to private and public antiquities, those of J. D. Michaelis are especially noteworthy. These concern more directly the subject of Israelitic law. It is true Michaelis' work suffers, like that of the rationalistic age in general, through failure to understand the religious uniqueness of Israel. From fear of falling into the error of the earlier archeologists—i.e., of estimating the customs and manners of Israel from the standpoint of a later age—rationalism fell into the opposite error of assigning their origin to barbarism and the primitive stage of civilization, where a keener eye might have seen other forces at work; and thus Israel was drawn down to the level of other peoples. The first attempt at a purely systematic organization of the discipline from the historical point of view was undertaken by De Wette. He was, however, surpassed by Ewald, because the latter not only had a truer appreciation of Israel's religious characteristics, but also possessed a deeper insight into the religions of Semitic antiquity.

7. School of Hengstenberg.

Against this historico-critical treatment of archeology, a reaction arose in the school of Hengstenberg. It found its appropriate expression in Keil's Archaeologie. Keil recognized in principle the necessity of the historical treatment, but he did not carry it through consistently, because in his attitude toward Scripture he was under the bondage of dogmatism. This was followed by the "theological" treatment of archeology still current, which is really nothing but a return to the old typological explanation of the Israelitic cultus. This typology was revived by Bähr in his Symbolik des Mosaischen Cultus. Bähr did indeed attempt to oppose the arbitrary method by setting up the rule that "symbols can only have such a meaning as is in harmony with the religious ideals of Mosaism and its clearly articulated principles." So Hengstenberg, Kurz, Keil, and others exerted themselves to remove some excrescences. In the main, however, they all assumed that without symbolism and typology it is not possible to reach a full understanding of the religious institutions of Israel.

8. Influence of Pentateuchal Criticism.

Through the general acceptance of the modern Pentateuchal criticism, which is associated with the names of Reuss, Graf, and Wellhausen, a powerful impulse was given to archeological research. The altogether different conception of the Priestly Code and its assignment to the post-exilic times necessitated an entirely new idea of the ritual development of Israel. In addition, has come the newly awakened interest in the history of religion, with fresh information in the field of Semitics, through the labors of W R. Smith, Wellhausen, and others, and the material brought to view by the excavations, especially in the Euphrates valley, through which we have secured a clear insight into the collective life of these peoples. We have thus for the first time come to know more accurately the ground from which Israel sprang, and can estimate with approximate correctness the influence which was exercised upon her by other peoples.

Literature: From the point of view of this modern critical school, Wellhausen has treated Biblical antiquities in his Prolegomena[6] (1897); in special chapters of his Geschichte des Volkes Israel (1889) Stade has taken up the customs and manners of Israel in its ancient period. Complete archeologies have been written by Benzinger (Hebräische Archaeologie, 1894), and the writer (Hebräische Archaeologie, 1894).

W N.

HEBREW LANGUAGE: Hebrew is one of the most important members of the Semitic group, closely related both to the Arabic and to the Aramaic, and emerging upon the field of history long after the Babylonian.

1. Affinities.

The name 'Hebrew' properly covers the dialects of the group of kindred peoples, Moab, Ammon, Edom, and Israel, as well as the Phœnicians. Hebrew was sometimes called the "language of Canaan" (Is 19 18), which would suggest that it was spoken by the Canaanites, or Amorites, who were dispossessed by Israel.

Very few inscriptions remain by which the primitive character of the language may be determined.

2. Monuments. The Siloam inscription (see JERUSALEM, § 34), dating perhaps from Hezekiah's reign (8th cent. B.C.), is the oldest on Palestinian soil. The Moabite Stone, written in a dialect almost identical with that of the O T, is about a century older. Phœnician inscriptions of various dates are also found, and coins of the Maccabæan period exist. The LXX. may be regarded as furnishing some data for the study of early Hebrew.

3. Linguistic Development and Change. The O T Hebrew has been so carefully worked over by the scribes that many of its irregularities have been obliterated. As originally spoken and written, it must have been more irregular than its present written form. It has been rhetorically developed, probably from an early period, as the result of its religious use. This has kept it pure from colloquial degeneration and has emphasized the fuller and more dignified forms of pronunciation, somewhat as the English Bible has enriched and preserved our speech. The LXX. is a witness to some pronunciations and spellings current about 250 B.C., which differ from the present Massoretic text. The Massoretes themselves worked with sedulous care upon the words and forms and have given to us a vocalization which represents the synagogue method of reading. This uniformity makes it difficult to distinguish between the form of the language at different periods, but, speaking broadly, there are two main divisions: the golden age of Hebrew literature, which produced the historical books (excluding Chronicles), most of the Prophets, and some of the poetical writings, and the post-exilic, in which were written most of the books of the Hagiographa and the three latest prophets. The differences in style, while not numerous, consist in a general lack of lucidity. In marked contrast to Chronicles, the Books of Kings are striking examples of simplicity, clearness, and brilliancy. Yet the general likeness is noteworthy in a language whose literary monuments cover 1,000 years.

4. Linguistic Structure. Hebrew has much in common with its kindred tongues, the triliterality of its roots, the structure of its verb system, its noun formation, its tendency to coordinate its sentences, together with a sparing use of particles, and the use of suffixed pronominal forms, where Aryan languages use separate pronouns. All these testify to a common origin and a close relationship to the primitive speech. Word-formation by prefixes, by prefixed words, and by suffixes shows that the Hebrew and its sister tongues occupy a different, if not a lower, stage in linguistic development from the Aryan.

(1) Lexical Peculiarities. Almost every Hebrew verb is reducible to three radicals, but there are besides a number of monosyllabic words, as well as those built up by means of weak letters, which seem to point to a biliteral stage. The personal pronouns and the numerals do not in all respects fall into the triliteral scheme. But the language has nearly obliterated the traces of the primitive Semitic. Most of the roots are expressions of physical facts and actions, and therefore intellectual and religious notions must be rendered figuratively and symbolically. This will account also for the strong anthropomorphisms of the O T.

(2) Grammatical Peculiarities. (a) The alphabet. The present character is a development from an older and more rudimentary form, which did not go out of use probably until about 300 B.C., traces remaining on coins even later (see ALPHABET). The alphabet is consonantal and contains a number of sounds difficult to represent by our characters or our vocal organs; prominent among these are the so-called gutturals. The LXX. recognized at least two gutturals, which are not represented in the present alphabet, but which are current in Arabic, and the letter Rēsh was evidently doubled in the LXX. period, but not later. The mode of writing from right to left is retained by most Semitic languages, and was probably prevalent everywhere in early times.

(b) Orthoepy and Orthography. The vowel system is a late addition to the Hebrew alphabet, the vowel signs being introduced probably about the 7th cent. A.D., to represent and preserve the traditional synagogue pronunciation. Together with them, a number of diacritical marks were invented to indicate doubling of letters and certain distinctions in sound. Three stages may be noted in the history of the Hebrew text: In the beginning, Hebrew writing must have had no indication of vowels or diacritical marks. It has been conjectured that the perpendicular line, occurring frequently and called Paseq, was the first sign introduced by Hebrew copyists to guide the reader (cf. James Kennedy, The Note Line in the Hebrew Scriptures). During the second stage, the characters for h (ה), y (י), and w (ו) were used to represent the long vowels ā, ī, and ū, but at a third and later stage, since these might be ambiguous—y standing for i or e, and w for o or u respectively—points and marks were added to make clear to the reader which guttural, palatal, or labial vowel was intended. The old letters were retained in many instances in connection with the vowel-points and were called matres lectionis. A prime peculiarity of Hebrew words is the vowel system and the vowel quantity A group of vowels, which are called 'tone long,' and which occur only in the accented and the adjacent syllable, are a unique product of Hebrew vocalization, for which there is no exact parallel in the other written Semitic languages.

(c) Etymology. The Massoretic reworking has introduced great regularity, especially in the books most read, but this ecclesiastical process has not obscured the fundamental principles of the language; it has in a measure accentuated them. The particles are most of them nouns which have undergone processes of denudation and metamorphosis, but they represent the earliest stratum of the language. The noun is to be considered the basis of the linguistic structure, and, with pronominal fragments appended or prefixed, it was used to express various phases of verbal action. Hebrew words (aside from pronouns, numerals, particles, and certain monosyllables) can be divided into two classes: monosyllabic, those that have one original formative vowel, and which may appear in the simple triliteral form ('segholates'), or augmented with prefixes or affixes; and dissyllabic, those that have two original formative vowels, which also may be augmented, generally by affixes, or strengthened by lengthened vowels or doubled consonants. This division applies not only to nouns but to verbs. In the former, by augmentations and vowel changes the various abstract, instrumental, local, and similar phases of state or condition may be expressed. In the latter, a language which might seem singularly rigid is given flexibility and life. The Hebrew verb by various modifications of the root is able to express simple, reflexive, causative, and intensive action; while the division into monosyllabic and dissyllabic forms is notably exemplified in the simple stem, where the perfect infinitive absolute and the participle belong to the dissyllabic group, and the infinitive construct, imperative, and imperfect belong to the monosyllabic.

The Hebrew verb lacks the richness of the Aryan in modal and tense development. There are but two so-called tenses, the perfect and the imperfect, and these are hardly analogous to the Greek, for the perfect represents a verbal idea as a fact, while the imperfect represents it as action. The time idea inheres in the context, and the perfect may represent a fact as taking place in past, present, or future time (cf. for the last, Is 9 6). The imperfect is the more flexible of the two, for by it all the shades of meaning of the Greek or Latin imperfect, future subjunctive, or optative are expressed. Particles and conjunctives being the real tense media, the so-called Hebrew tenses are more nearly moods. Hebrew syntax is much simpler than Arabic. Noteworthy constructions are the construct state, the form which a noun takes when governing a genitive; and the wâw consecutive, i.e., the conjunction, which, when used with an imperfect, 'converts' it into a perfect, and when used with a perfect 'converts' it into an imperfect. This idiom may be philosophically explained in accordance with the syntax of the tense, but it is peculiar to the Hebrew (and Moabite) among the Semitic languages.

Hebrew ceased to be a spoken language near the beginning of the Christian era. Aramaic supplanted it, but its literary development continued somewhat longer. In the Mishna it maintained a scholastic existence which was largely artificial, analogous to that of the ecclesiastical Latin.

5. Later Developments.

A. S. C.

HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE: The longest and most significant of the anonymous Epistles of the N T. It is peculiar both in its form and in the character of its contents. In form, it lacks the usual epistolary address, which may be due to a purposed anonymity on the part of the writer, or to the loss of its opening section (see § 6, below). At the same time, it contains a conclusion which, even if its closing verses were not originally a part of the Epistle (cf. Jülicher, pp. 152, 155), discloses the individuality of the writer and the personal conditions surrounding the composition of the letter. Furthermore, its material is arranged on the basis of a distinct and carefully wrought-out argument, beginning with a statement of theme in the opening verses of the first chapter and reaching its main position in chs. 5–10. In character, its contents are distinctly rhetorical in style, and present the writer's thought in a homiletic way that accompanies each step in the argument with practical exhortations, which are not only vitally wrought into, but practically overshadow the argument itself. In fact, it is not impossible that, though intended by the author in its present form as a communication to a definite group of Christians, it is the reproduction of an oral address elsewhere delivered and adapted to the situation of his readers. The early Christian age was more remarkable for its wealth of preaching than of writing, while the absence of an epistolary greeting, together with the presence of a personal conclusion, might be thus explained (cf. Burggaller, in ZNTW, II, 1908).

1. Peculiarity of Form and Contents.

The view-point of the author is that of a Jewish Christian who holds that in the message given in Jesus Christ God has spoken to us His final word, from which there can be no safe return, even to the best that is in the Divine revelation of the past. This position, which is announced in the thematic statement of the opening verses (1 1, 2a), is immediately followed by a preliminary argument regarding the Son's sonship and theocratic relation (1 2b–4 13). This is made up of two statements: (1) The superiority of the Son to the angels of the old dispensation (1 2b–2 18), which is first presented (1 2b-4) and proved (1 5-14), and then followed with an extended resultant exhortation to be attentive to the Divine word of the Son, who, in His mission to earth, went through man's experience that He might lift man up to His salvation (ch. 2). There is then given (2) the second statement, viz., the superiority of the Son to Moses (3 1-6), upon which follows a warning to be attentive to the Son's voice (3 7-19), accompanied by a reminder of the limitation of the Divine promises to the present dispensation (4 1-13). Then is stated the main argument regarding the superiority of the Son's priesthood over that of the old dispensation (4 14–12 29), which, after a preliminary exhortation to loyalty (4 14-16), is opened with a formal discussion of the Son's perfect fulfilment in Himself of the qualifications for this office (5 1-10), and, after further exhortation (ch. 6), finds its main claim in (a) the statement of the supernatural character of His priesthood (ch. 7), and (b) its ministerial relation to the new and the better covenant of this final dispensation (8 1–10 18). This is then followed by exhortations, warnings, and encouragements directed toward the holding fast of their Christian profession (10 19–13 17), which brings the Epistle to its closing words (13 18-25).

2. Argument.

The situation disclosed by this argument is obviously one in which the readers are under pressure to abandon the religion of Christ (cf. 2 1-3, 3 6, 12 f., 4 1, 11, 6 4-6, 10 26-39). It is not certain that this abandonment involved a return to Judaism, though the references to "dead works" in 6 1, 9 14, and to the crucifying of the Son of God "afresh" in 6 6 (cf. 10 29) give plausibility to such a view. If it did, however, the return was not of the character of the Galatian apostasy, in which the ceremonial of cult was considered necessary to salvation (see GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO, §§ 2, 3); it was rather of such a character as found in this O T cult an entire religious contentment. In any case, the situation was one of an indifference toward the Christian faith, and did not necessarily involve a propaganda and a polemic (cf. 3 12 f., 4 11, 5 11, 10 25,

3. Situation of the Readers.

12 12-16, 25), though there was more or less danger of the errors of false teaching (13 9). To what this pressure was due may be difficult to state definitely. It would seem, however, to have come, not so much from the severity of the afflictions the readers had been suffering, as rather from their long continuance (this seems to be the peculiar significance of the exhortations to patience in such passages as 3 6, 14, 4 1, 14, 10 23 f., 36, 12 13), and from the obloquy with which these sufferings were accompanied (11 26, 13 3, 13). It is not, indeed, necessary to assume from 12 4 that their persecutions were bloodless, for the statement refers to their struggle against the temptations which beset them and may, in a figurative way, mark it simply as lacking in determination. Their leaders had doubtless suffered death (13 7), and even some of their own number had been imprisoned (13 3), while the persecutions they had endured upon their acceptance of Christianity had been real in character and of considerable proportion (10 32-34). But these had been a long time since (5 12-14). Their present emergency, whatever its extent, had its force more in the bitterness of a scornful ostracism than in the suffering of bodily harm (12 2 f., 13 13).

4. Readers.

As to the identity of the readers it is evident, from the argument addressed to them, that they must have been Jewish Christians. Unless it was purely academic reasoning, the author's use of the Hebrew Scriptures and the Hebrew cultus as the background for his thought gets all its significance from the Hebrew character of those to whom he wrote. The familiar reference to O T personages, the confident reasoning from O T angelology and Mosaic institutions, can only presuppose Jewish readers, as we understand the racial conditions in the early Christian Church. This is confirmed by the situation which the argument discloses. Where the readers were located, however, may not be so evident; for while it is clear from such passages as 5 11 f., 10 32-34, 12 1-5, that this Epistle is a communication to a definite group of Christians, yet the circumstances of the readers are not concretely enough referred to for any betrayal of their local surroundings. Jerusalem, Rome, and Alexandria have all been urged; but in view of the decided difficulties involved in each of these localities, it may not be unwarranted to consider that the readers belonged to the general Ephesian region of Asia Minor. Some parts of this district had been colonized with Jews from Babylon, among whom not impossibly may have grown up a Christian community dominantly Hebrew in character. In addition to this, no district outside of Alexandria itself was more affected with Jewish Alexandrianism; so that the peculiar typology involved in the author's argument gains distinct significance, if those to whom the argument was addressed were Jews of an Alexandrian rather than a Palestinian cast of mind. This locality would be confirmed by the evidently close relationship between the readers and Timothy (13 23), since this region was the special field of Timothy's evangelistic work. The suggestion of Walker (Expos. Times, Dec., 1903) that the readers are to be located in Cyprus, though it has much to support it, is of value only as far as it shares the foregoing points in favor of an Ephesian region.

5. Place and Time.

That the letter was written from Italy (outside of Rome, as seems to be implied in the note regarding Timothy's release from prison and his expected joining of the author, 13 23) is clear from the salutation phrase in 13 24 (Ἀσπάζονται ὑμᾶς οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰταλίας), which indicates the persons so greeted as of (belonging to) Italy, rather than as journeying from Italy (cf. usage of ἀπό in Ac 10 23, 12 1, 17 13—especially the passage from Pseudo-Ignat. ad Her., § 8, cited by Westcott in Com., p. xlix). The time of writing will depend on the definiteness with which the persecutions referred to can be identified. As the Epistle was used by Clement of Rome (96 A.D.), it may have been written early enough to refer to the Claudian Edict (48 A.D.), or late enough to refer to the Jewish War (65 A.D.). The later date is perhaps preferable, though it is clear that much of the significance of all the old dispensation references would be lost were the writing after the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A.D.).

6. Author.

Special interest in the study of the Epistle gathers around the identity of its author. It is clear that he was a Jewish Christian of decided culture, and one whose culture was of that peculiar character which belonged to Alexandrianism. Fundamentally different as he is from Philo in his main position, he was evidently acquainted with the philosophy of that writer, whose allegorical method of interpretation he does not hesitate to use (ch. 7), with whose peculiar conception of the typological relation between the visible and the invisible world he is in large agreement (6 5, 8 2, 9 23, 11 10, 16, 12 22-28, 13 14), and to whose phraseology he exhibits often striking similarities (cf. 11 10, 13 14 with passages from Philo cited in Drummond, II, 53; 10 27, 12 29 with II, 17; 8 5, 9 23 with I, 289; 1 7, 14 with I, 289; 6 20, 7 25 with II, 193, 235). This makes it impossible that the Epistle could have been written by Paul, in spite of the general tradition to that effect held by the Eastern Church and the later (after the 4th cent.) acquiescence in this tradition on the part of the Western Church. Equally out of the question is the theory of an authorship by Luke or by Clement of Rome, though supported by a similarly early tradition. The suggestions that Apollos was the author (first made by Luther), or Barnabas (first revived by Cameron, a Scotch critic of the 17th cent.), seem to be the only reasonable possibilities. Apollos was an Alexandrian Jew, a man of culture, learned in the Scriptures (Ac 18 24; cf. I Co, passim) and of special power in reasoning with the Jews (Ac 18 25 f.). In addition, he may be said to have belonged especially to the Ephesian region, where he first entered upon his specific Christian work (Ac 18 24-26). At the same time, as far as we know, he was not specifically a disciple of the original Apostles; so that, if 2 3 be taken literally, it militates against his authorship. On the other hand, Barnabas was a Levite, of the island of Cyprus (Ac 4 36), which would bring him easily within the influence of Alexandrianism. He was of close connection with, indeed of special esteem and influence among, the original disciples

(Ac 4 36, 9 26 f., 11 22 f.), though he worked for some time with Paul in Antioch (Ac 11 26, 15 35), and, after his separation from the Apostle, went with Mark to his home land in Cyprus (Ac 15 39). Perhaps, from Paul's reference to him in I Co 9 6, he was known in ministry to the Corinthian Church; possibly, through the greeting to the Colossians from Mark, as "cousin of Barnabas" (4 10), he was known to the church of that place. At the same time, we have no knowledge of his literary ability, while the inaccuracy of statement regarding the Tabernacle contents (9 1 ff.) and the priestly ritual (7 27) does not well agree with his Levitical connection. He may have felt, however, that the typological character of his argument did not call for circumstantial accuracy in its details. In fact, inaccuracies in general, if not these particular ones, might be more reasonably looked for from one who, like the Levite Barnabas, was acquainted at first hand with the confused observance of Jewish ritual in his day, than from one who, like the outsider Apollos, must have got his knowledge of Mosaic institutions solely from a study of the Scriptures. The suggestion of his name gains distinct support from Tertullian's reference of the Epistle to him in a way to show that he understood it to be the generally accepted idea of his day (De Pudicitia, 20). In fact, it would seem that Tertullian had MS. authority for the presence of Barnabas' name in the address of the Epistle (cf. Harnack, Chronologie, I, 477). This tradition assumes new significance if, as suggested by Zahn (§ 45, p. 303), its origin is to be found among the Montanist churches of the Province of Asia. The suggestion of an authorship by Silas (Münster, 1808) has nothing positive to commend it, while that of a double authorship by Aquila and Priscilla (Harnack, in ZNTW, I, 1900) is more curious than convincing.

7. Relation of Epistle to N T Thought.

While the Epistle belongs in general to the group of N T writings that views Christianity from the Jewish rather than the Gentile point of view, it is so individual in its conceptions as to occupy a unique position, and its individual standpoint is so significant as to make it one of the most important books in the N T collection —especially in the matter of its Christology.

This peculiar character is due not alone to its method in presenting its thought, but also to the striking character of the thought itself. In general, its central idea of the finality of Christianity (1 1, 2a) is shown by the fact not only that the O T Covenant was by its nature insufficient to bring about the fulfilment of the promises made to the Fathers, but that these promises, in view of the essential character of Jesus, were fulfilled completely and finally in the new Covenant established by His mission on earth. This is worked out by laying emphasis (a) on the essential superiority of Jesus over the personages of the O T dispensation—the angels as helpers in the Covenant (ch. 1), Moses as a servant of the Covenant (ch. 3), the Levitical priesthood as ministrants of the Covenant (chs. 7–10); (b) on the essential insufficiency in the administration of the old Covenant —its priesthood (7 11-28), and its sacrifices, especially those of the Day of Atonement (10 1-18); (c) on the essentially temporary character of the old Covenant —the Covenant itself (7 22, 8 6-13), and its ordinances (9 9 f.); (d) on the essentially earthly type-character of its institutions—the tabernacle (8 2, 5, 9 1-11, 23 f.), the sacrifices (9 12-14, 25 f.), the ceremonies (9 18-22), the whole cultus (10 1; cf. 12 18-27). This view of the perfection in finality of Christianity naturally involves the idea of the supremacy of Christ Himself. This supremacy of Christ is expressed in the conception of Him as Son in His relation to God. It is this Sonship which makes Him superior to the angelic messengers of the old dispensation (ch. 1 f.), to the Mosaic leaders of the old Covenant (ch. 3 f.), and to the priestly ministrants of the old cultus (chs. 5–10). It places Him in an absolutely different class from them and makes Him in a Divine way what no human being could be, however exalted in nature, or character, or office, able to speak the final word of God to man (chs. 1–3), and to accomplish the final task of God for man (chs. 5–10). At the same time, great as is the author's conception of this Divine message and mission, it is merged with a peculiar human view of the experience of temptation and suffering which it involved (2 10, 18, 4 15, 5 7 f., 12 2 f.), with the result that this Divine Son is brought into closest sympathy with humanity in its struggles (2 11, 4 15), and brings humanity into directest access to God for help (2 9 f., 17 f., 4 16, 6 18-20, 7 19-25). In discussing the main proposition of his argument—viz., the priesthood of Jesus—the author illustrates it by the Melchizedek priesthood to prove its eternal efficiency (7 1-24) and contrasts it with the Aaronic priesthood to show its supreme worth (7 26-28). The supremacy of that worth is shown in the fact that the sacrifice which He offers for humanity's sin is the sacrifice of Himself (7 27, 9 14), and the eternal character of that efficiency is shown in the fact that it is carried into heaven itself and is constant before the Throne of God (6 17-20, 8 1, 9 24). Salvation is conceived characteristically in the theocratic sense of ideal covenant relations with God (6 13-20, 8 8-12, 9 15-22), and is thus viewed not only as sacrificial cleansing from the guilt of sin (9 11-14, 24-28, 10 1-4, 10-12), but as triumph over the struggle with sin (3 12-14, 4 11-16, ch. 11), idealized in the rest of fellowship with God (4 1-10, 7 22-25, 12 14-24, 13 13 f.). Faith is, therefore, looked at rather from the O T idea of a confident expectation and trust in the Divine promise than from the Pauline idea of a personal relationship with Christ (cf. especially ch. 11). At the same time, while the technical Pauline idea is not definitely present, the conception of faith as the heart of all relationship to God is so gloriously urged that the necessity of it in the Christian relationship, to Christ Himself, underlies implicitly all the author's view of the Christian religion.

LITERATURE: For Introductions, that of Jülicher (Eng. transl. 1904) gives an admirable discussion of the Epistle's thought, as well as of its critical questions; that of Zahn (Eng. transl. 1908) is exhaustive on the newer critical problems. For Commentaries, those of Rendall (1888), Westcott (1892), Davidson (in Handbooks for Bible Classes), Edwards (in Expositor's Bible, 1888), Weiss (in Krit. Exeget. Kom. üb. d. N T [3], 1897), and Von Soden (in Handkom. z. N T [3], 1899) are valuable. In addition, the special Biblico-Theological treatises of Riehm (1858), Bruce (1899), and Milligan (1899), as also Drummond's two-vol. work on Philo Judæus (1888), Hort's Judaistic Christianity (1894), and the articles of Bartlett in the Expositor, 1902, 1903, 1905, should be studied. See also ch. VI of Scott's N T Apologetic (1907).

HEBRON, hî'brun (חֶבְרוֹן, ḥebhrōn), 'association': I. A city, probably the oldest in Palestine (so Jos. BJ, IV, 9 7), said to have been built seven years before Zoan (Tanis) in Egypt (Nu 13 22). Its early name, Kiriath-arba (q.v.), was apparently revived after the Exile (Gn 23 2; Jos 14 15; Neh 11 25). The crusaders called H. "The Castle of St. Abraham." It is now known as el-Khalîl, 'The Friend,' i.e., Abraham (cf. Is 41 8, Ja 2 23). The history of the patriarchs centers about this ancient city (Gn 13 18, 35 27, 37 14). At the time of the Conquest (Jos 10 5, 36 f.) H. was made a city of refuge (Jos 20 7) and consigned to the Kohathite Levites (Jos 21 11); but the surrounding fields and villages were given to Caleb (Jos 21 12), who drove out the sons of Anak (Jos 15 13 f.; cf. Nu 13 22). David was twice anointed king in H. (II S 2 4, 5 3), and reigned here as king of Judah for seven and a half years (II S 2 11). Here six sons were born to him, one of whom, Absalom (II S 3 2-5), later chose his birthplace as headquarters for his rebellion (II S 15 7, 10).

After the time of David, H. is seldom mentioned in Scripture (only II Ch 11 10; Neh 11 25). In post-exilic times it came into the possession of the Edomites, from whom it was recovered by Judas Maccabæus (I Mac 5 65; Jos. Ant. XII, 8 6). It was seized without bloodshed by the rebel Simon bar-Gioras, but was soon recaptured and burned by the Romans (Jos. BJ, IV, 9 7, 9). From the 7th to the 11th cent. A.D., H. was under Moslem rule. It was then taken by the crusaders and, in 1100, was bestowed as a fief upon Gerhard of Avennes. In 1167 it became the seat of a Latin bishopric; but in 1187 it fell into the hands of Saladin, and has ever since remained in the possession of the Moslems, who reverence it as one of the four sacred cities of the world.[1]

H. is 19 m. SW. of Jerusalem, with which it is now connected by a good carriage road. The unwalled city lies about 3,000 ft. above sea-level, and stretches from NW. to SE. along a fertile valley[2] (cf. "the vale of Hebron," Gn 37 14), which is noted for its vineyards. Map II, E 2. An ancient reservoir in the lower part of the valley may be the "pool" by which the murderers of Ish-bosheth were hanged (II S 4 12). H. is the seat of a ḳâimmaḳâm ('lieutenant-governor'), and has a Turkish post-office. The population numbers about 18,000, of whom 1,500 are Jews, the remainder being Moslems of a fanatical type. The manufacture of glass and of water-skins are important industries. The most conspicuous object in H. is the structure enclosing the traditional cave of Machpelah (q.v.).

II. 1. A son of Kohath, the son of Levi (Ex 6 18), whose family, the Hebronites (Nu 3 27), or "sons of Hebron" (I Ch 15 19), are frequently mentioned in enumerations of Levites. In the time of David the clan was large and powerful (I Ch 26 30-32). 2. In I Ch 2 42 f. H. is probably not the name of a person, but of the Calebite town (cf. I, above). 3. A town of Asher (Jos 19 28 AV); see EBRON.

HELLENISM. See Greece.

HELLENISTIC AND BIBLICAL GREEK: The term 'Hellenistic,' as applied to the Greek language, includes approximately the entire development of Greek from Alexander the Great to the close of the period of antiquity, except in so far as the ancient dialects continued partially to be spoken, and the Attic was revived in the literary movement known as Atticism (2d–5th cent. A.D.). On the whole, it is best designated as the Koinē (i.e., the 'common' speech), though this historic term was not altogether uniform in its application by ancient writers. This Koinē, the world-speech of Hellenistic civilization, was contrasted by them with the Ionic, Attic, Doric, and Æolic dialects. The so-called Atticists, e.g., Moeris, designated it as the language of the Ἕλληνες, in opposition to that of the Ἀττικοί; accordingly ἑλληνίζειν means 'to speak the Hellenistic language,' and Ἑλληνιστής (Ac 6 1, 9 29) is 'a (Hellenistic) Greek-speaking Jew.'

1. The Term 'Hellenistic.'

The geographical limits of the Koinē were approximately identical with those of Alexander's empire. Within these limits the Hellenization of Asia Minor was the most complete of all; in fact, at the close of antiquity it came little short of being a purely Greek country—the original native languages (such as the Lycaonian, Acts 14 11, or the Galatian) exercising no longer any important influence upon its speech. In Syria and Egypt the Koinē was the language rather of the Hellenistic cities, of which there were a great number, as, for example, in the district from the Phœnician coast to some distance E. of the Sea of Galilee. In general, however, the Palestinian Jews acquired Greek only as the language of commerce, or for literary purposes, and still maintained their Aramaic mother tongue. Cf. on the expansion of the Greek language, Thumb, Die griechische Sprache (Strassburg, 1901), and the literature mentioned therein; also Mahaffy, The Progress of Hellenism in Alexander's Empire (Chicago, 1905).

2. Geographical Distribution of the Koinē.

Alongside of this spoken Koinē, which was the language of general intercourse, stands the written, or literary, Koinē, which was modified in varying degrees by the traditional classic idiom. The best sources of the vernacular Koinē are those texts which stand nearest to the spoken language, viz.: (1) The Papyri of Egypt, and the Inscriptions, especially those of Asia Minor; although it appears more distinctly in private papers than in the official documents of the state or magistrates. The linguistic investigation of these sources has progressed little beyond its earliest stages. The most important works are Schweizer, Grammatik der pergamenischen Inschriften (Berlin, 1898); Nachmanson, Laute und Formen der magnetischen Inschriften (Upsala, 1903); Mayser, Grammatik der griechischen Papyri aus der Ptolemaeerzeit (Leipzic, 1907); Crönert, Memoria græca Herculanensis (Leipsic, 1903). (2) The literary works of the period. These and the following sources are, in comparison with the former, less significant. With certainty only those elements in these sources can be assigned to the spoken language which deviate from the classical, or are confirmed by unmistakable evidence from the Koinē itself. On the other hand, even the Atticists were influenced by the spoken language of their time (cf. W. Schmid, Der Atticismus in seinen Hauptvertretern, 5 vols., Stuttgart, 1887–1897). Xenophon and Aristotle were forerunners, Polybius the first representative, of this new literary form; the Biblical and early Christian Greek is related, however, most closely to the language of the Papyri and the Inscriptions (see below). (3) The Atticizing grammarians of the Imperial Period, who give rules for writing good Attic (cf. especially the Λέξεις Ἀττικαί of Moeris, also extracts from Phrynichus and the Ἀνταττικιστής). What they reject belongs to the vernacular, what they defend, explain, and authenticate is foreign to the living language. (4) Græco-Latin grammatical manuals (Hermeneumata) and vocabularies, as, e.g., the Colloquium Pseudo-Dositheanum, edited by Krumbacher (Festschrift für Christ, Munich, 1891), or the Greek glosses found in the Corpus Glossariorum Latinorum. (5) The Greek elements preserved in the Latin, Gothic, and Oriental languages. These last exhibit features of the type of Greek spoken in Syria and Asia Minor. Cf. Thumb, Die griechischen Lehnwörter im Armenischen (BZ, ix, 1900); Krauss, Griechische und lateinische Lehnwörter im Talmud, Midrasch, und Targum, I (Berlin, 1898). Indispensable to any complete investigation is (6) a comparison with Modern Greek. Since Modern Greek, including its various dialects (excepting Tsaconian, the descendant of the ancient Laconian), is to be traced directly back to the vernacular Koinē, it can be taken advantage of in the reconstruction of the latter, just as the Romance languages serve for the reconstruction of vernacular Latin. Middle and Modern Greek often put us in a position to supplement and explain the written tradition of the Koinē, since much which appears as peculiar therein already shows the characteristics of Modern

3. Material for Study of the Koinē.

Greek; as, e.g., forms like ἔλαβαν (= ἔλαβον), or the substitution for the infinitive of ἵνα (Modern Greek νά) with the subjunctive. The evolution of Modern Greek also determines our whole conception of the Koinē as a universal dialect which absorbed and supplanted the older ones. Helps to the study of Modern Greek are: Hatzidakis, Einleitung in die neugriechische Grammatik (Leipsic, 1892); Thumb, Handbuch der neugriech. Volkssprache (Strassburg, 1895); Bibliography in G. Meyer, Neugriech. Studien I. (Vienna, 1894); Thumb, In dogerm. Forschungen, Anzeiger i, vi, ix, xiv, xv. As to method, compare also Thumb, Principienfragen der Koine-Forschung (Neue Jahrb. f. d. klass. Altertum, xvii).

4. Development of the Koinē.

The foundation of the Koinē is to be sought in the Attic dialect, which had already extended itself beyond its original boundaries by the time of the Delian League. The conquests of Alexander the Great and the establishment of their dominions by his successors transformed the Attic into a world-speech, but in the process it lost certain of its peculiarities (ττ instead of σσ, for example), simplified its accidence, and incorporated certain foreign elements into its vocabulary. The beginnings of this transformation are already visible in Xenophon and the Later Comedy. The ancient dialects were gradually supplanted by the Koinē during a period extending from the 4th cent. B.C. to about the 2d cent. A.D. The Ionic offered the least, the Doric the greatest, resistance—an Achaian-Dorian Koinē forming the transition to the Attic Koinē in the case of the latter. This process was naturally not without its effect upon the Koinē itself; at the same time it is quite incorrect, with Kretschmer (Die Entstehung der Koine, Vienna, 1900), to assume that the Koinē grew up out of a variegated mixture of the ancient dialects. The Ionic excepted, these dialects left only a few grammatical traces in certain circumscribed localities (i.e., the territories occupied by the ancient dialects), and the majority of these traces were lost during the later (Modern Greek) development. Even the lexical influence exercised by the ancient dialects does not seem to have been important. Only the Ionic has shared extensively in the evolution of the Koinē. The nouns in -ᾶς, -ᾶδος, and -οῦς, -οῦδος, the frequent employment of neuters in -μα, for example, are Ionic in origin; though, most of all, the Ionic constituents of the vocabulary of the Koinē give it an Ionic tinge, quite different from that of pure Attic prose. To these tonic elements belong also the poetic words which appear often in the Papyri and the New Testament, and still live in Modern Greek (compare ἀλέκτωρ, βαρέω, βασταζω, ἐντρέπομαι, ἔριφος, πειράζω, ῥάκος, ὠρύομαι, and many others). Such words have found their way not only into the language of poetry, but also, and quite independently, into the Hellenistic vernacular. It is, therefore, quite erroneous, for example, to adduce the medical expressions in Luke, which are Ionic in origin, to prove his acquaintance with Hippocrates. The most of the characteristics which differentiate the Koinē from Attic are the result of a natural further development. The influence exercised by the non-Grecian languages on the grammatical structure of the Koinē is almost negligible. In vocabulary it is that of the Latin alone which is noticeable (cf. Wessely, Die lat. Elemente in der Gracität der Papyri, Wiener Stud., xxiv and xxv; O. Hahn, Rom und Romanismus im griech. Osten, Leipsic, 1907), while the Oriental languages (e.g., the Rabbinical Hebrew) received from Greek far more than they contributed.

5. Dialectic Differences.

Out of this wide expansion of the Koinē it follows à priori that there must have been dialectic differences in it; i.e., that it was spoken differently, for example, in the Peloponnesus, in Asia Minor, and in Egypt. Since, however, the written texts preserve the characteristics of the common language more than does the spoken word, it is only occasionally possible to show the existence of dialectic idiosyncrasies within the Koinē. Nevertheless, we know that the Greek of Egypt and Asia Minor possessed certain phonetic peculiarities (e.g., the interchange of τ, δ, θ). On the other hand, the assumption of a peculiar Alexandrian, or Macedonian, Greek has no justification in the evidence preserved to us; for what is adduced by ancients or moderns as Alexandrian or Macedonian is only common Hellenistic property after all.

6. Biblical Greek.

Equally erroneous is it to call Biblical Greek (LXX. and N T) a peculiar dialectic variety of the Koinē. It is neither an example of "Jewish-Greek" (which is nowhere demonstrable) nor of a specific "Christian Greek," but rather a monument of the Koinē as a whole—the first earnest and really magnificent attempt to employ the spoken language of the time for literary purposes. The contest between the "Purists" and the "Hebraists," which, with its dogmatic presuppositions, lasted for centuries (the former seeking to demonstrate the Classic, the latter the Hebraistic, coloring of Biblical Greek), is to-day utterly pointless; since the study of the Koinē ever more unmistakably shows the Hellenistic character of the language of the Bible. In this respect Deissmann's work, beyond all others, has been epoch-making; cf. particularly his Bible Studies (2d ed. Edinburgh, 1903).

Biblical Greek shows in phonetics, morphology, syntax, and lexicography the characteristics of the contemporary Hellenistic Greek. In the light of recent investigation it is no longer possible to maintain that it is colored through and through with Semitisms. Much of that which was regarded as due to "Hebraism" proves to be the property of the Koinē, and the result of the inner development of the language. The specifically Christian conceptions (like εἰς τὸ ὄνομα, σωτήρ, εὐαγγελιστής) are also formed in the spirit and with the resources of the Koinē. Even the translation-Greek of the LXX. and the Apocalypse betrays the influence of the Hebrew original to a much less degree than is generally supposed. The criterion of the presence of Hebraisms must, therefore, be used with the greatest caution in literary problems (e.g., in the establishment of an Aramaic original in the case of N T writings). While it is true that N T Greek presents a unity with the Koinē, nevertheless it may be fairly questioned whether it does not betray traces of a local origin. It is quite possible to suppose that the text of the N T was written in the Asiatic or Egyptian Koinē, just as certain ancient manuscripts (A and ℵ) point toward an Eastern origin through some of their phonetic peculiarities. Even within the N T it is possible to surmise different shadings not only in style, but also in dialect. So that it does not seem accidental that the Gospel of John shows peculiarities in the use of the possessive pronouns, which are at the same time criteria of some of the Modern Greek dialects of Asia Minor.

In the history of Greek as a literary language, Biblical Greek represents a thoroughgoing innovation. Nevertheless as Christianity became more and more Hellenized, theological writings reverted completely to the old models of profane literature, and the language of Christian writers not only lost the charm of originality characteristic of Biblical Greek, but came even to participate in the artificialities of Atticism.
